upon to point out a mistake, or to complain of an apparent delinquency. This candid course, on the part of our editorial brethren, has been of infinite use to us, and we are not ashamed to confess the fact. It has cheered us in every new effort to excel, and, at the same time, it has enabled us to correct real errors, and to explain such as were only imaginary. Relying on this manly characteristic of the American press, our object has always been to maintain with its conductors a friendly and confidential interchange of sentiments, on all questions relating to the merits of the Lady's Book. And, under this full reliance on its integrity, we have never imputed its praises to the heartlessness of puffery, or its censures to the maliciousness of jealousy or envy. In this respect—we mean in their censures—our cotemporaries appear to have adopted the principle which we have seen very greatly applauded in Horace—that of delicacy. It was said of Horace, that he appeared in a good humor even while he censured; and, therefore, his censures had the more weight, as supposed to proceed from judgment and not from passion.

CLASSICAL.—Our friend of the "Mountain Banner," Rutherfordton, N. C., has proved himself both a scholar and a gentleman, by his happy and complimentary quotation from the Bard of Mantua. We must confess, however, that we were not a little startled at his Latin, being somewhat doubtful of our own capacity to find out its meaning. Nevertheless, with the aid of an old lexicon, which bore upon its leaves many a thumb-mark, impressed in our younger but not happier days, we finally accomplished the task of rendering it into tolerable English. Deeply sensible of the compliment he has paid to our artistical embellishments, we beg him to accept the following original stanza, in High Dutch, in return for his polite and classical allusion:—

Heil dir! hüfflicher Schüler,
Du freund des Sängers thums!
Glücklich sei all dein Ringen
Nach Kränzen ew'gen Ruhms;
Dein Name immer lebe,
Von jedem Spott befreit,
Und sei in künft'gen Jahren
Gefelert wie du est heut!

We have been favored, by the accomplished author and poet, Richard Coe, Esq., with a glance at the manuscript of the new book of stories and poems for children now in course of preparation by him, and can assure our readers that a treat is in store for them and their little ones, when the book is published, which will be in a very short time.

"Many a gem of purest ray serene" will be found in its pages, and the chasteness and beauty of its language are beyond praise, while the many quaint expressions put into the mouths of the children cannot fail to excite a smile of pleasure. The book is to be called "The Old Farm Gate, or Stories and Poems for Children," and will be published by Daniels & Smith, No. 36 North Sixth Street, Philadelphia. We hope that every one of our subscribers will secure a copy, and thus aid in the instruction and refinement of their children.

STEAMBOATS ON THE DELAWARE.—The steamboats on our beautiful river commenced their regular trips early in the spring. The "John Stevens," Capt. Keeter, made her appearance, fine as a new fiddle, quiet and orderly as ever, and greatly to the satisfaction of numerous friends living in the various towns and villages on both shores of the Delaware, from Philadelphia to Trenton. We happened to be on board the "Stevens" when she made her first trip, and were not a little amused with the cheerful remarks of the passengers as they recognized old familiar faces, and renewed the last summer's acquaintance with those from whom they were separated by the cold formalities and ice-bound restrictions of a long and severe winter. We presume the same scene was enacted on board the "Trenton," Capt. Hinkle, the "Forest," Capt. M'Makin, and the "Sun," Capt. Whildin.

While on the subject of our elegant steamboats, we will introduce to such of our readers as have not already made his acquaintance, Capt. Charles H. Miller, the affable and gentlemanly proprietor of the Florence Hotel. Florence has been laid out upon one of the highest sites on the Delaware between Camden and Bordentown, and is therefore an airy and beautiful retreat for those who may have leisure to leave the city during the warm and dusty season. The accommodations for boarders and for transient visitors at the Florence Hotel we are assured are as comfortable, as agreeable, and as home-like, as at any establishment of the kind in the Union.

ELEGANT FURNITURE.—On another page you will find an elaborate plate representing an elegant furnished room. The plate was furnished us by Mr. George J. Henkels, 173 Chestnut Street, whose extensive establishment contains the largest assortment of fine furniture in the country. Mr. Henkels imports from Paris all of the new styles of drawing-room and boudoir furniture as soon as they are out, manufactures from samples, or sells the sets as imported. His store is a perfect furniture bazaar, and is one of the most attractive promenades in Philadelphia. It is quite a relief to walk through his rooms and see the new patterns of drawing-room furniture, so light and graceful, and entirely different from the style so long in use. It is well known that the European furniture will not wear well in our climate, if it is finished in Europe: to obviate which difficulty Mr. Henkels imports it in the unfinished state, and has the furnishing and upholstering, which are most essential to its durability, done in his own establishment. Mr. Henkels also hangs the most tasteful curtains to match his sets of furniture, affording his patrons the facility of furnishing entirely from one establishment, and saving the annoyance of purchasing from numerous stores. We earnestly recommend all our readers to call and see Mr. Henkels, and assure them they will be welcome, either as visitors or purchasers.

GAS FIXTURES.—We ask the attention of our readers to the advertisement of Archer & Warner, on the cover of the Book for the present month. Their establishment is at 119 Chestnut Street, and is probably one of the most extensive and brilliant in the city. Those who may visit their store will find many articles to admire that are not alluded to in their advertisement, except under the general terms, Chandeliers, Brackets, &c. Under that of Chandeliers they will find a beautiful variety, from the splendid and richly ornamented crown chandelier of Queen Victoria, to a neat, plain republican sample, within the means of almost any comfortable housekeeper. There is also a beautiful article called the Florence bronze, which, when first brought to this city by one of our wealthy citizens, was considered imitable. Our friends, however, have produced admirable imitations, equal in every particular to the beauty and the elegance of the original. Among the minor articles, is a newly invented candlestick, which will attract the attention of the cleanly and prudent housekeeper, as well on account of the security it affords against accidents, as for its economy. But these articles, to be appreciated, must be seen, and our advice to the ladies is, to enlighten themselves by examining the splendid chandeliers, brackets, pendants, lamps, girandoles, &c. &c. to be found at the store of Archer & Warner.

EDITORIAL "RAPPINGS."—We are often greatly amused at the conduct of not a few of our editorial brethren in remarking with severity upon the fashions of the ladies. On that particular subject, however, as well as on many others which occupy the watchful and dignified solicitude of these guardians of public opinion, there is, unfortunately, nothing said that is original—nothing that will relieve the mind of that sense of weariness which comes over it while listening to a tale repeated for the tenth or twentieth time. There is, indeed, something extremely sepulchral in their "rappings," though we may not admit that they evince anything "spiritual." They are generally mere repetitions of the grave remarks of some cynical theorist who lived a thousand years ago, or of some snarling editor whose spirit, such as it was, passed from time to eternity without leaving any other than the most gloomy traces of its humanity. For our own part, we can truly say that we never yet knew a man addicted to carping at the fashions of the ladies who was not, if unmarried, a very pestilent friend and companion, or who, if married, was not a terror to his wife and daughters, and even to the domestics in his kitchen.

But what is very singular in the conduct of this class of "rappers," is the shrewdness they evince in never saying a word in relation to the "fashionable excesses" of the gentlemen, in which some of them participate to the most ridiculous extent. If our dear lady readers, through the "medium" of their imaginations, could be transported into the presence of one of these "restless spirits," as he sits in his editorial chair, "rapping" away at the "ribbons" and "furbelows," the "ringlets," the "wasp-like waists" and "dragging skirts" of their whole sex, what, think you, would they see? Probably they would expect to behold a seriously severe, crissed and crabbed old gentleman, sustaining, in his own costume, some appearance, at least, of consistency with his anti-fashionable principles. Verily, if they should anticipate meeting such a person in their bitterest assailant, in nine cases out of ten would they be disappointed. In reality, they would be more likely to behold a youthful individual with a weasel-like expression of countenance, "sickled o'er" with a very "spiritual" looking beard, or melancholy moustache, his head decorated with a Kossuth hat and feather, his body "laced" in a for-castle monkey-jacket, and his legs tight-bound in pantaloons made of stuff adorned with figures resembling the large cross-blocks in a floor-cloth. And this, with pen in hand, would most probably be the unspiritual "rapper" they would find at work tearing to tatters the garments of the ladies, and striving to "knock" out of his cranium the recollection of some stale censure, or of some staler criticism, which had, perhaps, been floating about since the times of Horace or of Diogenes; and all in ridicule, most likely, of his mother and his sisters, and even of his plainer, more genteel, and more discreet wife, if, unfortunately for her, he should be possessed of one. Talk of milliners and ladies' fashions as you will, even of those which are unfashionably fashionable, still we deny that they can, with justice or consistency, be complained of by those who adopt the outré and ridiculous costumes of the fashionable tailors.

Behold them. We have taken these very interesting personages from that most agreeable paper, the "Boston Carpet Bag."

Centre-Table Gossip.

We have often quarreled with the caprice of fashion that has, in a measure, banished centre-tables from the parlor and sitting-room. They are to us suggestive of a pleasant coterie, of new books, and knitting, glancing crochet needles, well stored work-baskets, and a free, social chat, full of pleasantry and grace, touching upon novelties, lingering over a choice sentiment, calling out the silver arrows of repartee. We enter a plea for centre-tables, with the cheerful family group, in the softly shaded light, and the pleasant converse that is thus brought forth. Nay, we will have centre-table gossip of our own, light, sketchy, and discursive; not aiming at deep criticism or labored homilies, but catching at topics of passing interest, looking a little into the foreign magazines which contribute their variety, or making occasional quotations from favorite authors nearer home. And to this we bid you welcome, gentle and industrious readers, one and all, with your crochet, or the aforesaid knitting, or even the mysteries of pointing and scolloping, by way of employment. We will institute a new order, and you shall henceforth be known as our "Ladies of the Round Table."

SPRING-TIME IN THE CITY.

There are many of our popular writers—Longfellow and Mr. Marvel included—who discourse most daintily upon the coming of Spring in the country. They seem to think that all the poetry of the season is confined to the theatre of fields and woods alone; they forget that Nature's rival, Art, has also its seasons, and that the denizens of streets have their own peculiar enjoyment of these balmy days of Spring.

"The red-flowering maple is the first to blossom," says Longfellow. "Its beautiful purple flowers unfolding a fortnight before the leaves. The moosewood follows, with rose-colored buds and leaves; and the dogwood, robed in the white of its own pure blossoms. Then comes the sudden rain-storm, and the birds fly to and fro and shriek. Where do they hide themselves in such storms? at what firesides dry their feathery cloaks? At the fireside of the great hospitable Sun—to-morrow, not before; they must sit in wet garments until then."

The many-colored ribbons of the milliner—runs our city record—are the first to unfold, brightening the promenade with their varied shades of green and purple, emblematic of the season for which they are intended. Blossoms as delicate as those of the field and the forest, but far less fragile, nod gayly from their glass receptacles to the passers-by. Silks of rainbow hues follow as you pass the plate windows of the fashionable shops, with laces seemingly as fragile as the web which the spider weaves over the branches of the sweetbrier. Muslins that seem wrought by fairy fingers into their exquisite patterns of blossoms or clustering berries are scattered among them, and you catch a glimpse of shawls woven with their brilliant hues in the looms of Ind, or scarfs that are heavy only with many-colored embroideries, beyond. Beautiful women, with bright and eager faces, pass by in bright procession. They lead little children by the hand, looking so fresh and childlike in their new bonnets of open straw, and their dresses of star-spotted cambrics and delicate muslins. They, too, are enjoying Spring, and the new wardrobe it has brought as an offering to them. Now they pause in delight—these beautiful passers-by—before a window that has more than Arabian enchantment to them. Then a sudden shower from the blue April sky drives them to take refuge in the gayly-painted omnibus, that is also renewed in honor of the spring-time, until the bright smile of to-morrow's sunshine shall call them forth again.

The marketwomen nod gayly to their favorite customers, as they offer the first bouquets of violets and crocuses. The itinerant vender of greenhouse plants brightens the street corners with his pots of roses and mignonette, and sweet-scented heliotrope. Birds sing to you from the window-ledge, and hop blithely from porch to porch, of their gilded city homes. And thus we have daily marked the coming of spring-time on the parade.

ENTRAIN.

Apropos of spring-time, but at the risk of incurring the disapprobation of some of our lady friends, we venture a remonstrance against the still prevalent practice of wearing trains in the street. They may remember the picture in a "Punch" of last winter, where mounted cannon were represented as novel Parisian street-sweepers, but scarcely more formidable to us seem the skirts "dragging their slow length along," cleansing the crossings at the expense of neatness, comfort, and good taste. In the first place, American ladies are noted for their lavish street toilets. Silks, and even satins, that no English or French woman would think of wearing unless in a carriage or drawing-room, our ladies put into constant street service. The immoderate length of dress was never intended by its inventor to figure in this way before the public. The French woman, whose immaculate white stockings have never a spot of dust, would shudder at the idea of walking with ankles—let us speak plainly—soiled and damp by the constant contact with the muddy drapery. We protest against it, as a "Lady's Book," in the name of neatness, common sense, and economy. Discoloration is inevitable; fringes are an ordinary sequence; and, when such expensive silks are worn as we see at the present day, few purses can or ought to afford the outlay. Neither grace nor expediency can be urged in their favor, and we trust the recent introduction of street-sweepers into our large cities will preclude the necessity of our ladies extending any farther aid to the sanitary resolutions of the Common Council.

PENNSYLVANIA AVENUE.

The "Southern Scenes" contributed by Mrs. Neal to a daily of our city, during her winter in Charleston, is followed up, we notice, by "Letters from Washington," in the pages of the "Southern Literary Gazette," under the able conduct of W. C. Richards, Esq. Here is a picture of Pennsylvania Avenue on a bright Spring day:—

"Gay groups of promenaders pass us, and carriages with liveried servants dash by. The broad street, lying, as it were, in the very face of the sunshine, is lined with shops and dotted with hotels, whose doors pour forth the butterfly crowd we see, every moment reminding us that the calm sobriety of Charleston is left far behind. There go a bevy of belles, velvet-cloaked and satin-bouneted. The large moustache in attendance could only have flourished in the shadow of a foreign legation, or the pinchbeck gentility of foreign travel. Yet the patient donkeys on the Market Square flap their ears in silence, nor dare venture a bray of recognition as their brethren pass. That low carriage, with its bright liveries and gayly-dressed occupants, has the arms of the Spanish minister upon the panel. Close behind, at the top speed of two spirited horses, but in an open vehicle, is the new-made English minister, Mr. Crampton, whose recent promotion is still a subject of congratulation among his numerous friends. That tall, graceful figure upon the side-walk, bending down in earnest conversation with the elaborately "got-up" individual at his side, represents one of the Central American States; his companion, a neighboring, and now prominent commercial interest. And all this kaleidoscope in less than a square of our promenade."

THE USE OF SUNSHINE.

In our homes, in our hearts, the sunshine is ever welcome; and the gentle author of "The Maiden Aunt" could not have chosen her text more wisely to interest the household circle. The tale which she has woven from it comes to us in the delicate print and paper which distinguish the publications of the liberal Appleton brothers, in this way making the "good wine" of the contents still more acceptable. The author of "The Maiden Aunt" we need not introduce to our readers. We speak of her tales more particularly here, as we do not know of any that we more gladly see on the centre-tables of our lady friends. They are characterized, as in this instance, by a graceful style and pure principles, and have none of the excitement of the modern French romance. We select, from the many quotable passages, a sentiment that will find a trembling response in many hearts who have like sacred trusts. The young clergyman, whose trials and triumphs it portrays, is left with the charge of his orphan sister, ten years younger than himself:—

"He did not know, till long afterwards, how holy a safeguard this one sweet duty, scrupulously fulfilled, had been to his own soul. He could not estimate the ceaseless, gentle influence of the thought of that innocent child upon his heart and life; the shield had been worn so unconsciously, that he knew not how many fiery darts it had quenched. We are sometimes apt to tremble and despair, when we think of the havoc which one encouraged sin may have wrought in our spiritual life; let us take comfort in remembering that our merciful Father may give a sphere as large, an effect as lasting, to one good work heartily and humbly carried through."

"I can, because I ought," is the second title of another pretty volume, the companion of this glimpse of sunshine, "Margaret Cecil." We commend it also as a story of interest, inculcating principles which every woman needs to sustain her in the common duties of daily life—her little world, whence flows an influence upon society, and even upon nations, which she can scarcely estimate. "Cousin Kate," the author, is heretofore a stranger to us, but perhaps may be of the family to which "Cousin Alice," of juvenile lore and memory, belongs.

Nor must we pass over in silence the first part of a new volume of travels, from the same publishers, by the well-known author of "Amy Herbert," Miss Sewell. It is in a beaten track, to be sure, but written for the interest and comprehension of the children of a village school. "The Journal of a Summer Tour" will be welcome as a recreation from school duties on this side the Atlantic. It is as well to mention, since Miss Sewell is so well known as a church writer, that the volume has nothing sectarian in it.

HURRIED WOOING.

"Happy is the wooing that 's not long a doing," says the old saw, in contradistinction to another equally familiar, which hints croakingly of a leisurely repentance.

Acting upon the first, was a courtship that we were the involuntary witness of not many weeks since. The lady was placed under the protection of a nice young gentleman in moustaches and braided overcoat, on the Camden ferry-boat, and secured the seat directly before us in the cars. It was situate in that narrow passage where the "ladies' cabin" cuts off one-half the space, and we were therefore, to all intent, save for the occasional visit of the conductor, a private party.

The young lady belonged to that large class typed by Dickens in the youngest Miss Pecksniff. "She was, indeed, a gushing thing." The gentleman was apparently well versed in the delightful art of winning hearts. They were talking of sympathies by the time we reached Beverly; Burlington saw the first tender glances exchanged; at Newtown, the shrill shriek of steam echoed a volley of sighs on either side; and, when the change at Amboy was made, she hung upon his arm as lovingly as the bride of a fortnight. Fortune placed us dos-a-dos to the interesting couple, on a lounge in the steamboat cabin; when we neared Castle Garden, her head reclined in graceful weariness, after a five hours' ride, upon his shoulder, while he lamented in tender accents their approaching separation, impressed with the well-known, affecting quotation—

"I never loved a dear gazelle."

The gazelle was probably unaware how many spectators were observing the "gladdening glances of her soft, black eye." We have more to say on this style of public courtship hereafter.

Fashions.

DESCRIPTION OF STEEL FASHION PLATE.

The peculiarity of fashion plates at the present day is the grace of their design and execution, not less than the fidelity which gives the reigning mode. For instance, the present plate, gracefully called by our artist, "May Day among the Children." The figures are arranged with a natural, lifelike effect: the background is a fine landscape, and, in the tout ensemble, we have a beautiful picture, as well as an accurate report of the fashions. This is not achieved by any other Journal des modes, save the celebrated "Moniteur," for which the best artistic skill in France is employed.

We linger over it lovingly, from the graceful young anglers to the floating water lilies, and can scarcely bring ourselves to the bald description of the costumes, which it is alone our province to give.

Fig. 1st.—A child's walking-dress of pink cashmere, with a light black satin bar. It is made quite simply, the waist being half high, and open in the square Marquise style. Narrow black velvet ribbon and small velvet buttons, are the only trimming. A frill of lace edges the neck, and the undersleeves are of plain cambric, with a narrow band of embroidery at the wrist. Gaiter boots and short pantalottes. Bonnet of white drawn silk.

Fig. 2d.—Dress of pale violet India silk; a small coat, or cloak, of gray merino, with a narrow trimming of embroidery in blue, a plain, neat pattern. Pink cottage bonnet of drawn silk. Gray gaiters, and short pantalettes of scoloped embroidery.

Fig. 3d.—Lad's costume, very plain and neat. Light gray trousers, long, and fitting loosely. Dark green jacket, buttoned only at the throat. A simple plaited cambric frill in the neck. Leghorn hat, with black ribbon.

Figs. 4th and 5th.—Two children's dresses. The little girl, pale blue mousseline or cashmere dress, embroidered sacque of white merino. Straw cottage bonnet and blue ribbons. The little brother has a loose buff sacque and skirt, with white linen trousers, and an embroidered edge. Bronze gaiters, with patent leather tips. A jaunty little cap—Oakford's pattern.

Fig. 6th.—Dress and pantalettes to match, of richly embroidered white cambric; the dress has a small berthe, and short sleeves. Sacque of pink silk, with a ruche of the same pinked. Hair in close ringlets.

Fig. 7th.—Lad's dress, dark brown jacket and trousers; the latter plaited over the hips. White vest, and small white linen collar and waistbands. The hat is beaver, of Oakford's "Spanish Sombrero" pattern. Blue and white stockings, and patent leather slippers.

We especially commend the boys' costumes, as neat and simple, in direct contrast to the undersleeves and open shirt fronts, which so many think necessary.

CHIT-CHAT ON PHILADELPHIA FASHIONS FOR MAY.

The shop windows present such a bright array, that we scarcely know in what department of fashion to commence to interest our lady readers. Dry goods and millinery, jewelry and laces, are all putting on their most attractive shapes and colors.

But to commence with the indispensable bonnet, since that is the first thing that seems imperative in its claims. The change has scarcely been needed so soon this Spring, as is usual, from the lightness of the prevailing winter style. It is a little singular that the coldest season known for years should have been marked by the most open and gossamer bonnets that it was possible to invent. Parisian artists had evidently not consulted the almanac, or that invaluable family companion for once failed to prophesy truly.

The bonnets of the past winter have evidently afforded hints for those of spring. The shapes of those we have seen are square in effect, the brim flaring still more, the crown short and square. In straw there is infinite variety. The cap crown, being too marked a fashion to last long with general adoption, seems to have gone out entirely. Brown, gray, and variegated straws are very neat, but will scarcely do for full dress. Gimps are made exquisitely light, having almost the effect of blonde; a very pretty style is white rice, or Neapolitan straw, with a broad gimp insertion in the brim, having the same air as the blonde in satins and velvets the past winter. Some entirely plain white Dunstables have very pretty shapes, and there is a yellow corded straw, which, mixed with a plainer braid, will be much worn. In a straw hat, everything depends on the lightness and elegance of the shape; fine or coarse matters very little, so the air of the bonnet is stylish. As the most suitable, and, at the same time, most durable material for summer wear, they can never go entirely out.

The brims are lined, if gimp, with a very full shirring of thulle, just shading the face. A blue edge is sometimes seen in plainer straws, or, for middle age, satin is much in favor. The thulle has the most delicate effect, and is deepened by being placed over white crape. All face flowers are mixed with it; and, indeed, no face loses by the association. Crape flowers are much worn, and are lighter than any others. Pink and blue convolvulus, with hanging stamens, are among the favorites. Sprays of heath, either pink or violet, lily of the valley, clematis, azalias, etc. etc., are all very gracefully imitated. They are worn by themselves, or with a few green leaves, as side or face bouquets.

Blonde cape, extending around the inside the brim, have been introduced; at best, they have a prim and formal air. Some bonnets, particularly if the straw is light, have only the cape and strings, an edge of blonde or straw finishing the former. The strings are not so wide as they have been, and are rather longer. Another very distingué style is a broad plaid scarf ribbon, of rich materials and light colors, thrown across the crown as a kind of curtain, and tying under the chin. This is taken from the hats of the early spring. The cape should be of the same. Others have two puffs of silk following the straw, between the crown and brim. In pale pink, violet, green, or blue, this is a very neat style. Ribbons are, of course, in every shade and variety. Plaids will be worn a little, but the most lady-like styles are the plain colors enumerated above, about four inches in width, with a pearly or feathered edge. White, with the edges in those shades, is also in good taste: a mixture of colors in ribbons, though often worn, are rarely entirely ladylike. Drawn bonnets, with insertions and edges of white blonde, will also be worn. The most elegant one we have seen was at the rooms of Miss Wharton, whose taste is unrivaled and unquestioned. The crown was of silk; a light brim of drawn thulle had a novel and graceful effect; face trimming pale blue convolvulus, in a cloud of thulle.

We have left little space for dresses, and can scarcely more than enumerate the materials and chronicle a prominent change in undersleeves and collars. The spring silks are principally of mode colors, striped, plaided, and waved. The stripes are sometimes of embroidery patterns, in different colors. India silks are in every variety of beautiful shades, and will be very much worn as a neat and inexpensive dress. Pale violet, blue, green, and mode colors predominate. Their advantage is, that there is no up or down, right or wrong side, and will bear turning, and even washing in clear soapsuds. The favorite pattern is small plaids. We also recommend them for aprons.

There is the usual list of grenadines, bareges, and muslins, which we will speak of more particularly in our next.

Silks are principally trimmed with ribbons that match; bows, of every shape and variety, are used on the corsage and down the front breadths. They are even placed at the head of the opening of the sleeve, which is now on the inside of the arm, rather than towards the elbow. Some of these are simple knots, others have floating ends. The favorite Parisian style of the present month is called les flots, or "the waves;" they are composed of five loops of ribbon, falling one below the other, and spreading at the last. One placed at the bottom of the opening in the corsage for the chemisette, one on each sleeve, and from five to seven from the bodice to the hem of the skirt. Quillings of ribbon surround the opening of the corsage and the edge of the sleeves.

Collars, both of lace and embroidery, are worn nearly twice as large as formerly, lying upon the shoulders instead of encircling the throat. But we will speak more fully of this, with gloves, gaiters, scarfs, parasols, &c., in our next.

FASHION.

J. H. B. B. B. B.

ENGRAVED BY F. H. B. B. B.

FRIENDSHIP OFFERING.

Engraved for Godey's Lady's Book

Digitized by Google

FRANKS & CO. LONDON.

THE COTTAGE

TWO PLAIN COTTAGES.

HINCLEBY

FIRST STORY.

SECOND STORY.

First Floor.—1, entry; 2, parlor, 17 feet 6 inches by 13 feet 6 inches; 3, bed-room, 9 feet 6 inches by 7 feet 6 inches; 4, press, 4 feet by 2 feet 6 inches; 5, closet, 5 feet 6 inches. Second Floor.—1, bed-room, 13 feet 6 inches by 6 feet 6 inches; 2, bed-room, 10 feet 6 inches by 10 feet; 3, bed-room, 10 feet 6 inches by 9 feet 6 inches; 4, room, 6 feet 6 inches.

Perspective View.—The "Plain Cottages" are of the simplest character, without ornament or projections of any kind; that on the right has the roof projecting over the sides and gables, about ten inches. The "Ornamented Cottages" are of the same dimensions, but changed in external appearance by adding a porch over the front door, caps to the lower windows, dormer windows—roofs projecting over the sides and gables eighteen inches, with drapery in the gables of one, and brackets in the other; also, the foundation raised two feet above the surface.

These two cottages are to be built with good materials—the frames of spruce or pine—siding, $\frac{3}{4}$ boards, eight inches wide; roofs of best pine shingles on rough boards; windows to have shutters in first story; doors with four panels and good rim locks; moulded castings to all the doors and windows; moulded base, five inches high; the closets with proper shelves; floors of $\frac{1}{4}$ plank; partitions of 2 by 4 strips; strong steps to cellar, and close stairs from first story to attic; cellar of good stone, laid in lime and sand mortar, sixteen inches thick; chimney of brick, with a large fireplace in the front cellar, which is to be used as a kitchen, and a 12 by 12 inch fine above, with three 6 inch iron stovepipe rings inserted; all the walls and ceilings in the house to be lathed and plastered one good heavy coat of best brown mortar, slipped and whitewashed: two brick hearths, one in parlor and one in cellar.

FRANK LINDS BIRD WALTZ,

COMPOSED AND ARRANGED FOR THE PIANO FORTE, BY

JAMES COENHOVEN.

PRESENTED TO THE LADY'S BOOK, BY COUENHOVEN.

8va. Joyous.

PIANO. mf

8va.

8va.

TRIO.

FINE.

grazioso.

8va.....

8va.....

This musical score is for a string ensemble, likely a string quartet or quintet, written for eight parts (8va). The score is organized into five systems, each consisting of two staves (treble and bass clef). The notation includes various musical symbols such as notes, rests, and dynamic markings. The first system begins with a treble clef and a key signature of one flat. The second system includes a dynamic marking of p (piano). The third system includes a dynamic marking of f (forte). The fourth system includes a dynamic marking of p (piano). The fifth system includes a dynamic marking of f (forte) and a key signature change to one sharp. The score concludes with a double bar line and the marking "D.C." (Da Capo). The notation is dense, with many notes and rests, and includes various musical symbols such as slurs, ties, and accidentals.

MOUCHOIR CASE.—SEE DESCRIPTION.

GODEY'S

LADY'S BOOK.

PHILADELPHIA, JUNE, 1852.

EVERYDAY ACTUALITIES.—NO. I.

ILLUSTRATED WITH PEN AND GRAVER.

BY C. T. HINCKLEY.

BLEACHING OF CALICO, MUSLIN, AND OTHER COTTON FABRICS.—There is probably no department of the useful arts which has received such apparent benefits from scientific research as the art of bleaching. Its origin belongs to Holland, where most of the brown linen manufactured in Scotland for a long period was sent to be bleached, and, to the present day, retain the name of "Brown Holland," from that fact. Calico, muslin, and other cotton fabrics, which are sold in a white state, require bleaching, which is also often a preparatory process to dyeing and calico printing. Linen goods also require bleaching. In the old manner, after some preparatory processes, the linen was spread out in bleaching grounds, and sprinkled with pure water several times a day. It required several months' exposure to air, light, and moisture, before the goods were bleached. Goods forwarded to Holland from Scotland, in the month of March, were usually returned in the following October; but, if sent at a later period, were not returned until the autumn of the following year. This process, it will be observed, occupied much time and trouble, and it was a matter of serious moment to obviate it in some degree.

Many attempts were made to introduce the Dutch method of bleaching into Great Britain. In 1749, bleach works were established in the north of Scotland with tolerable success. The cloth was submitted to a process called bucking, which consisted in steeping it for some days in alkaline leys; after that it was crofted, or washed clean, and spread upon the grass for some weeks. This bucking and crofting were repeated five or six times alternately. The cloth was then steeped in sour milk for some days, washed clean, and again crofted. These processes were repeated until the linen was sufficiently bleached, the strength of the alkaline ley being greatly diminished at each process. This method of bleaching was very expensive, not only from the extent of time required in the operation, but also from the large extent of grass-land required in crofting. The constant exposure of large quantities of goods out of doors served as a temptation to dishonest persons, and led to much crime, and to severe penal laws against the delinquents. Cases have also occurred in which innocent persons have been shot by spring-guns; and, in one terrible instance, a man, who was watching his property, actually shot his own son, who, after a long absence at sea, was returning home, and walked across the bleach croft as a nearer path to the house.

The first improvement made in England upon the old Scotch method was in the process of souring, in which diluted sulphuric acid was substituted for sour milk; the effect of which was to reduce the time required for bleaching, from eight to four months. The grand improvement in the art was made by Berthollet, who, in 1786, while repeating some experiments on chlorine, which had been discovered by Schule in 1774, found that an aqueous solution of this substance was capable of destroying vegetable colors, and he was hence led to suggest its application to bleaching. In 1786, Berthollet showed the experiment to Watt, who was then in Paris; and, on his return to England, he examined the subject practically, and actually bleached fifteen hundred yards of linen by its means in the bleach-field of his father-in-law, Mr. McGregor, near Glasgow, who was so well satisfied with the process that he resolved to adopt it in his works. In the following year, Professor Copeland, of Aberdeen, introduced the plan to the bleachers in that neighborhood, who adopted it gladly. The method soon got into bleach-works generally; but it was found, after a short time, that the powerful action of the gas was injurious to the workmen, and also to the texture of the goods exposed to it. Berthollet endeavored to remove the noxious odor by adding potash to the water, by which means a greater quantity of gas was absorbed, and the solution was then diluted with a considerable quantity of water. The bleaching property of the solution was, however, destroyed, after a time, by this method, in consequence of certain chemical changes which took place. Dr. Henry, of Manchester, substituted lime for the potash, by first passing the goods to be bleached through a stratum of thin cream of lime, and then exposing them to an atmosphere of chlorine: a chloride of lime was thus formed in the cloth; but its action was, in some degree, injurious.

In 1798, Mr. Tennant, of Glasgow, took out a patent for a method of making a saturated solution of chloride of lime for bleaching purposes. It was perfectly successful; but the patent was set aside, on the ground that the invention was not new. Mr. Tennant, however, continued his investigations, and discovered a method of impregnating lime in a dry state with chlorine, thus producing the celebrated bleaching powder, which is prepared at the present day much in the same manner as it was originally contrived. The lime is contained in a stone chamber t, eight or nine feet high, built of siliceous sandstone, the joints of which are secured with a cement of pitch, resin, and gypsum. A door, fitted into it at one end, can be made air-tight by strips of cloth and clay. A window at each side enables the workmen to judge how the impregnation goes on by the color of the gas, which is yellowish green. The lime to be impregnated with the gas is contained in trays eight or ten feet long, two feet broad, and one inch deep. These trays are arranged one over another, to the height of five or six feet, and are kept about an inch asunder by means of cross bars. The chlorine is obtained from common salt—chloride of sodium—by the action of black oxide of manganese and sulphuric acid. About ten hundred weight of salt are mixed with from ten to fourteen hundred weight of manganese, and then introduced, by an aperture at c, into a large leaden vessel of a nearly globular form. This vessel has an outer casing or jacket of iron a a, and steam is admitted at h into the interval between the two, for the purpose of communicating heat. From twelve to fourteen hundred weight of sulphuric acid are introduced, in successive portions, through a twisted funnel f, and the materials are all stirred up by means of an agitator d b, the handle of which is on the outside. As the gas escapes from this vessel, it is received into a leaden cylinder containing water: it then enters by a leaden pipe e into the top of the ceiling of the stove-room t, and, being heavier than the air of the room, falls slowly down and diffuses itself through the chamber, where it gradually combines with the lime. After the action has been carried on for about two days, the half-formed chloride within the chamber is stirred up by means of rakes l l from the outside, or a man enters the chambers for the purpose by the doors k k; by this means the particles of lime which have not yet absorbed the gas are exposed to its action. The process is then continued for another two days, the materials in the leaden retort being frequently stirred up. When all the chlorine is extracted, the contents of the retort, consisting of sulphate of soda and sulphate of manganese, are removed by the tube g.

The chloride of lime thus formed is used in enormous quantities in the bleach-works of Great Britain, most of which are situated in Lancashire and in the neighborhood of Glasgow. As the various processes require an abundant supply of pure water, the works are usually situated near some stream. The substances which require to be removed from cotton goods, in order that they may have a pure white color, are of various kinds. The cotton fibres are covered with a resinous substance, which, to a certain extent, prevents the absorption of moisture, and also with a yellow coloring matter, which, in some kinds of cotton, is so marked as to give a distinctive character to the fabric made from it, as in nankin, or nankeen, which is manufactured, in China and the United States, from a native cotton of a brown yellow hue. Neither the resinous nor the coloring matter has any influence on the strength of the fibre, for the yarn spun from it is as strong after bleaching as before. In some varieties of cotton, the quantity of coloring matter is so small that the fabric would not require bleaching, were it not for the impurities acquired in spinning and weaving. The weavers' dressing of paste, and the rancid tallow or butter used to soften it when it becomes dry, certain soapy and earthy matters, and the dirt of the hands, all require to be removed.

As soon as the goods are received at the bleach-works, the end of every piece is marked with the proprietor's name, which is done with a needle and thread, or with a wooden stamp moistened with coal tar. The fibrous down or nap on the surface of the goods is then burnt off by a process called singeing, which greatly improves their appearance; and, in the case of dyeing or printing, enables the cloth to receive the dye or pattern more perfectly. In this process, a number of pieces of cloth are fastened together at the ends by means of long wires, and then wound upon a roller furnished with a winch. The cloth is then drawn over a half cylinder of copper, made red-hot by being built into a horizontal flue. As soon as the cloth has passed over the heated metal, it is wound upon a second roller, which plays in a trough of water. The cloth is usually passed three times over the hot surface; twice on the face, or the side intended for printing on, and once on the back. It is wound from one roller over the heated metal to another roller on the other side of the furnace, a swing frame being placed for raising the cloth at any moment out of contact with the heated metal, and water is at hand in case of accident to the goods, which is a rare occurrence. By this operation the goods become brown and discolored. Thread muslins and bobinet lace are singed by the aid of gas flames. The flames issue from numerous perforations in the upper surface of a horizontal tube, and the fabric to be singed is drawn over the flame upon rollers, with a rapidity adapted to the texture of the goods. The flame is drawn up through the web by placing immediately over the gas flame a horizontal tube, with a slit in its lower surface. This tube is connected with a fan, or other apparatus for withdrawing the air from it, and thus increasing the draught of the flame.

SINGING COTTON GOODS

After singeing, the cloth is steeped in a cistern of water; and, in order to insure contact with the water, each piece is pulled out, folded loosely, and tied up, with a noose at the end, into an irregular bundle. After soaking twelve or fourteen hours, the pieces are washed in a dash or wash wheel, which is a perpendicular wheel, five or six feet in diameter, and nearly two feet in depth. It is divided into four equal compartments by partitions proceeding from the axis to the circumference, each of which has a circular opening upon one face of the wheel. Water is carried into the compartments by a pipe concentric with the axis on which the wheel rotates. The pieces to be washed are put into the compartments through the circular openings in front, and, water being introduced, the wheel is made to revolve rapidly, and thus wash the cloth with considerable agitation. The object of this washing is to remove as much of the dirt and weavers' dressing as possible; but, as the grease cannot be removed except by making it soluble by the action of an alkali, lime is economically employed. The pieces are therefore boiled with lime in a large circular boiler, or keir, called a bucketing or bocking keir, or puffer, shown in the accompanying section;

DASH WHEELS.

whilst, in the following engraving, one of these keirs is represented in action, and another in the course of preparation. It consists of a pan of wrought iron set in brick-work, on which the fire acts, and an upper part of cast-iron for containing the goods. The two parts are separated by a false bottom of cast-iron, and in the centre is an iron pipe furnished with a curved cover. The liquor in the pan, from the pressure of the goods above it, does not boil until it is some degrees above the boiling point; the liquor boils first in that part of the pipe where the pressure is less than it is in the pan, so that a mixture of steam and water, being formed there, rushes up the pipe, and is thrown back by the cap upon the goods, thoroughly drenching them with the hot alkaline liquor. This discharge is followed by another portion of the heated alkaline liquor, which, rising into the pipe, boils and escapes at the top as before. In this way the action goes on, and the liquor, gradually filtering through the goods, finds its way back again into the pan, to be again heated and discharged as before.

BUCKING KEIRS.

In preparing a keir, one pound of lime is used for every thirty or forty pounds of goods; the lime is formed into a cream in a separate vessel, and is gradually spread over the goods as they are deposited in layers in the keirs; the requisite quantity of water is next added, and heat is applied. The liquor is about two hours in boiling, and the process is continued about seven hours. The effect of the lime is to darken the coloring matter of the cotton, so that, after washing, they appear darker than they did before; but all the dirt and grease are removed by this process. The goods are next washed in the dash-wheels, in order to remove the adhering lime; and then comes the chemicking, or steeping in a very dilute solution of chloride of lime, for which purpose they are placed in stone vats, over the centre of which is a perforated trough, into which the bleaching solution is pumped up many times during the process, and from this it drains down upon the goods. Every pound of cloth requires about half a pound of chloride of lime, of a certain strength, mixed with about three gallons of water. The steeping is continued six hours, after which the cloth is of a light gray color, not white, but considerably improved in appearance. Care must be taken to make the steep of the proper strength; for, if too strong, the calico will run into holes.

In the next process, which is called souring, the goods are steeped for four hours in water soured by sulphuric acid, when a minute disengagement of chlorine takes place throughout the substance of the cloth, and it immediately assumes a bleached appearance. The acid also removes a small portion of oxide of iron contained in the fibre, and also the lime of the previous processes. When removed from the acid, the goods are again washed: they are greatly improved in appearance, but still not quite bleached. They are therefore boiled for eight or nine hours in a potash or soda ley; then washed at the dash-wheel; again steeped for five or six hours in a solution of bleaching-powder, two-thirds of the strength of the first solution; then soured as before for two, three, or four hours, according to the quality of the goods, and at length they are perfectly bleached. Every trace of acid is removed by careful washing, for, if any acid were left in the cloth, it would corrode it, especially when heated. The acid favors the bleaching action, and does not injure the fibre of the cloth, although the steeping is continued for days, provided the cloth is not allowed to dry with the acid in it, or be left above the surface of the liquor. The acid is also necessary to remove the caustic alkali, which adheres with great pertinacity to the goods. The goods lose weight in being bleached. Fine calico loses nearly ten per cent.; but of this, one-half is the weavers' dressing. In coarse goods the loss is greater. For the processes subsequent to bleaching, we must refer to an article on calendering, which will follow in the series.

The above details refer chiefly to cotton shirting, and the better descriptions of calico used for printing on. The processes are modified for different varieties of cotton goods. It is also often necessary to expedite the various processes. As an example of the rapidity of bleaching by the new method, compared with the old, we may mention one case in which a bleacher received fourteen hundred pieces of gray muslin on Tuesday, and, on the following Thursday, they were bleached and returned to the manufacturers, a distance of sixteen miles.

BLEACHING OF LINEN.—Linen contains much more coloring matter than cotton. Whilst cotton only loses about one-twentieth of its weight in the bleaching process, linen loses nearly one-third. The fibres of flax possess, in the natural state, a light gray, yellow, or blond color. By the operation of rotting, or, as it is commonly called, water-retting, which is employed to enable the textile filaments to be separated from the boon, or woolly matter, the color becomes darker; and, in consequence probably of the putrefaction of the green matter of the bark, the coloring substance appears. Hence, flax prepared without rotting is much paler, and its coloring matter may be, in a great measure, removed by washing with soap, leaving the filaments nearly white. In the bleaching of linen, the washing can never be overdone; and, on its being properly executed between every part of the bucking, boiling, steeping in the chloride of lime solution, and souring, not a little of the success depends.

Linens are first washed, and then steeped in waste alkaline ley; they then undergo fourteen processes of bucking, washing, and crofting. They are then taken to the rubbing-board, and well rubbed with a strong lather of black soap, after which they are well washed in clear spring water. At this period they are carefully examined, and those that are fully bleached are laid aside to be blued, and made up for market; while those that are not fully white are returned to be boiled, and steeped in the chloride of lime or potash, then soured until they are fully white. The method of bleaching linens in Ireland is similar to the foregoing.

BLEACHING OF SILK.—Silk, in its raw state, as spun by the worm, is either white or yellow, of various shades, and is covered with a varnish which gives it stiffness and a degree of elasticity. Many plans have been attempted to produce a whiteness in silk; but none have succeeded so well as boiling it with soap-water. It is believed, however, that the Chinese do not employ this method, but something that is preferable. It is said that they use a peculiar kind of bean, which they boil with their silk. Probably the superior beauty of their white silk may be owing to the superiority of the raw material. The most ancient mode of scouring silk consists of three operations. For the first, or the ungumming, thirty per cent. of soap is, first of all, dissolved in clear river water by a boiling heat; then the temperature is lowered by the addition of a little cold water, by withdrawing the fire, or at least by dampening it. The hanks of silk, suspended upon horizontal poles over the boiler, are now plunged into the soapy solution, kept at a heat somewhat under boiling, which is an essential point; for, if hotter, the soap would attack the substance of the silk, and not only dissolve a portion of it, but deprive the whole of its lustre. The portions of the hanks plunged in the bath get scoured by degrees, the varnish and the coloring matter come away, and the silk assumes its proper whiteness and pliancy. Whenever this point is attained, the hanks are turned round upon the poles, so that the portion formerly in the air may also be subjected to the bath. As soon as the whole is completely ungummed, they are taken out, rung by the pegs, and shaken out; after which the next step, called the boil, is commenced. Into bags of coarse canvas, called pockets, about twenty-five pounds of ungummed silk are inclosed, and put into a similar bath with the preceding, but with a smaller portion of soap, which may therefore be raised to the boiling point without danger of destroying the silk. The boiling is to be kept up for an hour and a half, during which time the bags must be frequently stirred, lest those near the bottom should suffer an undue degree of heat. The silk experiences, in these two operations, a loss of about twenty-five per cent. of its weight. "The third and last scouring operation is intended to give the silk a slight tinge, which renders the white more agreeable, as better adapted to its various uses in trade. In this way we distinguish the China white, which has a faint cast of red, the silver white, the azure white, and the thread white. To produce these different shades, we begin by preparing a soap water so strong as to lather by agitation; we then add to it, for the China white, a little annatto, mixing it carefully in, then passing the silk properly through it till it has acquired the wished-for tint. As to the other shades, we need only assure them more or less with fine indigo, which has been previously washed several times in hot water, and reduced to powder in a mortar. It is then diffused through the boiling water, allowed to settle for a few minutes, and the supernatant liquid, which contains only the finer particles, is added to the soap bath in such proportions as may be requisite. The silk, on being taken out of this bath, must be wrung well, and stretched upon perches to dry; after which it is introduced into the sulphuring chamber, if it is to be made use of in the white state. At Lyons, however, no soap is employed at the third operation; after the boil, the silk is washed, sulphured, and assured, by passing through very clear river water properly blued."

The silks intended for the manufacture of blonds and gauzes are not subjected to the ordinary scouring process, because it is essential in these cases for them to retain their natural stiffness. In selecting silks for gauze or blond, the whitest raw silk is obtained; they are then steeped and rinsed in a bath of pure water, or one containing a very little soap, wrung out, exposed to a sulphur bath, and then passed through blue water. Sometimes this process is repeated. When silks are to be dyed, much less soap is used, and very little for the dark colors. Of the dyeing, and other matters connected with silk, we shall speak in a future article on its manufacture.

BLEACHING OF WOOL.—Wool, like silk, is covered with a peculiar varnish, which impairs its qualities, and prevents its being employed in the raw state for the purposes to which it is well adapted when scoured. The yolk, as this varnish is called, readily dissolves in water, with the exception of a little free fatty matter which easily separates from the filaments, and remains floating in the liquor. Wool is first steeped in a simple warm water, or in warm water mixed with a peculiar ammonia liquid. It is left in the solution for fifteen or twenty minutes, if the heat is as warm as the hand will bear it, and is well stirred all the time with a rod. After this, it is taken out, set to drain, placed in large baskets, and then completely rinsed in a stream of water. Care is taken not to make the water boil in which wool is placed, as it would decompose the fibres and ruin it. When the wool is washed sufficiently, it is exposed to the action of sulphurous acid, either in a liquid or gaseous state. In the latter case, sulphur is burned in a close chamber, in which the wools are hung up or spread out; in the former, the wools are plunged into water moderately impregnated with the acid. Exposure on the grass also contributes to the bleaching of wool. It is sometimes whitened in the fleece, and sometimes in the state of yarn; the latter affording the best means of operating. After sulphuring, it has a harsh, crispy feel, which is removed by a weak soap bath. To this also the wool-comber has recourse, when he wishes to cleanse and whiten wool to the utmost. He generally uses a soft or potash soap, and often the wool is well soaked in the warm soap bath; with gentle pressure he wrings it well with the help of a hook fixed at the end of his washing-tub, and hangs it up to dry.

BLEACHING EXPERIMENT FOR OUR READERS.—Put a little common salt in a saucer, pour upon it a teaspoonful of sulphuric acid; stir it up, and place the saucer on the stove. When hot, cover the saucer with a pint tumbler, which has a sprig of parsley fastened inside on the bottom. The fumes which arise from the mixture are chlorine, or the bleaching gas; they are the result of a chemical action, and will soon take out the whole color from the parsley leaf, thus affording an interesting specimen of bleaching.

THE DEBARDEUR'S FIRST LOVE.*

(See Plate.)

THAT eve of joy, of sparkling glance,
Of merry mask and tripping dance,
When thou wast clinging to my side,
My heart's first love, my promised bride—
I live it o'er again;
And, as it passeth by, I seem
To dream once more the mournful dream
That prophesied my pain.

Methought thy vows yet thrilled my ear—
That lone I trod a desert drear—
Alone and joyless—and my breast
By burning thirst was sore oppressed,
And water there was none;
Until at last I did behold,
O'erbrimmed with wine, a cup of gold
Secluded from the sun.

That brimming cup—that golden cup—
Then to my lips I lifted up;
But, ere I tasted of its joy—
Alas! that life hath such annoy—
It slipped my eager hand;
And soon its pure and precious wine,
That I had deemed as wholly mine,
Had stained the desert sand.

In agony that found no cry,
That fallen cup I lingered by;

And ever fresh that stain was kept
With tears my deathless misery wept,
Yet eased they not its woe:
Ah! better far had I forgot
That golden cup and crimsoned spot,
And from them sought to go.

For soon that cup, that golden cup,
Another's hand held brimming up,
While from that stain upon the sand
There grew a vine which, like a hand,
Clung fast about my soul;
I could not cry—I could not fly—
But saw—and, seeing, longed to die—
Another drain that bowl.

Oh! thou whose name I may not speak,
So faint my breath—my tongue so weak—
Thou art the cup my lips then pressed—
Thy love the wine my thirsting breast.
Then thought its own might be:
Thou and thy love no more are mine,
Yet memory's tears still nurse the vine,
That binds me fast to thee.

J. B. J.

* Debardeur is a French word, signifying a stevedore or lighterman—a person who unloads vessels. The holiday apparel of the debardeurs of France is remarkable for its gay and unique appearance, and is frequently employed as a masquerade dress by the visitors to fancy-costume balls.

FRIENDSHIPS' OFFERING.

(See Plate.)

Ruddy and bright is the morning's light
O'er the mist-hung mountains glancing;
With rippling tread, o'er their rocky bed,
Are the wayside waters dancing:
Then come, my steed, from thy halter freed,
With step that is light and fleet
As the winds that sweep yon purple steep,
Where forest and cloud are meeting.

With hoof bedewed, and with cheek rose-hued,
Let us look on fair Nature's adorning,
And drink of the wine—fragrant, divine—
That brims on the beaker of morning:
With loosened rein and a flying mane,
Thou 'lt leave the breezes behind us;
And jocund Health, with her priceless wealth,
In our early ride shall find us.

With a tingling cry, the winds go by,
And my heart with thy feet is timing;
My loosened hair, in the sparkling air,
With thy rustling mane is rhyming;
With a keen delight, I feel thy might,
As thou leap'st o'er the grassy meadow;
Then on, brave steed! with a tempest's speed,
We'll sweep to yon mountain's shadow.

Ere hot is the sun, what pleasures we've won!
We've drank of the hill-born river,
And galloped back, by the olden track,
Where the breezeless poplars quiver;
And for thy reward, from the garden sward—
Now our morning ride is over—
Clean grasses I'll choose, still dripping with dew,
And sweeten with globes of fresh clover.

JOANNES BURLINGTONIUS.

MRS. HARRIET LEE;

THE LAST SURVIVING AUTHOR OF "THE CANTERBURY TALES."

IF old age be always—more or less—venerable, surely it is never so much so as when reposing in dignified retirement apart from the strife and struggle of busy life; enjoying that rest which has been justly earned by honorable exertions, and the fulfilment of difficult duties in earlier years; and waiting the final summons with hopeful trust and calm content.

We have rarely felt more impressed with this truth than on recently reading in the newspaper obituaries the name of Mrs. Harriet Lee, at the advanced age of ninety-five. Belonging to the generation of the grandmothers and great-grandmothers of the active, stirring, reading, writing, ruling, prime-of-life men and women of the present day, her having tarried among us so long seemed a sort of anomaly the more strange when announced, because previously so little known even in the Republic of Letters, which is usually pretty well informed about the doings of its citoyens and citoyennes. A brief retrospect of the lives of the two sisters will perhaps, however, best lead up to our subject.

Sophia and Harriet Lee were the daughters of a gentleman who, originally articulated to a solicitor, subsequently adopted the stage as a profession. Sophia, the elder, was born in 1750, and though early evincing a taste for literature, the domestic duties which devolved on her in consequence of the early death of her mother seem to have delayed the development of her powers. She did not appear as an authoress till her thirtieth year, when a comedy from her pen, called "The Chapter of Accidents," was brought out at the Haymarket, under the management of the elder Colman, and received with great applause. The profits derived from this play were devoted to the establishment of a ladies' school at Bath, where both sisters now settled, and seem to have combined for many years, in a singularly happy manner, the arduous duties of instruction and authorship. In 1784, Miss Lee published "The Recess," which may justly be considered the pioneer of the historical romance. The scene is laid in the time of Queen Elizabeth; Norfolk, Essex, Leicester, and the unhappy Queen of Scots, being the principal real personages introduced. It is a book which, judged even by the modern canons of criticism, displays many admirable qualities. Somewhat verbose it is, and replete with minute details; but in those days a good novel was a feast never complained of for the tediousness of its courses. It is full of high-wrought romantic incidents, verging on the debatable ground between the improbable and the impossible; but sixty or seventy years ago, we suspect the delicate flavor of the genuine simple story would have been voted insipid and unpalatable. While, with these drawbacks—to modern readers—"The Recess" is still remarkable for the brilliant imagination and vigorous construction of plot it displays, the true and powerful historical coloring which is maintained throughout; and last though by no means the least charm—since it is one in which so many modern would-be-novelists fail—for a lucid and euphonious style, which shows that composition had been studied as an art. It has been said that Scott was indebted to this novel for many suggestions for his Kenilworth; and he, so rich in gifts that were all his own, would probably have been the first to acknowledge his obligation.

About the year 1797, the first volume of the celebrated "Canterbury Tales"—the joint production of the two sisters—appeared, and met with so decided a success that the series was quickly extended to five volumes. The plan and outline of this work belonged exclusively to Harriet, the younger sister, although the author of "The Recess" contributed "The Young Lady's Tale, or the two Emilys," and "The Clergyman's Tale, or Pembroke;" together with the narrative introduction to the first volume. To Harriet Lee, however, belongs the fame of having written the powerful and original story of "Kruitzner," which appeared in the fourth volume of the "Canterbury Tales," and suggested to Lord Byron, as is so widely known, his tragedy of "Werner." Indeed, the noble poet acknowledged and announced his obligation, saying in his preface: "I have adopted the characters, plan, and even the language of many parts of this story. Some of the characters are modified or altered, a few of the names changed, and one character (Ida of Strahlenheim) added by myself; but in the rest the original is chiefly followed."

A writer in the twelfth volume of Blackwood's Magazine is very severe on Byron, declaring that he has invented nothing, and contrasting his manner of appropriation with that of Shakespeare, who, when he was indebted to some old novelist for a story, breathed a life into the characters which they had never possessed before. Writing of Werner, this critic says: "Indeed, but for the preparation which we had received from our old familiarity with Miss Lee's own admirable work, we rather incline to think we should have been unable to comprehend the gist of her noble imitator, or rather copier, in several of what seem to be meant for his most elaborate delineations. The fact is, that this undeviating closeness, this humble fidelity of imitation, is a thing so perfectly new in anything worthy of the name of literature, that we are sure no one, who has not read the 'Canterbury Tales,' will be able to form the least conception of what it amounts to.

* In the preface to one of the later editions of the "Canterbury Tales," Harriet Lee writes that they "were first called such in badinage between the authors, as being a proverbial phrase for gossiping, long stories; certainly with no thought of blending them with the recollection of our great English classic."

"Those who have never read Miss Lee's book will, however, be pleased with this production; for, in truth, the story is one of the most powerfully conceived, one of the most picturesque, and at the same time instructive stories, that we are acquainted with. Indeed, thus led as we are to name Harriet Lee, we cannot allow the opportunity to pass without saying that we have always considered her works as standing upon the verge of the first rank of excellence; that is to say, as inferior to no English novels whatever, excepting those of Fielding, Sterne, Smollett, Richardson, Defoe, Radcliffe, Godwin, Edgeworth, and the author of 'Waverley.' It would not, perhaps, be going too far to say that the 'Canterbury Tales' exhibit more of that species of invention which, as we have already remarked, was never common in English literature, than any of the works of those first-rate novelists we have named, with the single exception of Fielding.

"Kruitener, or the German's Tale," possesses mystery, and yet clearness, as to its structure; strength of characters, and admirable contrast of characters; and above all, the most lively interest, blended with, and subservient to, the most affecting of moral lessons. The main idea which lies at the root of it is, the horror of an erring father, who, having been detected in vice by his son, has dared to defend his own sin, and so to perplex the son's notions of moral rectitude, on finding that the son, in his turn, has pushed the false principles thus instilled to the last and worst extreme, on hearing his own sophistries flung in his face by a—Murderer!"

Though newer names are more familiar in our mouths than that of Harriet Lee, it is not difficult to imagine the high consideration in which she was held, both by the readers and the critics of a past generation. We have failed to discover any published memoir of importance of this venerable lady; but we cannot help conjecturing what an autobiography she might have written, and what curious and intensely interesting memoranda of her life may possibly be in existence. Authentic records show her as the friend of Mrs. Siddons, and John Kemble, and Jane Porter, and General Paoli; and as a clear-judging seer, who predicted the success and celebrity of Sir Thomas Lawrence. What a world of the past do these names conjure up! and what a homily on the length and brevity, the greatness and the littleness, of human life do they—in connection with the survivor of all—suggest! To have predicted the fame of the boy-artist, and then to live on till they who at his prime he painted in their youthful bloom have faded to elderly matrons; to have been born when George the Third was a stripling prince, and live into the blessed reign of Victoria, and the days of a Crystal Palace; to have been an intelligent little maiden ere Napoleon lived, and before Louis Seize mounted his rotten crumbling throne! What a century to have so nearly rounded! What an experience to have crowded even into ninety-five years!

In the year 1803, Sophia and Harriet Lee relinquished their school, having not only acquired a provision for their old age, but established a large family of nephews and nieces in life. A few years afterwards, they took up their abode in a charming house at Clifton, and, honored and esteemed for all the virtues which adorn private life, and famous for talents which had always been employed to improve while they amused, they must have spent many years of repose and enjoyment not easily to be overestimated.

Sophia Lee expired at the ripe age of seventy-four, on the 13th of March, 1824, in the arms of that attached sister who was destined so long to survive her. Once, during the last twenty-seven years, we hear of Mrs. Harriet Lee as an authoress; about fifteen years ago a play from her pen was produced at Covent Garden Theatre, but it failed to attract, and soon sank into oblivion. With this exception, her existence seems scarcely to have been recognized beyond the limited, yet not narrow circle, of her intimate and admiring friends. She met old age gracefully, and it was tenderly kind to her. By those who knew her to the last, her memory is said to have retained its always remarkable vigor, and her wonderful conversational powers to have remained unabated. But no persuasions—and must they not have been many?—drew her into general society. We have no account of her faded cheeks and snowy locks decked out for "midnight revelries;" no mention of her among the coteries. No; her truly venerable old age was one of honor, dignity, and repose; the proper sequence to the activity and energy of early life. Mrs. Harriet Lee died at Clifton on the 1st of August, conscious of her approaching end, and devoutly happy and resigned.

TWO NIGHTS AND TWO DAYS IN UPPER ASSAM.

BY AN OFFICER'S WIFE.

It was in the month of April, of the year '45, a report came down from this outpost of Ningroo, to the commanding officer at the head-quarters of Jeypore, stating rumors to be abroad that a party of Singphoes had come down, and were lurking about the jungles in rear of the outpost, with a design to make a night attack and cut up the guard. Now as this had really happened about a couple of years previously, it was necessary to ascertain the truth of the report, and to guard against treachery; consequently Major H—— ordered a detachment of forty men to be told off, intending himself to go up in person to see how matters really stood, and asked me to pack some linen for him, with "a piece of soap and a couple of towels" à la Napier, as also to give orders for his cook-boat to be made in readiness, with the usual supply of small black and speckled fowls, red ruffed cocks, and two or three dispirited-looking ducks, shut into small bamboo coops, for consumption on the journey. This I did, but at the same time seeing no cause of detention for myself alone at home, I begged very hard to accompany him, to which he at last consented, although I was warned of all the discomforts and roughing which awaited me; but as I cared not for this, and my own arrangements were soon completed, the morrow's early morn was fixed for our departure.

As soon as dawn broke, great was the bustle. The large number of canoes needed for such a detachment of men, with their provisions—not to speak of arms, accoutrements, and ammunition—had been seized or stopped by the commissariat agent the night before, and were now moored at the nearest ghaut. The river bank and road were crowded by the Sepoys' wives and children, bringing down their cooking-pots, bags of rice, parched peas, oil, jars, chillies, and spices.

By and by the bugle sounded, and the detachment appeared, headed by their native officer, and with three cheers entered their boats. We were in ours. There was a lighting in the eastern horizon; a fresh small breeze crept over the face of the waters; the long grasses and large leaves bowed themselves down to it; there was a wild chorus of cries from the monkeys in the high trees, and up rose the broad sun. The boats shoved off, one long canoe, with its union-jack trailing from the stern, taking the lead, and all the rest, like so many snakes, winding and paddling their way after us. By and by we entered the first reach of the river, and the station, with its houses and figures watching us from the bank, was lost, and the scene before us was one which might have been hundreds of miles away from any human habitation. Here was the deep quiet river, without a line or ripple before us, with its high wooded banks rising from a rocky base on each side of us; tall, dark, glossy-leaved Indian-rubber trees, with their myriad young shoots hanging from their long branches, filled with bright flowering parasites; dangling creepers, and red-faced monkeys, swaying about in wild play, or leaping from one tree to another; clumps of plantations, with their long roll of young unfurled leaves, sticking out from amidst them, heavy with dew, and then further down, and nearer the water, near themselves, those gigantic ferns, beautiful with their dentilated foliage and tiny sprays; betwixt and between rises one mass, one flush of many-leaved vegetation, dark green, light green, verging on yellow, crimson, deep warm brown, and the white-leaved shrub (I forget its name just now), with the little orange blossom so common in the jungles of Assam.

On we floated, the splash of the paddles dripping into the water again; the long-chanted song of some of the boatmen in the rear, the laugh or talk between some of the men, or the long, shrill chirp of some big grasshopper from the jungle, were the only sounds; and so we floated on till about ten, when I began to be very hungry; so, as a smooth little piece of white land was in view, we stopped, got out, and ordered our breakfast. As I was walking along, seeking for the nicest and shadiest spot for our table and chairs, I came upon the fresh foot-prints of a large tiger. He seemed, as I followed the steps, to have come down from the high jungle bank above our heads, walked to the water's edge to drink, then turned up again, ascended a little sandy slope, higher than where we had our boats moored, there lain himself down under the shadow of a large tree, just the most comfortable, airiest, and shadiest spot of the whole, and the very one I was on the lookout for. I fancy he must have remained there some little time, as the sand was a good deal marked, but not seeing anything in his way, up the river or down the river, he had got up disgusted, I presume, and walked away again into the jungle above our heads. Well, all this perambulating of a tiger a short time before (I fancy at dawn), upon the very spot where we wanted to eat our breakfast, was not very comfortable; but still, we had gone to his realm, not he to ours; so, as we were hungry, and there was no other sand-bank in view, there was nothing for it but to proceed with operations. So the camp-table was placed under the tree, and the two chairs set, the table-cloth laid, and then behold the covered dishes coming; fresh fried fish in one, and savory food in the other, peculiarly native, being a preparation of rice, and that small yellow grain called dhal, fried with a little butter and a good many spices, then eggs and toast, and lastly, the dear old Britannia metal marching teapot, with the two cups, and the good English-looking comforting tea poured into them. So we ate and drank, and were merry, only casting a look to the jungle every now and then, if a breeze stirred the leaves, and respectfully keeping our faces that way. The meal concluded, a good deal of food was left for the crows, if not for the tiger, all the overplus of the rice being emptied out on the sand by the natives before scouring and putting away their pots; then a general embarkation, and on we floated again to the noise of the dripping paddles.

The sun was by this time high, and although we were creeping along under the shadow of the bank, it was growing hot. Our canoe was very much like a coffin, though a good deal longer, but not much broader. We could just sit side by side on the floor, at the entry of the mat roof; so we pulled out Borrow's "Gipsies in Spain," as being a work I had lately received, and which, with writing, fishing, and sketching materials, I had sent on board; so we read, and talked, and dozed, and caught bright glimpses of the blue Naga range of hills ever and anon in the turns of the river.

At last the heat abated, and the shadows lengthened; the birds began to chirp and twitter, and the mirror of the stream became constantly broken by the lazy fish now leaping to every passing fly. An order was given to make for the first sand bank which was large enough to give us mooring room, as well as afford space for the pitching of our little hill tent. One was soon desisted (though there are not many on any river in the month of April); but it was too small for any comfort; however, it was the only one, and we must be satisfied. The table and chairs were placed as usual, but there was no room for pitching the tent—that was impossible. By and by the sun set, and the sky and water became many-colored; then the drowsy sound of beetles died off one by one; the butterflies fluttered in under the large leaves, and the moths fluttered out. After them came the long-winged bats, and then whole flights of little ones darting athwart the twilight sky; then the first stars came out above the mountain tops. I could count them at first, but soon their hosts multiplied brighter and thicker, and brighter still; then came the report that the sentries were posted and dinner on the table; so with small toilet we seated ourselves, and began discussing roast fowl and chicken outlets; but before we had gone far, our light was flapped out by a large white moth, left swimming in the oil; then followed swarms of small insects of the jumping genus, accompanied by little crickets and large crickets, crickets which made chirping enough even to have gladdened Mr. Dickens's heart. On they came, hosts of crickets, black, gray, and brown; some jumped into the wine-glasses, some into the tomato sauce of the unfortunate outlets, some into the curry gravy, some into Hudson's pale ale, some into the pickles, some into the oil burners. We looked at each other, we two who were at dinner, or at least, who wanted to eat it. "What shall we do?" H— said.

"Send for a bearer with a large punka" (fan), was my suggestion. Presently he came, and we had most vigorous puffs every sweep of the fan; but instead of sending the crickets away, it sent them from the table-cloth on to our faces, and there they were, crawling and jumping all over us. I fairly got up and ran away—I believe Major H— did the same; then we laughed a great deal, and sat down again. I said—"Let us eat fast before the crickets come again!" And we tried to do so; but there they were, the legion, the army, the host! So we got up in dismay, had the lights put out, and the dinner taken away. "I think we had better take a walk," said I, as I felt something biting my feet and ankles very much; so we got up, and walked to and fro, the length of our little sand-bank. But I heard the humming in my ears, all through the air in fact; it became more cadenced, more concentrated. I knew what it meant, but I said nothing, in silent despair. We walked and talked, and tried to keep up each other's spirits; but we never hinted as to how we should get through the night.

The bell-bird had now begun his long solitary call, full and round, and distinctly clear; sometimes close, then measured, like the sound of some full, deep-toned gong; sometimes distant, when it died away like the last long strokes of the vesper in some Italian square-cloistered tower—yes, that lonely bird calls the live-long night to itself; none of its kind ever seem to answer it; but still, as the night comes, it calls on with its melancholy note forever!

The sky had clouded; all the stars were gone; a slight breeze was stirring the trees, and a damp air had crept out of the jungle, which spoke of rain. "Ah!" said I, "perhaps the land-flics will get drowned, and the crickets at least will be obliged to get into their holes."

"But the mosquitoes!" said Major H—.

There was no answer to this.

Night waned; it was late; it was time to go to bed. "I am going to wrap myself in my cloak, and lay myself under the camp table to keep off the dew," said my husband.

"I think I'll try to get under the mosquito curtain in that coffin of a boat," said I, "and see if I can't get a little sleep."

So said, so done. I called my woman, who undressed me, and I crawled in on hands and knees; made a great fanning before the gauze curtains, where I intended to enter; made a dive in head-foremost, tucked in the curtains, and laid myself down to repose from my labors. At first a kind of sleep came over my eyelids, and I thought I was getting away to the blessed dream-land, when a humming commenced in my ears, and a sensation as if I were having live coals strewed all over my body came on me. I moved to a cool place on the sheets: the humming came close to my ear. I gave myself a desperate slap to try and smash him; then a humming above my head. I gave myself another slap there; then a keen, decided sting on my leg, then one or two on my foot. I rubbed them furiously together; then a universal pricking all over my body! No, this will never do! I darted up; it was intensely hot; no breath got to me in my coffin! I crawled out; the night was dark and quiet, for, though a waning moon was up, the sky was completely clouded, and a little drizzling rain was falling—just a night for a mosquito orgy, thought I. I looked round; most of the men and servants were lying stretched on their mats on the sand, rolled up in their long white sheets, looking like so many corpses; but, notwithstanding, one heard the slaps which were going on in all quarters. But they are patient beings, and think if one must needs be devoured by mosquitos, sand-flies, or any other noxious insect, it is as well to lie to be devoured as to sit for the same purpose. So there they lay, every man in his sheet. The two sentries were stalking up and down at a little distance. I looked for the table, but the space under its protecting shadow was empty.

"Where is H——?" thought I to myself; and I began looking round. Presently, not very far from the boat, close to the water's edge, seated upon a little cane stool, with his feet in the water, did I see my unfortunate husband. "What is the matter?" said I; "are you ill? Why are you sitting with your feet in the water?" A groan was my only answer.

"H——, dear, you'll make yourself ill!" cried I, "with your feet in the water; it's raining." "It's dreadful!" said he. What was to be done? I felt the mosquitos from head to foot—I was in a flame.

"I wonder," said I, "if these mosquitos bite the tigers in the jungles as they do us. What do you think they would do if they did? they could not eat them, you know."

"I fancy not," said my husband; "but I should not like to meet one just after a biting such as I have had."

And the bell-bird was ever calling its melancholy note, and the owls were hooting to each other.

"Well," thought I to myself, as I had already got wet through with the rain, "I think I had better get a bath that will cool me; so I crawled into the boat again, and got hold of my sleeping attendant in the back compartment of it; she was sound asleep. I shook her very hard. "Get up," said I; "I want to bathe."

"Bathe! Mem Sahib!" burst forth the woman. "But it's twelve at night, or two in the morning. How can you bathe just now?"

"Ah, never mind that," said I. "Get up; bring the water-pots. Come, be quick!"

Natives have certainly a notion that the Sahiblogs (c'est à dire, nous autres) are all more or less mad—deranged in mind, unsettled, or by whatever more kindly name it may be called. What with the needless trouble they so often take in climbing rocks to see views; wandering into impenetrable jungles to look after flowers, trees, and plants; lavishing a sum for an insect which they would call dear for a silk handkerchief, or a pitcher of clarified butter! Coming away as I had done in this instance, in a wretched hot canoe, to be bitten to death by mosquitos, when I might have stayed at home in my own comfortable house, where I had my dressing-room and spring-couches! Well, there was no accounting for what the Sahiblogs would do and then this bathing at two in the morning! . . . but, however, she got up, adjusted her drapery about her, took a water-pot in each hand, and crawled out after me. Once outside the long tunnel, I seated myself on the edge of the canoe. "Now fill the water-pot," said I, "and pour the water over me; and go on filling and pouring until I say stop."

So it was done—oh, it was delicious! One water-pot after the other was emptied over me; there I sat, quite happy and contented; but I heard my poor Abigail rubbing her feet one on the other in the bottom of the boat; but the mosquitos had no time to bite me; whenever they settled, another splash came down. Thus it went on until about half an hour of dawn. "Now," said I, "bring me my things, and I'll dress;" and so I did—I was all ready, and as fresh and as cool as a cucumber. Then the general ablution began. All the Hindoos walked into the water to say their prayers; every one bathed—the bugle sounded to boat, and off.

We had all, I think, good long sleeps that day, and not much of Mr. Borrow; but the weather was very hot, and the reaches of the river long. At last, a little before sunset, we came up to a high, open bank, the site of a deserted village, with some almost fallen huts still standing here and there; one of these, however, seemed yet to be inhabited, as an old man and a little boy sat by it, watching our approach. The boats were moored; the bank was rather a high one, but a rude broken path was used into its side; by this we managed to scramble up, and our little tent was pitched just on the edge above, with the door looking down upon the water, to catch any stray breeze which might rise with sunset. Major H—— went to see that the men took up good positions for the night, and had their boats well moored, as the intense heat and clouded sky gave promise of coming storms. All our tent pins were well hammered down, and the ropes tightly knotted. I saw to this. By and by we took a ramble on the bank, and had a chat with the old man and the little boy, who told us all their people had gone further up the river, where there was better opium ground; that they stayed only to gather in some few plantains from the deserted trees, which would be ripe by and by, and then they were to join their friends in the upper village.

Presently arrived the native political agent of these parts, hearing that Major H——'s boats were moored below. He gave us a good deal of news regarding the reports which had summoned us to Ningroo. He had his loaded gun in his hand; his long, square-ended Assamese sword in a wooden sheath, hooped with cane, and slung by the same over his shoulder, was all ready at hand. A large white turban, twisted round a knot of jet-black hair, was drawn up, and stuck on the very top of his head. A large white cotton plaid was wrapped round him, and in a scarf of the same material, tightly girt about his waist, stuck a long-bladed knife, with a carved ivory handle. He had a retinue of about ten or twelve men of his clan with him, and he said he had been lying about the jungles for the last two nights, in hopes of finding the whereabouts of the Singphoes, who were said to have been collected at a spot by a small inland stream not far in rear of the stockade of Ningroo; but who, having quarreled amongst themselves about the attack, had for the present dispersed. So far good news; but still Major H——, wishing to be on the spot himself, and hear the native officers report on the subject, as well as give some orders relative to the guards and sentries on duty, was anxious at the same time to inspect the ground in the vicinity of the stockade, which was greatly overgrown with jungle, and had to be cleared. The receillie was ordered to be sounded as usual in the morning at dawn.

We had our dinner in peace and quiet this evening, without crickets and without sandflies, and the few mosquitos were warded off by the evolutions of the large fan. We were very happy and comfortable this night, and talked of last night as a "horrible dream."

"Oh," said I, "how sound I shall sleep!"

"Yes, won't we!" said H——.

The night had set in dark and stormy; heavy gusts of hotish wind came moaning down the gorge of the river; the clouds were very low and lowering; long flashes of bright lightning were darting about these clouds, but as yet neither thunder nor rain. "It will be a tremendous storm that, when it breaks," said my husband to me, as we stood looking at the sky, and stream, and opposite bank, by the glare of the quick succeeding flashes at the open door of our tent. "I wonder," he continued, "if all the tent-pins are well knocked in, or else we shall find ourselves rolled up in the tent when this storm falls on us, and carried off into the middle of the river." I assured him I had seen them all hammered twice over; "and our own canoe," said he, "I must go and see to the moorings myself." So I was left to look on while he went down and saw that all was right below. He then ordered the sentries to be loaded, and a certain number of men to sleep with their accoutrements on, and their loaded muskets within reach.

I don't know how, but there was something ominous about the setting in of this night. I thought I was to get a good sleep, and still I felt as though I should be woke out of it before morning. It was past ten; the wind had become a great deal cooler, a few heavy drops of rain had begun to fall; it was pitch dark—I was very tired and sleepy. I saw H—— come in, put a sharp, short-bladed sword he had for use upon the chair by his bed. He loaded his gun, and also put it close by; but I was sleepy, and fell asleep.

How long I may have slept I know not—till perhaps an hour past midnight—when I was awake, but by a most tremendous noise. I sat up in my bed and listened; I called H——; no answer. The night-lamp had blown out—the tent was in darkness. I felt about—everything was empty; I felt on the chair—the sword was gone; I felt—the gun was gone. I was then wide awake; I heard the crashing of the thunder above every other noise; but betwixt and between, and with it, I heard other noises; I jumped up, slipped my arms into my dressing-gown, tied the sash round my waist, opened the tent door, which was soaking. It was raining in torrents. I called my husband—once, twice—but no answer. At last a blazing flash of lightning showed him to me, about twenty yards off, on the bank of the river. The unearthly howling, roaring, and raving of wild beasts now rose to my ears. I ran to his side, and asked him what on earth was the matter. He told me we were in the midst of a herd of wild elephants, at least that the herd had taken to the water, and were infuriated at finding obstacles in their way. He had already fired a few shots, and he had been calling to the other loaded men to fire. I never saw, I never heard such a scene in my life. The raging of the elephants; thunder-crash after crash over head; and then those long crackling reports, which go wandering about the clouds to fall in with other peals which clash against each other, seeming as if they would tear the vault of heaven in two. Then that vivid, forked, fiery, flaming lightning, which for the minute it flashes shows every leaf in the jungle, every stick and stone on the bank, every wave on the tide.

By such a flash, then, was made visible to my dazzled eyes a herd of wild elephants on the opposite bank of the river. There might have been five and twenty or thirty large males with tusks, females without, and young ones; in fact, it was a herd, and composed of animals of all sizes. Several had taken to the water, and were swimming straight for our landing-place where our canoes were moored, and above which our tent was pitched. One large female, with two young ones, was in advance of them all; the young ones, I fancy, were fired, and wanted to land; of course nothing would turn the mother. The whole herd had been startled by the report of the firearms, but were still anxious to cross, as this seemed to be a selected crossing of their own to come over, and tear down and eat the plantains belonging to the deserted village. But not only were they startled, but they were angered, and hence the noise, a noise which was more unearthly than any other I ever heard; for mixed with screams of the shrillest sharpness, were groans, and roarings, and ravings and beating of trunks, and tearing down and crashing amongst branches; and trees were being hurled into the river by them in their wrath. All I here describe was seen during the space of a flash of lightning.

"If they effect a landing," said H—— to me, "it's all up with us; there's not one of us will escape with life." In the mean time, he was shouting to the men to load and fire, for the female with the two young ones was swimming steadily on. The rain and wind were pelting—both mercilessly. Of course, I was wet through long ago, and my hair, which had tumbled down, was beating about my face in wild entanglement. "Go into that house, dear, you'll get your death of cold here," said H——; and he told the old man, who had crept out to his side, to lead me there: forthwith he took me by the wrist and tottered away with me through a splash of mud and water up to my ankles—for I was bare-foot—to the door of his tent, which had to be ascended to by a ladder of unsmoothed sticks, the knots of which went through and through my unfortunate feet. But the minute I was landed there, with the old man by me, I could not bear the suspense. I could not see what was going on at the river's bank, so I scrambled down the steps again, splashed through the mud and water, and, as I did not want to disturb, or rather distract H——, made my way to a kneeling figure I saw by the tent. He was one of our sentries, a man I knew. "Are you loaded?" said I. "Yes." And, when the next flash of lightning came, we saw the massive head of the great female elephant nearing us rapidly in the stream. "Fire!" said I; for the strong instinct of self-preservation quenched my pity for the noble animal; and the heavy dead dab with which the ball fell showed it had hit; and a plunge and a furious roar ensued—then a rise. Now the black spot in the water was so large we could see it without the lightning. The sharp crack of my husband's rifle whizzed past us—another plunge and a groan, then a roar. A cross fire was thus kept up. And now came a volley from all the loaded men, who had by this time come up; they shouted, they threw fire, lighted sticks, burning straw from the old falling roofs of the deserted huts; all sorts of things did they throw into the water to scare them. With this several of the further-off elephants, who were swimming towards us, turned with fearful roars and shrieks; but the young ones kept on their steady course for our bank, the mother following. At last, the largest of the young ones fairly landed. There was a dead silence amongst us all for a minute. I saw him gathering himself together to mount the broken path in the bank, up which we had come, and which was none other than an elephant track. H—— was standing at the head of it. "Fire!" he shouted. I heard both his own barrels discharged. The poor beast gave a shrill trumpet cry, and stood still a moment at the foot of the bank, when the mother, panting from her wounds and her wrath, set foot on ground, and landed to the assistance of her young one. Notwithstanding our peril, I felt it to be a pitiful sight: she gave one lash with her trunk to the moorings of the cockboat which was in her way, and sent it, with all our pots and pans, our dinner, our breakfast, our all, floating down the stream. She was roaring, and throwing the earth over her head in her passion. Well, thought I, it is all over with us; she'll be up the bank in another minute, and she'll tear and trample down everything and every one in her way. I looked hard for H—— through the darkness, and I saw he had reloaded; my sentry had done the same. "Another volley!" cried H—— to his men, and down whizzed the balls—some splashing in the water, some tearing up the earth from the bank, and some going with their heavy sound into the body of the great animals below. The little beast by this time, I fancy wounded, and fairly scared, seemed to roll itself together, twisted up its trunk, and, with a shriek, trundled into the water. The brave mother stood for a moment irresolute whether to face her enemies and punish them, or go with her young one; instinct at last prevailed; she backed into the water, but, finding our own large canoe in her way, she got to the outside of it, and, with a regular succession of sledge-hammer blows from her trunk, beat in the mat roofing level with the sides of the boat. I thought I heard a kind of stifled scream from inside; but, before I had time to say "What is that?" or "Who is that?" I saw the infuriated animal curl her trunk round the end of the canoe, raise it high out of water, and then dash it down again. The whole end of the boat snapped off like a hazel wand, and the bit which remained in her trunk she flung into the river, and swam down the stream; at the same time, the water rushed into the poor broken boat, and down she went stern foremost, but still held on by her moorings to the bank.

At this minute, I distinctly heard cries for help from within, and I ordered the sepoy, who had been firing away under my orders, to jump down the bank and see who it was. In a minute after, he had cut open the fastenings to the roof matting, and from beneath crawled out my unfortunate tire-woman.

"What!" cried I. "Are you not hurt? Are you not killed? Are not all your bones broken?"

"No, Mem Sahib; but all your things are wet through; your dress, and your sketch-books, and your bonnet," said she, holding up an unfortunate little Paris bonnet, from off which the water was running in torrents, and which was smashed as flat as—as a pancake, in fact, for want of a better simile.

"But how have you not been killed—been crushed to bits?" said I.

"Oh, because I took up one of the boards of the boat, when I heard him coming, and lay down quietly in the bottom of it; but I am all wet through."

With this she made the best of her way up the bank, with the dripping bonnet still in her hand; for she mourned ever it. But we now heard shrieks and shouts all down the bank as far as our camp extended. "Stop the boats! Save the boats!" was the cry on every side; our friend the elephant having swam deliberately down, and cast loose or swamped every canoe she came near, had then taken herself off and crossed to the herd. There were John Company's muskets, ammunition, and provisions all sailing down the river, spinning round the corners where the eddies were strongest, and never thinking of touching or stopping anywhere. All this time, the herd on the opposite side had majestically marched down the stream for some way, still making a great roaring and screaming amongst themselves; but we were thankful to see they had given up the crossing opposite us. In the mean time, there was a general scramble for a boat to catch the rest. Notwithstanding past danger, and all my former tribulations, I could not help laughing aloud as I rung the rain out of my hair. They succeeded in hauling up one of the swamped canoes, and, after unlading it, set out in chase of the rest, which I believe were all duly caught at different distances down the river. By this time a pale, sickly moon had come out, and there was an order from Major H—— to fire the few remaining loaded muskets, as a kind of parting and warning salute to the retreating herd; it was answered by a chorus of groans: with that we were thankful, and got into our poor little tent. I had no dry linen to put on, so was obliged to lay down in my wet; but I was tired out, and soon went to sleep to dream of those horrid elephants under various distorted forms.

The next morning, of course, there was a general drying—uniforms, woman's gear, pantaloons, the unlucky bonnet, drawing-books, Newman's superfine colors swimming about, having made to themselves a sea of many tints; bags of rice, foraging caps, and an abundance of other objects. The old man and the little boy, of course, came to look on, and, seating themselves at our tent-door, told us it was not our fate to be trampled to death by wild elephants, and that was why it had not occurred last night; but that a few months ago this very herd had crossed at a village lower down to devastate the young rice crops, and when the people came to scare them away, they got so infuriated that they rushed on their huts and toppled them over, tearing down their thatches, and sending the unfortunate inhabitants howling to the wilderness.

Our own boat being useless, we were obliged to have one of the small commissariat canoes emptied for Major H—— and myself, into which we squeezed ourselves. The interior had been newly charred, so it was not very delightful for white clothes; but, in the course of a few hours, we arrived at Ningroo, where we found the native political agent's accounts verified by the native officer commanding there. So, after sundry orders given, and reports received, and inspections of works and buildings made, there was not much more to do; thus, after a night's stay, the next forenoon we started, and our men pulling hard down stream all day, we arrived at our own comfortable house at about nine o'clock that night. Thus ended my adventurous trip to the outposts of Ningroo. Perhaps it may be as well here to state that a few months after this, two Singphoes came into our verandah at Jeypore, with a large-sized female elephant's skull, slung by cane ties to a long bamboo. They told us that they had tracked the animal, which appeared sick some little time before, and, having brought her down with poisoned arrows, had found the skull to be full of shot-holes; they therefore brought it for us to see. And, as we had no doubt that this was the remains of our poor heroine of the ford, we gave the men a due proportion of salt, tobacco, and opium, and took possession of our trophy.

A LOVE WAIF.

BY HENRIE HOLLIS.

So it seems thou dost doubt
In my love for thee, dearest;
Though thou speakest not out,
There is something thou fearest.
By that sigh on the night
When alone we were straying,
Know I fears not quite right
In thy breast were allaying.

Thou dost doubt, I perceive
By thy low voice's tremble—
That you partly believe
That my heart doth dissemble;
I perceive that the hours
Of reliance are flying—
That the "leaves and the flowers"
Of true love are dying.

Thou dost doubt: 'tis a foe
That is coming between us
From the wound of his blow
There is nothing can screen us.
Lest our faith it remain
In each other unshaken,
Love's joy—not its pain—
From our bosoms is taken.

Salineville, Ohio.

THE CAMPBELLS AND THE CLIFTONS.

A DOMESTIC TALE.

BY MISS META M. DUNCAN.

(Concluded from page 340.)

MRS. CLIFTON, at the earnest solicitation of Mrs. John Campbell, had taken up her residence, as usual, with them for the warm weather; and Edward, to be near her, as well as Emily, procured lodgings in the neighborhood.

It was impossible for Edward Clifton not to observe the strong contrast between the homes of the two brothers, domesticated as he was with them. In the one house, all was neatness, cheerfulness, and comfort; in the other, neglect, disorder, and discontent unceasingly prevailed. At John Campbell's plain, but neatly served table, Edward always found a cover laid for him, and a simple, unaffected welcome. At the elder brother's, the meals seemed to be always indefinitely postponed while he remained, and sometimes he received a private intimation from old Nanny that the cook was "off," or in a bad humor, or that the butcher had not come, by way of hint not to stop for dinner.

All this mismanagement and discomfort, Edward, with the blindness of love, attributed to the incompetency and fine-ladyism of Mrs. Frederic Campbell; though, at the other house, he could not fail to observe that Nora was the chief manager in all domestic matters, her mother's health being too delicate to admit of her attending to any active duties herself.

On his return home, Edward had been much struck by Elinor's appearance. His thoughts often recurred to the circumstances which had come to his knowledge while abroad respecting her, and he could not help deploring that one so lovely in person and character should have bestowed her affections upon such a man. The beauty of Elinor had been much increased by the development of her character. Her whole nature was invigorated, and seemed to expand under the pressure of misfortune, and never, since the days of heedless childhood, had she been so gay, animated, and bright as now, when there was a field of action opened to her—a work to be done.

Edward's anxiety on this subject led him to desire some information relative to it. He spoke to Emily of her cousin, of his sense of her increased attractiveness, and of his high opinion of her, and asked her if she knew an officer in the navy named Harvey?

Emily replied that she did.

"He is a lover of Elinor's, is he not?"

"No," replied Emily. "What put that notion into your head?"

"It is no notion, no surmise, Emily. I am certain of it. They are engaged. You must ask me no questions; but, be assured, I am not mistaken."

"Then he is the greatest?"

"Greatest what, Emily?"

"The most artful wretch that ever lived!" continued Emily, warmly.

"Why? Tell me what you know of him. How did you become acquainted with him?"

"We met him in society the winter after you left, and saw a great deal of him; and he must have managed his advances very adroitly to deceive me. I never even suspected that he admired Nora, though they were thrown a great deal together."

"Then it is a secret engagement," said Edward, feeling his high opinion of Elinor cooing away sensibly, never remembering that the woman whom he himself loved was similarly situated.

"Of course it is a secret engagement. I know that my aunt and uncle have no suspicion of anything of the kind. I wonder what they will think of their paragon when they find it out. For my part, I always thought that Nora, with all her prudery, was no better than other people; though I did not think she was so sly as to throw dust in my eyes."

Adversity, and some bitter experience, had diminished very considerably Emily's "sweetness," as well as her refinement; and she dwelt with a degree of acrimony upon her cousin's conduct that her responsibilities in the case scarcely warranted, and which annoyed Edward in secret, though he condemned Nora himself.

Edward's regard for the Campbell family was warm and long cherished. To Mr. and Mrs. John he felt that he owed a deep debt of gratitude, both on his own and his mother's account. In Elinor, also, he took a warm interest; and, as he remembered the affecting charge which he had received from her young brother in his dying moments, he determined, for the first time, to assume a brother's privilege, and speak to her with a gentle warning of what he had heard of her lover. Accordingly, he one morning joined the family at breakfast, proposing to await a favorable opportunity to speak to Nora. Fortunately, she was preparing to set out on a walk to a country store, about a mile distant, on some household matters, and Edward begged to join her. They walked on in silence for some time, till Edward began to get a little nervous, feeling that he had undertaken an office that was more difficult than he had conceived. When they reached the entrance to a by-path that led to the little dell where Arthur had been wounded, he paused and said—

"Let us go this way, Elinor."

Elinor shrank back; but he continued, saying—

"I have something to speak to you about, and would like to say it here."

Elinor followed him in silence to the spot which she had never visited, save alone, since that fatal day. Edward seated her upon a fragment of rock, and sat down near her.

"Elinor," he said, with an effort at composure, "I believe that you have confidence in me—that you do not doubt my deep interest in you, my sincere regard?"

Elinor's countenance was very pale, and upon it were painted the surprise and varied emotions which filled her at this address, while her large, dark eyes looked troubled and serious. When he ceased, however, she answered, in a low voice—

"I have. I do not doubt you."

"Then, Elinor, I will tell you why I have brought you to this spot. Years ago, when the brother whose memory you revere so truly was leaving us, you remember he asked of me a pledge that I would be a brother to you in his place, if occasion should require it. Heretofore I have never been called upon to redeem that pledge; but now I think the time is come."

Elinor looked up into his face with tearful eyes. She could not speak; but she motioned him to proceed.

"When I was in the Mediterranean last winter, I learned some circumstances connected with a Mr. Harvey of the navy. It is of him I wish to speak."

At the mention of Harvey's name, a crimson glow suffused Elinor's face. Still she said nothing.

"His name was mentioned in connection with yours, Elinor. Indeed, his engagement with you was freely spoken of among his intimates—spoken of in a way offensive to a woman's delicacy, and very wounding to me, feeling, as I do, a brother's sensitiveness in all that concerns you, and I determined, when the opportunity offered, to tell you this, and to say that I feared, inexperienced and confiding as you are, that you had suffered your feelings to be influenced by a man who is not worthy of you. Excuse me, if I pain you; but I feel it my duty, resolved, as I am, to act a brother's part by you, to speak plainly."

Elinor looked up and said, firmly—

"It is a mistake. I know the gentleman you speak of; but no such connection or engagement exists between us. He is but a common acquaintance."

"A common acquaintance!" exclaimed Edward, his trepidation of manner disappearing in a strong feeling of amazement. "Why, Elinor, he exhibits your miniature and your letters, with the signature attached, to his messmates!"

"Did you see them?" asked Elinor, quickly.

"No, I did not see them; but Selby, who is the soul of honor, has seen both, and he assured me of the fact. Selby is a Philadelphian; and, though you are not acquainted, he knows all about your family."

Elinor bent her face to her knees, and her convulsive sobs shook her whole frame. It was pitiable to witness such an agony of distress. Edward was greatly pained, and attempted to soothe her.

"If there exists any entanglement that you regret, dear Nora," he whispered, "confide in me. I will do more than a brother's part. I will guard your feelings, your name, and take all responsibility upon myself. Tell me all."

Elinor lifted up her head with a movement of haughty pride.

"I have nothing to tell," she said; "nothing to regret. It is not consciousness of error that has humbled me thus. I was weak enough to weep at finding you could entertain so poor an opinion of me." And she rose to go with an air of offended dignity.

"But, Elinor," said Edward, surprised, overpowered, and convinced, spite of himself, "what am I to think?"

"Think that I have told you the truth."

"Then you never gave Mr. Harvey your picture, never wrote to him?"

"Never!"

"Then, Elinor, it is proper that a stop should be put to the calumnies of this coxcomb; and, as one who considers himself your brother, I shall do it."

"I empower you to take no such step," said Elinor. "I acknowledge no such claim. Truth will always prevail at last, and I have no fear of consequences." And she left him and returned home, spite of his urgent request to speak with her still farther.

This conversation excited Edward's mind strongly. There were a purity and elevation about Elinor's character that impressed him spite of himself, rendering it almost impossible to doubt her. On the other hand, there was a want of openness, a reserve in all that regarded herself individually, that, while it repelled, left room for doubt. Emily's hints, too, of Elinor's being other than she seemed, influenced him, and he felt thoroughly uncomfortable. Edward would have done well at this time to confide in his mother; but he hesitated, knowing her strong affection for Elinor, to speak of her in the terms he would be obliged to use.

Since his interview with Elinor, she had changed towards him. All that winning softness of manner, which had so much struck him of late, was gone; she was cold, restrained, and evidently troubled.

When Edward's annoyance had reached its extreme point, he unexpectedly heard of the arrival in New York of the vessel in which Mr. Harvey was an officer. Without saying anything of his purpose, farther than a notification to Mrs. Clifton of his intended absence for a few days, he repaired immediately to New York, met and entertained the gentlemen to whose hospitality he had been indebted, and then sought out Mr. Harvey, who replied civilly to his note asking for an interview, and appointed the same evening, in his own rooms at his hotel.

Edward repaired to the meeting at the time appointed, and announced himself as a friend closely connected with the Campbell family, who had called to ask an explanation of some circumstances connected with one of them. He then stated frankly, but firmly, that, while a guest during the past year on board the "Wisconsin," in the absence of Mr. Harvey, he had learned that he represented himself to be engaged to Miss Campbell, whose portrait and letters he was said frequently to have exhibited; that, on his return to Philadelphia, he had mentioned the circumstance to the lady, who asserted that she had nothing more than a common acquaintance with him, and denied ever having written to him or given him her picture.

"She must be the most consummate flirt that ever lived, then," said Harvey, bluntly, and looking very indignant; his after-dinner mood, which savored strongly of champagne, rendering him very communicative. "She swore—no, she didn't swear. What do ladies do? They vow. She vowed she'd marry me as soon as I came home; and I was just thinking of going to see her when I got your note."

"Excuse me, sir, if I mention that it is necessary I should, for the complete adjustment of this matter, see the miniature and letters alluded to. We are always bound to take a lady's word, unless a gentleman can bring proofs."

"Proofs! Confound it, I can bring plenty of proofs; and, since she is disposed to back out, I don't care how much I expose her."

He arose and went to a writing-desk on a table close by, and took from it a morocco miniature-case and a package of letters. He unclasped the case and looked at it.

"Here," he said, "is the most treacherous little face in the United States. Look at it. 'Man may smile and be a villain,' Shakspeare or some of those fellows say; but I'll be hanged if they would not have been nearer the mark, if they had said it about woman."

The picture was in Edward's hand; he had been looking at it for several moments. He appeared very composed, but his brain was reeling, and emotion had rendered him speechless. The miniature before him was a beautifully executed portrait of Emily Campbell! not Elinor! At length, he asked, in a tolerably calm voice—

"Did you receive this picture from the hands of the original, sir?"

"Not exactly from her own hands."

"Not exactly!" replied Edward, turning fiercely upon him, and repeating his words. "How, then, sir, did you obtain it? and by what right do you keep possession of a lady's picture unauthorized?"

"I have a great mind not to answer you," replied Harvey, sulkily, his genial mood fast disappearing under the influence of Edward's dictatorial manner. "Though, confound it, she isn't worth a quarrel;" and he threw down a note addressed to himself. "There's the note which accompanied the picture when she sent it to me," he said. "Read it. I give you leave."

Edward opened the note. It was Emily's hand, and signed by her, and the date was exactly four months after he had parted from her solemnly engaged. He read it. It was a note such as a woman, very much in love, would write to her affianced lover on the eve of a painful separation. Such a note as Emily had never written to him. Edward rose from his chair; his face was very pale, but he was calm.

"I am much indebted to you for the forbearance which you have exercised in this interview, Mr. Harvey, and I owe you an apology, which I hope you will accept. I have been laboring under a mistake. I was misled by a blunder originating in a similarity of names. The lady who disclaimed you as her lover was not Miss Emily Campbell." And Edward hastily took his leave.

Edward reached home the afternoon of the following day, and proceeded immediately to seek Emily. He informed her that he had heard all the circumstances of her connection with Mr. Harvey, and that he was aware of her treachery towards himself.

"Who told you?" hastily interrupted Emily, receiving the communication with wonderful coolness. "Was it Nora?"

"No, it was not Nora," replied Edward, remembering, with compunction, how honorably she had submitted to unjust suspicion sooner than betray her cousin; and he told her how he had been informed, reminding her of the mistake under which he had labored, in supposing it to be Elinor.

"It was very foolish in you to suppose," said Emily, coolly, "that I was going to be engaged to you for years, and never flirt during all that time."

"Flirt, Emily! Do you call pledging your vows, bestowing your portrait, and writing passionate love-letters to a man, flirting? Good God! what a perversion of mind! Why, I looked upon you, in my absence, as one who was as much my wife in faith, mind, and affections, as if our vows had been plighted at the altar, and I gave you an equal return. I have seen Mr. Harvey, Emily," he said, after a moment's pause, to stifle his emotion. "I have just returned from New York."

Emily colored, with some faint appearance of shame; but, immediately recovering herself, she said, proudly—

"To what does all this lead, Mr. Clifton? Am I to understand that you weary of your engagement?"

Edward looked at her in astonishment. The effrontery with which she braved the exposure of her misconduct, and her obtuseness as to its enormity, amazed him.

"You apprehend me right," he said. "It is my wish to sever finally a tie which your own want of faith has virtually broken. I could not say this thus calmly to a woman whom I believed I was injuring; but your affections could never have been mine, or, if mine, they are too easily transferred to make me hesitate in declining them. If, however, you think that there is anything in my conduct which you have not justly earned, I will submit the whole affair to your parents, towards whom I now feel that I have not acted a defensible part, and let them judge between us."

Emily, with extreme haughtiness, said that her wishes coincided entirely with his own, and, deprecating any appeal to her parents, desired that nothing should be said to them on the subject. And thus they parted.

This explanation over, there was one more duty which Edward felt himself called upon to perform, and this was to offer to Nora the humblest apologies for the pain which an unfortunate mistake had led him to give her. As his thoughts carried him back to this scene, and he recalled his offensive suspicions, blacker now a thousandfold that he saw her conduct in its true light, he felt mortified, angry with himself, and not even the remembrance of her indignant allusion to the value which she had placed upon his good opinion could soothe him. The excitement of Edward's mind admitted of no repose. He passed in review every incident connected with his engagement with Emily. He scanned her conduct with an unvelled eye, and it was no alleviation to his sufferings to see her as she was—heartless and scheming, guided by no high principle, and the slave of an absorbing vanity that sacrificed everything to its cravings. Wounded in his dearest feelings, humbled in his own opinion, and bitterly disappointed in all his prospects of happiness, he could better have borne to be parted from her forever, with his opinion of her unchanged, than to have had his faith in woman's nature so dispelled.

In this state of mind, he sought Elinor. She received him with the reserve which had marked her manner to him since their interview in the dell; but, when Edward entered upon his explanation, and gave her a history of the whole affair, beginning with his secret engagement with Emily and ending with their final conversation, her manner changed. She received his fervent, heartfelt apologies with emotion, admitted the plausibility of his grounds for suspicion, and offered her thanks for the interest which he had exhibited in her behalf.

"Your intentions," she said, "in speaking to me upon that occasion I did not misconstrue, although, I confess, I was deeply wounded at your low estimate of my character."

"But why, Elinor, when a word from you would have explained the whole thing—for you say you were not ignorant of Emily's regard for Harvey—why did you not speak? You owed it to yourself, for the exonerated of your own character."

Elinor blushed vividly, and answered with painful embarrassment—

"I was aware—I suspected the state of things between you and Emily. Could I tell what I knew must alienate you?"

"And you thought so much of your cousin, so little of me, Elinor, that you suffered me to continue a tool for the convenience of a heartless coquette! Was this kind, Elinor? Was it just?"

Elinor's lip quivered; she was unused to such scenes, and could scarcely control the confusion and agitation of her mind. A vague distrust of herself, a trembling fear that a sense of honor towards Emily, and regard for her happiness, had not wholly influenced her, impelled her to silence.

"I did what I thought best," she said, at length, in a broken voice. "I thought that time—that Emily—that you yourself, perhaps—I saw that she was unworthy of you. If I had spoken, she would have suspected—my motives, I mean, might have been misconstrued." Here Elinor's voice became inaudible, and she turned her agitated countenance away, veiling her eyes with her hand, unable to proceed.

Edward rose and walked rapidly across the floor. He saw that there was some secret feeling connected with himself that caused Elinor's emotion; some suffering, perhaps—some wounded delicacy, brought about by the malevolence or temper of others. His vanity, but recently so rudely shocked, admitted, but for an instant, the dangerous flattery which it might have suggested. His self-complacency was annihilated, and he repelled the presumptuous thought with scorn, and the vision disappeared. Not so its effects. He returned to Elinor's side, and, taking her hand, said—

"I am going away, Elinor; I may not see you again for a long time. But, before I go, I wish to assure you that I acquit you of all blame in this sad affair. As you say, 'you did all for the best,' and I offer you my humblest apologies for the wrong I did you in suspecting you of anything that was not noble and upright, as you are. You must think of me kindly, affectionately, Nora, when I am gone, and sometimes send me a message by mamma." He raised her hand to his lips, kissed it once, twice, and left her.

Nora's head sank upon the table beside her, and she gave way unrestrainedly to her emotions so long pent up.

In a hurried farewell interview with Mrs. Clifton, Edward briefly explained to her his past and present position with regard to Emily. He touched as lightly as possible upon her misconduct, and begged his mother to consider this communication, which he felt that he owed to her, one of strict confidence.

Ere Edward reached New Orleans, letters of an urgent and distressing character had been forwarded to him. His uncle was lying dangerously ill; and, on his arrival, he learned that his end was hourly expected. A heavy stupor, in which Mr. Fairly had lain for many hours, passed off about this time; he recognised Edward, who sat beside him, and stretched out his hand to him. Edward took it, and, with much feeling, bent over the dying man.

"Kiss me, Edward," he said. Edward did so. "Now raise me up. You are a good man, Edward. I am glad I have been spared to see you. I have left you all. Don't stay here. Go home and take care of your mother." His voice failed him, and, in a few hours, he was no more. When the will was opened, with the exception of a few trifling bequests, Edward was declared sole heir to all his uncle's vast possessions. The will also contained a request that he would, as soon as possible, wind up the affairs of the firm, and retire from business.

Edward's attachment to his uncle, founded in the best feelings of our nature, was strong and tender, and he felt his loss sensibly; but the shock which his mind had so recently sustained, and the embittered feelings which it had produced, left more lasting and depressing effects, rendering his sudden acquisition of wealth scarcely a matter of congratulation to him. The first letter to Mrs. Clifton after his loss breathed only this spirit, and she wrote to entreat him to conclude his business speedily and return to her. This, however, could not be done so easily as she supposed; and the long weary winter passed over, and he was still unable to fix a time for his return.

Meanwhile, things were not standing still at the North. Mr. Harvey came to Philadelphia. He was characteristically shocked when he discovered the overthrow of Mr. Campbell's fortunes, and assured Emily in good faith "that he thought it was very hard upon her." At the end of three weeks, not having repeated his visit, he made no demur at the demand which Emily made for her portrait and letters, "those fatal tell-tales," she said, "but for which she might now have been the mistress of Edward Clifton's large fortune." Being rather depressed by the dullness of home, and the total extinction of too promising love affairs, Emily accepted the invitation of one of her former schoolmates, who resided in Baltimore, to make her "a long visit." Here, in a new field, her sweetness returned, and she was again a belle, followed, flattered, and admired.

Late in the spring, Mrs. Clifton was seized with a dangerous illness. When her life was threatened, Edward was written to; but the important change for good or ill must take place ere he could reach Philadelphia. Mrs. John Campbell and Elinor remained with Mrs. Clifton while in this critical state; and Elinor was, throughout her illness, her untiring and efficient nurse.

Mrs. Clifton lingered many anxious days on the verge of the grave. At length, the native strength of her constitution conquered, and she became convalescent. The weather was now unusually warm for the season, and the physicians considering the pure air of the country necessary for her complete restoration, she was removed to Clover Hill, where, under the care of her kind friends, she improved rapidly.

Edward arrived soon after her removal to the country. He had feared the worst; and his joy, in finding his mother recovering, overflowed in kind deeds and words of affection to all around.

"I mean to be head nurse myself hereafter," said Edward one morning, a few days after his return, as he smoothed down Mrs. Clifton's sofa pillows; "nothing is to part us now. The Siamese twins are not more inseparable than we shall be."

"You have a powerful rival, Edward," said Mrs. Clifton, with a gentle caress. "Nora has been everything to me in my illness that nurse, friend, or comforter could be, and you will find it difficult to depose her."

"Then I must apply for some other office about your person. I can never be jealous of Nora. I know I can trust her." Edward began his remark laughingly, but as he concluded it, his countenance changed, and his eye turned full of seriousness to Nora, who was sitting close by employed with her needle.

Nora caught the glance, and, as she bent over her work, she said, mentally, "He has not forgotten the past, though outwardly he appears so gay and cheerful."

Edward had seen Emily, who was again at home, several times since his arrival. She always appeared when he called at her father's, where his visits, though few, could not, in consideration of past acts of kindness, be omitted entirely. She received him with an ease and cordiality that, while it startled Edward, afforded the strongest proof of her entire want of sensibility, and enabled him soon to meet her with equal composure.

Edward had a little matter upon his mind which troubled him. In the custom house, a box belonging to him had been lying for many months. It contained cameos, mosaics, and other works of art and taste, some of them very costly, which he had picked up abroad. Most of them had been intended for Emily; but the box did not arrive till after their connection ceased. He now wished to give them to Elinor, but knew not whether she would accept them. In the frankness of his nature, he one day told her the whole story, and begged her to say that she would receive them.

"Give me what you originally intended for me," she replied, "and let Mrs. Clifton keep the rest for you. You may find a use for them some day."

Edward understood her allusion, but made no reply. The next day Elinor received a packet containing many articles of great beauty and value. Whether Edward had implicitly followed her advice in the division, the impartial reader must decide for herself.

The summer passed on serenely, happily. Edward occupied his old lodgings; but the greater part of his time was spent at Mr. John Campbell's. "He was indulging himself in a holiday," he said, "before settling down into some decided pursuit." Nevertheless, as an idle man, he was at everybody's service. He read to the ladies, and sometimes drove Mrs. Clifton out. He helped the little boys with their lessons, and did all Mrs. John's errands in town. He walked occasionally with Elinor, helped her in the garden, or in any little matter that turned up, when she would permit him. A favorite method of getting over time, with him, was to loiter about the piazza with a book after breakfast, while Elinor was engaged in the little breakfast-room adjoining the kitchen, busied with her household cares. He assisted in this way, lounging at the window, sometimes reading, sometimes talking, and sometimes only looking at the washing of the breakfast cups, the compounding of puddings, the making of cakes, weighing of groceries, and various other domestic labors; and, in preserving-time, achieved wonders, in his own opinion, in the way of pasting up and labeling jars of sweetmeats, the praises which he lavished upon himself being called for, he said, by the want of gratitude in his employer.

"I must begin soon to think of returning to town, Edward," said Mrs. Clifton, one day, the changing foliage warning her that cold weather would soon be upon them.

"Don't you think we could get some nice little cottage in this neighborhood?" replied Edward. "You are so well here; and you will miss Mrs. Campbell so much when you go home. For my part, I think it is very pleasant here."

Mrs. Clifton shook her head and smiled, and then said, gravely—

"It would be very dreary for me in the country in the winter. When the weather is inclement, and the roads bad, I should see little more of the Campbells than I do in town. Besides, how should I get to church?"

Edward said no more; he knew how dear to her were her own pastor and her own church, and how true was all she said. He felt very dull, however, very dispirited, and he set out to take a long walk. On his return, being fatigued and heated, Edward threw himself upon a sofa in the wide, old-fashioned hall, and soon fell into a doze. It was quite dark when he was aroused by a heavy footstep. The parlor door opened, and, by the light that streamed through it, he perceived old Nanny Foster descending the stairs. Elinor, who had opened the door spoke a few words to her, and was about to retire, when the old woman arrested her steps.

"Stop, Miss Elinor," she said, "I want to say something to you. You know I always speak my mind. I've known you since you was a baby, and always did it, and shall do it now. I think, miss, you are behaving very mean to your cousin. You know very well that Mr. Edward Clifton is in love with Miss Emily, and wanted to marry her, till he got jealous of her. Now, such love tiffs as these soon pass over, if nobody stands in the way of lovers, keeping them apart; and, I am sorry to say, I think you are doing that very thing! Mr. Edward is very rich, to be sure, and a great match; but it isn't honorable for a lady, specially such quality as you are, to be standing in the way of another person, who has a better right to him."

Elinor was so astounded by this attack that, for a few moments, she could not collect herself. When she did so, she retired without a word, and closed the door. But the indomitable old woman was not to be thus quietly put down. She opened the parlor door, and, obtruding her hard, sharp visage into the room, said—

"I don't know where you got your manners, miss, to shut the door in the face of a decent body that nursed you when you was a baby. But I'll tell you my mind, for all that. You're in love with Mr. Edward yourself, I s'pose; but, I can tell you, you won't git him. He'll marry Miss Emily yet."

A hand was laid on Nanny's shoulder; she turned, and disappeared like a snow-wreath.

Edward entered the room, closed the door, and approached Nora. She was trembling like a leaf. He seated her upon the sofa, and said, kindly—

"Why suffer the insolence of that coarse and ignorant old woman to distress you thus, Nora?"

Nora could not speak; her voice was choked, and tears began to fall.

Edward sat by her quietly some minutes, till she was more calm, and then said—

"Nora, I was asleep on the sofa in the hall when Nanny aroused me. I overheard what she said; and we must overlook her impertinence, in honor of the faithful creature's motives. The tigress is not truer to her cubs than this poor woman is to the children whom she has served all their lives. With regard to myself," he said, his voice getting a little husky, "I must say that she is altogether wrong in her surmises. I do not love Emily; I have long ceased even to respect her. When I examine the feelings which now fill my whole heart for another, I doubt whether I ever did love her. Elinor, listen to me; look at me. I know that I cannot recommend myself to you as I might once have done. I cannot ask you for the priceless gift of your affections at present. I can only pray you to listen to me with indulgence, and to subject me to any period of probation you choose; but do not plunge me into despair by a cold denial. Give me time; let me show you how truly, how fervently I love you! Let me redeem myself in your opinion. Speak to me, dear Nora, and give me a little hope."

Elinor's countenance had been deadly pale for some time. It now flushed to a deep crimson, and her drooping lids veiled her eyes. Edward took her hand and kissed it. It remained passive in his. He drew her head upon his shoulder, and a shower of bright tears rained from those tender eyes.

It was never known to the voracious narrator of this history whether Elinor made any reply to the vehement pleadings of her lover. There is a sort of magnetism, however, between people thus situated which the uninitiated cannot understand, and which is an admirable substitute for words. One fact is ascertained; Edward never complained of the taciturnity of the lady of his love, and, before twenty-four hours were over, he made an authorized application to her father for her hand, which application, we may add, was favorably received.

The joy of Mrs. Clifton at this realization of her dearest hopes may be conceived. The chagrin of old Nanny may also be left to the imagination of the reader. Luckily for her peace of mind ever after, she never knew that her own act had precipitated the event which she so much deplored.

As for Emily, she was unable to conceal her mortification when her cousin's engagement was announced. She had no affection to disappoint; but her pride, vanity, and ambition were all deeply wounded, and she soon took occasion to make another visit to Baltimore. In less than two months after her departure, Mrs. Frederic Campbell was moving mountains to prepare for her an adequate bridal outfit. Emily's intended husband was altogether an unexceptionable person. He was a good deal elder than herself, to be sure; but what did that matter? He was very rich, and had a fine house and several carriages. Among the numerous sources of satisfaction to Emily, in this connection, was the triumph of being married before her cousin. Her wedding was solemnized with great éclat; she drove from church in her own carriage, and, in a few weeks, embarked for Europe, where, at the last accounts, she is represented to be as remarkable for the admiration which she attracts, as for the jealousy which she excites in her husband, who, a victim to paralysis, sojourns with his brilliant wife in every capital in Europe, and finds happiness and repose nowhere. Rumor says that Emily's infant, which was left in Paris with a French nurse, is dead; but, as she has never exhibited any signs of mourning, the charitable doubt the report.

The marriage of Edward and Elinor took place in a few months. The love which Edward bore his wife was equalled by the reverence which he felt for the mother who had trained her up, and given her those high principles and domestic virtues which made her the charm, the stay, the comfort of his home. He felt that he was supremely blest; and no happier day ever dawned than that which united, by an indissoluble tie, the two families of Campbell and Clifton.

THE DARK CLOSET.

A STORY FOR MOTHERS.

BY MRS. SARAH J. HALE.

It is terrible to strive with an accusing conscience! I have tried to overcome my remorse by reflecting that what I had done was done, and could not be altered. I have tried to stifle my anguish by prayers, to atone for my crime by tears. All has been vain, because all has been selfish.

I will make one more effort: I will try confession. Yes, I will confess not to Heaven only, but to earth. This humiliation may be blessed. Perhaps it may save some mother from errors like mine; from sorrows like mine: I shall not then have suffered in vain!

I must give a sketch of my own history, in order to make my confession fully understood. I do this, not with a view to palliate my faults while acknowledging them. No; my sins are great, and not easily excused; but I know what none besides can, the causes which have made me thus capricious and erring. And, while I confess my errors, shall I not also expose their causes? It is the only way in which I can hope my story may be of advantage to others. It would otherwise be like a warning of danger, without showing any way of escape—it might terrify, it would not enlighten or improve.

I trace all my errors of feeling and conduct to the errors of my early education. I was an only child. My father was devoted to his business, and paid little attention to my training. He only called me to him to give me some pretty plaything, or dainty, and I liked him because of these pretty and nice things he brought me. When my humors and appetites were gratified, I was fond of him and glad to see him; at other times, I felt no more affection for him than for the cook; for she, too, pampered my appetite with all sweet and savory articles of food. My father never taught me; and I cannot now recall any early associations or ideas which rested on him for their origin. He had no moral power over my heart and mind.

My mother was a good manager; her house and table were always well arranged. She was fond of dress, but fonder of me; and, had she known how to train me judiciously, she would have done so. But she thought that the chief end of life was to live well, and that I needed a little of every good thing she herself indulged in. So that, from my cradle, I was pampered with every luxury, and thus taught to associate my happiness with my own gratifications of sense. I never loved any person because they loved me; but only because they gave me things I loved.

How much is depending on early impressions! How great the responsibility of those who have the privilege of training children rationally! There is not an absurdity in habit, a prejudice in judgment, an error in principle, but we Americans are at liberty to correct it. And yet, in one respect, there is not a people on the face of the earth who err so woefully in the management of their children. We kill them, body or soul, and often both, by early indulgences of the appetite. They literally eat themselves to death. Hundreds of children perish every year of diseases caused by repletion. And many who, by the strength of their constitutions, survive this pampering, are rendered sluggish in mind, and feeble in body, selfish, irritable, and miserable for life. I speak now particularly of the children of the rich. To the poor, in this respect, poverty is a blessing. Oh, I have felt what I would describe! I first remember myself as a puny, sickly creature, exhausted by the load of indigestible substances I was tempted to swallow. I have no doubt—indeed, I know that my temper was irritated by the stimulating effects of the rich and racy condiments I was permitted to gorge myself with. I was restless, and almost always cross; but it was caused either by the cravings of a diseased stomach, or the pain of a burdened one. Thus passed my infancy, when impressions, never to be effaced in this world, were made on my mind.

I was not sent to school till I was about seven years old, as my mother thought I was too feeble to bear the fatigue and confinement. She went with me the first day, when we only staid half an hour, to see how I liked it. I recollect my first impressions of that school. They were pleasurable, very. The children were all so busy, and looked so happy, I thought I should like to be a scholar. But, alas! my habits were totally averse to steady application. I had only considered books as playthings, which were pretty enough when new and full of pictures; but to pore over them day after day, to learn a lesson, was hateful. I had always been bribed to learn by the promise of something good to eat; I had no idea of any pleasure from the exercise of my rational or moral faculties. I was wholly a creature of sense and passion. I sucked my comfits when I should have studied my lesson; and, when the teacher took away my basket of confectionery, I was so angry I threw away my book. The teacher punished me, and my mother took me from the school.

"Poor child!" said my mother; "all her fault was eating a sugar-plum!"

This first scene of my school life was type of the whole course till I was nearly fourteen. During these seven years, my mother had changed my school at least twenty times, besides keeping me a considerable part of each year at home. I think the teachers should bear some of the blame of this fickleness. I was, to be sure, a fretful, indolent, spoiled child; but I had capacity to learn, and, if my instructors—I attended schools taught by men as well as ladies—had studied my disposition, and adapted their instructions accordingly, I do believe I might have been won to love books, and the discipline necessary to give me industrious habits and self-control would then have been comparatively easy. I believe this, because it was afterwards effected in part; and, had the same management commenced earlier, it might have been entirely successful.

When I was about fourteen, a lady, a friend of my mother, and the confidant of all her troubles with respect to my education, strongly advised that I should be placed at a seminary in the country. She said it would improve my health, and the preceptress was a lady of such excellent judgment and principles that, if anything could be done to improve me, she would be sure to spare no pains to effect it. My parents had begun to despair of my capacity. I had been pronounced incorrigibly dull by every teacher. My father was mortified, and my mother grieved, by my conduct; and so, as a last resource, they sent me to the country.

Mrs. L*, the preceptress, made many minute inquiries of my mother. I recollect them well; and the expression of her countenance, too, when she looked over my trunks, and found one nearly filled with rich cakes, and confectionery, and essences, and rare juleps. She said nothing at that time, but she appeared afterwards to understand my disposition perfectly. She took me into her own room, had a bed fitted up for me beside hers, and every night, after I retired, she sat down beside me and conversed. At first, she said only a few words, perhaps some inquiries about my lesson or my thoughts, and a little explanation of what would be done the next day. By degrees, she introduced stories of the good scholars she had had, and then she repeated short poems, and pointed out their beauties, and endeavored to make me comprehend and feel them. She recited poetry in a most impressive manner; and I remember the effect which some of those poems wrought on me. I think I may say, the first time my heart was ever melted by the pathos of sentiment was hearing her recite Wordsworth's ballad, "We are Seven." I wept; sweet tears they were; for they had been called forth by sympathy with innocence. Mrs. L. bent over me and kissed my cheek. The tears were in her eyes, as she said—

"My child, Louisa, you will yet be all I can wish."

In this manner, without any appearance of undue solicitude on her part, she was winning my confidence. I thought it not strange she should talk thus with me, because I had always been used to so many attentions from my mother; but, had she not taken me to her own room, her solicitude would have been remarked by the other scholars. But how different were my mother's nightly salutations from that of Mrs. L!

"Louisa, dear, how do you feel? Shall I get you anything to take before you go to sleep?" my kind, but mistaken mother would say.

Mrs. L. never inquired about the state of my stomach; she gave me cordials for the heart and mind, and, by her skill, awakened such new and pleasant ideas, that I would lie quietly musing till I fell asleep. And this sleep was to me a very great blessing, for I had been, from an infant, troubled with restlessness through the night.

For the first three months, I recited to Mrs. L. My lessons were very imperfectly studied, but she bore with me; for she said that my moral affections were strengthening, and that I was acquiring a taste for mental beauties. The process was slow, for I had been, as it were, indurated in my selfish appetites till I hardly felt a wish for social enjoyments. This was, in some measure, caused by my being an only child, and for that misfortune I was to be pitied. But at last I became fond of my schoolmates, and interested in my studies. I learned well, and my parents were astonished and delighted at my progress. The last year I spent with Mrs. L. was the happiest of my life, and it was the most useful. The truths which then dawned on my mind have been darkened by many shadows, but still they have never been totally obscured. Oh, why did I not remain longer in their light, till my vision had been strengthened to discern their fairest beauties! I should not then have followed the delusions of sense and sin.

I was about sixteen when my father died, and my mother sent for me home immediately, and never afterwards permitted me to attend school. I cannot blame her; for she was solitary, indeed, and only seemed to live for my sake; but the circumstance was a fatal one to my improvement. I was not sufficiently strong in self-control to practice the lessons of industry and forbearance my dear Mrs. L. had taught me; and my mother's whole soul was absorbed in my happiness, which she thought could only be insured by indulgences. I became again the petted darling, and every luxury was sought for me. And this indolence seemed charming, and I thought it folly for those who were rich to trouble themselves about learning.

My father had left us rich.

For some years, I led a life of complete inanity. My mother took care of my wardrobe; and this, with managing the house, gave her full employment. I had little to do when at home, and I was not very fond of society, so that I was obliged to have recourse to the complaints of ill health to diversify my life. I had the dyspepsia one year, and was nervous the next, successively. And this might have continued to the end of my days, had not an incident, which occurred while I was on a tour to Canada, roused me once more to exertion. That incident introduced me to a Mr. C——. I was pleased with him from the first, and I wished to make a favorable impression on him. I was tolerably handsome, I believe; my maid always told me I was beautiful; but Mrs. L. had warned me against being flattered by those I thought my inferiors—so, as no person but my maid had ever assured me I was beautiful, I did not quite think myself so. But I was rich. There was no doubt of that; and I found means to let Mr. C—— know I was rich. I had better not have boasted. He was a man of a fine mind and highly cultivated taste; and, after he found I had had the means so abundantly of education, he was less inclined to pardon the ignorance he could not but discover in me. He seemed to fear, too, that addressing me would make him appear mercenary, as no one could think there was a fitness in our characters and tastes. Oh, how I did regret my wasted time! I would have given half my fortune for the benefit of one year's improvement at Mrs. L.'s school. It could not be bought, however.

Mr. C—— did not propose for me, but said he thought he should visit Boston the next summer. I came home and set resolutely to my studies, resolving I would redeem the time. But habit was too strong for my resolution. I had been indolent so long, that employment distressed me; and then I was ashamed to allow my ignorance to appear to those who attended to give me lessons, and I became more peevish and discontented every day. I was dissatisfied with myself, and I had no kind Mrs. L. at hand to soothe my spirit by the pity which encourages. It was better for me, though, that I made the exertion, for I have never since had the dyspepsia, and I should never have been nervous if—My poor heart! when will it be still forever?

Mr. C—— never came to Boston. He married a few months after I parted from him, and I heard of him at Washington with a fair and intelligent wife, to whom he seemed devoted. The disappointment was, for a time, very vexatious to me, because I had allowed him to know my partiality; and, to escape from my own thoughts, I went more into company.

My mother had an excellence. She was sincere in her character. She never managed to get me a husband; in truth, I do not think she wished to have me married, because she feared I never would find a husband sufficiently kind. But she was growing into years, and she was troubled at leaving me alone in the world. And she began to hint to me that it was time I made a selection. A number of single gentlemen visited at our house, for our establishment was elegant, and table such as a gourmand would worship. The character of our male visitors may be easily understood. They came to be feasted without any metaphor. There was little said or thought of "reason" or the "soul" at our table. But we had delicious soups and rich wines.

I married Mr. M—. He offered himself to me because I was rich; I accepted because I was nearly thirty, and feared I should not do better. There was no love on either side; but we lived together tolerably well till after my mother's death, which happened about a year after my marriage. I mourned her loss; but it was a selfish feeling entirely, because she had saved me from all domestic cares, and I did not see how I could live without her. Soon my troubles began. I could not manage the household as my mother had done, though I harassed myself with constant cares; and my husband found fault continually. An epicure is always selfish. Never, never let any woman, who wishes for domestic happiness, marry a man whose soul is in his palate. A gourmand will be a tyrant—a capricious, unreasonable tyrant. My husband was a tyrant, and, in witnessing the paroxysms of rage into which he would be thrown, when disappointed of any good thing on which he had set his appetite, gave me more impressive lessons than sermons could have done. I am persuaded that those who would be happy must be temperate in all things; and that excess in eating is as wicked as excess in drinking.

But I linger on circumstances that may seem trifling. They are trifling compared with what I must tell. The confession must be made. It shall be, though my heart break in the effort.

The second year after my mother's decease, I became a mother myself. My daughter, my sweet, lovely child! still thy image lives in my heart. When thinking of thy first smile, of the pressure of thy soft cheek to mine, I can yet feel the thrill of pleasure that agitated my bosom. It is a blessed thing to have the affections called forth. I had never loved till I loved my child. The affection I bore my own mother was a selfish feeling, and always had regard to what she did for me. This was the fault partly of my education, and partly of circumstances. But when I looked on my little delicate babe, my own, a being dependent on my care, and one that I could make happy, oh! my heart was drawn towards it with a yearning of fondness, hope, delight, that was perfectly new and almost overpowering! I could have laid down my life for her:—and yet I murdered her!

Righteous Heaven! was this the punishment of my early self-indulgence?

Though I loved my child, and earnestly wished to train her rightly, I was not fitted for the task. Now it was that I felt the deficiencies of my own education. The lessons of Mrs. L. had impressed my mind with a sense of my infirmities of temper and inconsistencies of conduct, but I did not stay long enough with her to learn how to correct them. I knew I had been wrongly managed, but I had not discriminated the manner or degree. Like many other superficial reasoners, I thought the reverse of wrong must be right. My mother, I knew, had indulged me too much; and so I determined not to indulge my child at all. I made no difference between those indulgences that excite the passions or gratify the appetite, and those which call forth and foster the kind affections and moral feelings. My whole system was one of rigid self-denial. The consequence was, my child feared me, and she never was happy with me. She loved the nursery girl much better than me, and that was a source of constant grief and vexation. I used frequently to send away the girl and let Caroline cry as long as I dared, to punish her for not choosing to have me feed her, and dress her, &c. I fear it was to gratify my own temper as much as to govern hers, that I exerted my authority. None but those who have subdued their own passions are fit to be intrusted with children. They may otherwise love children, but they will not be just towards them.

It was in the month of June—a bright, balmy day—such an one as seems designed for human enjoyment, when, to be happy, we have only to open the heart to the sweet sunny influences around us; and yet, if the heart is not right, how wretched we may be! I was unhappy that day. Some difference with my husband had occurred at the breakfast-table. Since the birth of my daughter, we had lived in much better harmony; he had been more reasonable, as he knew I must attend to the child, when anything had gone wrong in our household affairs. And I believe he loved me more as the mother of his child than as his wife; for he was doatingly fond of Caroline, and our chief difficulties now arose respecting her. He insisted that I was harsh with her, and that it made her obstinate; and then he told a long story about his own mother, and how she used to persuade her children—not hire or drive them—but reason with them.

We had differed that morning in our opinions respecting the time when Caroline should be obliged to learn her lessons steadily. I wanted her to commence then, for she was three years old; my husband thought it was well enough, if she chose to learn, but insisted that no compulsion should be used. But, notwithstanding what he said, I went out and purchased books, and determined to commence that very day, and that she should take her lessons at regular hours every day, whether she were or were not pleased. I came home in no pleasant humor; for I had bowed to a lady who did not return my salute, and I felt enraged at her insolence. With these feelings of anger uppermost in my mind, I entered the nursery. Never shall I forget the sweet looks of my child at that moment. She was sitting on a cushion, with her face towards the door, the sunlight streamed through the window curtain, its beams fell on her pale-yellow hair, and the ringlets seemed clusters of pure gold. The nursery-maid had been twisting roses among her curls, and the little creature was passionately fond of flowers; so, when I entered, she looked up to me with a laugh of such heartfelt joy that I had come to see her pretty roses, and her blue eyes sparkled with a light that made the sunbeams dim—it was the light of a happy and innocent heart.

"I have brought a new book for you, Caroline," said I.

"My roses, mother; see my pretty roses!" said the child.

I turned to the maid, and bade her take off the roses, for Caroline should say her lesson. I spoke sternly, and Caroline began to weep; I minded nothing of her tears, but took her on my knee and gave her the book.

She threw it on the floor, and cried for her roses. I ordered the maid to go down with the roses; and, when she was gone, I told Caroline that she should pick up her book and read to me. She refused to pick up her book; she was obstinate; but then I had provoked it by my own imprudence in teasing her to read when her mind was engrossed with another object. I should then only have told her of the rose, how it was spelt, and shown her the picture of it, and told her stories about it, that would have made her interested to learn more. What tyrants we are with our children, when, instead of aiding their ideas, we would force them to understand ours!

I had not succeeded to make Caroline pick up her book, when the maid entered to say Mrs. F was in the parlor. Mrs. F was a very proud and very fashionable lady, and I was glad to receive a call from her; but, in my struggles with Caroline, I had quite discomposed my dress, and this made me excessively angry with the child. Never before had I felt so towards her. I wanted to punish her severely. The maid offered to take her, but I bade her go down and say I would come soon; and then I told Caroline I should shut her in my dark closet while I was gone. She had always been afraid to be alone in the dark, and one of the very few things in which I had uniformly indulged her was to have a light burning through the night. If she ever awoke, and found herself in the dark, she had always been frightened.

When I told her I should put her in the dark closet, she screamed as loudly as possible, and I hurried her in quick, before she had time to yield, because I feared Mrs. F. would hear her shrieks. I locked the door and took the key, to prevent the maid from letting the child out, as I thought that would destroy all the salutary effects of the punishment. I tell all these minute particulars that I may be judged truly. I confess my faults; but yet I did not seem to myself to act unreasonably at the time. Are there not others who have deceived themselves, and been cruel when they only meant to correct?

Caroline had given one long shriek as I shut the door. "Mother! mother! it is dark! all dark!" was the last I heard her say.

Mrs. F was extremely polite, and she stayed a long time; I cannot tell how long. My heart misgave me every moment; I wished she would go, for I thought of my poor babe. But she had to tell me of her new bonnet, and ask my opinion of the trimming, and advise me to employ her milliner—such was our discourse while my child was dying!

The moment she was gone I rushed up stairs, and called "Caroline!" "Caroline!" as I unlocked the door. She did not answer. She lay extended on the floor of the closet—her eyes rolled up till only the white glared in their sockets—her features convulsed—and purple as with suffocation. Why dwell on this scene? Horror! horror! is all the word that can express my feelings.

The physician reported she died by fits. The world believed it; her father never knew otherwise; but on my conscience the burden of her death has lain like a mountain of fire, burning while it bowed me to the earth.

"It is dark! all dark!" sounds constantly in my ears. "It is dark! all dark!" to me, indeed! Would that I could place my trust in the God of light!

THE CALL.

BY MARY MAY.

Come, thou beloved, come,
While yet the morning of thy life is bright,
And thou art bounding in its joyous light,
Come to thy sheltering home!

It lies not far from thee,
Even on its threshold have thy footsteps trod;
A court within the mansion of thy God,
Enter, and thou wilt see.

Thy Father dwells therein—
He seeks to lead thee forth 'mid pleasant ways,
Give Him the homage of thy youthful days,
And Heavenly blessings win.

Thou wilt not find repose
Amid the fading world's delusive toys;
Come thou, and seek the more abiding joys
Which only virtue knows.

Then, when fierce storms assail,
And doubts and fears perplex thy wildered mind,
A covert from the tempest thou wilt find—
A hope that ne'er shall fall.

Then shall thy full heart say—
"Father, one day within thy courts with thee
Is better than a thousand are to me
When thou art far away."

HOW TIME PASSES!

BY PENNY PATCH.

How Time passes! but yesterday
I was a young girl in my prime,
Blushing in womanhood, and gay,
And heeding not thee—treach'rous Time.

How Time passes! methinks I see
My mother, with her deep blue eye
Film'd with a tear—while she Turns sadly from my gambols nigh

I see her falling, wasting, now
Beneath Consumption's hollow glare—
Brightening her broad and dazling brow,
As if for Heaven—making fair.

My baby brother now I see,
Whose cradle I so often rooked,
And sang my childish lullaby,
While his large eyes all sleeping mocked.

Our humble room—nor strange nor bare,
Though little it had to adorn;
My mind calls up each homely chair—
The windows towards eve and morn.

Well, Time passed on—too quickly on;
My baby brother smiled and died;
My mother, too—"I come, my son!"
The wasted victim feebly cried.

Now tossed upon that world so chill,
Where none felt for me, and none cared
How I grew up—for good or ill,
Or how the cast-off orphan fared.

Poor and unloved, a timid girl,
I shrank from all, and drew me up
In my lone thoughts—for the great world
Had offered me a bitter cup.

"Wealth! wealth!" yes, thus they cried—for me!
For me, riches and honors came:
An Indian uncle died at sea—
I was the last of his proud name.

Now dawned a great and vivid day—
I was all beauty and all grace—
And poets lent their unbought lay
To laud and halo my poor face.

I was amazed—my bowed head
Rose slowly from my bruised breast;
They did but mock me when they said
I was, of all the world, most blest.

Come back, O mother! Brother, come!
Without you all the world is blank;
Come back! the light of my old home;
Come back! the echo my heart sank.

How Time passes! I was a bride,
The choice of one who wooed my gold;
My tears have fallen—in my pride
I've cursed this paltry wealth untold.

How Time passes! The widow now
Knows but one comfort or one joy,
Which centres in the sunlit brow
Of all she has—her ruddy boy.

My child! my child! on, he will bring
Some healing for my stricken heart.
My child! my child! see how I cling
To this one hope—the better part!

Hope nerved me when I saw my son
So like my brother—and I dared
To love again. But Time passed on,
And withered all he should have spared.

My lovely boy! soon his fine eye
Shone with strange glow—a quenchless glow;
He'd lay aside his toys and sigh—
His little step was tired and slow.

And then he ceased to play or sing
About my knee, or on the green;
And summer flowers he would bring,
Then talk of Heaven—his world unseen.

Ah! well I marked the startling glow
Which on my mother's cheek had shone;
Death's seal was set—nor was he slow
To claim all I could call my own.

In vain I hovered o'er his bed,
Hanging in madness on his breath;
Once, only once, he smiled, and said—
"Weep not, my mother—'tis but death!"

Death! Oh, 'twas he! Too well I knew
The marks and lineaments he traced;
Yes, this was death—fearful and true,
Stealing the idol he had graced.

Gone in thy early beauty, gone!
Ere thy young bud of promise opened;
Son of my heart! with thee I mourn
All that I ever loved or hoped.

And this is life—this that rare Time
That beckoned me, as I went on
From childhood to my maiden prime,
From mother, brother, and from son.

Yes, this is life—that little span—
Crowded unto sigh, and hope, and tear,
While Death mocks every subtle plan,
Or tissue, that we weave out here.

MR. HARRISON'S CONFESSIONS.

(Concluded from page 388.)

CHAPTER XII.

"THE next morning I met Miss Horsman.

" 'So you dined at Mr. Bullock's yesterday, Mr. Harrison? Quite a family party, I hear. They are quite charmed with you, and your knowledge of chemistry. Mr. Bullock told me so, in Hodgson's shop, just now. Miss Bullock is a nice girl; eh, Mr. Harrison?' She looked sharply at me. Of course, whatever I thought, I could do nothing but assent. 'A nice little fortune, too, three thousand pounds, Consols, from her own mother.'

"What did I care? She might have three millions, for me. I had begun to think a good deal about money, though, but not in connection with her. I had been doing up our books, ready to send out our Christmas bills, and had been wondering how far the vicar would consider three hundred a year, with a prospect of increase, would justify me in thinking of Sophy. Think of her I could not help; and the more I thought of how good, and sweet, and pretty, she was, the more I felt that she ought to have far more than I could offer. Besides, my father was a shopkeeper, and I saw the vicar had a sort of respect for family. I determined to try and be very attentive to my profession. I was as civil as could be to every one; and wore the nap off the brim of my hat by taking it off so often.

"I had my eyes open to every glimpse of Sophy. I am overstocked with gloves now, that I bought at that time, by way of making errands into the shops where I saw her black gown. I bought pounds upon pounds of arrow-root, till I was tired of the eternal arrow-root puddings Mrs. Rose gave me. I asked her if she could not make bread of it, but she seemed to think that would be expensive; so I took to soap as a safe purchase. I believe soap improves by keeping.

CHAPTER XIII.

"THE more I knew of Mrs. Rose, the better I liked her. She was sweet, and kind, and motherly, and we never had any rubs. I hurt her once or twice, I think, by cutting her short in her long stories about Mr. Rose. But I found out that when she had plenty to do, she did not think of him quite so much; so I expressed a wish for some Corazza shirts, and in the puzzle of devising how they were to be cut out, she forgot Mr. Rose for some time.

I was still more pleased by her way about some legacy her elder brother left her. I don't know the amount, but it was something handsome, and she might have set up housekeeping for herself; but instead, she told Mr. Morgan (who repeated it to me), that she should continue with me, as she had quite an elder sister's interest in me.

"The 'country young lady,' Miss Tyrrell, returned to Miss Tomkinson's after the holidays. She had an enlargement of the tonsils, which required to be frequently touched with caustic, so I often called to see her. Miss Caroline always received me, and kept me talking in her washed-out style, after I had seen my patient. One day she told me she thought she had a weakness about the heart, and would be glad if I would bring my stethoscope the next time, which I accordingly did; and while I was on my knees listening to the pulsations, one of the young ladies came in. She said:

" 'Oh dear! I never! I beg your pardon, ma'am,' and scuttled out. There was not much the matter with Miss Caroline's heart; a little feeble in action or so, a mere matter of weakness and general languor. When I went down I saw two or three of the girls peeping out of the half-closed school-room door, but they shut it immediately and I heard them laughing. The next time I called, Miss Tomkinson was sitting in state to receive me.

" 'Miss Tyrrell's throat does not seem to make much progress. Do you understand the case, Mr. Harrison? or should we have further advice? I think Mr. Morgan would probably know more about it.'

"I assured her it was the simplest thing in the world; that it always implied a little torpor in the constitution, and that we preferred working through the system, which of course was a slow process, and that the medicine the young lady was taking (iodide of iron) was sure to be successful, although the progress would not be rapid. She bent her head, and said, 'It might be so; but she confessed she had more confidence in medicines which had some effect.'

"She seemed to expect me to tell her something; but I had nothing to say, and accordingly I bade good-by. Somehow Miss Tomkinson always managed to make me feel very small, by a succession of snubbings; and whenever I left her I had always to comfort myself under her contradictions by saying to myself, 'Her saying it is so does not make it so.' Or I invented good retorts which I might have made to her brusque speeches if I had but thought of them at the right time. But it was provoking that I had not had the presence of mind to recollect them just when they were wanted.

CHAPTER XIV.

"On the whole, things went on smoothly. Mr. Holden's legacy came in just about this time; and I felt quite rich. Five hundred pounds would furnish the house, I thought, when Mrs. Rose left and Sophy came. I was delighted, too, to imagine that Sophy perceived the difference of my manner to her from what it was to any one else, and that she was embarrassed and shy in consequence, but not displeased with me for it. All was so flourishing that I went about on wings instead of feet. We were very busy, without having anxious cases. My legacy was paid into Mr. Bullock's hands, who united a little banking business to his profession of law. In return for his advice about investments (which I never meant to take, having a more charming, if less profitable, mode in my head), I went pretty frequently to teach him his agricultural chemistry. I was so happy in Sophy's blushes that I was universally benevolent, and desirous of giving pleasure to every one. I went, at Mrs. Bullock's general invitation, to dinner there one day unexpectedly; but there was such a fuss of ill-concealed preparation consequent upon my coming, that I never went again. Her little boy came in, with an audibly given message from the cook, to ask—

"If this was the gentleman as she was to send in the best dinner service and dessert for?"

"I looked deaf, but determined never to go again.

"Miss Bullock and I, meanwhile, became rather friendly. We found out that we mutually disliked each other; and were contented with the discovery. If people are worth anything, this sort of non-liking is a very good beginning of friendship. Every good quality is revealed naturally and slowly, and is a pleasant surprise. I found out that Miss Bullock was sensible, and even sweet-tempered, when not irritated by her step-mother's endeavors to show her off. But she would sulk for hours after Mrs. Bullock's offensive praise of her good points. And I never saw such a black passion as she went into when she suddenly came into the room when Mrs. Bullock was telling me of all the offers she had had.

"My legacy made me feel up to extravagance. I scoured the country for a glorious nosegay of camelias, which I sent to Sophy on Valentine's day. I durst not add a line, but I wished the flowers could speak, and tell her how I loved her.

"I called on Miss Tyrrell that day. Miss Caroline was more simpering and affected than ever; and full of allusions to the day.

"Do you affix much sincerity of meaning to the little gallantries of this day, Mr. Harrison?" asked she in a languishing tone. I thought of my camelias, and how my heart had gone with them into Sophy's keeping; and I told her I thought one might often take advantage of such a time to hint at feelings one dared not fully express.

"I remembered afterwards the forced display she made, after Miss Tyrrell left the room, of a valentine. But I took no notice at the time; my head was full of Sophy.

"It was on that very day that John Brouncker, the gardener to all of us who had small gardens to keep in order, fell down and injured his wrist severely, (I don't give you the details of the case, because they would not interest you, being too technical; if you've any curiosity, you will find them in the Lancet of August in that year.) We all liked John, and this accident was felt like a town's misfortune. The gardens, too, just wanted doing up. Both Mr. Morgan and I went directly to him. It was a very awkward case, and his wife and children were crying sadly. He himself was in great distress at being thrown out of work. He begged us to do something that would cure him speedily, as he could not afford to be laid up, with six children depending on him for bread. We did not say much before him, but we both thought the arm would have to come off; and it was his right arm. We talked it over when we came out of the cottage. Mr. Morgan had no doubt of the necessity. I went back at dinner-time to see the poor fellow. He was feverish and anxious. He had caught up some expression of Mr. Morgan's in the morning, and had guessed the measure we had in contemplation. He bade his wife leave the room, and spoke to me by myself.

"If you please, sir, I'd rather be done for at once than have my arm taken off, and be a burden to my family. I'm not afraid of dying, but I could not stand being a cripple for life, eating bread, and not able to earn it."

"The tears were in his eyes with earnestness. I had all along been more doubtful about the necessity of the amputation than Mr. Morgan. I knew the improved treatment of such cases. In his days there was much more of the rough and ready in surgical practice; so I gave the poor fellow some hope.

"In the afternoon, I met Mr. Bullock.

"So you're to try your hand at an amputation to-morrow, I hear. Poor John Brouncker! I used to tell him he was not careful enough about his ladders. Mr. Morgan is quite excited about it. He asked me to be present; and see how well a man from Guy's could operate; he says he is sure you'll do it beautifully. Pah! no such sights for me, thank you."

"Ruddy Mr. Bullock went a shade or two paler at the thought.

"Curious! how professionally a man views these things. Here's Mr. Morgan, who has been all along as proud of you as if you were his own son, abso-lately rubbing his hands at the idea of this crowning glory, this feather in your cap! He told me just now, he knew he had always been too nervous to be a good operator; and had therefore preferred sending for White from Chesterton. But now any one might have a serious accident who liked, for you would be always at hand.'

"I told Mr. Bullock, I really thought we might avoid the amputation; but his mind was pre-occupied with the idea of it, and he did not care to listen to me. The whole town was full of it. That is a charm in a little town, everybody is so sympathetically full of the same events. Even Miss Horsman stopped me to ask after John Brouncker with interest; but she threw cold water upon my intention of saving the arm.

"As for the wife and family, we'll take care of them. Think what a fine opportunity you have of showing off, Mr. Harrison!"

"That was just like her. Always ready with her suggestions of ill-natured or interested motives.

"Mr. Morgan heard my proposal of a mode of treatment by which I thought it possible that the arm might be saved.

"I differ from you, Mr. Harrison," said he. "I regret it, but I differ in toto from you. Your kind heart deceives you in this instance. There is no doubt that amputation must take place—not later than to-morrow morning, I should say. I have made myself at liberty to attend upon you, sir; I shall be happy to officiate as your assistant. Time was when I should have been proud to be principal, but a little trembling in my arm incapacitates me."

"I urged my reasons upon him again; but he was obstinate. He had, in fact, boasted so much of my acquirements as an operator, that he was unwilling I should lose this opportunity of displaying my skill. He could not see that there would be greater skill evinced in saving the arm; nor did I think of this at the time. I grew angry at his old-fashioned narrow-mindedness, as I thought it; and I became dogged in my resolution to adhere to my own course. We parted very coolly; and I went straight off to John Brouncker to tell him I believed that I could save the arm, if he would refuse to have it amputated. When I calmed myself a little, before going in and speaking to him, I could not help acknowledging that we should run some risk of locked-jaw; but, on the whole, and after giving most earnest conscientious thought to the case, I was sure that my mode of treatment would be the better.

"He was a sensible man. I told him the difference of opinion that existed between Mr. Morgan and myself. I said that there might be some little risk attending the non-amputation; but that I should guard against it, and I trusted that I should be able to preserve his arm.

"Under God's blessing," said he, reverently. I bowed my head. I don't like to talk too frequently of the dependence which I always felt on that holy blessing, as to the result of my efforts; but I was glad to hear that speech of John's, because it showed a calm and faithful heart; and I had almost certain hopes of him from that time.

"We agreed that he should tell Mr. Morgan the reason of his objections to the amputation, and his reliance on my opinion. I determined to recur to every book I had relating to such cases, and to convince Mr. Morgan, if I could, of my wisdom. Unluckily, I found out afterwards that he had met Miss Horsman in the time that intervened before I saw him again at his own house that evening; and she had more than hinted that I shrank from performing the operation, 'for very good reasons, no doubt. She had heard that the medical students in London were a bad set, and were not remarkable for regular attendance in the hospitals. She might be mistaken; but she thought it was, perhaps, quite as well poor John Brouncker had not his arm cut off by—Was there not such a thing as mortification coming on after a clumsy operation? It was, perhaps, only a choice of deaths!'

"Mr. Morgan had been stung at all this. Perhaps I did not speak quite respectfully enough; I was a good deal excited. We only got more and more angry with each other; though he, to do him justice, was as civil as could be all the time, thinking that thereby he concealed his vexation and disappointment. He did not try to conceal his anxiety about poor John. I went home weary and dispirited. I made up, and took the necessary applications to John; and, promising to return with the dawn of day—I would fain have stayed, but I did not wish him to be alarmed about himself—I went home, and resolved to sit up and study the treatment of similar cases.

"Mrs. Rose knocked at the door.

"Come in!" said I, sharply.

"She said she had seen I had something on my mind all day, and she could not go to bed without asking if there was nothing she could do. She was good and kind; and I could not help telling her a little of the truth. She listened pleasantly; and I shook her warmly by the hand, thinking that, though she might not be very wise, her good heart made her worth a dozen keen, sharp, hard people like Miss Horsman.

"When I went at daybreak, I saw John's wife for a few minutes outside of the door. She seemed to wish her husband had been in Mr. Morgan's hands rather than mine; but she gave me as good an account as I dared to hope for of the manner in which her husband had passed the night. This was confirmed by my own examination.

"When Mr. Morgan and I visited him together later on in the day, John said what we had agreed upon the day before; and I told Mr. Morgan openly that it was by my advice that amputation was declined. He did not speak to me till we had left the house. Then he said, 'Now, sir, from this time I consider this case entirely in your hands. Only remember the poor fellow has a wife and six children. In case you come round to my opinion, remember that Mr. White could come over, as he has done before, for the operation.'

"So! Mr. Morgan believed I declined operating because I felt myself incapable. Very well! I was much mortified.

"An hour after we parted, I received a note to this effect:—

"DEAR SIR: I will take the long round to-day, to leave you at liberty to attend to Brouncker's case, which I feel to be a very responsible one.

"J. MORGAN."

"This was kindly done. I went back, as soon as I could, to John's cottage. While I was in the inner room with him, I heard the Miss Tomkinsons' voices outside. They had called to inquire. Miss Tomkinson came in, and evidently was poking and snuffing about. (Mrs. Brouncker told her that I was within; and within I resolved to be, till they had gone.)

"What is this close smell?" asked she. 'I am afraid you are not cleanly. Cheese!—cheese in this cupboard! No wonder there is an unpleasant smell. Don't you know how particular you should be about being clean when there is illness about?'

"Mrs. Brouncker was exquisitely clean in general, and was piqued at these remarks.

"If you please, ma'am, I could not leave John yesterday to do any housework, and Jenny put the dinner things away. She is but eight years old.'

"But this did not satisfy Miss Tomkinson, who was evidently pursuing the course of her observation.

"Fresh butter, I declare! Well now, Mrs. Brouncker, do you know I don't allow myself fresh butter at this time of the year? How can you save, indeed, with such extravagance?"

"Please, ma'am," answered Mrs. Brouncker, 'you'd think it strange if I was to take such liberties in your house as you're taking here.'

"I expected to hear a sharp answer. No! Miss Tomkinson liked true, plain-speaking. The only person in whom she would tolerate roundabout ways of talking was her sister.

"Well, that's true," she said. 'Still, you must not be above taking advice. Fresh butter is extravagant at this time of the year. However, you're a good kind of woman, and I've a great respect for John. Send Jenny for some broth as soon as he can take it. Come, Caroline, we have got to go on to Williams's.'

"But Miss Caroline said that she was tired, and would rest where she was till Miss Tomkinson came back. I was a prisoner for some time, I found. When she was alone with Miss Brouncker, she said—

"You must not be hurt by my sister's abrupt manner. She means well. She has not much imagination or sympathy, and cannot understand the distraction of mind produced by the illness of a worshiped husband.'

"I could hear the loud sigh of commiseration which followed this speech. Mrs. Brouncker said—

"Please, ma'am, I don't worship my husband. I would not be so wicked.'

"Goodness! You don't think it wicked, do you? For my part, if . . . I should worship—I should adore him.'

"I thought she need not imagine such improbable cases. But sturdy Mrs. Brouncker said again—

"I hope I know my duty better. I've not learned my Commandments for nothing. I know whom I ought to worship.'

"Just then the children came in, dirty and unwashed, I have no doubt. And now Miss Caroline's real nature peeped out. She spoke sharply to them, and asked them if they had no manners, little pigs as they were, to come brushing against her silk gown in that way? She sweetened herself again; and was, as sugary as love when Miss Tomkinson returned for her, accompanied by one whose voice, 'like winds in summer sighing,' I knew to be my dear Sophy's.

"She did not say much; but what she did say, and the manner in which she spoke, was tender and compassionate in the highest degree; and she came to take the four little ones back with her to the vicarage, in order that they might be out of their mother's way; the older two might help at home. She offered to wash their hands and faces; and, when I emerged from my inner chamber, after the Miss Tomkinsons had left, I found her with a chubby child on her knees, bubbling and sputtering against her white, wet hand, with a face bright, rosy, and merry under the operation. Just as I came in, she said to him, 'There, Jemmy, now I can kiss you with this nice clean face.'

"She colored when she saw me. I liked her speaking, and I liked her silence. She was silent now, and I 'lo'ed a' the better.' I gave my directions to Mrs. Brouncker, and hastened to overtake Sophy and the children; but they had gone round by the lanes, I suppose, for I saw nothing of them.

"I was very anxious about the case. At night I went again. Miss Horsman had been there; I believe she was really kind among the poor, but she could not help leaving a sting behind her everywhere. She had been frightening Mrs. Brouncker about her husband; and been, I have no doubt, expressing her doubts of my skill; for Mrs. Brouncker began—

"Oh, please, sir, if you'll only let Mr. Morgan take off his arm! I will never think the worse of you for not being able to do it.'

"I told her it was from no doubt of my own competency to perform the operation that I wished to save the arm; but that he himself was anxious to have it spared.

"Ay, bless him! he frets about not earning enough to keep us, if he's crippled; but, sir, I don't care about that. I would work my fingers to the bone, and so would the children; I'm sure we'd be proud to do for him, and keep him, God bless him! It would be far better to have him only with one arm than to have him in the churchyard. Miss Horsman says'—

"Confound Miss Horsman!" said I.

"Thank you, Mr. Harrison," said her well-known voice behind me. She had come out, dark as it was, to bring some old linen to Mrs. Brouncker; for, as I said before, she was very kind to all the poor people of Duncombe.

"I beg your pardon; for I really was sorry for my speech, or rather, that she had heard it.

"There is no occasion for any apology," she replied, drawing herself up, and pinching her lips into a very venomous shape.

"John was doing pretty well; but, of course, the danger of looked-jaw was not over. Before I left, his wife entreated me to take off the arm; she wrung her hands in her passionate entreaty. 'Spare him to me, Mr. Harrison!' she implored. Miss Horsman stood by. It was mortifying enough; but I thought of the power which was in my hands, as I firmly believed, of saving the limb; and I was inflexible.

"You cannot think how pleasantly Mrs. Rose's sympathy came in on my return. To be sure, she did not understand one word of the case which I detailed to her; but she listened with interest, and, as long as she held her tongue, I thought she was really taking it in; but her first remark was as mal-à-propos as could be.

"You are anxious to save the tibia; I see completely how difficult that will be. My late husband had a case exactly similar, and I remember his anxiety; but you must not distress yourself too much, my dear Mr. Harrison; I have no doubt it will end well.'

"I knew she had no grounds for this assurance, and yet it comforted me.

"However, as it happened, John did fully as well as I could hope—of course, he was long in rallying his strength; and, indeed, sea air was evidently so necessary for his complete restoration, that I accepted, with gratitude, Mrs. Rose's proposal of sending him to Highport for a fortnight or three weeks. Her kind generosity in this matter made me more desirous than ever of paying her every mark of respect and attention.

CHAPTER XV.

"ABOUT this time there was a sale at Ashmeadow, a pretty house, in the neighborhood of Duncombe.

It was likewise an easy walk, and the spring days tempted many people thither, who had no intention of buying anything, but who liked the idea of rambling through the woods, gay with early primroses and wild daffodils, and of seeing the gardens and house, which till now had been shut up from the ingress of the townpeople. Mrs. Rose had planned to go, but an unlucky cold prevented her. She begged me to bring her a very particular account, saying she delighted in details, and always questioned the late Mr. Rose as to the side dishes of the dinners to which he went. The late Mr. Rose's conduct was always held up as a model to me, by the way. I walked to Ashmeadow, pausing, or loitering with different parties of townpeople, all bound in the same direction. At last I found the vicar and Sophy, and with them I stayed. I sat by Sophy, and talked and listened. A sale is a very pleasant gathering after all. The auctioneer, in a country place, is privileged to joke from his rostrum; and, having a personal knowledge of most of the people, can sometimes make a very keen hit at their circumstances, and turn the laugh against them. For instance, on the present occasion, there was a farmer present, with his wife, who was notoriously the gray mare. The auctioneer was selling some horse-clothes, and called out to recommend the article to her, telling her, with a knowing look at the company, that they would make her a dashing pair of trowsers if she was in want of such an article. She drew herself up with dignity, and said, 'Come, John, we've had enough of thees.' Whereupon there was a burst of laughter, and in the midst of it John meekly followed his wife out of the place. The furniture in the sitting-rooms was, I believe, very beautiful, but I did not notice it much. Suddenly I heard the auctioneer speaking to me, 'Mr. Harrison, won't you give me a bid for this table?'

"It was a very pretty little table of walnut-wood. I thought it would go into my study very well, so I gave him a bid. I saw Miss Horsman bidding against me, so I went off with full force, and at last it was knocked down to me. The auctioneer smiled, and congratulated me.

"A most useful present for Mrs. Harrison, when that lady comes.'

"Everybody laughed. They like a joke about marriage, it is so easy of comprehension. But the table which I had thought was for writing, turned out to be a work-table, scissors and thimble complete. No wonder I looked foolish. Sophy was not looking at me, that was one comfort. She was busy arranging a nosegay of wood-anemone and wild sorrel.

"Miss Horsman came up, with her curious eyes.

"I had no idea things were far enough advanced for you to be purchasing a work-table, Mr. Harrison.'

"I laughed off my awkwardness.

"Did not you, Miss Horsman? You are very much behindhand. You have not heard of my piano, then?"

"No, indeed," said she, half uncertain whether I was serious or not. "Then it seems there is nothing wanting but the lady."

"Perhaps she may not be wanting either," said I; for I wished to perplex her keen curiosity.

CHAPTER XVI.

"WHEN I got home from my round, I found Mrs. Rose in some sorrow.

"Miss Horsman called after you left," said she. "Have you heard how John Brouncker is at Highport?"

"Very well," replied I. "I called on his wife just now, and she had just got a letter from him. She had been anxious about him, for she had not heard for a week. However, all's right now; and she has pretty well of work at Mrs. Munton's, as her servant is ill. Oh, they'll do, never fear."

"At Mrs. Munton's? Oh, that accounts for it, then. She is so deaf, and makes such blunders."

"Accounts for what?" asked I.

"Oh, perhaps I had better not tell you," hesitated Mrs. Rose.

"Yes, tell me at once. I beg your pardon; but I hate mysteries."

"You are so like my poor dear Mr. Rose. He used to speak to me just in that sharp, cross way.—It is only that Miss Horsman called. She had been making a collection for John Brouncker's widow, and—"

"But the man's alive!" said I.

"So it seems. But Mrs. Munton had told her that he was dead. And she has got Mr. Morgan's name down at the head of the list, and Mr. Bullock's—"

"Mr. Morgan and I had got into a short cool way of speaking to each other ever since we had differed so much about the treatment of Brouncker's arm; and I had heard once or twice of his shakes of the head over John's case. He would not have spoken against my method for the world, and fancied that he concealed his fears."

"Miss Horsman is very ill-natured, I think," sighed forth Mrs. Rose.

"I saw that something had been said of which I had not heard; for the mere fact of collecting money for the widow was good-natured, whoever did it. So I asked quietly what she had said."

"Oh, I don't know if I should tell you. I only know she made me cry; for I'm not well, and I can't bear to hear any one I live with abused."

"Come! this was pretty plain."

"What did Miss Horsman say of me?" asked I, half laughing, for I knew there was no love lost between us.

"Oh, she only said she wondered you could go to sales, and spend your money there, when your ignorance had made Jane Brouncker a widow, and her children fatherless."

"Pooh! pooh! John's alive, and likely to live as long as you or me, thanks to you, Mrs. Rose."

"When my work-table came home, Mrs. Rose was so struck with its beauty and completeness, and I was so much obliged to her for her identification of my interests with hers, and the kindness of her whole conduct about John, that I begged her to accept of it. She seemed very much pleased; and, after a few apologies, she consented to take it, and placed it in the most conspicuous part of the front parlor, where she usually sat. There was a good deal of morning calling in Duncombe after the sale; and, during this time, the fact of John's being alive was established to the conviction of all except Miss Horsman, who, I believe, still doubted. I myself told Mr. Morgan, who immediately went to reclaim his money; saying to me, that he was thankful of the information; he was truly glad to hear it; and he shook me warmly by the hand for the first time for a month."

CHAPTER XVII.

"A few days after the sale, I was in the consulting room. The servant must have left the folding-doors a little ajar, I think. Mrs. Munton came to call on Mrs. Rose; and, the former being deaf, I heard all the speeches of the latter lady, as she was obliged to speak very loud in order to be heard. She began:—

"This is a great pleasure, Mrs. Munton; so seldom that you are well enough to go out."

"Mumble, mumble, mumble, through the door."

"Oh, very well, thank you. Take this scat, and then you can admire my new work-table, ma'am; a present from Mr. Harrison."

"Mumble, mumble."

"Who could have told you, ma'am? Miss Horsman. Oh yes, I showed it Miss Horsman."

"Mumble, mumble."

"I don't quite understand you, ma'am."

"Mumble, mumble."

"I'm not blushing, I believe. I really am quite in the dark as to what you mean."

"Mumble, mumble."

"Oh yes, Mr. Harrison and I are most comfortable together. He reminds me so of my dear Mr. Rose; just as fidgety and anxious in his profession."

"Mumble, mumble"

"I'm sure you are joking now, ma'am." Then I heard a pretty loud—

"Oh no; mumble, mumble, for a long time."

"Did he really? Well, I'm sure I don't know."

I should be sorry to think he was doomed to be unfortunate in so serious an affair; but you know my undying regard for the late Mr. Rose.'

"Another long mumble.

"You're very kind, I'm sure. Mr. Rose always thought more of my happiness than his own—a little crying—but the turtle dove has always been my ideal, ma'am."

"Mumble, mumble.

"No one could have been happier than I. As you say, it is a compliment to matrimony."

"Mumble.

"Oh, but you must not repeat such a thing. Mr. Harrison would not like it. He can't bear to have his affairs spoken about."

"Then there was a change of subject; an inquiry after some poor person, I imagine; I heard Mrs. Rose say—

"She has got a mucous membrane, I'm afraid, ma'am."

"A commiserating mumble.

"Not always fatal. I believe Mr. Rose knew some cases that lived for years after it was discovered that they had a mucous membrane."—A pause. Then Mrs. Rose spoke in a different tone.

"Are you sure, ma'am, there is no mistake about what he said?"

"Mumble.

"Pray don't be so observant, Mrs. Munton; you find out too much. One can have no little secrets."

"The call broke up; and I heard Mrs. Munton say in the passage, 'I wish you joy, ma'am, with all my heart. There's no use denying it; for I've seen all along what would happen.'"

"When I went in to dinner, I said to Mrs. Rose—

"You've had Mrs. Munton here, I think. Did she bring any news?" To my surprise, she bridled and simpered, and replied, "Oh, you must not ask, Mr. Harrison: such foolish reports."

"I did not ask, as she seemed to wish me not, and I knew there were silly reports always about. Then I think she was vexed that I did not ask. Altogether she went on so strangely that I could not help looking at her; and then she took up a hand-screen, and held it between me and her. I really felt rather anxiously.

"Are you not feeling well?" said I, innocently.

"Oh, thank you, I believe I'm quite well; only the room is rather warm, is it not?"

"Let me put the blinds down for you; the sun begins to have a good deal of power." I drew down the blinds.

"You are so attentive, Mr. Harrison. Mr. Rose himself never did more for my little wishes than you do."

"I wish I could do more—I wish I could show you how much I feel—her kindness to John Bagnicker. I was going on to say; but I was just then called out to a patient. Before I went I turned back, and said—

"Take care of yourself, my dear Mrs. Rose; you had better rest a little."

"For your sake, I will," said she tenderly.

"I did not care for whose sake she did it. Only I really thought she was not quite well, and required rest. I thought she was more affected than usual at tea-time; and could have been angry with her nonsensical ways once or twice, but that I knew the real goodness of her heart. She said she wished she had the power to sweeten my life as she could my tea. I told her what a comfort she had been all during my late time of anxiety; and then I stole out to try if I could hear the evening singing at the vicarage, by standing close to the garden wall.

CHAPTER XVIII.

"The next morning I met Mr. Bullock by appointment, to talk a little about the legacy which was paid into his hands. As I was leaving his office, feeling full of my riches, I met Miss Horsman. She smiled rather grimly, and said:

"Oh! Mr. Harrison, I must congratulate, I believe. I don't know whether I ought to have known, but as I do, I must wish you joy. A very nice little sum, too. I always said you would have money."

"So she had found out my legacy, had she? Well, it was no secret, and one likes the reputation of being a person of property. Accordingly I smiled, and said I was much obliged to her, and if I could alter the figures to my liking, she might congratulate me still more.

"She said, 'Oh, Mr. Harrison, you can't have everything. It would be better the other way, certainly. Money is the great thing, as you've found out. The relation died most opportunely, I must say.'

"He was no relative," said I; "only an intimate friend."

"Dear-ah-me! I thought it had been a brother! Well, at any rate, the legacy is safe."

"I wished her good morning, and passed on. Before long I was sent for to Miss Tomkinson's.

"Miss Tomkinson sat in severe state to receive me. I went in with an air of ease, because I always felt so uncomfortable.

"Is this true that I hear?" asked she, in an inquisitorial manner.

"I thought she alluded to my five hundred pounds. So I smiled, and said that I believed it was.

"Can money be so great an object with you, Mr. Harrison?" she asked again.

"I said I had never cared much for money, except as an assistance to any plan of settling in life; and then, as I did not like her severe way of treating the subject, I said that I hoped every one was well; though of course I expected some one was ill, or I should not have been sent for.

"Miss Tomkinson looked very grave and sad. Then she answered, 'Caroline is very poorly—the old palpitations at the heart; but of course that is nothing to you.'

"I said I was very sorry. She had a weakness there, I knew. Could I see her? I might be able to order something for her.

"I thought I heard Miss Tomkinson say something in a low voice about my being a heartless deceiver. Then she spoke up. 'I was always distrustful of you, Mr. Harrison. I never liked your looks. I begged Caroline again and again not to confide in you. I foresaw how it would end. And now I fear her precious life will be a sacrifice.'

"I begged her not to distress herself, for in all probability there was very little the matter with her sister. Might I see her?

"'No!' she said, shortly, standing up as if to dismiss me. 'There has been too much of this seeing and calling. By my consent, you shall never see her again.'

"I bowed. I was annoyed, of course. Such a dismissal might injure my practice just when I was most anxious to increase it.

"'Have you no apology, no excuse, to offer?'

"I said I had done my best; I did not feel that there was any reason to offer an apology. I wished her good morning. Suddenly she came forwards.

"'Oh, Mr. Harrison,' said she, 'if you have really loved Caroline, do not let a little paltry money make you desert her for another.'

"I was struck dumb. Loved Miss Caroline! I loved Miss Tomkinson a great deal better, and yet I disliked her. She went on.

"I have saved nearly three thousand pounds. If you think you are too poor to marry without money, I will give it all to Caroline. I am strong, and can go on working; but she is weak, and this disappointment will kill her.' She sat down suddenly, and covered her face with her hands. Then she looked up.

"'You are unwilling, I see. Don't suppose I would have urged you if it had been for myself; but she has had so much sorrow.' And now she fairly cried aloud. I tried to explain; but she would not listen, but kept saying, 'Leave the house, sir! leave the house!' But I would be heard.

"I have never had any feeling warmer than respect for Miss Caroline, and I have never shown any different feeling. I never for an instant thought of making her my wife, and she has had no cause in my behavior to imagine I entertained any such intention.'

"'This is adding insult to injury,' said she. 'Leave the house, sir, this instant!'

CHAPTER XIX.

"I WENT, and sadly enough. In a small town such an occurrence is sure to be talked about, and to make a great deal of mischief. When I went home to dinner I was so full of it, and foresaw so clearly that I should need some advocate soon to set the case in its right light, that I determined on making a confidante of good Mrs. Rose. I could not eat. She watched me tenderly, and sighed when she saw my want of appetite.

"'I am sure you have something on your mind, Mr. Harrison. Would it be—would it not be—a relief to impart it to some sympathizing friend?'

"It was just what I wanted to do.

"'My dear kind Mrs. Rose,' said I, 'I must tell you, if you will listen.'

"She took up the fire-screen, and held it, as yesterday, between me and her.

"'The most unfortunate misunderstanding has taken place. Miss Tomkinson thinks that I have been paying attentions to Miss Caroline; when, in fact—may I tell you, Mrs. Rose?—my affections are placed elsewhere. Perhaps you have found it out already?' for indeed I thought I had been too much in love to conceal my attachment to Sophy from any one who knew my movements as well as Mrs. Rose.

"She hung down her head, and said she believed she had found out my secret.

"'Then only think how miserably I am situated. If I have any hope—oh, Mrs. Rose, do you think I have any hope?—'

"She put the hand-screen still more before her face, and after some hesitation she said she thought 'if I persevered—in time—I might have hope.' And then she suddenly got up, and left the room.

CHAPTER XX.

"THAT afternoon I met Mr. Bullock in the street. My mind was so full of the affair with Miss Tomkinson, that I should have passed him without notice, if he had not stopped me short, and said that he must speak to me; about my wonderful five hundred pounds, I supposed. But I did not care for that now.

"'What is this I hear,' said he, severely, 'about your engagement with Mrs. Rose?'

"'With Mrs. Rose?' said I, almost laughing, although my heart was heavy enough.

"'Yes! with Mrs. Rose!' said he, sternly.

"'I'm not engaged to Mrs. Rose,' I replied. 'There is some mistake.'

"'I'm glad to hear it, sir,' he answered; 'very glad. It requires some explanation, however. Mrs. Rose has been congratulated, and has acknowledged the truth of the report. It is confirmed by many facts. The work-table you bought, confessing your intention of giving it to your future wife, is given to her. How do you account for these things, sir?"

"I said I did not pretend to account for them. At present, a good deal was inexplicable; and when I could give an explanation, I did not think that I should feel myself called upon to give it to him.

"Very well, sir; very well," replied he, growing very red. "I shall take care and let Mr. Morgan know the opinion I entertain of you. What do you think that man deserves to be called, who enters a family under the plea of friendship, and takes advantage of his intimacy to win the affections of the daughter, and then engages himself to another woman?"

"I thought he referred to Miss Caroline. I simply said I could only say that I was not engaged; and that Miss Tomkinson had been quite mistaken in supposing I had been paying any attentions to her sister beyond those dictated by mere civility.

"Miss Tomkinson! Miss Caroline! I don't understand to what you refer. Is there another victim to your perfidy? What I allude to are the attentions you have paid to my daughter, Miss Bullock."

"Another! I could but disclaim, as I had done in the case of Miss Caroline; but I began to be in despair. Would Miss Horsman, too, come forward as a victim to my tender affections? It was all Mr. Morgan's doing, who had lectured me into this tenderly deferential manner. But on the score of Miss Bullock, I was brave in my innocence. I had positively disliked her; and so I told her father, though in more civil and measured tones, adding that I was sure the feeling was reciprocal.

"He looked as if he would like to horsewhip me. I longed to call him out.

"I hope my daughter has had sense enough to despise you; I hope she has, that's all. I trust my wife may be mistaken as to her feelings."

"So, he had heard all through the medium of his wife. That explained something, and rather calmed me. I begged he would ask Miss Bullock if she had ever thought I had any ulterior object in my intercourse with her, beyond mere friendliness (and not so much of that, I might have added). I would refer it to her.

"Girls," said Mr. Bullock, a little more quietly, 'do not like to acknowledge that they have been deceived and disappointed. I consider my wife's testimony as likely to be nearer the truth than my daughter's, for that reason. And she tells me she never doubted but that, if not absolutely engaged, you understood each other perfectly. She is sure Jemima is deeply wounded by your engagement to Mrs. Rose.'

"Once for all, I am not engaged to anybody. Till you have seen your daughter, and learnt the truth from her, I will wish you farewell."

"I bowed in a stiff, haughty manner, and walked off homewards. But, when I got to my own door, I remembered Mrs. Rose, and all that Mr. Bullock had said about her acknowledging the truth of the report of my engagement to her. Where could I go to be safe? Mrs. Rose, Miss Bullock, Miss Caroline—they lived, as it were, at the three points of an equilateral triangle; here was I in the centre. I would go to Mr. Morgan's, and drink tea with him. There, at any rate, I was secure from any one wanting to marry me; and I might be as professionally bland as I liked, without being misunderstood. But there, too, a contretemps awaited me.

CHAPTER XXI.

"Mr. Morgan was looking grave. After a minute or two of humming and hawing, he said—

"I have been sent for to Miss Caroline Tomkinson, Mr. Harrison. I am sorry to hear of this—I am grieved to find that there seems to have been some trifling with the affections of a very worthy lady. Miss Tomkinson, who is in sad distress, tells me that they had every reason to believe that you were attached to her sister. May I ask if you do not intend to marry her?"

"I said nothing was farther from my thoughts.

"My dear sir," said Mr. Morgan, rather agitated, 'do not express yourself so strongly and vehemently. It is derogatory to the sex to speak so. It is more respectful to say, in these cases, that you do not venture to entertain a hope; such a manner is generally understood, and does not sound like such positive objection.'

"I cannot help it, sir; I must talk in my own natural manner. I would not speak disrespectfully of any woman; but nothing should induce me to marry Miss Caroline Tomkinson; not if she were Venus herself, and Queen of England into the bargain. I cannot understand what has given rise to the idea.'

"Indeed, sir; I think that is very plain. You have a trifling case to attend to in the house, and you invariably make it a pretext for seeing and conversing with the lady.'

"That was her doing, not mine!" said I, vehemently.

"Allow me to go on. You are discovered on your knees before her—a positive injury to the establishment, as Miss Tomkinson observes; a most passionate valentine is sent, and, when questioned, you acknowledge the sincerity of meaning which you affix to such things.' He stopped; for, in his earnestness, he had been talking more quickly than usual, and was out of breath. I burst in with my explanations—

"The valentine I knew nothing about.'

"It is in your handwriting," said he, coldly. 'I should be most deeply grieved to—in fact, I will not think it possible of your father's son. But, I must say, it is in your handwriting.'

"I tried again; and, at last, succeeded in convincing him that I had been only unfortunate, not intentionally guilty of winning Miss Caroline's affections. I said that I had been endeavoring, it was true, to practice the manner he had recommended, of universal sympathy, and recalled to his mind some of the advice he had given me. He was a good deal furried.

"But, my dear sir, I had no idea you would carry it out to such consequences. "Philandering," Tomkinson called it. That is a hard word, sir. My manner has been always tender and sympathetic; but I am not aware that I ever excited any hopes; there never was any report about me. I believe no lady was ever attached to me. You must strive after this happy medium, sir."

"I was still distressed. Mr. Morgan had only heard of one, but there were three ladies, including Miss Bullock, hoping to marry me. He saw my annoyance.

"Don't be too much distressed about it, my dear sir; I was sure you were too honorable a man, from the first. With a conscience like yours, I would defy the world."

"He became anxious to console me, and I was hesitating whether I would not tell him all my three dilemmas, when a note was brought in to him. It was from Mrs. Munton. He threw it to me with a face of dismay.

"MY DEAR MR. MORGAN: I most sincerely congratulate you on the happy matrimonial engagement I hear you have formed with Miss Tomkinson. All previous circumstances, as I have just been remarking to Miss Horsman, combine to promise you felicity. And I wish that every blessing may attend your married life! Most sincerely yours,

"JANE MUNTUN."

"I could not help laughing; he had been so lately congratulating himself that no report of the kind had ever been circulated about himself. He said—

"Sir! this is no laughing matter; I assure you it is not."

"I could not resist asking, if I was to conclude that there was no truth in the report?

"Truth, sir! it's a lie from beginning to end! I don't like to speak too decidedly about any lady; and I've a great respect for Miss Tomkinson; but I do assure you, sir, I'd as soon marry one of Her Majesty's Life-guards. I would rather; it would be more suitable. Miss Tomkinson is a very worthy lady; but she's a perfect grenadier."

"He grew very nervous. He was evidently insecure. He thought it not impossible that Miss Tomkinson might come and marry him, vi et armis. I am sure he had some dim idea of abduction in his mind. Still, he was better off than I was; for he was in his own house, and report had only engaged him to one lady; while I stood, like Paris, among three contending beauties. Truly, an apple of discord had been thrown into our little town. I suspected at the time, what I know now, that it was Miss Horsman's doing; not intentionally, I will do her the justice to say. But she had shouted out the story of my behavior to Miss Caroline up Mrs. Munton's trumpet; and that lady, possessed with the idea that I was engaged to Mrs. Rose, had imagined the masculine pronoun to relate to Mr. Morgan, whom she had seen only that afternoon tête-à-tête with Miss Tomkinson, condoling with her in some tender deferential manner, I'll be bound.

CHAPTER XXII.

"I WAS very cowardly. I positively dared not go home; but, at length, I was obliged to go. I had done all I could to console Mr. Morgan, but he refused to be comforted. I went at last. I rang at the bell. I don't know who opened the door, but I think it was Mrs. Rose. I kept a handkerchief to my face, and, muttering something about having a dreadful toothache, I flew up to my room and bolted the door. I had no candle; but what did that signify? I was safe. I could not sleep; and, when I did fall into a sort of doze, it was ten times worse wakening up. I could not remember whether I was engaged or not. If I was engaged, who was the lady? I had always considered myself as rather plain than otherwise; but surely I had made a mistake. Fascinating I certainly must be; but perhaps I was handsome. As soon as day dawned, I got up to ascertain the fact at the looking-glass. Even with the best disposition to be convinced, I could not see any striking beauty in my round face, with an unshaven beard and a night-cap, like a fool's cap at the top. I took off my night-cap. No! I must be content to be plain, but agreeable. All this I tell you in confidence. I would not have my little bit of vanity known for the world. I fell asleep towards morning. I was awakened by a tap at my door. It was Peggy: she put in a hand with a note. I took it.

"It is not from Miss Horsman?" said I, half in joke, half in very earnest fright.

"No, sir; Mr. Morgan's man brought it."

"I opened it. It ran thus:—

"MY DEAR SIR: It is now nearly twenty years since I have had a little relaxation, and I find that my health requires it. I have also the utmost confidence in you, and I am sure this feeling is shared by our patients. I have therefore no scruple in putting in execution a hastily formed plan, and going to Chesterton to catch the early train on my way to Paris. If your accounts are good, I shall remain away probably a fortnight. Direct to Meurice's. Yours, most truly,

J. MORGAN.

"P. S. Perhaps it may be as well not to name where I am gone, especially to Miss Tomkinson."

He had deserted me. He, with only one report, had left me to stand my ground with three.

"Mrs. Rose's kind regards, sir, and it's nearly nine o'clock. Breakfast has been ready this hour, sir."

"Tell Mrs. Rose I don't want any breakfast. Or stay (for I was very hungry), I will take a cup of tea and some toast up here."

"Peggy brought the tray to the door."

"I hope you're not ill, sir?" said she, kindly.

"Not very. I shall be better when I get into the air."

"Mrs. Rose seems sadly put about," said she; "she seems so grieved like."

"I watched my opportunity, and went out by the side door in the garden."

CHAPTER XXIII.

"I HAD intended to ask Mr. Morgan to call at the vicarage, and give his parting explanation before they could hear the report. Now, I thought that if I could see Sophy, I would speak to her myself; but I did not wish to encounter the vicar. I went along the lane at the back of the vicarage, and came suddenly upon Miss Bullock. She colored, and asked me if I would allow her to speak to me. I could only be resigned; but I thought I could probably set one report at rest by this conversation."

"She was almost crying."

"I must tell you, Mr. Harrison, I have watched you here in order to speak to you. I heard, with the greatest regret, of papa's conversation with you yesterday." She was fairly crying. "I believe Mrs. Bullock finds me in her way, and wants to have me married. It is the only way in which I can account for such a complete misrepresentation as she had told papa. I don't care for you in the least, sir. You never paid me any attentions. You've been almost rude to me; and I have liked you the better. That's to say, I never have liked you."

"I am truly glad to hear what you say," answered I. "Don't distress yourself. I was sure there was some mistake."

"But she cried bitterly."

"It is so hard to feel that my marriage—my absence—is desired so earnestly at home. I dread every new acquaintance we form with any gentleman. It is sure to be the beginning of a series of attacks on him, of which everybody must be aware, and to which they may think I am a willing party. But I should not much mind it, if it were not for the conviction that she wishes me so earnestly away. Oh, my own dear mamma, you would never—"

"She cried more than ever. I was truly sorry for her, and had just taken her hand, and began—"My dear Miss Bullock—," when the door in the wall of the vicarage garden opened. It was the vicar letting out Miss Tomkinson, whose face was all swelled with crying. He saw me; but he did not bow, or make any sign. On the contrary, he looked down as from a severe eminence, and shut the door hastily. I turned to Miss Bullock.

"I am afraid the vicar has been hearing something to my disadvantage from Miss Tomkinson, and it is very awkward—" She finished my sentence, "To have found us here together. Yes, but as long as we understand that we do not care for each other, it does not signify what people say."

"Oh, but to me it does," said I; "I may, perhaps, tell you—but do not mention it to a creature—I am attached to Miss Hutton."

"To Sophy! Oh, Mr. Harrison, I am so glad; she is such a sweet creature. Oh, I wish you joy!"

"Not yet; I have never spoken about it."

"Oh, but it is certain to happen." She jumped with a woman's rapidity to a conclusion. And then she began to praise Sophy. Never was a man yet who did not like to hear the praises of his mistress. I walked by her side; we came past the front of the vicarage together. I looked up, and saw Sophy there, and she saw me.

"That afternoon she was sent away; sent to visit her aunt ostensibly; in reality, because of the reports of my conduct, which were showered down upon the vicar, and one of which he saw confirmed by his own eyes."

CHAPTER XXIV.

"I HEARD of Sophy's departure as one heard of everything, soon after it had taken place. I did not care for the awkwardness of my situation, which had so perplexed and amused me in the morning. I felt that something was wrong; that Sophy was taken away from me. I sank into despair. If anybody liked to marry me, they might. I was willing to be sacrificed. I did not speak to Mrs. Rose. She wondered at me, and grieved over my coldness, I saw; but I had left off feeling anything. Miss Tomkinson cut me in the street; and it did not break my heart. Sophy was gone away; that was all I cared for. Where had they sent her to? Who was her aunt, that she should go and visit her? One day I met Lizzie, who looked as though she had been told not to speak to me, but could not help doing so."

"Have you heard from your sister?" said I.

"Yes."

"Where is she? I hope she is well."

"She is at the Leoms (I was not much wiser). Oh yes, she is very well. Fanny says she was at the Assembly last Wednesday, and danced all night with the officers."

"I thought I would enter myself a member of the Peace Society at once. She was a little flirt, and a hard-hearted creature. I don't think I wished Lizzie good-by.

CHAPTER XXV.

"WHAT most people would have considered a more serious evil than Sophy's absence, befell me. I found that my practice was falling off. The prejudice of the town ran strongly against me. Mrs. Muntton told me all that was said. She heard it through Miss Horsman. It was said—cruel little town—that my negligence or ignorance had been the cause of Walter's death; that Miss Tyrrell had become worse under my treatment; and that John Brouncker was all but dead, if he was not quite, from my mismanagement. All Jack Marshland's jokes and revelations, which had, I thought, gone to oblivion, were raked up to my discredit. He himself, formerly, to my astonishment, rather a favorite with the good people of Duncombe, was spoken of as one of my disreputable friends.

"In short, so prejudiced were the good people of Duncombe, that I believe a very little would have made them suspect me of a brutal highway robbery, which took place in the neighborhood about this time. Mrs. Muntton told me, à propos of the robbery, that she had never yet understood the cause of my year's imprisonment in Newgate; she had no doubt, from what Mr. Morgan had told her, there was some good reason for it: but if I would tell her the particulars, she should like to know them.

"Miss Tomkinson sent for Mr. White, from Chesterton, to see Miss Caroline; and, as he was coming over, all our old patients seemed to take advantage of it, and send for him too.

"But the worst of all was the vicar's manner to me. If he had sent me, I could have asked him why he did so. But the freezing change in his behavior was indescribable, though bitterly felt. I heard of Sophy's gayety from Lizzie. I thought of writing to her. Just then Mr. Morgan's fortnight of absence expired. I was wearied out by Mrs. Rose's tender vagaries, and took no comfort from her sympathy, which indeed I rather avoided. Her tears irritated, instead of grieving me. I wished I could tell her at once that I had no intention of marrying her.

CHAPTER XXVI.

"MR. MORGAN had not been at home above two hours before he was sent for to the vicarage. Sophy had come back, and I had never heard of it. She had some home ill and weary, and longing for rest; and the rest seemed approaching with awful strides.

Mr. Morgan forgot all his Parisian adventures, and all his terror of Miss Tomkinson, when he was sent for to see her. She was ill of a fever, which made fearful progress. When he told me, I wished to force the vicarage door, if I might but see her. But I controlled myself; and only cursed my weak indecision, which had prevented my writing to her. It was well I had no patients; they would have had but a poor chance of attention. I hung about Mr. Morgan, who might see her, and did see her. But from what he told me, I perceived that the measures he was adopting were powerless to check so sudden and violent an illness. Oh! if they would but let me see her! But that was out of the question. It was not merely that the vicar had heard of my character as a gay Lothario, but that doubts had been thrown out of my medical skill. The accounts grew worse. Suddenly, my resolution was taken. Mr. Morgan's very regard for Sophy made him more than usually timid in his practice. I had my horse saddled, and galloped to Chesterton. I took the express train to town. I went to Dr. ——. I told him every particular of the case. He listened; but shook his head. He wrote down a prescription; and recommended a new preparation, not yet in full use: a preparation of a poison, in fact.

"It may save her," said he. "It is a chance, in such a state of things as you describe. It must be given on the fifth day, if the pulse will bear it. Crabbe makes up the preparation most skillfully. Let me hear from you, I beg."

"I went to Crabbe's. I begged to make it up myself; but my hands trembled, so that I could not weigh the quantities. I asked the young man to do it for me. I went, without touching food, to the station, with my medicine and my prescription in my pocket. Back we flew through the country. I sprang on Bay Maldon, which my groom had in waiting, and galloped across the country to Duncombe.

"But I drew bridle when I came to the top of the hill—the hill above the old hall, from which we catch the first glimpse of the town, for I thought within myself that she might be dead; and I dreaded to come near certainty. The hawthorns were out in the woods, the young lambs were in the meadows, the song of the thrushes filled the air; but it only made the thought the more terrible.

"What if in this world of hope and life she lies dead! I heard the church bells soft and clear. I sickened to listen. Was it the passing bell? No!—it was ringing eight o'clock. I put spurs to my horse, down hill as it was. We dashed into the town. I turned him, saddle and bridle, into the stable-yard, and went off to Mr. Morgan's.

"Is she?—" said I. "How is she?"
 "Very ill. My poor fellow, I see how it is with you. She may live—but I fear. My dear sir, I am very much afraid."

"I told him of my journey, and consultation with Dr——, and showed him the prescription. His hands trembled as he put on his spectacles to read it.

"This is a very dangerous medicine, sir," said he, with his finger under the name of the poison.

"It is a new preparation," said I. "Dr. —— relies much upon it."

"I dare not administer it," he replied. "I have never tried it. It must be very powerful. I dare not play tricks in this case."

"I believe I stamped with impatience; but it was all of no use. My journey had been in vain. The more I urged the imminent danger of the case requiring some powerful remedy, the more nervous he became."

"I told him I would throw up the partnership. I threatened him with that, though, in fact, it was only what I felt I ought to do, and had resolved upon before Sophy's illness, as I had lost the confidence of his patients. He only said—

"I cannot help it, sir. I shall regret it for your father's sake; but I must do my duty. I dare not run the risk of giving Miss Sophy this violent medicine—a preparation of a deadly poison."

"I left him without a word. He was quite right in adhering to his own views, as I can see now; but, at the time, I thought him brutal and obstinate."

CHAPTER XXVII.

"I went home. I spoke rudely to Mrs. Rose, who awaited my return at the door. I rushed past, and locked myself in my room. I could not go to bed."

"The morning sun came pouring in, and enraged me, as everything did since Mr. Morgan refused. I pulled the blind down so violently that the string broke. What did it signify? The light might come in. What was the sun to me? And then I remembered that that sun might be shining on her—dead."

"I sat down and covered my face. Mrs. Rose knocked at the door. I opened it. She had never been in bed, and had been crying too."

"Mr. Morgan wants to speak to you, sir!"

"I rushed back for my medicine, and went to him. He stood at the door, pale and anxious."

"She's alive, sir," said he; "but that's all. We have sent for Dr. Hamilton. I'm afraid he will not come in time. Do you know, sir, I think we should venture—with Dr. ——'s sanction—to give her that medicine. It is but a chance; but it is the only one, I'm afraid." He fairly cried before he had ended.

"I've got it here," said I, setting off to walk; but he could not go so fast.

"I beg your pardon, sir," said he, "for my abrupt refusal last night."

"Indeed, sir," said I; "I ought much rather to beg your pardon. I was very violent."

"Oh! Never mind! Never mind! Will you repeat what Dr. —— said?"

"I did so; and then I asked, with a meekness that astonished myself, if I might not go in and administer it."

"No, sir," said he, "I'm afraid not. I am sure your good heart would not wish to give pain. Besides, it might agitate her, if she has any consciousness before death. In her delirium she has often mentioned your name; and, sir, I'm sure you won't name it again, as it may, in fact, be considered a professional secret; but I did hear our good vicar speak a little strongly about you; in fact, sir, I did hear him curse you. You see the mischief it might make in the parish, I'm sure, if this were known."

"I gave him the medicine, and watched him in, and saw the door shut. I hung about the place all day. Poor and rich, all came to inquire. The county people drove up in their carriages—the halt and the lame came on their crutches. Their anxiety did my heart good. Mr. Morgan told me that she slept, and I watched Dr. Hamilton into the house. The night came on. She slept. I watched round the house. I saw the light high up, burning still and steady. Then I saw it moved. It was the crisis, in one way or other."

CHAPTER XXVIII.

"Mr. Morgan came out. Good old man! The tears were running down his cheeks: he could not speak; but kept shaking my hands. I did not want words. I understood that she was better."

"Dr. Hamilton says it was the only medicine that could have saved her. I was an old fool, sir. I beg your pardon. The vicar shall know all. I beg your pardon, sir, if I was abrupt."

"Everything went on brilliantly from this time."

"Mr. Bullock called to apologize for his mistake, and consequent upbraiding. John Brouncker came home brave and well."

"There was still Miss Tomkinson in the ranks of the enemy; and Mrs. Rose, too much, I feared, in the ranks of the friends."

CHAPTER XXIX.

"One night she had gone to bed, and I was thinking of going. I had been studying in the back room, where I went for refuge from her in the present position of affairs; (I read a good number of surgical books about this time, and also 'Vanity Fair') when I heard a loud, long-continued knocking at the door, enough to waken the whole street."

Before I could get to open it, I heard that well-known bass of Jack Marshland's, once heard never to be forgotten, pipe up the negro song,

"Who's dat knocking at de door?"

"Though it was raining hard at the time, and I stood waiting to let him in, he would finish his melody in the open air; loud and clear along the street it sounded. I saw Miss Tomkinson's night-capped head emerge from a window. She called out 'Police! police!'

"Now there were no police, only a rheumatic constable, in the town; but it was the custom of the ladies, when alarmed at night, to call an imaginary police, which had, they thought, an intimidating effect, but, as every one knew the real state of the unwatched town, we did not much mind it in general. Just now, however, I wanted to regain my character. So I pulled Jack in, quivering as he entered.

"'You've spoilt a good shake,' said he; 'that's what you have. I'm nearly up to Jenny Lind; and you see I'm a nightingale like her.'

"We sat up late; and I don't know how it was, but I told him all my matrimonial misadventures.

"'I thought I could imitate your hand pretty well,' said he. 'My word! it was a flaming valentine! No wonder she thought you loved her!'

"'So that was your doing, was it? Now I'll tell you what you shall do to make up for it. You shall write me a letter confessing your hoax—a letter that I can show.'

"'Give me pen and paper, my boy; you shall dictate. "With a deeply penitent heart"—will that do for a beginning?'

"I told him what to write; a simple, straightforward confession of his practical joke. I enclosed it in a few lines of regret that, unknown to me, any of my friends should have so acted.

CHAPTER XXX.

"ALL this time I knew that Sophy was slowly recovering. One day I met Miss Bullock, who had seen her.

"'We have been talking about you,' said she with a bright smile; for, since she knew I disliked her, she felt quite at her ease, and could smile very pleasantly. I understood that she had been explaining the misunderstanding about herself to Sophy; so that when Jack Marshland's note had been sent to Miss Tomkinson's I thought myself in a fair way to have my character established in two quarters. But the third was my dilemma. Mrs. Rose had really so much of my true regard for her good qualities, that I disliked the idea of a formal explanation, in which a good deal must be said on my side to wound her. We had become very much estranged ever since I had heard of this report of my engagement to her. I saw that she grieved over it. While Jack Marshland stayed with us, I felt at my ease in the presence of a third person. But he told me confidentially he durst not stay long, for fear some of the ladies should snap him up, and marry him. Indeed I myself did not think it unlikely that he would snap one of them up if he could. For when we met Miss Bullock one day, and heard her hopeful, joyous account of Sophy's progress (to whom she was a daily visitor), he asked me who that bright-looking girl was? And when I told him she was the Miss Bullock of whom I had spoken to him, he was pleased to observe that he thought I had been a great fool, and asked me if Sophy had anything like such splendid eyes. He made me repeat about Miss Bullock's unhappy circumstances at home, and then became very thoughtful—a most unusual and morbid symptom in his case.

"Soon after he went, by Mr. Morgan's kind offices and explanations I was permitted to see Sophy. I might not speak much; it was prohibited for fear of agitating her. We talked of the weather and the flowers; and we were silent. But her little, white, thin hand lay in mine; and we understood each other without words. I had a long interview with the vicar afterwards; and came away glad and satisfied.

"Mr. Morgan called in the afternoon, evidently anxious, though he made no direct inquiries (he was too polite for that), to hear the result of my visit at the vicarage. I told him to give me joy. He shook me warmly by the hand; and then rubbed his own together. I thought I would consult him about my dilemma with Mrs. Rose, who, I was afraid, would be deeply affected by my engagement.

"'There is only one awkward circumstance,' said I; 'about Mrs. Rose.' I hesitated how to word the fact of her having received congratulations on her supposed engagement with me, and her manifest attachment; but, before I could speak, he broke in—

"'My dear sir, you need not trouble yourself about that; she will have a home. In fact, sir,' said he, reddening a little, 'I thought it would, perhaps, put a stop to those reports connecting my name with Miss Tomkinson's if I married some one else. I hoped it might prove an efficacious contradiction. And I was struck with admiration for Mrs. Rose's undying memory of her late husband. Not to be prolix, I have this morning obtained Mrs. Rose's consent to—to marry her, in fact, sir!' said he, jerking out the climax.

"'Here was an event! Then Mr. Morgan had never heard the report about Mrs. Rose and me. (To this day, I think she would have taken me, if I had proposed.) So much the better.

"'Marriages were in the fashion that year. Mr. Bullock met me one morning, as I was going to ride with Sophy. He and I had quite got over our misunderstanding, thanks to Jemima, and were as friendly as ever. This morning he was chuckling aloud as he walked.

"'Stop, Mr. Harrison!' he said, as I went quickly past. 'Have you heard the news? Miss Horsman has just told me Miss Caroline has eloped with young Hoggins! She is ten years older than he is! How can her gentility like being married to a tallow-chandler? It is a very good thing for her, though,' he added, in a more serious manner; 'old Hoggins is very rich; and though he's angry just now, he will soon be reconciled.'

"Any vanity I might have entertained on the score of the three ladies who were, at one time, said to be captivated by my charms, was being rapidly dispersed. Soon after Mr. Hoggins' marriage, I met Miss Tomkinson face to face, for the first time since our memorable conversation. She stopped me, and said—

"'Don't refuse to receive my congratulations, Mr. Harrison, on your most happy engagement to Miss Hutton. I owe you an apology, too, for my behavior when I last saw you at our house. I really did think Caroline was attached to you then; and it irritated me, I confess, in a very wrong and unjustifiable way. But I heard her telling Mr. Hoggins only yesterday that she had been attached to him for years; ever since he was in pinafores, she dated it from; and when I asked her afterwards how she could say so, after her distress on hearing that false report about you and Mrs. Rose, she cried, and said I never had understood her; and that the hysterics which alarmed me so much were simply caused by eating pickled cucumber. I am very sorry for my stupidity and improper way of speaking; but I hope we are friends now, Mr. Harrison, for I should wish to be liked by Sophy's husband.'

"Good Miss Tomkinson! to believe the substitution of indigestion for disappointed affection. I shook her warmly by the hand; and we have been all right ever since. I think I told you she is baby's godmother.

CHAPTER XXXI.

"I HAD some difficulty in persuading Jack Marshland to be groomsman; but when he heard all the arrangements, he came. Miss Bullock was bridesmaid. He liked us all so well, that he came again at Christmas, and was far better behaved than he had been the year before. He won golden opinions indeed. Miss Tomkinson said he was a reformed young man. We dined altogether at Mr. Morgan's (the vicar wanted us to go there; but, from what Sophy told me, Helen was not confident of the mince-meat, and rather dreaded so large a party). We had a jolly day of it. Mrs. Morgan was as kind and motherly as ever. Miss Horsman certainly did not cut a sorry figure; that the vicar was thinking of Miss Tomkinson for his second; or else, I think, we had no other report circulated in consequence of our happy, merry Christmas-day; and it is a wonder, considering how Jack Marshland went on with Je-mima."

Here Sophy came back from putting baby to bed; and Charles wakened up.

EVENING REVERIE.

BY F. N. SABBISKIE.

The twilight hour, whose shaded robes
Seem half of night and half of day,
And golden pictures of the sun
From earth and sky have passed away.

And timbly the queenly moon
Gilds where the vestal fire burns;
And starry priesthood stand and shake
Thought's incense from their golden urns.

The dim cathedral of the sky
Gleams with a gush of ruddy light;
Our thoughts steal through its shadowy aisles
To worship at the shrine of Night.

Then drops the veil that hides the past,
And Memory, with illuming wings,
Flits o'er those ruins dim and old—
The land of the departed things.

And forms which, dying, left us sad,
Are floating in the lustrous air;
We catch their smiles of Heaven's light,
And eager pant to meet them there.

Then wave the forests, sing the birds,
That waved and sung in younger days;
The brook that passed our cottage home
Still chants its naled roundelays.

The matron, with her snowy cap,
And olden Bible on her knee,
Still teaches to that merry boy
Truth, which shall keep his spirit free.

More beautiful than all the fanes
Of temples in the ancient lands,
'Mid leafy oaks and tablet-stones
Our humble village chapel stands.

And older days, when manly toil
And love did pave the path of life,
Glide softly to my listening ear,
And whisper of the bygone strife.

Then Fancy rings its golden bell,
And clear-toned music summons thought
To leave the shades of former years,
And revel in a wilder sport.

The mist that clouds our future sky
It piles into fantastic form,
And airy castles glittering rise,
And rainbows sit on every storm.

Let not the calm and holy night
Be wasted in the revel's shame,
But let its hours be steps, on which
Thy thoughts pursue a heavenward aim!

THE LADY'S LEAP.

A LEGEND OF THE WARS OF THE ROSES.

BY HENRY WILLIAM HERBERT, AUTHOR OF "THE ROMAN TRAITOR," "MARMADUKE WYVIL," "CROMWELL," "THE BROTHERS," ETC.

EVEN at this day, one of the wildest and most purely pastoral districts in all England is that region of the West Riding of Yorkshire which lies between Lancashire on the south and west, and a part of Westmoreland on the north, and which is divided on the east, from the more populous portions of the fine county to which it belongs, by the waters of the great northern river Ure, destined, after twice changing its name, and swallowing up tributaries mightier than itself, to fall into the North Sea as the Humber. To this day, in the whole of that large tract, there is no large town; nothing, indeed, that we should dignify, in the United States, by the title of a considerable village.

It abounds, however, in the most splendid scenery; it contains some of the loftiest hills, as Ingleborough, Wharfedale, and Pensington, and is watered by the loveliest rivers, the Nid, the Wharfe, the Eyre, and many a tributary torrent, in all the sea-girt island. Emphatically, it is a land of hills and dales, or, as they are termed in the north country dialect, the fells and the ghylls. The population sparse, simple, hospitable, and contented, are scattered, through the narrow vales which intersect the huge round-topped heathery ridges, in hamlets small, indeed, but picturesque and happy, earning enough to supply their few and trivial wants by cultivating the narrow verge of soft green meadow land, which everywhere forms the bottom of the ghylls, and pasturing their flocks and herds, of moorland sheep and kyles, upon the heath-clad hills, on which each farm possesses a free commonage.

In the times, however, of the wars of the Roses, during the fatal strife of the kindred houses of York and Lancaster, which constitute the cruellest and bloodiest page of Britain's history, the Ghyllsland was a purely pastoral, a purely feudal region.

The great Earl of Warwick, from his Castle of Middleham, a little way to the eastward on the waters of the Ure, the Prior of Bolton Abbey on the Wharfe, and the Egremonts of Barden Tower, were all the great proprietors throughout that rugged country; and so lightly did the feudal rule of the good monks and popular nobles press on their vassals, that they might be called the freest population in all England: a few simple quit-rents of the produce of their farms, a few days of man-service when their lords waged war on the wild beasts, which were then plentiful in the forest, or on one other in the field of civil strife, constituted the whole of their duties; and these, in those dark and bloody days, were looked upon almost as privileges. Every dalesman was in those days an archer, and, as such, a huntsman and a soldier; and, to have been debarred from following his lord's hounds on the fell, his lord's banner on the field, he would have looked upon not as a privilege, but as a penalty and a disgrace.

The bloody field of Towton had been fought about ten days, and the whole north of England was filled with terror, lamentation, and despair. Some forty thousand men had fallen, in their harness, on that field of "gentle blood," after which a baron of the old Norman blood was more rarely to be seen for half a century in England, as the old saying ran, than a wolf or a wild boar.

Nor had the Ghyllsmen escaped their share of the slaughter; nor were their humble homes exempt from the desolation, which smote yet more heavily the towers of their feudal liege lords.

That country, like the rest of England, had been divided in some sort against itself; for the men of the eastern fells had followed the Bear and Ragged staff of Warwick, the great king-maker, to bloody triumph; the westlanders had marched to horrible defeat for the ill-fated cause of Lancaster, under the Prior of Bolton's bailiffs and the Lady of Barden's seneschal.

The days of chivalry were passed; the spirit of chivalry had died out, choked by the fiercer fire of intestine warfare. Edward, the Burgher King, as his enemies were wont to call him, although a leader in the field and a soldier in the mêlée, had little of the cavalier, less of the gentle knight, in his iron composition. None knew more stoutly how to fight, more kingly how to conquer. None knew more bloodily, more brutally, how to gather in the fruits of victory. No veneration of old age, no pity of green youth, no tenderness for sex, no respect for valor, ever once moved his heart of steel to remit the bloody sentence of ex vicie. To be a captive enemy was to be butchered summarily upon the field, or reserved yet more pitilessly for the scaffold.

No wonder, then, if, between mourning for their dead and trembling for their living, the fugitive Lancastrians shuddered in their wild ghylls at every blast of wind that whistled through their mountain gorges, magnified by their fears into the fatal clangor of the Yorkist trumpet.

The vassals, it is true, were suffered, unless taken under arms red-handed, to escape the penalty of their faith to their feudal lords; since loyalty of that nature both sides alike desired to promote, and neither dared in policy to punish. The cottage, therefore, oftentimes afforded to the lowly peasant that shelter which the abbey could not yield to its revered prior, nor the Norman castle to its haughty noble.

It was the tenth night after that terrible defeat, and the Lady of Barden Tower sat lonely by the dim embers and dull lamplight of her mournful hall; now striving to draw consolation from the pages of her illuminated missal, now listening gloomily to the fierce gusts of the autumn wind, as it roared and wailed about her turrets; to the incessant pelting of the storm upon the roofs; to the wild raving of the tortured Wharfe, as, flooded by the torrents from the hills, it chafed and howled among the rocks, which pent up its maddened waters in the dale below. Almost she fancied now that she could hear the war cries and the trumpets, the pattering arrow flights on mail shirt and steel helmet, the cries and curses of the desperate and the dying, in the voices of the winter tempest.

Her tenants had returned home unmolested; their dead had been laid in holy earth, within the abbey precincts, in the lower glen. Herself she had seen their dust consigned to dust, their ashes unto ashes; herself she had given tears to their dead from those stern eyes, which refused to weep when her own lord fell under shield, as the phrase ran, full knightly; herself she had consoled their widows with her sympathy, and salved their wounds with gold; and now she sat alone, as I have said, disconsolate, almost despairing, in the gloom of her widowed hall.

Yet she feared nothing, thought of nothing touching her own losses, her own sorrows, her own safety; save as her people, decimated by the sword of York, were sorrowing; save as her truest knights were hunted by the hounds of Warwick; save as her king was again an exile afar from the land of his fathers; save as her own and only daughter was imperiled by her loyalty. For, though her vassals had returned, the gray-haired seneschal who led them to the field, and who had fought beside her husband's rein in Guienne and Poitou, was yet a fugitive, wounded and weak, as tidings had already reached her, not daring to return to his own home, whither most certainly he should be hunted—for the good knight who bore her banner, Sir Amelot de Manhower, was in like plight, and only bade her trust that banner to his keeping, for it was bound about his breast, till brighter days should come, and it should fly again for Egremont and Lancaster—for she had one fair daughter, the flower of all the dales; and even now she shuddered, as she thought how the bloody and licentious Edward might wreak his vengeance on herself, upon that innocent and lovely child. She shuddered, but she shrank not for one instant from her fealty; nor hesitated, even in her inmost heart, from battling yet again for Lancaster, so soon as Henry's banner should be spread again to British breezes.

While thus she sat, her tall and stately figure clad in the darkest weeds, bending above the pictured missal, her snow-white locks straying disheveled over her neck and shoulders, her dark eyes fixed on vacancy, a light and joyous step came bounding down the stone turret stairway, and paused for a moment at the door, as if in doubt whether it might enter.

But the lady heard not, heeded not, till a fluttering hand turned the ponderous lock, and the fleet foot crossed the threshold with a step so lightsome, as told sure tidings of a happy heart inspiring it.

It was as beautiful a girl as ever cheered a widowed mother's solitude, not past her eighteenth summer, and looking yet more youthful than she was, from the extreme brilliancy and brightness of her pure complexion, the sunny loveliness of her long golden tresses, and the expression of exquisite innocence and candor which lighted up her large azure eyes. The Lady of Barden raised her eyes and fixed them fondly on her child, and a mournful smile played over her pallid features as she looked upon her, joyous still and radiant in the midst of peril and dismay.

"Ever gay, ever joyous, Eleanor," she said, with a half reproachful gesture of the head; "and what can you find, in these dark and dreadful days, to light up that merry beacon in your eye, to kindle that gay smile upon your lip? But, youth! youth! It is still the part of youth to hope, as it is of age, sad age, to despair."

"Nay, mother dear," said the girl, in a whisper, when she stood close beside the lady's footstool, having closed the door carefully behind her; "but there is cause of joy now; yes, great cause of joy; for he has returned, and safely, too, or, at least, not badly wounded, and is hard by, looking to us, as well he may, for succor."

"Who has returned? Whom do you mean, Eleanor?"

"Whom do I mean, mother?" she exclaimed, her cheek paling for the moment with the intensity of her feeling. "Whom should I mean but Amelot?"

"Sir Amelot de Manhower!" replied the lady. "I had not thought of this. He should not have come. What shall we do to save him? There is a Yorkist force even now at Settle." Thus far she had spoken musingly, as if in thoughtful commune with herself; but now her eye brightened, and she inquired quickly, "But how can you know this? Where is Sir Amelot? Is he within the tower? Why came he not with his report to me, instead of forcing you into this peril?"

"No, dearest mother," replied the girl, eagerly; "my maiden, Marian, brought me the tidings up. She was down in the glen at sunset, ere the storm came on; and, seeing her, he crawled out from his hiding-place, and bade her bring you tidings that he was hidden in the cavern under the first fall, and that no man could take him there, for that he only knows its secret. But he lacks food and wine, and the means of procuring light, which he prays you send him."

"And why brought she not the news to me? Why did she tarry so long on the way? She must have known this these five hours."

"She dared not leave the supper-board before my hour for untiring; and dared not seek your presence, with whom she has no duty to perform, lest she should so create suspicion."

"If that were but the reason!" said the lady, relapsing into thought. "But that boy, that page, Damian! I doubt her—I doubt her much, Eleanor. Why should she have told you? Does she know that you love him, Nell?"

"Mother!" exclaimed the agitated girl, with the conscious blood flushing crimson to her brow, her cheeks, her neck. "No one—no one knows that. I don't—I don't know, mother! What mean you, mother mine?" And she burst into a flood of tears, and sank into a chair, overpowered and exhausted by the mere force of her own feelings.

The lady walked up slowly to her fair child's side, and laying both her withered hands in attitude of benediction on that fair, sunny head—

"Be comforted, my own sweet child. Weep not; but little can you guess of what a mother knows or knows not, whose best child's happiness is staked. Eleanor, I have known, have seen all this a year and over."

"You have seen—have known all, mother!" cried she, starting to her feet, and gazing into her mother's eyes with nascent hope. "Then you do not—you do—I mean—not disapprove? You, ah! you pardon me?"

"If I had disapproved, I had interposed to prevent. For the rest, Eleanor, I trust—have I ought to pardon?"

"I do love him, mother."

"And he knows it?"

"He might hope, might perhaps fancy—but I—I—Oh, mother, you do not dream that I ever told him?"

"Nor he you, Eleanor?"

"Had he but whispered it without your sanction, then I had not loved him."

"Then you have loved, yourself unloved. Is it so, Eleanor?"

"Mother, no! Can you think it of me?" she exclaimed, indignantly, and again she crimsoned.

"You said he never whispered it," replied the lady, half suppressing a smile. "How then can you know it?"

"Never in words, mother; but his manner—his voice—his eyes. Oh, mother, do not! do not! You must know what I mean."

"Perfectly, dearest. His manner, his voice, and his eyes told you what he dreamed of, and yours replied as plainly. But now to the point; does Marian know, or suspect aught, think you, of these—these love passages?"

"I am certain—no, as certain as that I live."

"Send her to me at once. I mistrust her sorely. There have been passages, I know, between her and the page Damian; and he sought leave of me, as the curfew rang, to go down to the Abbot's forester. Send her to me at once; and bid Geoffrey, the warder, take arms, with two of his best men, and wait my call in the anteroom."

Eleanor, not unwilling to escape farther questioning, and to gain time to collect her senses, bounded from the hall; and, giving the lady's orders to the warder, hurried up to her turret chamber, and sent the girl down to her mother's presence. Then, falling on her knees by her own bedside, she thanked, from the depths of her guileless heart, the Giver of all good for the blessings he had that night granted her, and prayed, among fast flowing tear-drops, half of joy, half of sorrow, for protection to her loved Amelot.

The interview between the dreaded lady and the girl, Marian, was but brief; for, terrified already and self-conscious, she could no more endure the lady's piercing eye and calm, hard, cutting questions than the partridge can the talons and the beak of the keen goshawk. Within ten minutes from entering the hall, the lady's voice was heard, "Without there!" And, at the word, all steel from helm to shoe, with bill and bow and broadsword, the stout retainers entered.

They found the lady, impassive as her wont, writing upon a strip of parchment, and the girl prostrate at her feet, in an agony of tears and terror.

"Here, Jansen," said the lady, as she finished her writing, "bear me this scroll forthwith to the sub-prior of Bolton; and, hark you, put this wench upon a palfrey, and carry her down with you to the abbey. There leave her in keeping of the Father Janitor. That done, await the sub-prior's orders. Perform them, be they what they may, and that with all due diligence. Tush, wench!" she added; "tears are vain, and supplication. You should have thought of these things ere you thought to deal in treason. Lose no time, Jansen; honor and life depend upon your diligence and fealty."

The sturdy henchman bowed, and, leading the unhappy girl away, half carried in the arms of his followers—for, ignorant what fate awaited her, she was now all but fainting—he left the proud, impassive lady to her own melancholy meditations.

They were not long, however; for, lighting a taper from her lamp, she opened a private doorway at the farther end of the hall, and, ascending a narrow staircase to an upper story, soon stood, unseen and unsuspected, at the door of her daughter's chamber.

Already had that fair young being fallen into the light and happy sleep of innocence and peace; but need was that she should be aroused; and long and anxious was the consultation that ensued on her awakening.

It had already struck the first hour past midnight, and the bells for prime were already pealing up the deep glen from Bolton's hoary towers, ere, with a heartfelt blessing, and a parting memento to be astir with the lark or before him, the mother left her child to dream of future bliss, alas! not unmixed with future peril.

Perhaps even then she had not left her, but that a hoarse resounding challenge from the gate tower warned her that probably her emissaries had returned; and, in truth, she had scarce retrimmed her lamp, and resumed her seat in the great hall, where of late she had held vigils oft till well nigh morning, before an esquire reverently entered to say that the warden craved a hearing of the lady.

The man had little to relate, however. The sub-prior, he said, had sent the bailiff for the forester, and had questioned him for some time in private, when, with the simple word that "it was too late!" he had dismissed them. The girl, Marian, he had heard, was committed to the penitentiary cell.

"You have done well, Jansen," answered the lady. "But you have more to do. Keep watch and ward yourself to-night, with half the garrison in arms; suffer no one to enter in or go out before noon to-morrow, saving the Lady Eleanor, who will go forth mounted at daybreak. If the page Damian show himself before the gates, bend your own trusty bow and send a clothyard arrow to his heart. For the rest, if any band of marauding Yorkists show themselves on our side the Wharfe, ring bancoche and fire beacon till all the country is aroused, and then upon them, and cry 'Egremont for Lancaster, and give no quarter!'"

The man bowed low, and was retiring silently, when a sign checked him.

"How goes the night, Jansen? and how promises the morrow?"

"The storm has rolled away to the east, lady; the moon is up. It will be fair morn the morrow."

She waved him his dismissal; and, within half an hour, except the warder at the gate-house, and the sentinels along the walls, there was not an eye open within the walls of Barden Tower.

Long ere the sun was up, however, a light foot glided down the castle stair; and the delicate and gentle Eleanor passed down into the castle hall, arrayed in plumed cap and riding skirt, with a short mantle over it, which, had its folds been disturbed, might have revealed things so incongruous to a young lady's morning ramble as a light basket girded round her slender waist on the one side, and counterbalanced by a stone flagon on the other.

No envious eye, however, fell upon her; no eye at all, indeed, save the trusty warden's, who, forewarned of her early coming forth, awaited her himself, with her palfrey saddled, at the castle gate, himself assisted her to the selle, and, opening a postern gate, let her forth, without a word of question. Only, as she rode out, he said, quietly—

"If there be need, remember, lady, this postern will be held in hand."

Bowing her head in answer, she gave her horse the rein, and cantered down into the deep and awful chasm through which the Wharfe was raging, between black walls of rock crusted with blacker forests, here tumbling, a hundred yards in width, over sheer ledges in white cataracts; here roaring, wider yet, over dread boiling rapids; and here, most hideous spot of all, pent in between the slippery ledges which its spray constantly overflowed, a broad and powerful torrent jammed into a pass of scarce ten feet in width, arrowy, louder than a surf-beat shore, unfathomable. "The Strid," that pass is called, in the tongue of the Northmen, because a man, if he have heart enough, may stride across it; "the Strid," a spot fatal to her race, who now galloped fearlessly along the slippery rocks beside it; for there the Boy of Egremont, the son of her who answered "Endless weeping," died miserably, nor was ever found again, pulled back by his reluctant greyhound, after his own fleet foot had crossed the chasm.

But not of that she thought; her heart was beating only with true love, and the high hope how she should save her lover. Two cataracts she had passed by, and then the perilous "Strid;" and now the farthest, the first fall, of the glen thundered down white before her, as the driven snow, a terrible stupendous cataract. The sun gleamed out just as she reached its foot; and as his first rays gilt the silver foam, a human form stepped out from beneath the arch of spray, and stood before her eyes, Sir Amelot de Manhowe, as yet in safety.

An instant, and she was in his arms—another, and she had torn herself from that short embrace; and with all the eloquence of young permitted love, with all the volubility of a woman's fear for whom she loves the best, was pouring out her tidings, insisting on his silence, recounting her mother's kindness, impressing on him the wisdom of her mother's plans, enforcing her own sweet injunctions.

"There, there! Not a word more," she cried. "You have told me your secret of escape; now I have to speak only, and you only to obey, if you are either good knight or true lover. Marian, my wretched girl, has betrayed you to her lover Damian; and he set off last night for Settle, to bring the soldiers down upon you. It is by God's grace alone, which sent the storm last night, that they are not here already! Make your way then at once, like the mole underground, to Malham cove; lie hidden there till night; and, traveling by night only, hiding from dawn till twilight, make your way through the fells to Carlisle. Enter that city boldly, for we shall be there before you with six score of stout spears of Lancaster. The warden of the Marches is for us.

There is no force to check us, for an hour, to the northward. There will we all take ship for Flanders, and tarry there in peace till better days return for hapless England. Here be provisions, wine, and lights, and money. Say, liegeman, will you do my bidding?"

"I were a traitor else."

"And instantly? Our horses are already saddling! The Lady of Barden Tower will take horse ere sunset!"

"For Carlisle and for Flanders?"

"What? Do you doubt me? For Carlisle and Flanders."

"And, Eleanor, when we be safe in Flanders?"

"Then, Amelot, you must ask—"

"Whom?"

"Whom—if you are obedient—but your Eleanor?"

"I am obedient."

One more brief embrace, and he raised her light burthen to her saddle; and, eager to prove his obedience and good faith, disappeared behind the cataract, and plunged fearlessly into the abysses of those limestone caverns, which, undermining all that region, conduits of subterranean rivers, would lead him, miles away, to the cove of Malham.

Had he remained one minute longer, he had lingered until it was too late—for had he dreamed the peril she had yet to run, he had died before he had turned on his heel, or he had not deserved to win her.

She had just reached the Strid, when the ban-cloche of Barden Tower pealed forth its battle summons, and, casting her eyes down the gorge between herself and the ascent to the castle, she saw a band of archery and spears hurrying up the pass, led by the traitor Damian.

A wooded corner of the rock below, and the steep elevation on which she stood, concealed her from them for the moment. Another minute, and she would be in the hands of those who spared nor sex, nor age, least of all beauty—herself and him also!

There was no passage up the glen; on this side no concealment. The thought flashed on her, like the electric fluid. Across "the Strid" is honor—life—love!

That was a brave thought for a brave man's mind. What then for a frail girl's—a girl's whose ancestor had perished in those black whirling waters?

She paused not to think twice. With a bright eye, but cheek and lip white as ashes, whispering one soft prayer to God, she turned her horse's head, faced him at the dread pass, and with light curb and well-plied lash, charged him right at it.

Fiery and fresh, he reared bolt upright as he felt the lash; and, ignorant of what lay in his path, charged over the black slippery rocks right onward.

His hoofs were on the very brink, when he perceived the hideous whirl of the black torrent; then he would have sheered or paused—when sheer or pause had been instant death—but it was all too late; for with a steady bridle hand she rose him at it, and brought down the lash on his croupe with such a will of that slight arm that the thong left a bloody score.

He sprang—his feet clanged twice upon the rocks, drowned by the roar of the river, and the clash of the ban-cloche, and he and his fair rider were in shelter of the deep woodland, just as the band of Yorkists, scaling the heights, stood upon the plateau, where they stood not a point of time before.

Ill went it with that band of Yorkists; worse with the traitor Damian. For, ere the gentle Eleanor, faint with the peril which now first she apprehended, had scaled the opposing bank and won the open moorland, down from the keep of Barden, with bill, and bow, and bugle-blast and battle cry, poured in treble force the vassals of her house.

"Lancaster, Egremont for Lancaster! and give no quarter!"

Within ten minutes it was over; pent in that gorge where they could neither fight nor fly, they were cut down like sheep, until not one remained to tell the tale of horror.

Damian alone they took alive; and him, in the rage and vengeance of the moment, for they believed themselves too late to save their mistress, they flung headlong into the awful chasm, o'er which she had just passed in safety.

One wild cry—and no human eye again beheld him—no human ear again heard of him.

But, ere the executioners returned in gory triumph home, borne like the wind by her good steed, she had descended to the abbey bridge, recrossed the brineful Wharfe, and was already weeping on her mother's bosom.

But her trials all were ended, and thence her joys began. Carlisle, Flanders, were gained in safety; and when, in the good town of Antwerp, Amelot asked his Eleanor, she said not nay! to Amelot.

Some years they lived in exile, but neither poor nor unhonored; for those were days in which the stout hand and true heart gained the wealth and fame which now fall to the lot of peddler craft and greed.

But when the Count of Richmond won England's crown on bloody Bosworth, Sir Amelot de Man-hower stood beside him; and, ere he sat on his throne at Westminster, fair Eleanor sat, happy wife, and happy mistress, in the halls of Barden.

Nor, though the keep is now one rifted tower, the abbey but a roofless pile, have the country folk forgotten the tale which gained the fearful "Strid" its more romantic name, "The Lady's Leap."

COSTUMES OF ALL NATIONS.—THIRD SERIES.

CHAPTER VI.

THE TOILETTE IN HUNGARY.

THE dress worn by the better classes in most of the courts of Europe is swayed by the fashions of France and England; but the national costume of Hungary is well known to the lovers of the fancy ball, who often array themselves in its sable dress, with sleeves straight to the arms, and stays fastened in front with gold, pearl, or diamond buttons.

Lady Wortley Montague, in her "Letters," says: "The Hungarian lady's dress is beautiful; a gown of scarlet velvet lined and faced with sable, made exactly to fit her shape, the skirt falling to the feet. The sleeves are straight, the stays buttoned before with two rows of little buttons of gold, pearl, or diamonds. On their heads they wear a tassel of gold, that hangs low on one side, lined with sable or some other fine fur."

The dress of the female peasants is not so becoming. The hair in front is plaited tight, and joined to the back, which is likewise plaited, and hangs down behind, in the same manner as that of the Swiss peasants. The neck is covered with a white handkerchief, and a variegated body and petticoat, with a white apron, form the rest of the dress. The petticoat is worn short, to show the yellow leather boots, with low iron heels.

The Morlacchi, though belonging to Hungary, differ much in manners and appearance from the inhabitants of that country. The dress of the women is very remarkable. The unmarried females are very whimsical in respect to the ornaments of the head; but, when married, they are not allowed to wear anything but a handkerchief tied round it.

The girls wear a scarlet cap, to which they generally fasten a veil, which falls back over the shoulders; strings of silver coins, glass beads, shells, feathers, and artificial flowers, as well as tremulous plumes of glass, are all employed to ornament these caps, which, though singular in their appearance, are often not devoid of elegance. Their holiday shifts are embroidered with red silk, and sometimes with gold; these they work for themselves, while tending their flocks, and it is wonderful how well they are executed.

The use of stays is unknown, nor do they put whalebone or iron in their stomachers. A woollen girdle sustains the petticoat, which is commonly decked with shells, and of a blue color, whence it derives the name of modrina. The gown, which is made of serge, reaches to the ankle, and is bordered with red; it is called sadak. In summer the modrina is not worn, only the sadak without sleeves, and the shift. The girls always wear red stockings, and their shoes, or opantee, which somewhat resemble the cothurnus of the ancients, are made of undressed leather, and fasten with knotted thongs above the ankles. The unmarried women, even of the richest families, are not permitted to wear any other sort of shoe; but, after marriage, they are allowed to replace it by the Turkish slipper.

The girls keep their hair concealed under their caps, but the women wear it falling on their shoulders. Sometimes they tie it under the chin, and always have beads and coins twisted among it, in the Tartar fashion.

Both old and young women wear round their necks strings of various sized beads, and rings of silver, brass, and tin, on their fingers; they have bracelets of leather, covered with wrought tin or silver, and they embroider their stomachers or adorn them with beads and shells.

CHAPTER VII.

THE TOILETTE IN INDIA.

THE sweet, harmonious tinkling of golden anklets now invites us to repose under the shade of the sacred banyan, while the soft balmy breeze wafts towards us the elegant blossoms of the oleander, the myrtle, the jasmine, and "love's own creeper,"* in

* The calamata (called, by Linnaeus, Ipomoea) is the most beautiful of its order, both in the color and form of its leaves and flowers; its elegant blossoms are "celestial rosy red, Love's proper hue," and have justly procured it the name of calamata, or "love's creeper."—SIR W. JONES.

the land where

"Flow'rets and fruits blush over every stream."

where we may

"Gather the rich anana, India's pride
Of vegetable life; beyond what'er
The poets imaged of the golden age."

where the blue water-lilies bathe their azure blossoms in the crystal waves of the "Lake of Pearl," where whose sunny banks the bird of a "thousand songs" serenades his lovely rose, and where the ately elephant reposes under the shade of the high lmetto and the spreading tamarind. Such is the r-famed country of Hindostan—the land beneath whose bosom lie concealed the most precious jewels, and the beds of whose rivers teem with gold; while the fields, groves, and gardens are filled with the richest spices, and adorned with the loveliest flowers.

The costume of the Hindoo women is peculiarly becoming. It consists of a long piece of silk or cotton tied round the waist, and hanging in a graceful manner to the feet; it is afterwards brought over the body in negligent folds: under this they cover the bosom with a short waistcoat of satin, but wear no linen. Their long black hair is adorned with jewels and wreaths of flowers; their ears are bored in many places, and loaded with pearls; a variety of gold chains, strings of pearl, and precious stones, fall from the neck over the bosom, and the arms are covered with bracelets from the wrist to the elbow. They also have gold and silver chains round the ankles, and abundance of rings on their fingers and toes; among the former is often a small mirror. They perfume their hair with oil of cloves, cinnamon, sandal, mogreese, and sweet-scented flowers, and those who can afford it use the oil or otto of roses; they also make use of henna and antimony, like most other Eastern nations, to heighten their beauty.

The costume of the Mohammedans in India is much like that of the Hindoos, especially the turban, the long white gown, sash, and shoes; but, in addition, they wear full trowsers, usually of satin, with gold and silver flowers, and a catarra, or short dagger, in their girdle. The Mohammedan women adorn themselves with a variety of jewels, worn over a close gown of muslin, with long sleeves and a short waist; silk or satin drawers reach to the ankles, and a transparent veil covers the head.

When the Hindoos and Mohammedans are baptized into the Christian faith, the women lay aside their Eastern dress, and put on a jacket and petticoat; and the men wear as much of the European apparel as they can, with the exception of a coat and stockings, which are only worn on festivals and days of ceremony.

LE MELANGE.

CHAPTER I.

MORE EMPLOYMENTS FOR WOMEN MUCH NEEDED.

"I MUST confess, when I have seen so many of this sex, who have lived well in the time of their childhood, grievously exposed to many hardships and poverty upon the death of their parents, I have often wished there were more of the callings or employments of life appropriated to women, and that they were regularly educated in them, that there might be a better provision made for their support. What if all the garments which are worn by women were so limited and restrained in the manufacture of them that they should all be made only by their own sex? This would go a great way towards relief in this case. And what if some of the easier labors of life were reserved for them only?"—WATTS, vol. vii. p. 362.

EMPLOYMENTS OF WOMEN.

"Now for women—instead of laborious studies, they have curious needle-works, cut-works, spinning, bone-lace, and many pretty devices of their own making, to adorn their houses; cushions, carpets, chairs, stools (for she eats not the bread of idleness, Prov. xxxi. 27, quæssivit lanam et linum), confections, conserves, distillations, &c., which they show to strangers—

*Ipsa comes præseque operis venientibus ultro
Hospitibus monstrare solet, non segnitur horas
Contestata suas, sed nec sibi deperitisse.*

Which to her guests she shows, with all her pelf;
Thus far my maids, but this I did myself.

This they have to busy themselves about; household offices, &c.; neat gardens, full of exotic, versicolor, diversely varied; sweet-smelling flowers, and plants in all kinds, which they are most ambitious to get, curious to preserve and keep, proud to possess, and much many times brag of."—BURTON'S Anatomy of Melancholy, p. 282.

MISERIES OF IDLENESS.

"In a commonwealth where is no public enemy, there is likely civil wars, and they rage upon themselves; this body of ours, when it is idle, and knows not how to bestow itself, macerates and vexeth itself with cares, grief, false-fears, discontents, and suspicions; it tortures, and preys upon its own bowels, and is never at rest. Thus much I dare boldly say: be or she that is idle, be they of what condition they will, never so rich, so well allied, fortunate, happy, let them have all things in abundance, and felicity that heart can wish or desire, all contentment—so long as he or she or they are idle they shall never be pleased, never well in body and mind, but weary still, sickly still, vexed still, loathing still, weeping, sighing, grieving, suspecting, offended with the world, with every object, wishing themselves gone or dead, or else carried away with some foolish phantasy or other. And this is the true cause that so many great men, ladies, and gentlewomen labor of this disease in country and city: for idleness is an appendix to nobility; they count it a disgrace to work, and spend all their days in sports, recreations, and pastimes, and will therefore take no pains, be of no vocation; they feed liberally, fare well, want exercise, action, employment (for to work I say they may not abide), and company to their desires; and thence their bodies become full of gross humors, wind, crudities; their minds disquieted, dull, heavy, &c.; care, jealousy, fear of some disease, sullen fits, weeping fits, seize too familiarly on them. For what will not fear and phantasy work in an idle body?"—Ibid., p. 86.

DISAPPOINTMENT IN MARRIAGE.

"LISTEN, I pray you, to the stories of the disappointed in marriage:—collect all their complaints: hear their mutual reproaches; upon what fatal hinge do the greatest part of them turn?—'They were mistaken in the person.'—Some disguise either of body or mind is seen through in the first domestic scuffle:—some fair ornament—perhaps the very one which won the heart—the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit falls off. It is not the Rachel for whom I have served,—Why hast thou then beguiled me?

"Be open—be honest; give yourself for what you are; conceal nothing; varnish nothing; and if these fair weapons will not do, better not conquer at all than conquer for a day. When the night is passed, 'twill ever be the same story—And it came to pass, behold it was Leah!

"If the heart beguiles itself in its choice, and imagination will give excellencies which are not the portion of flesh and blood; when the dream is over, and we awake in the morning, it matters little whether 'tis Rachel or Leah—be the object what it will, as it must be on the earthly side, at least, of perfection—it will fall short of the work of fancy, whose existence is in the clouds.

"In such cases of deception, let not man exclaim, as Jacob does in his—What is it thou hast done unto me?—for 'tis his own doings, and he has nothing to lay his fault on but the heat and poetic indiscretion of his own passions."—STERNE'S Sermons, vol. iv. p. 11.

PLEASURE GROUNDS.—THEIR MORAL APPLICATION.

"THEY enter a spacious lawn, which lay opposite to the house, and opened itself in the form of an expanded fan. The mounds, on either side, were dressed in verdure, and ran out in a slanting direction. The whole, to an eye placed at a distance, bore the resemblance of a magnificent vista, contracting, by slow degrees, its dimensions, and lessening, at last, into a point; which the regular and graceful seat, with all imaginable dignity, supplied.

"Nature had sunk the lawn into a gentle decline, on whose ample sides were oxen browsing and lambs frisking. The lusty droves lowed as they passed; and the thriving flocks bleated welcome music in their master's ear. Along the midst of this verdant slope was stretched a spacious and extensive walk, which, coated with gravel, and fenced with palisades, looked like a plain stripe of brown, intersecting a carpet of the brightest green. At the bottom, two handsome canals, copiously stocked with fish, sometimes floated to the breeze; sometimes stood unmoved, 'pure as the expanse of heaven.' The waters, beheld from every room in the house, had a fine effect upon the sight; not without a refreshing influence on the imagination. At the extremity of one was planted a stately colonnade; the roof elevated on pillars of the Ionic order; the area slabbed with stones, neatly ranged in the diamond fashion. Several forest-chairs accommodated the anglers with a seat, while the bending dome supplied them with a shade.

"Corresponding, and on the margin of the other canal, was erected a summer-house of a very singular kind. The lower part had an opening towards the north; it was cool; it was gloomy; and had never seen the sun. It carried the romantic air of a grotto, or rather the pensive appearance of a hermit's cell. The outside was coarse and rugged with protuberant stones. Partly overspread with ivy, partly covered with moss, it seemed to be the work of ancient years. You descend by steps of turf, and are obliged to stoop as you pass the door. A scanty iron grate, with certain narrow slits in the wall, transmits a glimmering light, just sufficient to discover the inner structure, which appears like one continued piece of rock-work; a cavern cut from the surrounding quarry. Above, hung an irregular arch, with an aspect that seemed to presage a fall, and more than seemed to alarm the stranger. Below, lay a paving of homely pebbles; in some places a little furrowed, as though it had been worn by the frequent tread of solitary feet. All around, were rusticity and solemnity; solemnity never more visibly seen than through a gloom. The furniture, of the same grotesque fashion with the apartment. A bench hewed, you would suspect, by Nature's chisel, out of the solid stone. A sort of couch, composed of swelling moss and small fibrous roots. From one corner trickled a pure spring, which crept, with a bubbling moan, along the channeled floor, till its current was collected into a basin, rudely scooped from the ground. On the edge of this little receptacle lay chained a rusty bowl; and over it stood an antique worm-eaten table. On the least obscure part of the wall you discern, dimly discern, a parchment scroll, inscribed with that sage, but mortifying admonition, 'VANITY OF VANITIES! ALL IS VANITY!'

"Over this recess, so pleasingly horrid, and adapted to solemn musings, arose an open and airy belvedere. You ascend by winding stairs, and, coming from the uncouth abode below, are sweetly surprised with an elegant hexagon; the ceiling lofty, and decorated with the softest, richest, almost flowing fretwork. The wainscot, in large panels of oak, retained its native auburn; so beautifully plain, that, like an amiable countenance, it would have been disfigured, rather than improved, by the most costly paint. On this were disposed, in gilded frames and to great advantage, a variety of entertaining landscapes. But none surpassed, none equaled, all were a foil to the noble, lovely views which the windows commanded. The chimney-piece, of white shining marble, streaked with veins of vivid red. Over it, was carved a fine festoon of artificial: in it, was ranged a choice collection of natural flowers. On a table of glossy walnut, lay a portable telescope, attended with 'Thomson's Seasons,' and 'Vanierii Prædium Rusticum.'

"The whole was fitted up in the highest taste, and furnished with every pleasurable ornament. On purpose to harmonize with that lavish gayety which seemed to smile over all the face of Nature. On purpose to correspond with that vernal delight, which came breathing on the wings of every fragrant gale. I may add, on purpose to remind the beholder of those immortal mansions, which are decorated with images infinitely more splendid, with objects unspeakably more glorious. Where Holy Beings will spend, not a few vacant hours in refined amusement, but a boundless eternity in the consummation of joy. For, to a well-turned mind Nature is a preceptor; and these are her instructive lessons. To the pure in heart, even sense is edifying; and these are its delicate moralities.

"The redundant waters of the canal rolled off in a spreading cascade; which, tumbling from many a little precipice, soothed the air with a symphony of soft and gurgling sounds. Nor ever intermitted the obliging office—

From morn to noon, from noon to dewy eve.

But, when the fanning breezes dropt their wings; when the feathered choir were hushed in sleep; when not so much as a chirping grasshopper was heard throughout the meads; this liquid instrument still played its solo, still pursued its busy way, and warbled, as it flowed, melodious murmurs."—HENRY'S Dialogues, vol. i. p. 314.

A CHAPTER ON WATCHES.

BY MRS. WHITE.

WE have no means of telling how long a period elapsed from that primal time when the "evening and the morning made the first day," ere man's ingenuity devised a means of calculating the passing by of those precious moments of which his duration is composed, in order to economize them to the purposes of life.

Shadows by day and stars at night appear to have indexed the flight of time for the ancient Hebrews; though it is very evident that, long before the sundial of Ahas was made memorable by the prophet Isaiah, the Chaldeans, accustomed to calculate eclipses, and other astronomical phenomena, must have been in possession of some much more accurate instrument for its computation.

Days, months, and years are constantly referred to in the books of the Old Testament, but nothing is said of more minute divisions of time, save that of the day into the natural ones of morning, noon, eventide, and night, until Judea became tributary to Rome, when three of the Evangelists, in describing the crucifixion, and the supernatural darkness subsequent to that event, remark that it lasted from the sixth hour to the ninth; and it is on record, that the clepsydra, or water-clock (said by Vitruvius to have been invented by one Ctesibius of Alexandria, in the reign of Ptolemy Evergetes), was introduced at Rome by P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica, in the 595th year of the city, and consequently many years before the birth of Christ.

This simple time-keeper was so constructed that the water issued drop by drop through a hole in the vessel, and fell into another, in which a light floating body marked the height of the water as it rose, and by this means the time that had elapsed.

These instruments, we are told, were set full of water in the courts of judicature, and by them the lawyers pleaded; in order, as Phavorinus tells us, to prevent babbling, and cause those who spoke to be brief in their speeches.

Hour, or sand-glasses, are also said to have originated at Alexandria, and to have been introduced into domestic use amongst the Romans eight years afterwards, or 158 years before the Christian era.

The earliest attempt at measuring time in this country appears to have been on the part of Alfred the Great by means of waxen tapers. The exact period when those direct ancestors of our subject, clocks, or, as they were primitively called, horologes, came into use, is one of those things over which time has cast so thick a veil, that not even the researches of the encyclopedists can penetrate it. By some, the invention of clocks with wheels is ascribed to Pacificus, archdeacon of Verona, as early as the ninth century. And though we read that clocks (without water) were set up in churches toward the end of the twelfth, the author of the "Divine Commedia" is the first writer on record who distinctly applies the term horologium to a clock that struck the hours; and he was born 1265, and died 1321.

In 1288, during the reign of Edward the First, the English Justinian, as he has been called, it is said that a fine levied on a lord chief justice was applied to the purpose of furnishing the famous clock-house near Westminster Hall with an horologe, which it is farther stated was the work of an English artist.

Mention is also made of the setting up of a clock in Canterbury Cathedral about the same period, and in that of Wells in 1325. So that those three Dutch horologists from Delft, who came over (as Rymmer tells us) at the invitation of Edward III. in 1368, were not, as some imagined, the introducers of the art, though they very possibly helped us to improve it. Up to the time when Henry de Wio astonished the Emperor Charles V. with those seemingly living toys with which he was wont to surround himself after dinner, and watch the beating and revolving of their curious machinery, those rude prototypes of our subject, which are said to have resembled small table clocks rather than watches, and yet were true specimens we imagine, since they continued going in an horizontal position, which is the only mechanical distinction between a watch and clock—up to this period, we were about to say, clocks appear to have endured a very ascetic existence, living in tall houses built on purpose for them, or shut up in church towers and monastic buildings—

"Fell sickener* was his crowning in his logs,
As is a clock, or any abbey orloge," wrote Chaucer in the fourteenth century. And it is not until nearly the end of the fifteenth that we find them domesticated in houses.

From a description of some, which appear in an inventory of articles in the king's palaces of Westminster and Hampton Court, copied by Strutt, the pendules of the period must have been equally ornate with those in modern drawing-rooms, and much more curious.

Thus one, we are told, not only showed the course of the planets, and the days of the year, but was richly gilt, and enameled and ornamented with the king's (Henry the Eighth's) coat of arms; it also possessed a chime.

* Sickerness—steady, secure.

Speaking of this monarch reminds us that, previous to the scattering of the treasures of Strawberry Hill, there was preserved in the library there a little clock, of silver gilt, the gift of Henry on the morning of his marriage to the ill-fated Anne Boleyn. It was elaborately chased and engraved, and adorned with fleurs-de-lys, and other heraldic devices, and had on the top a lion supporting the arms of England.

The gilded weights represented true lovers' knots, enclosing the initials of Henry and Anne; and one bore the inscription, "The most happye," the other the royal motto.

Though more than three hundred years had passed since the tragic ending of time with its original possessor, it was still going when the ivory hammer of the famous Robins struck it down to another new and more fortunate owner.

About this period, watches are said to have been in use; and in the Holbein chamber of the collection just mentioned, a bust of the royal wife-slayer, carved in box-wood, represented him with a dial suspended on his breast. The earliest watch known was one in Sir Ashton Lever's Museum, which bore date 1541; but from various imperfections in the workmanship they were not very generally used till towards the end of Elizabeth's reign.

Shakspeare frequently mentions the clock, and in "Twelfth Night" he makes Malvolio exclaim, in his babblings of fancied greatness—"While I, perchance, wind up my watch, or play with some rich jewel," an expression that would lead us to suppose that they were even then regarded rather as toys or ornaments than things of necessary use.

Archbishop Parker, in 1575, left by will to the Bishop of Ely his staff of Indian cane, with a watch in the top of it; a position that savors more of whim than utility. Yet the excellence of some of these ancient time-keepers is remarkable, for Derham, in his "Artificial Clockmaker," mentions a watch of Henry VIII., which was in order in 1714, and of which Dr. Demanbray had often heard Sir Isaac Newton and Demoivre speak; and the old wooden-framed clock of Peterborough Cathedral, which, instead of the usual key or winch, is wound up by long handles or spikes—a sufficient proof of its antiquity—still strikes, says Denison, upon a bell of considerable size.

Guy Fawkes carried a watch in a more practical spirit, than Malvolio or Archbishop Parker; Stowe tells us, one was found upon him which he and Percy had bought the day before, "to try conclusions for the long and short burning of the touch-wood with which he had prepared to give fire to the train of powder;" a proof that even in the third year of the reign of James I. watches were not commonly worn, or the circumstance would not have been mentioned.

In the next reign, however, we find the London "Clockmakers' Company," incorporated 1631—a sign of the increased use of these instruments, and the growing importance of their manufacture; and, as this charter prohibits the importation of clocks, watches, and alarms, it proves that we had even then artists sufficiently skilful in the various manipulations requisite in the construction of these articles, to render us independent of foreign workmanship.

It is a singular feature in the history of this branch of art, that it has remained until very lately concentrated in the metropolis; besides which, Liverpool and Coventry are said to be the only places in England where a complete watch can be manufactured. At the latter place the business has only been introduced since the commencement of the present century, but the number of persons employed are said to equal the number in London.

But before passing from this event in the history of our subject (the incorporation of a company for the protection of their manufacture in the reign of Charles I.), we may as well describe a watch of the period, which a few years before the publication of the "Encyclopædia Londinensis" (in 1811) had been in the possession of the proprietor. It was dug up but a few years previously, near the site of the ancient castle of Winchester, where it had probably lain from the time of Cromwell, who it is well known destroyed that edifice. It was of an octagon form, and had no minute hand; a piece of catgut supplied the place of a chain; it required winding up every twelve hours, had no balance-spring, and appeared never to have had one; and it shut like a hunting-watch without any glass.

But to compensate for this interior rudeness in its construction, the lid and bottom of the case, as well as the dial-plate, were of silver, very neatly engraved, with pieces of Scripture history in the centre, and in the compartment the four Evangelists, and St. Peter, St. Paul, St. James, and St. Jude; it had no date.

The reign of Charles II., who (like his namesake, the emperor, in whose time they first appeared) is said to have been very partial to these instruments, was remarkable for the improvements made in them. Spring pocket-watches were invented by Hooke, 1658; and repeaters were introduced, one of the first of which Charles sent as a present to Louis XIV. of France.

According to some authorities, reproduced would would be the juster phrase here, for it is stated, in "Memoirs of Literature," that some of the most ancient watches were strikers, and that such having been stolen both from Charles V. and Louis XI. whilst they were in a crowd, the thief was detected by their striking the hour!

Perhaps the most remarkable repeating watch extant is that in the Academy of Sciences at St. Petersburg, and which, like the old Nuremberg watches, is about the size of an egg; within is represented the holy sepulchre, with the sentinels, and the stone at the mouth; and while the spectator is admiring this curious piece of mechanism, the stone is suddenly removed, the sentinels drop down, the angels appear, the women enter the tomb, and the same chant is heard which is performed in the Greek Church on Easter Eve.

Germany, by the way, has always been famous for the manufacture of clocks and watches, these latter claiming Nuremberg for their birthplace; and from this circumstance, and their oval shape, Dopplemayer tells us they were originally known as Nuremberg animated eggs.

At present this branch of horometry is chiefly to be found on the other side of the Alps, at or near Geneva, and at Chaux de Fond, in the principality of Neuchâtel, where vast numbers of watches are manufactured. But the wooden clocks, which tick on every cottage wall, and which are erroneously called Dutch, are in fact German, and are nearly all made in the Black Forest, the village of Freyburg being the centre of the manufacture, whence it is said 180,000 wooden clocks on an average are yearly exported.

The Swiss, or Geneva watches, as they are commonly called, owing to the poverty of the workmen, the employment of women, and the subdivision of labor, which is carried to even a greater extent than with us, sell at a much lower price than those made in England; but an English watch has hitherto been a desideratum in every part of the world.

At present, the term watchmaker is no longer applicable, every portion of the instrument being the work of a different artisan, and the separate parts are often sent hundreds of miles, to meet in the metropolis, and make a whole of excellent workmanship.

In London, Clerkenwell Green has long been the resort of artificers employed in the various nice and delicate manipulations requisite in the construction of our subject; here, slide-makers, jewellers, motion-makers, wheel-cutters, cap-makers, dial-plate makers, the painter, the case-maker, the joint-finisher, the pendent-maker, the engraver, the piercer, the escape-maker, the spring-maker, the chain-maker, the finisher, the glider, the fusee-cutter, the hand-maker, the glass-maker, and pendulum spring wire-drawer, are all located; for, owing to the minute division of labor, which tends greatly to facilitate its execution after the movements (which have previously passed through thirteen workmen's hands in the provinces) are received in town, the watch progresses through those of these other twenty-one artificers before it comes forth complete.

Owing to this delicate and varied workmanship, materials originally not worth sixpence are frequently converted into watches worth a hundred pounds and more, so costly may their appendages be made. But in all these different branches of a business which maintains thousands of families, the only part of it which falls to women in this country is the polishing of the cases, which the case-maker's wives are sometimes employed to do.

Perhaps no object of man's ingenuity has been made the exponent of so many grave morals as the watch. Poets and philosophers have managed that its beatings should be only a little less gloomy to the imagination than the associations of a passing bell; but Paley has thrown a glory round this gloom, and aggrandised it from a peevish reminder of passing time into a fair argument of a Creator's presence, in the delicate and wonderful machinery of nature, which could no more come by chance (as men blinded by folly have occasionally asserted) than could this little instrument have been formed without a contriver.

What the author of the "Old Church Clock" has said of that branch of our subject may be equally applied to this—"there is no dead thing so like a living one." Day by day, year by year, its iron heart throbs on, some of them surviving, as we have seen, for centuries, though they are said to beat 17-160 times in an hour. Well would it be for us if the time-keeper in our bosoms, beating momentarily the escape of our allotted term, acted as lightly on the frame; but all its emotions help to wear this out.

In the dawn of its appearance, in an age when every science that set men wondering was in some degree regarded as the work of magic, what a sensation must these "animated eggs" have occasioned, and how suggestive! unless the fanciful belief of some of the early fathers of the church, who averred that gems and precious metals were first made known to mortals by fallen angels, who also inspired the desire to profit by, and be adorned with them, had anything to do with the tabooring of evil by holy signatures—how suggestive are the quaint gravings of saints and scriptural subjects on the cover of the watch dug up at Winchester, of the antique custom of inscribing trinkets with sacred symbols, and so converting them into amulets; a custom which the Greeks and Romans borrowed from the Egyptians, and which the early Christians perpetuated after them.

We have seen the watch, originally oval, take an octagon form; after which it appears to have subsided into its present shape, the only variation being in size, and different degrees of roundness.

At present watches are frequently made not thicker than a crown piece, and yet perform their functions with exactness; nay, there are some with perfect works, compressed into a smaller compass than a shilling! A friend of the writer's saw one, not long since, set in a ring, the hands and figures being composed of brilliants, upon a dial of blue enamel; and at the recent World's Exhibition one filled the place usually occupied by a seal at the end of a pencil-case, and another appeared as an appendage to a lady's bracelet. There was also a large silver watch, such as mariners are fond of wearing, immersed in a vase of water, and yet impervious to any ill effects.

Our subject is one which grows under our hands, and we might go on ad libitum describing their different idiosyncrasies; for watches, like individuals, have their several temperaments and ways of going. We have all met with fast watches and slow ones, and some (a disposition they are apt to contract from their wearers) are very irregular—varieties of character, which so puzzled their first owner, the Emperor Charles V., who amused himself on his retirement to the monastery of St. John, by endeavoring to keep in order these bygone companions of his dinner-table, that they produced a reflection on the absurdity of his attempts to keep together the powers of Europe, when even these little pieces of mechanism baffled him.

RUTH NORTON'S TRIAL OF PATIENCE.

BY ALICE B. KEAL.

"The short and simple annals of the poor."

AND what possible interest can they have for any of the city belles who take up the "Lady's Book"—we are writing with especial reference to its pages—to while away ten minutes waiting for a carriage, or perhaps the altering of a dress at a milliner's?

Very true; we were not thinking of them at this moment. We do not know that we ever cater especially to their morbid, yet stimulated tastes. The magazines are to them like any others of the hosts of their fashionable acquaintances, to be met by a smile and a bow, a languid "Is that you?" five minutes' attention, possibly interest, and then entire forgetfulness. But when we sit down quietly, with a sad or graceful incident to relate, to stir the deeps of human sympathy, or have an hour's cheerful conversation, we think of those far away homes where there is time to "love and to cherish" pleasant associations, where amusement is the relaxation, and not the end of existence; for there we know the charm of a new magazine, with its fresh cover and choice engravings, its tales and its poems, is fully appreciated. It is looked for; it is talked over; it is remembered. And in these home circles we find healthy tastes, that can enjoy the ballad style, if we may so call it, of sketches embodying simple, everyday incidents.

City life is not confined to the bright shops of a fashionable promenade; to the mansions in which are centered all that luxury and taste can invent; to the crowded assembly, or the brilliant concert-room. There is strong vitality beneath all this, as much of human love in all the tenderness of its first romance, or the strength of its long suffering, as much of earnest hope, and much more of simple faith; faith that is the virtue of the religion of the poor, even as charity becomes the creed of the devout among the rich. We do not speak of abject poverty, though of this there is much to tell; incidents that brighten the sombre garb which it ever wears, beautiful self-denial that would shame the careless indulgence of the wealthy, and fortitude that they could scarcely realize, much less imitate. There are those whom we call poor, who yet do not "lack or suffer hunger;"

they are born, and live, and die in obscurity, but not in actual want.

I have sometimes wondered, thridding the narrow streets in which these homes congregate, whether, after all, their existence is not more real than that of those who pity or scorn them; whether many a surfeited rich man might not envy them the vividness of their simple pleasures; and, God help them! their sorrows are not less keen. But if you do not shrink, in your rustling garments, from entering one of these lowly homes, we may find they have also their romance, or, at least, their vicissitudes of love and happiness.

It is a street within a street, a narrow court, bounded on all sides by brick and mortar; yet, shut out as it is from the sweet air and sunshine, it is cleanly, and even neat. And here we find our hero.

"Home in good season, mother;" and the loud, clear voice goes ringing up into the little chamber where Ruth Norton is stitching away on store work, that ought to have been done early in the day. But she was tired sitting up last night for James, he came in so late now, and she could never bear to let him find the fire out and the room empty. It was her way, she said, to keep him from bad company, and it seemed to have succeeded very well; for, whether it was a gay oyster supper at some humble restaurant, or a game of cards with a friend, James always remembered she was waiting for him, and had a tolerably steady hand to raise the latch, and an amusing recital of the evening's adventures for the patient and cheerful listener, his widowed mother.

Ruth Norton made her appearance with the vest she was just finishing off hanging over her arm, and her spectacles pushed back upon her cap. She was a quick, active little body, not over-tidy in her dress, perhaps, but then "she never had time to attend to these things." James was making good wages, it was true, but he was generous to a fault, and was always spending on his companions; for, like all other generous natures, he was social, and liked merry fellows about him. So Ruth took care of the house, "and earned just a bit by tailoring" for her own clothes, but which oftener went for family expenses than James, in his careless good nature, was aware of.

"Oh, is that my best vest, mother?" said he, throwing down the pile of kindlings he always brought home from the workshop in a snug place behind the stove. "I forgot to tell you it wants a button; and it'll have to come in play to-night, for there'll be a grand frolic at Tom Lane's wedding, and I'm 'specially invited."

"So it is; dear me, I'd quite forgot it was to come off so soon; but he's a nice, steady young man, and I hope he'll get a good wife. A good wife's the making of most men, in my opinion. Set on the tea kettle, Jemmy dear, and you shall soon have your supper. I hope you'll be bringing home a daughter to me, one of these days."

"Not I, mother; 'liberty for me,' as the play says. I haven't sown my wild oats yet."

"The sooner the better," was the ready answer of his mother, who seemed to think it was not quite politic to press the matter any farther just now, and bustled about to set on the tea things; while James, at his toilet overhead, sang snatches of gay sea songs, for he added a good natural voice to his other advantages.

No wonder his mother was proud of him, as he came down in that most picturesque of costumes, known as "shirt sleeves," to claim the renovated vest; and, closing it about his fine figure as he tried the new button, drew himself up to his full six feet height, and shook back the clustering hair from his brown face, gay with good-tempered cheerfulness, and brightened when he smiled by teeth that many a man of fashion might have envied. There was a certain natural grace in his movements; and, as he often assured his mother, he could dance with the best of them until three o'clock any morning. No wonder, moreover, that, with these social qualities, his mother should be anxious to see him "well settled," knowing, as she did, the constant temptations to which they exposed him.

"Now don't be very late to-night, James," said the proud little woman, holding the light as high as she could reach, that she might see whether all was right, and, in reality, to indulge the fondness of her motherly eyes with a last glance of admiration. "I shall want to know all about it, and how the bride looked, and what she had on. Be sure to bring home a piece of the cake to dream on; and don't drink the bride's health too often."

"Never fear, old lady; and I'm bound to dance with the prettiest girl in the room, you may be sure. Don't sew too hard, or sit up after one; for maybe we'll be late." He patted her on the shoulder as he said this, a caress of which he was very fond, and which conveyed a great deal more affection than one would have supposed. She understood it; and, still proud and happy, went back to

"clear up," as she called it, and then to finish the promised vest.

But Ruth Norton's tidying would not have pleased the most fastidious; indeed, it was the only point on which James ever ventured a remonstrance. He had a habit of order that was rather troubled by the crowd of boxes and baskets, combs, clothes-pins, and an innumerable catalogue of sundries, with which she somehow contrived to litter the mantels, tables, and chairs. She knew that it troubled him, and often tried to reform; but her organ of order had never been developed in childhood, and old habits still clung to her.

She sat stitching quietly for a long time; and, when the vest was finished and folded up, snuffed the candle so that it sent a cheery blaze through the room, and, drawing the old-fashioned stand, with its thin, crooked stem and claw-feet, nearer to the fire, took up her favorite volume to pass away the interval until her son's return. Her Bible, her hymn-book, and Pilgrim's Progress, in their worn leathern bindings, always lay together on the bureau; and now she was soon engaged in reading, for the hundredth time at least, the story of Christian in Doubting Castle. It was a part of the wonderful narrative which she liked best of all, if we may except the sojourn in Vanity Fair. That, she said, always reminded her of the great Book of Martyrs she used to read when a little girl, visiting her grandfather's in the country. But Giant Despair was more like the wonderful stories her grandmother used to tell her, after she was in bed, in the old garret-room, with its huge, dark rafters and strings of dried fruit and seed corn.

As yet, she had but a faint glimmering of the beautiful truth enveloped in this garb of romance; but it interested her, and had served to beguile many an hour of watchfulness. But the key of promise had been discovered, and the door had creaked on its dismal hinges, and the prisoners went rejoicing on their way, and still she was there alone. Gradually the candle grew dimmer, and the cheerful song of the fire more indistinct, the book closed over the spectacles she had taken off to polish, and she had fallen into a very comfortable reverie. As usual, it was about James: what great reason she had to be proud of him; how truthful and honest he had always been. Then their last conversation mingled in the bright web she was weaving for his future, and she thought how pleasant it would be to have a good, tidy, industrious little daughter come home some day, who would make James happy and keep the house cheerful, and be company for herself. She could but confess that she was a little lonesome now and then, and she was not so young and active as she once was. We are not sure but a vision of "wee toddlin' things," who should cling to her knee and beg for her spectacles, rose in the distance; but it could not have been very well defined, for her hands sank down into her lap, and she was taking a nap comfortably in the old-fashioned, high-backed rocking-chair.

She certainly had not intended to go to sleep and let the light burn down and the fire go out, before James came home; but these three things happened, and she woke with a start, and a chilled, uncomfortable sensation, to hear him turning the lock. At first, she thought it must be her drowsiness that made his voice sound so strange and hoarse; but, when she had lighted another candle, his face was so pale and haggard, his whole manner so excited, that she could scarcely ask the reason. He did not keep her long in suspense. He had been too much accustomed to find ready sympathy in her love, to conceal the cause of this sudden change. He threw himself down wearily on the floor at her feet, and said, in a tone of utter despondency—

"I 've ruined us all, mother!"

"Oh, James! James! what do you mean?"

"Just what I say. I didn't mind you, and I drank too much, and got excited; and then they dared me to it—and"—

"What, Jimmy dear?" She scarcely dared to fill the pause he had made; sudden thoughts of robbery, and even murder, darted through her mind.

"I was married, before them all, to a girl I have never seen before to-night. I thought it was a joke; but it's not; for Tom Lane's uncle was an alderman. I thought they were joking all the while; but he says it's real, and her brother says so, and swears I must take her home and take care of her, for she's more than he can manage; and, of course, no one can marry her now. Oh, mother! mother! what shall I do?"

There was a weight lifted at first from the heart of poor Ruth; but these last words had brought the reality of the misfortune before her.

"Is there things against her, Jimmy?"

"Nobody would tell me anything about her, except that they laughed and joked; and I heard Nat Jones say, 'What a take in!' and I struck him in the face. We were all standing in the hall then, with her brother, for he was the foremost one to put me up to it; and I was almost crazy with the thought of what I had done. Somebody parted us, and said it was 'too bad!' and she came flying out—they were all dancing yet—and I heard her call out, 'Where's my husband? to go off and leave his bride!' I don't believe she knows yet; but it sounded so light and forward, and I dashed away from them; and I've been walking about the street ever since, feeling as though I should go crazy."

He wiped his forehead, still beaded with perspiration from the excitement of feeling and his quick, hurried walk. His mother did not know what counsel to offer, and only held his hand, and looked down into his face as if she did not yet comprehend it.

"I noticed her when I first went into the room," James said again, as if it was a relief to talk. "She was one of the bridesmaids, and dressed elegantly, and danced better than anybody in the room. And Tom Lane said I must dance with her. And, it seems, she had been told about me, and had made a bet to flirt with me; and then they joked us at supper, and I wasn't going to be outdone, and called her my sweetheart, and said fifty silly things; and so they said two weddings were better than one, and dared us to be married on the spot. She laughed and said yes, and I thought it was good fun, and so I was married; and now it can't be helped, they all say. It makes me almost hate her every time I think of it, if she knew, to marry a man she knew nothing about, and had never seen in her life before. And I was so happy and light-hearted when I went off, and now I feel as if I was twenty years older. What shall I do, mother? Tell me."

"Go to bed now, Jimmy dear, and we will talk it over in the morning. Perhaps it will turn out a trick, after all; or maybe she's heard about you, and loves you"—the fond mother could have understood that, and forgiven her—"and she may make you a good wife, after all; who knows? But go to bed now, for you're all worn out, and you'll be sick. Come, do now, Jimmy."

He went up to the little room by the side of her own to please her; but she heard him walking up and down unsteadily, until she fell into an uneasy slumber.

It was, as James had said, a reality; and, more than all, the brother and the young bride had both known it; and now they were obliged to act, for the brother, with a heartless indifference, had refused to support her any longer "in her idle ways, when he could come on James Norton by law for it, and he must make the best of a bad bargain." This last pithy aphorism was all the comfort any one had to offer him, even his patient old mother, on whom the worst seemed to fall, the constant sight of her son's unhappiness, and the introduction of a stranger into the household, who seemed neither to know nor care how much trouble she gave, or how unwelcome she was.

She came home to them after the end of a week, apparently thinking they should be compensated for all by the honor of her presence. Ruth had done her best to make the house look bright and cheerful, but the plain, old-fashioned furniture seemed to Ellen a poor exchange for the showy mahogany veneering of her brother's parlor, and the worn out old piano, on which she had learned to drum a few marches and quicksteps, her chief accomplishment.

She was idle and vain, and, of course, selfish; the worst faults of her nature having been encouraged by the alternate flattery and threats of her brother, and sister-in-law, a weak, not to say wicked, woman. She missed the excitement of dances and balls, to which she had been always accustomed. James had no heart to go, and, indeed, shrank from appearing anywhere with her. Her chief amusement and employment seemed to be a review of her large stock of finery, visiting her old friends, girls as giddy and as frivolous as herself, or sitting, attired in a thin, showy silk, her hair adorned with flowers or wax beads, at the front window, watching the few passers-by.

It was a dreary change in that once contented little household. Ruth did her best. She bore the impertinence and carelessness of her daughter-in-law without complaint; she tried, in her quiet way, to make her as comfortable as she could, sharing her room, her drawers, and even her clothes with her; for, with all the finery, she had not comfortable garments for the inclement season that had now set in. James seemed utterly broken in spirit. He never sang or whistled cheerfully, as had been his wont when he came home from his work; their meals were eaten in silence when Ellen was present, or with desponding complaints, when she was paying some gay visit. He avoided her in every way, never addressing her when he could escape it, or sitting down for a talk, or to read to his mother, if she was going to pass the evening at home. Sometimes he seemed like himself, when he found a cheerful fire and his mother waiting for him; but oftener he came home with a clouded brain and disturbed temper, too plain tokens that his troubles were driving him into bad company.

And yet his fault had been one that is frequently committed. We hear of such things often, even in more polished circles than that we are describing. A party, a picnic, a wedding, and some thoughtless young creature has married a man she has never met before, and of whose temper and principles she knows nothing. It is the old adage of marrying in haste to repent at leisure, and unhappy differences are sure to follow. Does not this come, in a measure, from the light and jesting way in which it is too much the habit of young people to speak of this most serious step, as if it were the frolic of a day, instead of a solemn bond for life? So they rush into connections and responsibilities, of the import of which they have scarcely dreamed.

It was hardest, we have said, on poor Ruth; that is, the everyday recurring perplexities were more wearying, perhaps, than the unwelcome bonds, which the young people, as yet, had only chafed at. Ellen would gladly have gone back to her brother's home, but that was closed to her, he only saying it was her own fault, and not his, if she did not get along well with her husband. So she would come back, her eyes swollen with crying, more sullen and disagreeable than ever; and the mother was obliged to bear with it, while her son's altered habits were almost breaking her heart, and his wife grew daily more disagreeable to her as the cause of it. Her faith was sadly put to the test in these dark days; but she read her Bible and the Pilgrim's Progress more and more, now beginning to comprehend the harsh imprisonment of her favorite hero in the dungeon of Doubting Castle.

She was sitting, in a silent, downcast mood, one afternoon, when a light rap at the door was followed by the sunshine of a face that plainly told of peace and inward happiness. Years ago—five years now since the good woman had bought the black bombazine, still her Sunday dress—Ruth had lost a daughter, a bright, cheerful girl of fifteen, just beginning to be "all the world to her." She died of lingering illness, her life wasting away, hour by hour, it seemed; and, to the last, her bedside was cheered, and the lonely mother comforted, by the visits of Martha's Sunday School teacher, who had first led her to think of another home, where there would be no pain or weariness. Since then, the teacher had never forgotten her older pupil, who had learned more of the life to come, than ever before, at her daughter's bedside; and this was the unexpected, but most welcome visitor.

"Oh, is it you, Miss Lewis? It's a long time since you have been to see me. I was most afraid, indeed, you would never come again," Ruth said, eagerly, as she pushed some work from a chair, and dusted it with her apron.

"You could not have thought I should forget you, Ruth?" Miss Lewis said, in a pleasant, friendly voice. "But have you been sick this winter? Why did you not let me know it? You look so thin and downcast. I hope there's nothing the matter with James?"

It needed little sympathy to draw forth the troubles of poor Ruth; and she had a most interested and patient listener.

"But are you sure she doesn't love James?" she said. "Love works wonders sometimes, you know; and she may be a comfort yet."

"God forgive me, if I'm wrong saying it, Miss Lewis, but I don't believe she'll be anything but a torment to us—and James breaking his heart from morning till night. I tried to be good to her, and would be a mother to her; but she'll ruin my boy, my only comfort since poor Martha died."

"But, you know, good came even out of that great sorrow, Mrs. Norton, as you have told me a thousand times. He who sends us trials can make them end in blessings: the key of promise, don't forget that; and, besides, I'm a great believer in the law of kindness. Unless she is utterly unworthy, James must, in time, win her."

"I'm afraid I'm not always kind," poor Ruth said, self-reproachfully; "sometimes it's so hard to put up with, and I fret a bit, and then she's quick tempered, and so it goes. She's up there now, I dare say, braiding her hair, or fixing up her neck ribbons; it's all she does from morning till night."

"But do you ever ask her to help you? I should think there was a great deal she might do; and James likes to see things look tidy."

"True enough, he does;" and here a sigh followed the glance around the disorderly room. "But I can hardly get time to have his meals ready now. If it was real God-sent trouble, I shouldn't mind it so much."

"But it certainly seems to be so," Miss Lewis answered. "All troubles are given us to try our strength. Take this as a trial of your patience, Ruth, as Martha's death proved your faith. It will never do for James to see you give up."

Miss Lewis did not know, as she returned to her own elegant home, the good seed that had been sown with her words of cheer. It is true, she felt happy in the thought that she had exerted some little self-denial to pay the visit, and that Ruth had been glad to see her. If more women in an elevated sphere of life comprehended the weight of influence that they carry to the humbler classes of society, more such visits—passing missions of mercy—would be paid. The very air of refinement and intelligence, the judgment that is so relied on, when advice is given, or it may be the momentary association with one who has time to cherish taste and beauty, which they admire all the more that it is placed so far from them, is like a ray of sunshine in the dimness of their seclusion; and, when to this is added an earnest human love, made earnest by a chastened heart, we can scarcely calculate how much good may arise from the words of counsel or comfort thus spoken.

As it was, Ruth went more cheerfully about the next day's task, taking "patience" for her talisman; and, when she recollected what Miss Lewis had asked her, she forced herself to take some notice of the poor girl, who, from her heart, she pitied.

"You have never told me anything about your mother, Ellen," she said, as, in her usual idle way, the girl was sitting with folded hands by the window.

It was a chance touch; but it proved the right one. It did not seem so at first, however, for the only answer was a sullen stare, as if astonished at hearing herself voluntarily addressed. But Ruth did not seem to notice this, and went on questioning her, until she was rewarded by seeing a more amiable expression than usual brighten the really beautiful eyes; and afterwards, when she laid aside her work and rose to set the dinner-table, Ellen, for the first time, offered to assist her. This was done a little awkwardly, and not quite so cheerfully as Ruth could have wished; and she was a little surprised, when she commended Ellen for her assistance, to hear her say, "Don't tell him, though," as sulkily as before.

From that small beginning matters seemed to mend. It is true, James and Ellen were no better friends. She returned his indifference with absolute dislike, it seemed, and they avoided each other as much as before; but, when he was away, she was sociable, and willing to do anything she could for his mother, only she constantly repeated the injunction not to tell him. Ruth found herself one day opening her heart to her, as they sat sewing together, Ellen stitching almost as fast as she could do, for she had taken a fancy to learn Ruth's trade. She reminded her of Martha now; for, since Ellen had combed her hair more plainly, and left off the bright brooches and rings she used to be so fond of, they did not look unlike. Ruth told her about Martha's death, and how hard it had been to her, and how James missed his sister; and Ellen's tears blinded her for a few moments so that she could not thread her needle, though she did not look up or say anything. That afternoon, when she came home from her brother's, she had a little rose-bud one of the children had given her. Ruth noticed it as she passed through the room. When James came down to tea, he had it in his hand, and thanked his mother for placing it in the little vase on his bureau. Ruth would have disclaimed, but she caught a quick warning look from Ellen, which prevented the explanation, and Ruth also saw a deep blush as he placed it in his button-hole. He sat in the kitchen a little while after tea, and talked about the spring weather, and how fond he was of flowers; and he even noticed the improvement of the room, and complimented his mother on it. Ruth longed to tell him it was all Ellen's taste and neatness, but the meaning of that look restrained her.

That night she found Ellen sobbing in her bed, and asked if she was ill; but no, Ellen said, "not ill, only a little nervous." And Ruth, with a rare delicacy, did not question her, but stooped down and kissed her forehead, the first time she had ever done so.

After this, Ruth knew that still brighter days were before them; that is, if James could return the love she was sure was springing up in Ellen's heart for him; and this she nursed by long tales of his childhood, to which Ellen listened eagerly, or of his generosity and good nature, which brought the same loving, tender light always to her eyes, as she bent over her needle. She would willingly have tried to win her son by the same simple means; but sometimes, even when a boast of Ellen's industry, of tidiness, was on her lips, she had checked it, feeling the time was not yet come. James could not but have noticed the improvement in her appearance, though he never spoke of it. She had earned and made herself some neat chintz dresses, for she had invariably refused the money he had put into his mother's hands for her use; at first from obstinacy, and more lately from womanly pride. The broad, cotton lace collars were replaced by narrow cambric ruffles, and, with her hair parted smoothly over her forehead, and a smile of good nature lighting up her face, Ruth was never weary of admiring her. Love had, indeed, worked wonders. Whether she went singing with her sweet voice about their household tasks, or sewed diligently by Ruth's side, it was the same;

but, the instant James was heard approaching, the song was hushed, the smile was clouded, and she either retreated to her own room, or sat in unamiable silence.

The whole house betokened a change. The books and newspapers, of which James was fond, were always neatly piled up on the bureau, or in the window-seat; the brushes and towels had their appointed places; "chips of cloth" no longer littered the striped carpet, or chips of wood the hearth. The work of a "household fairy" was plainly visible to any but wilfully blinded eyes; but, though James enjoyed it, and even brought home a new table-cover, and a box of mignonette for the now open window, he never seemed to connect Ellen with the improvement. She did not cross his path, or give him cross looks and rude replies, and therefore he felt more at ease. Something of his old cheerfulness came back with the spring sunshine, but it was fitful, and easily driven away.

He came home one evening earlier than usual; he had lingered about the house more for several days; and, as if he had something important to disclose, drew his chair up, in the old familiar way, to his mother.

Ruth's heart beat a little quicker. She was sure it was something about Ellen, for he had seemed to watch her lately; she had noticed it several times. But she was not prepared for his proposal, which was that they should find a home for her somewhere among her own friends.

"She is not happy here, mother, and no wonder; and I think perhaps I ought to do something for her. The poor girl was no more to blame than I was; and, since it is as it is, I ought to make her as comfortable as I can. I think she seems different lately; and, at any rate, she hasn't gone gadding off with others, disgracing me as many would have done. To be sure, I set my foot down against it from the first; but there's many wouldn't have minded that. Then you wouldn't have so much to do; and, on the whole, since we can't love each other, perhaps it's best we should separate."

"But why can't you love each other, Jimmy?"

Her son looked up, struck more by the tone than the words. He saw his mother had a more than usually anxious look.

"If I loved her ever so well, she hates me. She must hate me; she never would love me."

"Did you ever ask her if she did?"

"Oh, mother! and we worse than strangers! I could have loved a wife dearly, that you know. Any one who would have cared for me, and tried to help you, and make you happy, I could love almost any one that would do that."

It is no wonder that Ellen's secret was not kept now, and that Ruth's kind heart set forth her improvement in the most glowing light. How she had put up the window curtains and piled up the books, and swept and dusted, and taken care of the mignonette, because he loved things tidy; and the story of the rose-bud came out now; and, more than all, she had been earning her two dollars a week with Ruth for a long time, rather than be dependent on him.

"Oh, James, go to the poor girl," Ruth said, appealingly, "and tell her that you will try to love her, at any rate!"

It was no great trial; the choked up tenderness of years had gone out to Ellen during that simple recital. He saw all that his mother said must be true, and blamed himself for not discovering it sooner. He seemed now so deeply in fault, as if he had so much to make up to her.

"Go and tell her so," his mother urged again.

"But to-night?" he said, doubtfully.

"Yes, to-night; for it will be harder to-morrow, I know, and I am sure she loves you."

Ellen had not yet retired; she was leaning her head on her arm, in an attitude of sadness, and looking very beautiful in the soft moonlight that came streaming into the room. She did not look up as he entered softly, but said, in a voice that showed she had been weeping—

"James came home early to-night, mother; I have been lying here listening to his voice. You have been talking a long time."

"Yes, Ellen, of you, my poor girl," James said, with a voice quivering with emotion; and he stooped down and raised her in his arms. "Do not go away from me; do not be frightened. There, you will not send me away?" and he drew her head down upon his shoulder as they stood there together. "I was coming to tell you that you might leave us; but now I ask you to stay, if you can love me, and be my wife."

"Oh, I have loved you so long!" she said, sobbing; "and I was content, or tried to be, to live just seeing you every day, and working for you. I know I was wild, and vain, and selfish; but I was not wicked; and everybody loved you, and how could I help it?"

"Do not try to help it, Nelly; it is I who have been wrong; but I will try to make it up to you, poor child. We will be married again to-morrow, that we may feel it sacred and real, and I will try to keep all the promises; only love me—put your arms about my neck, Nelly—love me always; and God bless you for being so good to my poor mother!"

And they were married—married more truly, realizing all they promised before the minister of God; and, loving each other, their lives henceforth were beautiful, through all trial or hardship that could arise.

OF THE STARS.

BY MRS. MARY SOMERVILLE.

ABOUT 2,000 stars only are visible to the naked eye; but when we view the heavens with a telescope, their number seems to be limited only by the imperfection of the instrument. In one hour Sir William Herschel estimated that 50,000 stars passed through the field of his telescope, in a zone of the heavens 2° in breadth. This, however, was stated as an instance of extraordinary crowding; but at an average, the whole expanse of the heavens must exhibit about a hundred millions of fixed stars that come within the reach of telescopic vision.

The stars are classed according to their apparent brightness, and the places of the most remarkable of those visible to the naked eye are ascertained with great precision, and formed into a catalogue, not only for the determination of geographical position by their occultations, but to serve as points of reference for finding the places of comets and other celestial phenomena. The whole number of stars registered amounts to about 15,000 or 20,000. The distance of the fixed stars is too great to admit of their exhibiting a sensible disk: but, in all probability, they are spherical, and must certainly be so if gravitation pervades all space, which it may be presumed to do, since John Herschel has shown that it extends to the binary systems of stars. With a fine telescope the stars appear like a point of light; their occultations by the moon are therefore instantaneous: their twinkling arises from sudden changes in the refractive power of the air, which would not be sensible if they had disks like the planets. Thus we can learn nothing of the relative distances of the stars from us and from one another by their apparent diameters; but their annual parallax being insensible, shows that we must be one hundred millions of millions of miles at least from the nearest: many of them, however, must be vastly more remote, for of two stars that appear close together, one may be far beyond the other in the depth of space. The light of Sirius, according to the observations of Sir John Herschel, is 324 times greater than that of a star of the sixth magnitude: if we suppose the two to be really of the same size, their distances from us must be in the ratio of 57.3 to 1, because light diminishes as the square of the distance of the luminous body increases.

Nothing is known of the absolute magnitude of the fixed stars, but the quantity of light emitted by many of them shows that they must be much larger than the sun. Dr. Wollaston determined the approximate ratio that the light of a wax candle bears to that of the sun, moon, and stars, by comparing their respective images, reflected from small glass globes filled with mercury, whence a comparison was established between the quantities of light emitted by the celestial bodies themselves. By this method he found that the light of the sun is about twenty millions of millions of times greater than that of Sirius, the brightest, and supposed to be the nearest of the fixed stars. If Sirius had a parallax of half a second, its distance from the earth would be 525,481 times the distance of the sun from the earth; and therefore Sirius, placed where the sun is, would appear to us to be 3.7 times as large as the sun, and would give 13.8 times more light; but many of the fixed stars must be infinitely larger than Sirius.

Many stars have vanished from the heavens; the star 42 Virginis seems to be of this number, having been missed by Sir John Herschel on the 9th of May, 1828, and not again found, though he frequently had occasion to observe that part of the heavens. Sometimes stars have all at once appeared, shone with a bright light, and vanished. Several instances of these temporary stars are on record; a remarkable instance occurred in the year 125, which is said to have induced Hipparchus to form the first catalogue of stars. Another star appeared suddenly near Aquilæ in the year 389, which vanished after remaining for three weeks as bright as Venus. On the 10th of October, 1604, a brilliant star burst forth in the constellation of Serpentarius, which continued visible for a year; and a more recent case occurred in the year 1670, when a new star was discovered in the head of the Swan, which, after becoming invisible, reappeared, and, after many variations in light, vanished after two years, and has never since been seen. In 1572, a star was discovered in Cassiopeia, which rapidly increased in brightness till it even surpassed that of Jupiter; it then gradually diminished in splendor, and, after exhibiting all the variety of tints that indicates the changes of combustion, vanished sixteen months after its discovery without altering its position. It is impossible to imagine anything more tremendous than a conflagration that could be visible at such a distance. It is, however, suspected that this star may be periodical and identical with the stars which appeared in the years 945 and 1264. There are probably many stars which alternately vanish and reappear among the innumerable multitudes that spangle the heavens; the periods of thirteen have already been pretty well ascertained. Of these, the most remarkable is the star Omicron, in the constellation Cetus. It appears about twelve times in eleven years, and is of variable brightness, sometimes appearing like a star of the second magnitude; but it neither always arrives at the same lustre, nor does it increase or diminish by the same degrees. According to Hevelius, it did not appear at all for four years. Hydræ also vanishes and reappears every 494 days, and a very singular instance of periodicity is given by Sir John Herschel in the star Algol or Persei, which is described as retaining the size of a star of the second magnitude for two days and fourteen seconds; it then suddenly begins to diminish in splendor, and in about three hours and a half is reduced to the size of a star of the fourth magnitude; it then begins again to increase, and in three hours and a half more regains its usual brightness, going through all these vicissitudes in two days, twenty hours, and forty-eight minutes. The cause of the variations in most of the periodical stars is unknown, but, from the changes of Algol, M. Goodricke has conjectured that they may be occasioned by the revolution of some opaque body coming between us and the star, obstructing part of its light. Sir John Herschel is struck with the high degree of activity evinced by these changes in regions where, "but for such evidences, we might conclude all to be lifeless." He observes that our own sun requires nine times the period of Algol to perform a revolution on its own axis; while, on the other hand, the periodic time of an opaque revolving body sufficiently large to produce a similar temporary obscuration of the sun, seen from a fixed star, would be less than fourteen hours.

Many thousands of stars that seem to be only brilliant points, when carefully examined are found to be in reality systems of two or more suns, some revolving about a common centre. These binary and multiple stars are extremely remote, requiring the most powerful telescopes to show them separately. The first catalogue of double stars, in which their places and relative positions are determined, was accomplished by the talents and industry of Sir William Herschel, to whom astronomy is indebted for so many brilliant discoveries, and with whom the idea of their combination in binary and multiple systems originated—an idea completely established by his own observations, recently confirmed by those of his son. The motions of revolution of many round a common centre have been ascertained, and their periods determined with considerable accuracy. Some have, since their first discovery, already accomplished nearly a whole revolution, and one, Coronæ, is actually considerably advanced in its second period. These interesting systems thus present a species of sidereal chronometer, by which the chronology of the heavens will be marked out to future ages by epochs of their own, liable to no fluctuations from planetary disturbances, such as obtain in our system.

In observing the relative position of the stars of a binary system, the distance between them, and also the angle of position, that is, the angle which the meridian or a parallel to the equator makes with the line joining the two stars, are measured. The accuracy of each result depends upon taking the mean of a great number of the best observations, and eliminating error by mutual comparison. The distances between the stars are so minute that they cannot be measured with the same accuracy as the angles of position; therefore, to determine the orbit of a star independently of the distance, it is necessary to assume, as the most probable hypothesis, that the stars are subject to the law of gravitation, and consequently, that one of the two stars revolves in an ellipse about the other, supposed to be at rest, though not necessarily in the focus. A curve is thus constructed graphically by means of the angles of position and the corresponding times of observation. The angular velocities of the stars are obtained by drawing tangents to this curve at stated intervals, whence the apparent distances, or radii vectores, of the revolving star become known for each angle of position; because, by the laws of elliptical motion, they are equal to the square roots of the apparent angular velocities. Now that the angles of position estimated from a given line, and the corresponding distances of the two stars, are known, another curve may be drawn, which will represent on paper the actual orbit of the star projected on the visible surface of the heavens: so that the elliptical elements of the true orbit and its position in space may be determined by a combined system of measurements and computation. But as this orbit has been obtained on the hypothesis that gravitation prevails in these distant regions, which could not be known a priori, it must be compared with as many observations as can be obtained, to ascertain how far the computed ellipse agrees with the curve actually described by the star.

By this process Sir John Herschel has discovered that several of these systems of stars are subject to the same laws of motion with our system of planets: he has determined the elements of their elliptical orbits, and computed the periods of their revolution. One of the stars of Virginis revolves about the other in 629 years; the periodic time of Coronæ is 287 years; that of Castor is 253 years; that of Bootes is 1600; that of 70 Ophiuci is ascertained by M. Savary to be 80 years; and Professor Encke has shown that the revolution of Ursæ is completed in 58 years. The first of these stars approached its perihelion on the 18th of August, 1834, and Castor will arrive at it some time in 1855. The actual proximity of the two component stars in each case will then be extreme, and the apparent angular velocity so great, that, in the case of Virginis, an angle of 68° may be described in a single year. Coronæ also attained its perihelion about 1835. Sir John Herschel, Sir James South, and Professor Struve of Dorpat, have increased Sir Wil-

William Herschel's original catalogue to more than 3,000, of which thirty or forty are known to form revolving or binary systems, and Mr. Dunlop has formed a catalogue of 253 double stars in the southern hemisphere. The motion of Mercury is more rapid than that of any other planet, being at the rate of 107,000 miles in an hour: the perihelion velocity of the comet of 1680 was no less than 880,000 miles an hour; but if the two stars of Ursæ be as remote from one another as the nearest fixed star is from the sun, the velocity of the revolving stars must exceed imagination. The discovery of the elliptical motion of the double stars excites the highest interest, since it shows that gravitation is not peculiar to our system of planets, but that systems of suns in the far distant regions of the universe are also obedient to its laws.

Possibly, among the multitudes of small stars, whether double or insulated, some may be found near enough to exhibit distinct parallactic motions, arising from the revolution of the earth in its orbit. Of two stars apparently in close approximation, one may be far behind the other in space. These may seem near to one another when viewed from the earth in one part of its orbit, but may separate widely when seen from the earth in another position, just as two terrestrial objects appear to be one when viewed in the same straight line, but separate as the observer changes his position. In this case the stars would not have real, but only apparent motion. One of them would seem to oscillate annually to and fro in a straight line on each side of the other—a motion which could not be mistaken for that of a binary system, where one star describes an ellipse about the other. Such parallax does not yet appear to have been made out, so that the actual distance of the stars is still a matter of conjecture.

The double stars are of various hues, but most frequently exhibit the contrasted colors. The large star is generally yellow, orange, or red; and the small star blue, purple, or green. Sometimes a white star is combined with a blue or purple, and more rarely a red and white are united. In many cases, these appearances are due to the influences of contrast on our judgment of colors. For example, in observing a double star, where the large one is a full ruby-red or almost blood-color, and the small one a fine green, the latter loses its color when the former is hid by the cross wires of the telescope. But there is a vast number of instances where the colors are too strongly marked to be merely imaginary. Sir John Herschel observes, in one of his papers in the "Philosophical Transactions," as a very remarkable fact, that, although red stars are common enough, no example of an insulated blue, green, or purple one has yet been produced.

Besides the revolutions about one another, some of the binary systems are carried forward in space by a motion common to both stars, towards some unknown point in the firmament. The two stars of 61 Cygni, which are nearly equal, and have remained at the distance of about 15" from each other for fifty years, have changed their place in the heavens during that period, by a motion which for ages must appear uniform and rectilinear: because, even if the path be curved, so small a portion of it must be sensibly a straight line to us. Multitudes of the single stars also have proper motions, yet so minute that that of Cassiopeia, which is only 3".74 annually, is the greatest yet observed; but the enormous distances of the stars make motions appear small to us which are in reality very great. Sir William Herschel conceived that, among many irregularities, the motions of the stars have a general tendency towards a point diametrically opposite to that occupied by the star Herculis, which he attributed to a motion of the solar system in the contrary direction. Should this really be the case, the stars, from the effects of perspective alone, would seem to diverge in the direction to which we are tending, and would apparently converge in the space we leave, and there would be a regularity in these apparent motions which would in time be detected; but if the solar system and the whole of the stars visible to us be carried forward in space by a motion common to all, like ships drifting in a current, it would be impossible for us, who move with the rest, to ascertain its direction. There can be no doubt of the progressive motion of the sun and many of the stars, but sidereal astronomy is not far enough advanced to determine what relations these bear to one another.

The stars are scattered very irregularly over the firmament. In some places they are crowded together, in others thinly dispersed. A few groups more closely condensed form very beautiful objects even to the naked eye, of which the Pleiades and the constellation Coma Berenices are the most striking examples; but the greater number of these clusters of stars appear to unassisted vision like thin white clouds or vapors: such is the Milky Way, which, as Sir William Herschel has proved, derives its brightness from the diffused light of the myriads of stars that form it. Most of them are extremely small on account of their enormous distances, and they are so numerous that, according to his estimation, no fewer than 50,000 passed through the field of his telescope in the course of one hour in a zone 2° broad. This singular portion of the heavens, constituting part of our firmament, consists of an extensive stratum of stars, whose thickness is small compared with its length and breadth; the earth is placed about midway between its two surfaces, near the point where it diverges into two branches. Many clusters of stars appear like white clouds or round comets without tails, either to unassisted vision or with ordinary telescopes; but with powerful instruments Sir John Herschel describes them as conveying the idea of a globular space filled full of stars insulated in the heavens, and constituting a family or society apart from the rest, subject only to its own internal laws. To attempt to count the stars in one of these globular clusters, he says, would be a vain task—that they are not to be reckoned by hundreds—and, on a rough computation, it appears that many clusters of this description must contain ten or twenty thousand stars compacted and wedged together in a round space whose area is not more than a tenth part of that covered by the moon; so that its centre, where the stars are seen projected on each other, is one blaze of light. If each of these stars be a sun, and if they be separated by intervals equal to that which separates our sun from the nearest fixed star, the distance which renders the whole cluster barely visible to the naked eye must be so great, that the existence of this splendid assemblage can only be known to us by light which must have left it at least a thousand years ago. Occasionally these clusters are so irregular and so undefined in their outline as merely to suggest the idea of a richer part of the heavens. They contain fewer stars than the globular clusters, and sometimes a red star forms a conspicuous object among them. These Sir William Herschel regarded as the rudiments of globular clusters in a less advanced state of condensation, but tending to that form by their mutual attraction.

Multitudes of nebulous spots are to be seen on the clear vault of heaven which have every appearance of being clusters like those described, but are too distant to be resolved into stars by the most excellent telescopes. This nebulous matter exists in vast abundance in space. No fewer than 2,000 nebulae and clusters of stars were observed by Sir William Herschel, whose places have been computed from his observations, reduced to a common epoch, and arranged into a catalogue in order of right ascension by his sister, Miss Caroline Herschel, lately deceased, a lady so justly eminent for astronomical knowledge and discovery. Six or seven hundred nebulae have already been ascertained in the southern hemisphere: of these, the magellanic clouds are the most remarkable. The nature and use of this matter, scattered over the heavens in such a variety of forms, are involved in the greatest obscurity. That it is a self-luminous, phosphorescent, material substance, in a highly dilated or gaseous state, but gradually subsiding by the mutual gravitation of its particles into stars and sidereal systems, is the hypothesis which seems to be most generally received; but the only way that any real knowledge on this mysterious subject can be obtained is by the determination of the form, place, and present state of each individual nebula; and a comparison of these with future observations will show generations to come the changes that may now be going on in these supposed rudiments of future systems. With this view, Sir John Herschel began in the year 1825 the arduous and pious task of revising his illustrious father's observations, which he finished a short time before he sailed for the Cape of Good Hope, in order to disclose the mysteries of the southern hemisphere, because he considers our firmament to be exhausted till farther improvements in the telescope shall enable astronomers to penetrate deeper into space. In a truly splendid paper read before the Royal Society on the 21st of November, 1833, he gives the places of 2,500 nebulae and clusters of stars. Of these, 500 are new—the rest he mentions with peculiar pleasure as having been most accurately determined by his father. This work is the more extraordinary, as, from bad weather, fogs, twilight, and moonlight, these shadowy appearances are not visible, at an average, above thirty nights in the year.

The nebulae have a great variety of forms. Vast multitudes are so faint as to be with difficulty discerned at all till they have been for some time in the field of the telescope, or are just about to quit it. Many present an ill-defined surface, in which it is difficult to say where the centre of the greatest brightness is. Some cling to stars like wisps of cloud; others exhibit the wonderful appearance of an enormous flat ring seen very obliquely, with a lenticular vacancy in the centre. A very remarkable instance of an annular nebula is to be seen exactly half way between Persei and Lyrae. It is elliptical in the ratio of 4 to 5, is sharply defined, the internal opening occupying about half the diameter. This opening is not entirely dark, but filled up with a faint hazy light, aptly compared by Sir John Herschel to fine gauze stretched over a hoop. Two are described as most amazing objects: one like a dumb-bell or hour-glass of bright matter, surrounded by a thin hazy atmosphere, so as to give the whole an oval form, or the appearance of an oblate spheroid. This phenomenon bears no resemblance to any known object. The other consists of a bright round nucleus, surrounded at a distance by a nebulous ring split through half its circumference, and having the split portions separated at an angle of 45° each to the plane of the other. This nebula bears a strong similitude to the milky-way, and suggested to Sir John Herschel the idea of "a brother system bearing a real physical resemblance and strong analogy of structure to our own." It appears that double nebulae are not unfrequent, exhibiting all the varieties of distance, position, and relative brightness with their counterparts the double stars. The rarity of single nebulae as large, faint, and as little condensed in the centre as these, makes it extremely improbable that two such bodies should be accidentally so near as to touch, and often in part to overlap each other as these do. It is much more likely that they constitute systems; and if so, it will form an interesting subject of future inquiry to discover whether they possess orbital motion round one another.

Stellar nebulae form another class. These have a round or oval shape, increasing in density towards the centre. Sometimes the matter is so rapidly condensed as to give the whole the appearance of a star with a blur, or like a candle shining through horn. In some instances the central matter is so highly and suddenly condensed, so vivid and sharply defined, that the nebula might be taken for a bright star surrounded by a thin atmosphere. Such are nebulous stars. The sodiacal light, or lenticular-shaped atmosphere of the sun, which may be seen extending beyond the orbits of Mercury and Venus soon after sunset in the months of April and May, is supposed to be a condensation of the etherial medium by his attractive force, and seems to place our sun among the class of stellar nebulae. The stellar nebulae and nebulous stars assume all degrees of ellipticity. Not unfrequently they are long and narrow, like a spindle-shaped ray, with a bright nucleus in the centre. The last class are the planetary nebulae. These bodies have exactly the appearance of planets, with sensibly round or oval disks, sometimes sharply terminated, at other times hazy and ill-defined. Their surface, which is blue or bluish-white, is equable or slightly mottled, and their light occasionally rivals that of the planets in vividness. They are generally attended by minute stars, which give the idea of accompanying satellites. These nebulae are of enormous dimensions. One of them, near Aquarii, has a sensible diameter of about 20'', and another presents a diameter of 12''. Sir John Herschel has computed that, if these objects be as far from us as the stars, their real magnitude must, even on the lowest estimation, be such as would fill the orbit of Uranus. He concludes that, if they be solid bodies of a solar nature, their intrinsic splendor must be greatly inferior to that of the sun, because a circular portion of the sun's disk, subtending an angle of 20'', would give a light equal to that of a hundred full moons, while, on the contrary, the objects in question are hardly, if at all, visible to the naked eye. From the uniformity of the disks of the planetary nebulae, and their want of apparent condensation, he presumes that they may be hollow shells, only emitting light from their surfaces.

The existence of every degree of ellipticity in the nebulae—from long lenticular rays to the exact circular form, and of every shade of central condensation—from the slightest increase of density to apparently a solid nucleus—may be accounted for by supposing the general constitution of these nebulae to be that of oblate spheroidal masses of every degree of flatness, from the sphere to the disk, and of every variety in their density and ellipticity towards the centre. It would be erroneous, however, to imagine that the forms of these systems are maintained by forces identical with those already described, which determine the form of a fluid mass in rotation; because, if the nebulae be only clusters of separate stars, as in the greater number of cases there is every reason to believe them to be, no pressure can be propagated through them. Consequently, since no general rotation of such a system as one mass can be supposed, it may be conceived to be a quiescent form, comprising within its limits an indefinite multitude of stars, each of which may be moving in an orbit about the common centre of the whole, in virtue of a law of internal gravitation resulting from the compound gravitation of all its parts. Sir John Herschel has proved that the existence of such a system is not inconsistent with the law of gravitation under certain conditions.

The distribution of the nebulae over the heavens is even more irregular than that of the stars. In some places they are so crowded together as scarcely to allow one to pass through the field of the telescope before another appears, while in other parts hours elapse without a single nebula occurring in the zone under observation. They are in general only to be seen with the very best telescopes, and are most abundant in a zone whose general direction is not far from the hour circles 0^h and 12^h, and which crosses the milky way nearly at right angles. Where that zone crosses the constellations Virgo, Coma Berenices, and the Great Bear, they are to be found in multitudes.

Such is a brief account of the discoveries contained in Sir John Herschel's paper, which, for sublimity of views and patient investigation, has not been surpassed in any age or country. To him and to Sir William Herschel is due almost all that is known of sidereal astronomy; and in the inimitable works of that highly gifted father and son, the reader will find this subject treated of in a style altogether worthy of it, and of them.

So numerous are the objects which meet our view in the heavens, that we cannot imagine a part of space where some light would not strike the eye;—innumerable stars, thousands of double and multiple systems, clusters in one blaze with their tens of thousands of stars, and the nebulae amazing us by the strangeness of their forms and the incomprehensibility of their nature, till at last, from the imperfection of our senses, even these thin and airy phantoms vanish in the distance. If such remote bodies shine by reflected light, we should be unconscious of their existence; each star must then be a sun, and may be presumed to have its system of planets, satellites, and comets, like our own; and, for aught we know, myriads of bodies may be wandering in space unseen by us, of whose nature we can form no idea, and still less of the part they perform in the economy of the universe: nor is this an unwarranted presumption; many such do come within the sphere of the earth's attraction, are ignited by the velocity with which they pass through the atmosphere, and are precipitated with great violence on the earth. The fall of meteoric stones is much more frequent than is generally believed; hardly a year passes without some instances occurring, and if it be considered that only a small part of the earth is inhabited, it may be presumed that numbers fall in the ocean or on the uninhabited part of the land, unseen by man. They are sometimes of great magnitude; the volume of several has exceeded that of the planet Ceres, which is about 70 miles in diameter. One which passed within twenty-five miles of us was estimated to weigh about 600,000 tons, and to move with a velocity of about twenty miles in a second—a fragment of it alone reached the earth. The obliquity of the descent of meteorites, the peculiar substances they are composed of, and the explosion accompanying their fall, show that they are foreign to our system. Luminous spots, altogether independent of the phases, have occasionally appeared on the dark part of the moon; these have been ascribed to the light arising from the eruption of volcanoes; whence it has been supposed that meteorites have been projected from the moon by the impetus of volcanic eruption. It has even been computed that, if a stone were projected from the moon in a vertical line, with an initial velocity of 10,992 feet in a second—more than four times the velocity of a ball when first discharged from a cannon—instead of falling back to the moon by the attraction of gravity, it would come within the sphere of the earth's attraction, and revolve about it like a satellite. These bodies, impelled either by the direction of the primitive impulse, or by the disturbing action of the sun, might ultimately penetrate the earth's atmosphere, and arrive at its surface. But from whatever source meteoric stones may come, it seems highly probable that they have a common origin, from the uniformity—we may almost say identity—of their chemical composition.

WILD FLOWERS.

BY HARLAND COULTAS.

If the wild flowers around Philadelphia be viewed as objects of merchandise, they certainly present but few claims to our consideration; for, though they sometimes rival in beauty and fragrance foreign flowers, yet they can never be esteemed so valuable, and would not repay the gardener for the trouble of cultivation. This fact is well known to florists; and, generally speaking, these gentlemen are better acquainted with the foreign than with the native wild flowers. Strange as it may appear, it is nevertheless true that, if some of the best nurserymen and florists in this city were shipped to Ceylon or British India, they would feel more at home amongst the wild flowers in the mountains and forests of those distant countries, than if surrounded by the flora of their own woods.

If, however, the wild flowers around Philadelphia be regarded in a scientific point of view, they become truly interesting, and even the florist would be more successful in his business if he were to devote to them a portion of his time and study. Many genera of the plants which grow wild around this city are the spontaneous growth of all parts of the habitable world; and the study of native plants would assist the florist and nurseryman in the recognition of foreign genera to an extent that would amply repay him for any time and labor he might bestow on them. It is also clear that the grand and beautiful laws which govern the development of vegetable life on the surface of our planet may be as easily discovered by an investigation of our own wild flowers, as by any researches into the organization of the costly plants in the conservatory. And, accordingly, when we search the annals of scientific progress, we actually find that our greatest philosophers have made their discoveries in vegetable physiology by a close scrutiny of the mechanism of the common and despised plants growing in their neighborhood.

And let it not be assumed, at the outset of this investigation, that the intelligence of man is incapable of searching out the mysteries of vegetation. Before the time of Newton, there were many men on whose heads apples fell who never reflected on the cause of their fall. But Newton saw the same, and thought. The result of his reflections was the production of his immortal work, "The Principia and the Development of the Theory of Universal Gravitation." He showed with what small means Nature attains the most magnificent results. It was the mutual attraction of the earth and the apple that brought the apple to its surface, and the same mutual attraction retains the moon and planets in their orbits, causing them to sweep out those sublime curves in immensity with which the mind of the geometer is familiarized. It is by the attraction of other suns that our own sun, or rather star, is upheld in space; whilst all the stars that sparkle on the roof of night, and whose light comes to us from the most distant regions of the universe, are upheld by mutual attraction. Such the sublime discovery of the illustrious Newton. What though the chemistry which Nature employs in the construction of plants with various hues and forms has hitherto baffled the closest scrutiny? If the law that regulates the motion of masses of matter has been discovered, why not the law which influences the moving alone in the laboratory of organic nature? How long shall man continue hopeless and helpless in the presence of those forces of nature to which he is subject? It is his prerogative to "subdue the earth," and "have dominion." He is "the minister and interpreter of Nature."

If it be true as some philosophers have asserted, that the whole chain of organic being, from man down to the humble spire of grass, is only a manifestation of life in different degrees of development, then are we all personally interested in this inquiry. Human physiology will progress, and the noble art of healing be better understood, in proportion as the student examines the expression of life in the inferior organic forms. It is in plants that mineral matter first becomes endowed with life. It is there that we meet with its earliest humblest indications. The vegetable world is formed out of mineral matter for the support of animal life. Hence almost every plant is frequented by some insect with organs beautifully constructed and adapted to the organization of the plant, on which the insect subsists for food. It is by the chemistry of Nature that mineral matter is changed into vegetable; and, when it enters the animal, it undergoes another transmutation, and becomes animal matter. He who would study the laws of life as revealed in the animal world ought not to neglect the vegetable world, on which animals depend for their food, or rather for their very existence. In the order of Nature, the study of wild flowers ought certainly to precede the study of wild animals. Botany would seem to have a prior claim to every other branch of natural history.

Linnaeus and his scholars have generally written in Latin. They addressed themselves to anatomists, physicians, and philosophers, and not to the people, or they would have adopted a different language as a means of communicating thought. I shall endeavor to copy Nature in her simplicity, and to conduct my readers by a plain and easy pathway to the noble temple of Flora; and, when they shall catch a glimpse of the glorious interior, of the play of those magnificent laws of life of which man is the highest expression, and which operate in the production of the vast chain of organic being beneath him, there is no difficulty which they will not attempt to surmount, in order to learn more about those beautiful forms of life called plants, and to solve the problem of their growth and reproduction.

MY SIX LAST COOKS.

An unexceptionable character, setting forth every excellent quality, was almost more than we needed to influence our decision in favor of a most pleasing, sensible, middle-aged woman. There was a respectability in her appearance which warranted the extravagant idea of having found a treasure. She proved herself a treasure of information, and her private history must ever remain an enigma. We were complaining to her, sotto voce, that some workmen on the premises seemed very idle; she immediately in excellent, almost Parisian, French, expressed her acquiescence in our opinion, and we continued the necessary conversation of giving many orders in a newly-finished house in that language. We soon discovered she was equally conversant with German. We asked her to assist in making some table linen; she regretted her eyes had suffered so much from a Neapolitan sun as to incapacitate her from neat sewing work. A French priest had been a very kind friend to her on the Continent. She had broken her leg in the Tyrol, and had lost her property in America. We had proofs of the truth of all she said: but a conviction that we had no pretension to call ourselves mistress in our own house; that we were never more to eat a dinner of our own ordering, nor be permitted to have a wish, however modest, gratified, whilst this polyglot, overbearing, clever, and traveled woman reigned in the kitchen, obliged us, in these days of rebellion, to rebel; and we, gently and in proper terms, explained that we desired to be president of our own household, with a ministry that followed orders. Her place was supplied by a Paragon; six years' character from her last place left no doubt that we were decidedly *suit*ed. Oh! that word; how much it does comprehend! Paragon wore little natural ringlets; we wished so much they had been assisted by art, we could have suggested a little less exuberance in that particular. She used very choice language, would occasionally regret she had received an indifferent bulletin of her mother's health; and in lamenting "that the beauteous days of summer were o'er," would ask gracefully, and with a lisp, "what vegetation was to be served that day." Whilst Paragon fulfilled her duties which came under our observation, we could not object to the rosewood desk, taken from the drawer of the kitchen-dresser, and sentimentally placed for immediate use; nor did we make any observation on accidentally intruding in the regions of this refined cook, and seeing her, with an ornamented pen, writing verses—an Ode, possibly, to a patty-pan. Six months we were gracefully and poetically served; one morning, with a more marked lisp, we were begged to "suit ourselves" at our earliest convenience. Cook said, "she found that her talents were completely rusting in our service; in the simple and quiet habits of the family, we gave no opportunity for their display."—What could we say? We mentally ejaculated something very like a wish, Paragon might go further and fare worse.

A sickly cook succeeded. She had been crossed in love—tea-caddy, every household necessary purchased—she had been deserted for another. A tear moistened the hashed mutton—sudden despair would seize her in the act of whipping a cream; and she would sink on the nearest chair, and give way to a burst of sorrow for her melancholy state. There was no alternative. We grieve to see others suffer, and particularly hopelessly. We murmured a kind advice to be cheerful; and at length being unable to cheer this Niobe, who, in the solitude of her own room each evening, would indulge her feelings of anguish, and would not come out to make the toast, to the housemaid's great disgust, we were necessitated to suggest change of air and scene, and excited a hope that, in a town residence, the faithless swain might possibly be replaced by some disengaged butcher or green-grocer's man.

Annoyed at our ill-fortune, we once more tried our fate, and, striving to keep clear of our last disasters, engaged one who, having been kitchen-maid in a gentleman's family, had little chance of being poetical, and who decidedly had a cheerful countenance. Alas! her countenance was cheerful through the aid of a cheerful glass. Although warranted sober and honest, and useful and active, she, to the shame of those who recommended her, in one short fortnight was almost always under the influence of strong drink; took her butter money to pay her bill at the neighboring public house; was seldom awake enough to be useful; and her activity resulted in tumbling up-stairs to bed, without setting herself on fire. Her knowledge of existing facts was so keen that, on inquiry being made for the portion which was left of a birth-day pudding, she exclaimed, "Please, ma'am, nurse say we ate that there pudding." Willing to find some good in so much inconvenience as a new change in the kitchen dynasty, we endeavored to believe a friend's assurance that it was a great comfort that the house had not been burned over our heads, during the brief career of Cheerful Susan.

A short interregnum followed, whilst we despairingly sought amongst the advertisements of accomplished cooks for one who could exist without the presence of a man-servant, and anxiously carried on a diligent correspondence with M. P., M. D., S. Z., and E. F., who each individually testified their sense of their own excellence, by asking such wages as would prove a tempting salary to many a poor governess. At length a pleasing-looking, simply dressed person, appeared, and it is to be concluded we were mutually pleased with each other, for all preliminaries were settled, and she was engaged. She had with some skill concealed the turn of her mind, which was an insatiable love of the admiration of others, and a very extensive private admiration for her own attractions. Before a week elapsed, rumors reached the drawing-room of such elaborate toilettes every evening, that, as the only single man in the house was the eldest son of the family, not yet three years old, and not capable consequently of appreciating her attractions, little hope remained that so much labor would be long exercised, where it was in vain. At all hours, when she was likely to meet her mistress's eyes, her costume was unexceptionable; but when the dinner and its appointments were hastily cleared away, a canvas-worked footstool and private hearth-rug were placed before the fire, a red table-cloth, from her own box, covered the kitchen table, and thus the attributes being in keeping, as far as possible, cook returned from her room, befouled and belaced—watch, chain, bre-loques, all en suite, and a cap which rivaled the daintiest Parisian fashion. Our apprehension that a quiet gentleman's family in the country was no resting-place for such a butterfly, proved correct. Psyche and her mistress unanimously agreed to part after a month's trial, and most positively had we realized, in our various experiences, the painful fact of too frequently ill-directed effects of the march of intellect and the love of dress.

It may be some consolation to young housekeepers to know that comfort and confidence in cooks are not quite unattainable in these days, when servants in general are unwilling to abide by the catechism of their youth, and "do their duty in the station in which it has pleased God to place them." A neat, sober, cheerful, unromantic person, and one who speaks no language but her own, and that not faultlessly, now fulfils the daily routine of simple duty. Psyche, Bacchante, Niobe, Paragon, and Polyglot, having run their short race, we can only rejoice in the respectability of our sixth and, we hope, for many years, last cook.

SONG.

You have stolen my heart! Oh, do not delay
To give back the heart you have stolen away!
'Tis a heart full of love, and its every thought
With the deepest, the truest affection is fraught:
It is not deceptive—it does not conceal
One thought, save the depths of the love it can feel.
Then give back my heart! Oh, do not delay
To give back the heart you have stolen away!

It is not a trifling one—nay, it would spurn
To accept of a love that it could not return;
But when for another it changes its own,
It will love with the truest affection alone.
Such, such is the heart you have stolen away;
Then, pray, give it back without further delay.

And, true as the ivy, it fondly will cling
Its tendrils around, and confidingly cling
To the one that it loves, ne'er forgetting its plight,
Through sunshine or storm 'twill forever be bright.
Oh! give back my heart—pray, do not delay—
The heart you've so wilfully stolen away.

Oh! give back my heart, or another to fill
The vacuum left;—let the one you give thrill
In response to my own. Oh! let it reveal
One-half of the love my own heart can feel.
If not, I can never receive it in pay
For the fond, loving heart you have stolen away.

VISIT TO THE PROTESTANT SISTERS OF MERCY AT KAISERSWERTH.

BY FREDRIKA BEEMER.

Do you know anything of Kaiserswerth? Did you ever hear it mentioned? I had not until about a year ago, when I stood upon a rock in Blekinge with some German travelers. The graves of the Vikingr surrounded us, nearly a hundred cairns, and we talked of the old Vikingr—of their life of arduous achievement—of their abhorrence of inactivity and sloth—and of their doctrine and desire of winning heaven through incessant combat. We spoke of the achievements of our time in contrast with those of the Vikingr, and of the endeavors and labors of a Christian life on earth. This led to the mention of Fliedner's Benevolent Institution at Kaiserswerth, as one of the Vikingr undertakings of our day.

From the time that our excursion to the Rhine was determined upon, I resolved to make myself acquainted with Kaiserswerth. I proposed, therefore, that Miss W. should accompany me, and we joyfully set forth on our journey, which would occupy a couple of days. We were to go down the Rhine, past Coblenz, Cologne, Bonn, and Düsseldorf.

It is a pleasure to see the steamboats on the Rhine, their number, and how they manœuvre and flourish about like sea-horses, putting to here and there along the shore with all the silence and ease of spiritual creatures; and it is merry living on board those steamboats, and there are magnificent banquetings at which all the superfluity of life, in meats and drinks, is served up! There is no end to courses, wines, dessert, ices, and every kind of delicacy. The long tables placed on deck, beneath an awning, as of a tent, are filled with cheerful company, who thoroughly enjoy all that is set before them. This region, beyond any other, presents a bustling, active, and festive life. On every hand people are traveling—posting along and running from one spot to another; on every hand one sees travelers streaming in and out, and every place is crowded—on the steamboats—on the railways, in the hotels, at the table d'hôtes; one very hand one receives a still stronger impression that man, upon this earth, is merely a traveler; and well is it for him if he gets safe and sound through the great crowd of other travelers; for, amid all this movement, this streaming to and fro, and this crowding together, it is vain pretending that good-heartedness, and especially good manners, do not frequently suffer. People intend no ill to their neighbors, nay, they most frequently have neither intentions nor thoughts on the subject; but still they thrust aside their neighbor to get the better place for themselves, to appropriate to themselves the dish they like best. Upon this Rhine trip I saw these steamboat manners lead even to quarrels among the gentlemen. The captain of the vessel was obliged to interfere between the combatants.

"Do you know who I am?" said to him, proudly, one of these champions.

"If you were the Emperor of China himself," replied the captain, "you would have no right to carry your point here by strength of arm!"

Nevertheless, amid such scenes and such behavior, one is frequently astonished by instances of amiability and politeness. I shall always remember, with delight, a certain Baron von H., whose appearance and manners were such as no one would willingly forget, who, in a manly and witty way, reproved a rude person who had compelled two elderly ladies to leave their seats for the accommodation of his feet, thus inducing him to occupy less space, and who, moreover, devoted himself, with knightly courtesy, to a young sickly-looking lady, caring for her comfort as he had done for that of the elder ladies, although she could have no other attraction than her feebleness and the intelligence and life of goodness which beamed in her pale countenance; but conduct of this kind might be expected from a man who acknowledged—"Je vous l'avoue; j'ai une marotte; c'est—la légitimité. Les Rois malheureux ont ma passion."

I confess that I felt almost reverence for the man who dared to avow sentiments at the same time so old fashioned and so little profitable to self.

But we are approaching Kaiserswerth. My friend, Miss W., had a friend at this place from whom she had parted a few months before, shortly after the death of her father, her only near relative, and when she was about to leave house and home for Kaiserswerth, there to become a deaconess, that is to say, a servant. Miss W. had seen her at that time uncertain, anxious, and in the highest degree afraid of Fliedner, the founder of the institution, who had been described to her as a man of despotic character. Since this time she had heard nothing of her, and was now in the highest degree curious to know what had been the result of the experiment. Miss W. had written to apprise her of our intended visit, and expected that she would meet us at Kaiserswerth if she still remained there.

The journey in company with Miss W. could not be other than interesting. The banks of the Rhine appeared to me more beautiful than formerly; the views expanded themselves. At Bonn, the country is magnificent; the Siebengebirge are actual giants, but they do not contract the river, which flows on, at this place, broadly and freely, a kingly stream, rich in heroic memories and customs.

The affluent cities he, as guests, inviteth,
And flowery meadows gather round his knees.

The memory of Bonn will always be precious to me, not merely for the sake of its splendid neighborhood, but still more for the sake of the people whom I found there old Arndt, who still speaks of Sweden with affection, and sings the songs of Franzén with delight; the brothers Boisserée; and Matilda the wife of the younger brother, Blumes; and above all, that warm-hearted, amiable, Swedish lady who gave bed and board, in her own house, to her unknown countrywomen, and thus enabled them to enjoy the feeling of home in this foreign land. This Miss B., who will always be dear to my heart, is esteemed and loved in the town under the name of das Schloss-fraülein.

Leaving Bonn, the banks of the Rhine assume another character; they become low and flat.

Upon one of these flat banks, not far from Düsseldorf, stands the little, low town of Kaiserswerth. Some fragments of walls of the time of the Romans give it a romantic coloring, although they are hardly observed.

About fifteen years ago, Fliedner, the pastor of the evangelical church here, together with his wife, founded an institution at this place for the education of good nurses for the sick, who were called deaconesses, according to the custom in the early Christian churches; and hither they invited young women of all classes. To this was afterwards added an asylum, where female offenders and those who have suffered the punishment of the law, might, on leaving prison, be received and educated anew for an improved return to society. Afterwards, a considerable hospital was established, and later, an infant school, an orphan house, and a seminary for the instruction of infant school teachers.

This establishment instantly flourished, and won for itself a universal interest, which still continues on the increase. Within the first year of its existence, were established, in fifteen different places in Germany, female auxiliary societies; whilst other institutions, resembling, in some respects, the parent establishment, were founded in Germany, in Switzerland, France, Holland, and England, all belonging to the Protestant church. At Duisburg, not far from this place, an establishment has been formed under the management of Fliedner for the preparation of deacons, or Christian sick nurses of the male sex.

The deaconess house at Kaiserswerth receives but few of its members from the higher classes. Here are educated, not merely nurses for hospitals, but for prisons, and for the care and education of children, each and all according to their various gifts and inclinations. There were, at the time we were there, about one hundred servants in the establishment, amongst whom seventy-four were initiated deaconesses. The others are still in their year of probation, and are called "servants on probation." Initiation takes place after about six or eight months' trial, and involves five years of servitude, at the expiration of which, the deaconess may either quit her calling or bind herself anew, according to her own inclination. During the five years she may also be released from her duties, if any sufficient cause demands it. The number of deaconesses, or "sisters," as they are called in the establishment, is taken annually; and in proportion as they increase in number, increases the necessity for them, and the demand for their services even in distant countries. Already have they been sent for from Berlin, Dresden, Frankfort, Muhlhausen, and many other places, to undertake there the management of hospitals or infant schools. It is not long since the Prussian minister in London, Chevalier Bunsen, requested that two sisters might be sent over to have the superintendence of a German hospital which he had established there. These excellent sisters have even gone to the East Indies.

The number of sick who are under the care of the institution increases annually, and it is impossible to receive all who make application for that purpose. During the last year, five hundred and sixty-eight persons, all of the lower class, have been housed and cared for by the institution.

It was for this office and for this life that Miss T., still in the flower of her youth, with agreeable manners, and caressed by the world, had resigned all the pleasures which wealth and a respectable position could obtain for her in the great city where she resided.

We looked around for Miss T., immediately on landing at Kaiserswerth, but no Miss T. was to be seen. We were conducted through the little town or village to a house where preparations were made for our reception. This was a proof that we were expected, and that Miss T. was still at Kaiserswerth.

We found a pleasant little room ready for us, in which all the furniture was white. The walls were whitewashed; the entire bedding, with the hangings, was as white as snow. For the rest, there was no ornament whatever. "This is the style of Kaiserswerth!" thought I to myself, and felt greatly pleased.

We ordered tea, seated ourselves, wondered whether anybody would come to look after us, and then determined to go out on a journey of discovery through the town. With that we heard a light, buoyant step upon the wooden stairs which led to our room; the door opened; a tall, classically-formed figure, in a high black dress, with an agreeable, beaming countenance, and the gayest and most friendly blue eyes, presented herself. My friend uttered an exclamation, sprang up, and she and the stranger embraced each other with the warmest affection. This was Miss T. I scarcely know whether I ever saw a more agreeable, kind, frank countenance, or a more cheerfully harmonious being than the one who stood before us.

In a short time, Miss T. conducted us to Fliedner's establishment. As she descended the stairs, she bounded down the last three steps. There was a something wonderfully buoyant, and, as it were, dancing in her whole figure, although perfectly developing all the solidity of youth and health. She unquestionably moved more lightly and with greater freedom of action than any other human being. She seemed, as it were, borne upon invisible wings.

Fliedner himself was from home this evening, and would not return till the following morning. His wife had not yet recovered from her recent confinement. We certainly had not arrived at Kaiserswerth under favorable circumstances.

In the reception-room, I saw the portrait of Gustavus Adolphus, and in the little book-case a volume on the same monarch, written by Fliedner himself, for the use of the people. It was now so dark that it was not possible this evening to see anything of the establishment. We were, however, invited to stay to supper. A couple of the gentlemen of the institution, the physician and the secretary, Miss T., two of the sisters, with Fliedner's eldest daughter, a merry little girl ten years old, seated themselves at the table, and these constituted our little party.

This simple meal brought to mind the banquets on the Rhine, by way of contrast.

The stars shone splendidly above our heads as we betook ourselves through the quiet streets of the little town to our inn, where we reposed pleasantly in our white beds. Miss W. had not found much opportunity for private conversation with her friend, but yet sufficient for her to discover how contented, how happy beyond all expectation, she was in her new circumstances; how she had found the best of fathers and friends in the so much dreaded Fliedner, and in his wife a sister and mother.

The following day we spent in making ourselves acquainted with the whole establishment, and with its numerous subdivisions. On every hand, we saw order and neatness; on every hand we met among the sisters bright and kind countenances. The hospital for children made the most lively impression upon me, because it was a happiness to see these little creatures, all of them suffering from diseases more or less severe, yet all of them cheerful and occupied; to hear them singing songs, and to see them, spite of distorted or diseased limbs, evidently merry and happy in themselves. One little girl, who was lame in her hands and arms, was sorting rags with her toes. Among upwards of twenty whom I saw assembled in a light and spacious hall, many were suffering from carious bone, a disease which is very prevalent in this district. The sister who had the care of these was a young woman with deep, affectionately beaming eyes, though of delicate appearance. She had been a sad invalid before she came hither, but had, she said, in consequence of her present great activity, been much better in health.

There were at this time eleven women in the Evangelical Asylum, who were brought hither from prison. They were each placed in a separate cell, which opened into a private passage, and two sisters always remained with them, one on each side of their cells. During the day they worked together, under the direction of the sisters, and were instructed in various kinds of employment.

The deaconess mother's house is the common dwelling of the sisters. Here they live, two and two, in little cell-like rooms, in which there is no other ornament than the utmost neatness. It is to this "mother-house" that they may return from foreign lands, when they require rest or when they are ill. It is here, also, that they may have a home, and be cared for when old age disables them from working and serving.

The sisters wear a uniform of dark blue cotton, spotted with white, with a white collar, and a simple white cap. A little lace border to the cap distinguishes the uninitiated sisters from the initiated, the proper deaconesses. In one room a young sister, who had lately come, sat alone making her dress, and another sister lay ill of consumption, but upon her peaceful countenance there was no trace of suffering. She looked calm and happy. The physician of the place is a man, but the office of apothecary is entirely filled by one of the deaconesses who has been duly instructed, and who has passed through an examination in her art. Assuredly the time will come when woman will study and practice the business of the physician. Nature seems to have intended them for the practice of the healing arts, and their bias thereto, aided by science, would be of incalculable service to humanity.

"In Queen Christina's time," relates the historian, Fryxell, "the duties of physician were mostly performed by wise women, and there were, at that time, very few sick in the country."

Miss W. and I were invited to take our afternoon coffee with the deaconesses. Thirty sisters in their blue and white dresses took their seats at a long table in a large hall, and I can with truth testify that I never before saw such an assembly of cheerful, kind, and peaceful countenances. A cup stood before each person; the coffee was contained in a tall earthenware pot, which was placed in the middle of the table. A silent thanksgiving was made by every one before taking their seats. There was then poured into each cup a grayish kind of liquid which was intended to represent coffee; but, as to the taste of coffee, it really did not possess that. Probably it was rye-coffee, mingled with milk. It was drunk without sugar, and I confess that it was with difficulty that I emptied my cup. The excellent deaconesses seemed, however, to drink with right good will this beverage, which no servant-maid in Sweden would touch. The bread, on the contrary, which was distributed round with the coffee, was remarkably nice, white, and beautiful. There was but little said, but that little was unconstrained, and full of cheerfulness. They soon, however, all left the table, some to go to their employments, others to chapel, for on this day there was afternoon service. My friend and I accompanied the latter. The chapel was of wood, a spacious room devoid of ornament, and without even an altar-cloth. The clergyman spoke of Mrs. Fry, and of works of benevolence in general, but in quite too declamatory a manner. I became unspeakably sleepy, and my friend slept. Here everything is removed from divine worship which is calculated to elevate and warm the mind, and an unusual degree of spiritual power is requisite to keep the mind awake, especially so soon after dinner. The strength of reason should come in to aid the meagreness of the mind, and the weakness of the body; but here is nothing which calls it forth.

In the afternoon, Fliedner returned. He is a middle-aged man, whose exterior exhibits a high degree of perseverance and firmness. His demeanor is grave, earnest, and simple. Towards evening, I was present at a lecture given by him to the young girls who are being educated for teachers of infant-schools. They are most of them the daughters of poor clergymen and schoolmasters, and are received here to go through a suitable course of instruction, after which they easily obtain situations which secure to them a useful life, and a sufficient income. There were at the lecture upwards of thirty of this class. If I were sleepy during the sermon, I was on this occasion wakeful enough; so lively was the pleasure which I experienced from Fliedner's mode of communicating instruction. He read a chapter from the book of Daniel, and at every verse inquired, "And what does this suggest for the edification of children?"

The manner and the tone of voice in which he himself made the reply were worthy of all admiration; and could not fail of making a strong impression on the young. In evidence of this, their eyes were riveted upon him with unbroken attention, whilst he called sometimes on one, and sometimes on another to give an answer. In the intervals they sang little songs, suitable for children. This mode of instruction was especially calculated to call forth and to develop the mental powers of these young girls.

My friend, who was not quite well, returned early to our lodgings in the town, accompanied by Miss T.; Fliedner gave me his company for the evening, as he saw that I wished it. And the kindness and candor with which he replied, even to some of my questions which might appear impertinent, when he saw my earnestness on the subject, I shall always remember with gratitude.

It was dark night when Fliedner had the goodness to accompany me to my inn. His great reverence for Gustavus Adolphus, and Oxenstierna, and the circumstance of his quoting their opinions in the course of our conversation, delighted me.

The following day was devoted to a still more extended survey of the institution; in conversation with the sisters in the sick-room, and amid their various avocations, I put to them my usual question, "Are you happy?" and received generally this candid answer, "Yes, we are happy. It is true, indeed, that we have our difficult moments, yes, very difficult; but the Lord helps us through them. We are contented; we are happy!" Many who formerly had suffered from bad health had here fully recovered health and strength.

The female superintendent of a hospital in Frankfort arrived on a visit, and it was affecting to hear the lively and kind inquiries of the sisters, "after those sisters who had been sent from Kaiserswerth to Frankfort." Other travelers also arrived; English countesses, German princes, American citizens, and all these had to be conducted through the whole establishment. The continued stream of travelers who came to Kaiserswerth "to see it," appeared to me one of the greatest of plagues; and I wonder that there are not one or two days in the week set apart for this specific purpose.

Again and again to-day, either in the sick-room or with strangers, we fell in with Miss T., and saw her always the same, always borne aloft on the same invisible wings; all her movements, words, and glances seemed inspired by I know not what gay and elevating harmony. And here, yes here, there was no mistake about it here, and in her person, had I found a happy human being.

She had not words to express the feeling of freedom, peace, and happiness which had filled her soul since she had come hither; since she had bidden adieu forever to the world, and all its pleasures, and had here determined her sphere of activity, her future life.

"I am so well, so cheerful, and so happy in mind!" said she, "it can hardly continue; that would be too much for this world!" Yes, thus had I dreamed to myself, thus had I imagined must be the happy human being. And now I had found her.

But this happiness was at this time very young, only a few months old. May it only still continue! say I, in the words of the amiable sisters. And now, if these words, written two years afterwards, should meet her eye, will she permit me to inquire, "Has it still continued?" And will she not vouchsafe to me an answer?

Early in the morning of the following day we left Kaiserswerth.

This great and unusually increasing establishment, supported entirely by voluntary donations and contributions, is a strong evidence of the ability of the manager, and of the spirit which influences him. It is this spirit, and such works as these, which powerfully bear witness that Christianity is not merely doctrine; not merely tradition; not merely historical narrative; but that, beyond everything else, it is a life, a living, animating, and life-producing vitality. It is that life of which the Chevalier Bunsen speaks, in his liberal and truly Christian work, on The Church of the Future. "Shoots of a new vitality," says he, "put forth from all sides, and reveal a life rich in hope for the future. The most astonishing and significant appear to be those within the dominion of the Church, and which have reference to the poor, the sick, and the prisoner. We are met by a multitude of men and women who have founded institutions for the reformation of the depraved, for the care of homeless children and orphans, for the consolation of the imprisoned and the sick, workers and co-operators, rich in pity and power; deaconesses, who perform the deeds of sisters of charity without their binding vows, in the entire freedom of apostolic life, and in the power of a free, because a grateful, sentiment of love. They who reflect that the office of deacon in the early Church failed because there was needed for its full development a community of feeling between clergy and laity, will now easily see how important is this fact in the history of the world, that, among the most vigorous shoots of a new vitality in the Church, the office of deacon, that of servant is the one which is pre-eminently so. This is the office of love, and, before every other, the office of the future Church. In this is the strongest element of the advancing Church; the pangs of whose birth we all experience. This is the community to which the groans of the animal world and the frightfully increasing woes of humanity appeal; this is the office which is open to all; this the confession of faith to which every one is called; this is the practice of that priesthood to which every Church gives permission; and in this is a central point from which alone every community of the future Church may advance towards its inner life."

I add to the above, and in this is the home, the sphere of operation, in which the poor and the mean of the world may become esteemed, noble, and useful members of the community; and not merely the unemployed of the lower, but those of higher class. "Our poor rich, our poor high-born young women," as Amalie Sieveking said, "may find here an opportunity for activity which would be beneficial both to society and to humanity, and without which they never would attain to." There is everywhere a superfluity of the unemployed, even in the higher regions of society; and if they here become servants, they at the same time are elevated to high-born in the kingdom of God, and even in the judgment of the world; for, although the world may ridicule and blame that which appears eccentric in these respects, it always secretly esteems them.

But let every one remain by his calling! This was vividly impressed on my mind when I, in Düsseldorf, entered a silent, dimly-lighted room, in which a number of the best pictures by modern artists were exhibited. I confess that in this little temple of art I shed tears of joy. I hardly myself knew why. It was highly gratifying to my Scandinavian sympathies to find that foremost among the landscape painters stands a Scandinavian, the Norwegian Gude. The scenery of his native country has inspired him, and he has here portrayed one of the romantic mountain tracts; but with how much fidelity to nature no words can describe. In order to increase the life of the picture, it was not necessary to have introduced the couple of bears which steal along, leaving behind them bloody traces. The whole of this scenery is pervaded with life; the air, the waterfall, the wood, the cliffs, the heath in the foreground, and that little fir-tree with its light-green and brilliant shoots. I could almost fancy I saw them growing!

Exquisite sea-pieces and genre pictures were numerous. This young school of painters seem to have turned themselves with great partiality to subjects taken from nature and from every-day life, and it is evident that this has been done with noble intention and love of truth.

But I must not omit to mention a picture of living and actual life, which I myself saw, and which must often be seen on the banks of the Rhine, as well as in seaport towns. That is, men, women, and children sitting grouped together among chests, packages, household goods, and every kind of implement of trade. They sit upon the shore waiting, with their eyes riveted upon the river. The children sleep or play about. Many of the women look as if they wept much; others play with the little children on their knees. "He knows nothing about it!" said one mother, whose little lad, full of the joyful activity of childhood, was dancing in her arms; and, as she said this, a few bright tears fell for the uncertain future of the child. "Look! the child, after all, can be merry!" said another mother, pointing with pleasure to her lively infant. Other women looked cheerful and resolute. The men sat smoking their pipes with German characteristic endurance. All were looking out, all were waiting. They were emigrants bound for America, and were waiting for the vessel which was to take them. Not unfrequently they have to wait thus beneath the open sky for many days and nights.

We hear a great deal about the sufferings of these poor emigrants. But why is not more done to obviate or alleviate them? Emigration cannot be prevented, and who would wish it, in these over-populated countries? Who does not see the necessity for this emigration, and recognize in it the plan by which Providence would people with a European stock those regions of the earth which are poor in their native race, although rich in the gifts of nature—South America, the great and glorious continent of Australia, and many other countries? Yes, it appears to me that I behold in emigration, and the establishment of such homes of mercy as that of Kaiserswerth, two important means of relief for the misery of the present time; but these both are still in their commencement, as yet only in their ascent.

May the first become more and more organised by wise governments, and thus be the means of infusing fresh air and fresh life into dwellings and into human souls rendered pestilent by swarming crowds and by want! And may the latter continue to develop themselves, and to extend into all countries, healing the wounds of humanity; and, as they advance, preparing the people to make their lives that universal sacrifice of praise which, says the youngest prophet of the Old Testament, shall one day ascend to heaven from all people on the face of the earth!

Institutions similar to that of Kaiserswerth have, within the last twenty years, silently arisen under various forms, and in numerous places of Germany and other countries. There are no longer, as formerly, secret orders and societies; but free associations between Christian-minded men and women for the instruction and the support of fallen or necessitous fellow-creatures. Of this class are Elizabeth's Hospital, at Berlin; the institution for poor scholars, at Bruggen; the one at Weimar, for destitute children, established by Joannes Falk; and another at Düsseldorf, by the brothers Adelbert and Werner von der Recke Vollmerstein, established immediately after the war, for the children whom it had left orphans; Martin's Institution, at Erfurt; the Rauche Haus, at Hamburg; Amalie von Sieveking's excellent Society of Ladies, in the same city, and many other associations and establishments of a similar character, testify that this new Christian life is vigorous in Germany. To them may be added the Gustavus Adolphus Societies, which are extending more and more over the whole of Germany, and which are the most beautiful living monuments which a great nation could raise to the hero king who conquered and who died in the cause of her spiritual freedom.

DISAPPOINTED HOPES.

ALL who have lived in the world long enough to attain any degree of maturity; long enough to lay plans, and found expectations and hopes upon these plans, have learned by experience that disappointment, in a greater or less degree, is the lot of all. It is true, there is a vast difference in the fortunes of mankind; for, while some are in the main successful, and experience vexations in the less important affairs of life only, others seem born to be, as Shakspeare expresses it, "the footballs of fortune," tossed to and fro continually. And not only is there a difference in the amount of misfortune which they are doomed to contend with, but there is also a great difference in the effect which disappointment produces upon different minds. Some sink paralyzed under its power, and remit all effort; while it only rouses others to more active exertions, seeming to create new energies to meet new emergencies. These remarks, however, apply more particularly to the disappointments of active life, and, as such, fall of course mostly upon men: the disappointments of the gentler sex are more frequently those of the affections, and therefore less apparent to observation and discussion, but perhaps not less difficult to bear on that account. Indeed, the very necessity which exists with all delicate minds for concealing such sorrows as far as possible, only adds to their poignancy. Disappointments of this kind are not unfrequent in the early life of woman, and their effects upon her are also various. With some it is a mere wounding of vanity and womanly sensibility, which is of course but a temporary grief; while with others it is the destruction of hopes long cherished and dear, the rending of which is like uprooting the foundations of life itself. But let not my unpracticed pen stray upon that ground which has been consecrated by the immortal author of the "Sketch Book." Besides, it is not of "broken hearts" that I wish to write; but the object of my humble tale is to show that such disappointments, even in hearts of exquisite delicacy and sensibility, may not only be often overcome, but that, like much of the discipline sent by our kind heavenly Father, they may in the end prove to have been "blessings in disguise."

"Mary, my dear! had you a pleasant party last night?" asked Mrs. Benson of her daughter, as the two sat sipping their coffee at the breakfast-table, which was spread—not, gentle reader, in some luxurious boudoir, into which the morning light streamed through silken curtains, after the manner of most romances—but in the neat and comfortable, but by no means magnificent back parlor of Mrs. Benson's modest mansion on ——— Street, in a city which shall be nameless.

"Oh yes, mamma! a delightful one," answered Mary, with much animation; and, as she looked up and met her mother's eye, she unconsciously blushed. This blush did not escape Mrs. Benson's attention; for, though Mary possessed one of those transparent complexions through which the "eloquent blood" delights to speak, she was not in the habit of blushing entirely without cause. Her mother, as we have said, noticed the blush, but made no comment, though she mused for a few moments. At length she said—

"Were there any strangers present?"

"Yes, mamma;" and she blushed again. "Miss Crawford and her brother, besides some others, whose names I do not recollect."

"And who are Mr. and Miss Crawford?"

"Oh! she is a very pretty young lady, and he—yes, he," added Mary, stammering a little, "is quite handsome too. They are, I believe, the son and daughter of a wealthy gentleman who has just come into the city to reside. At present they are staying at the ——— Hotel, but they have taken one of those fine houses on ——— Street for a residence; and when they get settled, mamma," continued Mary, "I wish you would persuade Aunt Lucy to go with you and call on Mrs. Crawford. They seem to be very pleasant people."

"I will think of it," said the mother; and here the conversation dropped; which was very well, as it affords us a desirable opportunity to introduce our heroine (for such, in a limited sense of the word, we intend Mary to be) to the acquaintance of our readers.

Mary Benson was the only child of a lawyer, who died in the prime of manhood, about six years before the commencement of our story, and when Mary was twelve years of age. Mr. Benson was a man of superior abilities, well cultivated, and, had he lived, would doubtless have acquired both fame and fortune; but, dying before his talents became generally known, or his professional practice very extensive, and, like many men of fine minds, possessing no peculiar faculty for acquiring property, he at his death left his family comparatively poor. The house in which they lived, and a sum of money loaned on good security, the income of which was merely sufficient for their comfortable support, were all they possessed. However, being connected with many families of wealth and influence, Mary and her mother had access to more aristocratic society, as it is generally termed, and occupied a higher position in social life, than their limited fortune would otherwise have entitled them to; for in our republican country, where people profess to repudiate all aristocracy, the aristocracy of money often obtains the high places of social life. Tant mieux.

Months rolled on. Mrs. Benson and Aunt Lucy (one of Mrs. Benson's fashionable sisters) had called upon Mrs. Crawford, as Mary requested. The call was returned, and succeeded by numerous other calls, visits, &c. In short, the two families had become very intimate, and the young people were almost inseparable. As for Edward Crawford, the marked attentions which he had shown Mary the first time they met, and which, as we have seen, caused her to blush at the mention of his name, had been continued to the present time. If there was a concert or public lecture of any kind, he expected to accompany her as much as he did his sister; and from all evening parties, to which she often went without her mother, who was an habitual invalid, he seemed to establish his right to escort her as a matter of course. Many were the expressive glances, the significant words, and the stolen pressures of the hand, which seemed to declare as plainly as language could have done, his passion and his intentions. Therefore, though he had never spoken of marriage, all looked upon it as a settled thing, and supposed a declaration would come in due time. Meanwhile, our gentle Mary—for gentle and good she truly was, as well as highly gifted and beautiful—had suffered her affections to become strongly fixed upon him. She saw him handsome, intelligent, and highly polished; she believed him to be all that was manly, generous, and noble. Regarding him as her affianced husband, she loved him fondly, and looked forward to the future with unsuspecting confidence and joy. It was during this state of things that Mrs. Benson and Mary left the city on a summer excursion for three or four weeks. The morning after their return, and just a year from the first introduction of the parties to our readers, the mother and daughter were again seated, at about the same hour of the day, at the breakfast-table, in the same room. Again Mrs. Benson asked the question which she asked before.

"Mary, had you a pleasant party last evening?"

And again her daughter replied as she had done before—"Yes, mamma."

But though the words were the same, the meaning seemed totally different. There was a hesitancy about Mary's manner which contrasted strongly with the alacrity with which she had spoken a year before, though she blushed as she had done at that time. Something was wrong, thought the mother, but she said nothing. After a few moments, Mary added—

"There were some strangers there, mamma. At least they were strangers to me, though a good many in the company seemed to know them—Mr. and Mrs. Downe, with their daughter."

"Oh yes," rejoined Mrs. Benson, "that is the family of whom Mrs. Forbes was speaking when she called here yesterday. They came into town while we were absent, and live next door to her. They are said to be immensely rich."

"I dare say they are; certainly they have all the airs which vulgar rich people are apt to assume," said Mary with a petulance very unusual to her amiable and even temper.

Again her mother thought something had gone wrong, but she did not speak. That evening it rained, and it had been Edward's almost invariable custom, for a long time, to spend the rainy evenings at Mrs. Benson's, as he knew that Mary seldom went out on such occasions; but that evening he did not come. Mary seemed ill at ease, though she tried to sew and converse in her usual manner. Once or twice the door-bell rang, and she looked up with a flushed face and an agitated manner, evidently hoping to see him enter; but it was only a servant with a note or message, and her hopes died away. Reader, the faithless Edward spent that evening at Mr. Downe's, playing the agreeable to Julia with as gay an air as he had ever worn. But we must go back a little to explain this change in the young man.

During the absence of Mrs. Benson and Mary, as has before been mentioned, Mr. Downe had come with his large family into the city, and taken up his residence not far from Mr. Crawford's. As report had said that he was "immensely rich," and as his family had all the appliances of wealth around them, their neighbors lost no time in making their acquaintance, and showering civilities upon them. Amid the straitlaced decorum and formality of society in our larger towns, a poor family may remain unnoticed forever; but even in this stagnant life, the coming of persons of unusual wealth creates a sensation. Such is the power of money. Of course Mr. Crawford's family were not behind their neighbors in making the acquaintance of the new-comers, and the young people were soon thrown much together. Julia Downe was a handsome girl—almost as handsome as Mary Benson—though infinitely her inferior in talent, education, and amability; and it was not long before Edward detected himself in some such train of thought as the following: "Julia is a fine-looking girl, quite as handsome as Mary, though certainly not quite so prepossessing; but then her fortune! I do really wish that Mary had a little more money. To be sure my father will give me something of a fortune, but not enough to support a family without the aid of my profession—and, to tell the plain truth to myself, I do hate my profession. (He might have added that he hated exertion of every kind.) Now if Mary had a fortune to unite with mine, I might live a life of ease and pleasure."

It was not long before this train of thought suggested the following: "Why cannot I marry Julia? I am really under no engagement of marriage to Mary." But here his conscience, though not very sensitive, gave him a little twinge, for he knew that in honor and justice he was as much bound to her as if a spoken, or even a written engagement, had been exchanged between them. Besides, he was attached to Mary, but, unhappily, still more fond of ease and money. However, when he had proceeded as far as this with his self-communings, it did not take him a very long time to overcome all his scruples, both of conscience and affection, and resolve to retrace his steps with the greatest possible haste. During this time, it may seem strange that weak and unprincipled as he showed himself to be, he did not experience any anxiety with regard to the effect which his desertion might have upon Mary. But this seems to be an error into which men of his stamp naturally fall. They judge of other hearts by their own, and consequently believe that all the tender emotions are weak, and of course easily effaced.

As we have said, Edward had resolved to transfer his attentions, not to say affections, to Julia; and the absence of Mary enabled him to set about it with less awkwardness than he could otherwise have done. Before the return of the latter, he had made such progress in his wooing that any attempts to recede would have been met by a prompt demand for explanation on the part of Mr. Downe; for, unlike poor Mary, Julia had a father to maintain and defend her rights.

When Mary, who was quite unconscious of the change in her prospects, returned home with her mother, it seemed a little surprising that Edward did not come to welcome her; and when the day passed without his appearance, she began to conjecture that he was out of town. That evening she attended the party, an invitation to which she found awaiting her return; and the first object which greeted her eyes, on entering the handsomely-lighted parlors, was her truant lover, seated on a sofa beside a splendidly-dressed young lady, a stranger to her, with whom he was carrying on an animated conversation. When he saw Mary, he colored and looked a little confused in spite of himself, but bowed and smiled, without speaking or endeavoring to approach her. She, poor girl, was shocked, and, having less self-possession than he, could not so well conceal her feelings. She turned pale, and, for a moment, seemed as if about to faint; but, recovering herself by a great effort, she followed her hostess to another part of the room, and found a seat. It was a trying evening. Edward never once came near her, and she could not help seeing, or fancying, that many in the room were watching her countenance with a curiosity not very far removed from impertinence. When, after an hour or two, she was, by change of places, brought beside Miss Downe, and introduced, that young lady, having received a hint that Mary had once been a rival, and perhaps fearing that she might, by bare possibility, become so again, treated her with all the coolness and contempt which a person making any pretensions to good breeding could exhibit. The party at length broke up, and Mary was escorted home by one of her young cousins and his sister, and retired to her chamber, to shed, we must confess, some bitter tears of disappointment and regret.

The events of the next day we have already recorded. From that time, Edward came no more to Mrs. Benson's, and Mary, who grew pale and pensive, and seemed to have lost her relish for society, but seldom went out. In the presence of her mother, she made a great effort to appear natural and at ease; but it was only too evident to the penetrating eye of parental affection that she suffered deeply, though uncomplainingly. Meanwhile, no word or comment on the transaction had been exchanged between the mother and daughter. Mrs. Benson felt an unwillingness to allude to a subject from which Mary obviously shrank. One day, however, a young lady called, and gave a most animated account of a party which she had attended, the evening before, at Mr. Downe's. The rooms were so brilliant, Julia's dress so becoming, and Mr. Crawford so devoted in his attentions, that everybody remarked it. She maliciously added that people thought they would soon be married; and, having given all this pleasant intelligence, and talked herself out of breath, took her leave. Mary, who had found it very difficult to control her feelings, the moment she was gone threw herself into a chair and burst into tears. Mrs. Benson no longer refrain from speaking. She drew a chair beside her daughter, and, taking her hand in her own, waited in silence till she became more composed. She then addressed her:—

"My dear child, I have too long delayed speaking to you on a subject which has been much in my thoughts, as well as your own. I have for some time seen that you are unhappy, but a kind of morbid delicacy has prevented my alluding to it. You, and I must confess I also, are disappointed in the conduct of Edward Crawford. You, probably, and certainly not without reason, looked upon him as your future husband, and permitted yourself to become strongly attached to him. Now, without any justifiable cause, you find yourself neglected, and apparently forgotten, and you suffer cruelly. My disappointment is of a different kind. I am not so much affected by the breaking off of the connection as I am by the change in the man; or rather by finding myself so much deceived in my estimate of him. I looked upon him as a man of one character; he proves to be of a totally different one. It is this view of the subject, my dear Mary," continued she, "which I hope may enable you to overcome your regret. In giving your affections to Edward, you gave them to one whom you believed to be not only gifted and pleasing in a high degree, as he certainly is, but, what is far more essential, a man of honorable feelings and fixed principles. This he has not proved to be, but quite the reverse; since to nothing but the most sordid and mercenary feelings can I attribute this change in him. Learn, then, to regard him in this, the true light, instead of investing him with all the perfections in which your youthful fancy had arrayed him, and you will soon cease to regret the loss of one whom you have ceased to respect. There is another view of the subject," added the judicious parent, "which I wish to present to you; for, though we should be governed by higher motives than the opinions of those around us, yet these should have their proper influence. You can easily see that your manners and appearance are the subject of observation, and probably of remark. You must learn, then, to exercise such a degree of self-control as shall preserve the respect of others, as well as your own self-esteem; and in order to do this, you must try to feel differently; for, with one so ingenuous and unpracticed as you are, the manners must necessarily be influenced by the feelings. Were it practicable, I would leave town with you for a time, to give you the aid of change of scene: but, as we have recently returned, we could not go again without exciting suspicions of our reasons: besides, I have confidence in you that your own mental firmness and dignity will be all that are necessary. I shall not mention this subject again," continued Mrs. Benson, rising, "but remember that, whatever may be your sufferings, I must sympathize most acutely;" and, kissing her daughter, she left the apartment.

From this time there was a perceptible change in Mary. She no longer drooped, and grieved in silence, but exerted herself to banish painful recollections by interesting herself in what was passing around her. She read, she walked, she busied herself with her needle, and, when inclined to despondency, cheered herself and her mother by a tune on the piano. For a time, she wisely avoided general society, lest she should meet Edward and his now betrothed, and all her painful associations be revived. By this course of mental discipline and effort, she obtained such mastery of her feelings as to be enabled to control herself perfectly, and gradually her thoughts ceased to revert to the subject at all; so that, when she heard of the marriage, which took place in about three months, it was almost with indifference; and when, after their return from the bridal tour, she met the newly-married pair, (for she had begun to mingle again in the world,) it was with unaffected dignity and composure.

As for Edward, he was not a little disappointed, as the reader may suppose, when his father-in-law, after the marriage, handed him a check for five thousand dollars, hinting that this was all he must expect, "as there were so many younger ones to provide for; and the truth was, he was not nearly so rich as people supposed."

Poor Edward! it seemed likely that he might be obliged to have recourse to his profession, after all; especially as his wife replied, on his making some economical suggestions, that she expected to be supported in the style to which she had always been accustomed, having married a rich man on purpose. He took a fine house; but, as it was in a different part of the city from that in which Mrs. Benson and Mary lived, they seldom met.

Four years passed away, and Edward Crawford, who was on the verge of bankruptcy, produced by his own indolence, and his wife's extravagance, was one evening pacing his parlor with a moody brow. His wife, seated by the centre-table, read the evening paper. Suddenly she exclaimed, "Listen, Edward! 'Married, this morning, at church, by the Right Rev. Bishop —, Hon. Henry Seymour, Member of Congress elect, to Miss Mary Benson, only daughter of Mrs. Ellen Benson, of this city.' Henry Seymour!" added Mrs. Crawford; "why he is as rich as a Jew!" Then, turning to her husband, she said, maliciously, "She has done as well as if she had married you."

His only reply was to snatch his hat and leave the room, closing the door behind him with a bang.

THE BRILLIANT AND THE COMMONPLACE.

BY MORTON COLMAN.

DAY after day I worked at my life-task, and worked in an earnest spirit. Not much did I seem to accomplish; yet the little that was done had on it the impress of good. Still, I was dissatisfied, because my gifts were less dazzling than those of which many around me could boast. When I thought of the brilliant ones sparkling in the firmament of literature, and filling the eyes of admiring thousands, something like the evil spirit of envy came into my heart and threw a shadow upon my feelings. I was troubled because I had not their gifts. I wished to shine with a stronger light. To dazzle, as well as to warm and vivify.

Not long ago, there came among us one whom nature had richly endowed. His mind possessed exceeding brilliancy. Flashes of thought, like lightning from a summer cloud, were ever filling the air around him. There was a stateliness in the movement of his intellect, and an evidence of power, that oppressed you at times with wonder.

Around him gathered the lesser lights in the hemisphere of thought, and veiled their feebler rays beneath his excessive brightness. He seemed conscious of his superior gifts, and displayed them more like a giant beating the air to excite wonder than putting forth his strength to accomplish a good and noble work. Still, I was oppressed and paralyzed by the sphere of his presence. I felt puny and weak beside him, and unhappy because I was not gifted with equal power.

It so happened that a work of mine, upon which the maker's name was not stamped—work done with a purpose of good—was spoken of and praised by one who did not know me as the handicraftsman.

"It is tame, dull, and commonplace," said the brilliant one, in a tone of contempt; and there were many present to agree with him.

Like the strokes of a hammer upon my heart, came these words of condemnation. "Tame, dull, and commonplace!" And was it, indeed, so? Yes; I felt that what he had uttered was true. That my powers were exceedingly limited, and my gifts few. Oh, what would I not have then given for brilliant endowments like those possessed by him from whom had fallen the words of condemnation?

"You will admit," said one—I thought it strange at the time that there should be even one to speak a word in favor of my poor performance—"that it will do good?"

"Good!" was answered, in a tone slightly touched by contempt. "Oh yes; it will do good!" and the brilliant one tossed his head. "Anybody can do good!"

I went home with a perturbed spirit. I had work to do; but I could not do it. I sat down and tried to forget what I had heard. I tried to think about the tasks that were before me. "Tame, dull, and commonplace!" Into no other form would my thoughts come.

Exhausted, at last, by this inward struggle, I threw myself upon my bed, and soon passed into the land of dreams.

Dream-land! Thou art thought by many to be only a land of fantasy and of shadows. But it is not so. Dreams, for the most part, are fantastic; but all are not so. Nearer are we to the world of spirits, in sleep; and, at times, angels come to us with lessons of wisdom, darkly veiled under similitude, or written in characters of light.

I passed into dream-land; but my thoughts went on in the same current. "Tame, dull, and commonplace!" I felt the condemnation more strongly than before.

I was out in the open air, and around me were mountains, trees, green fields, and running waters; and above all bent the sky in its azure beauty. The sun was just unveiling his face in the east, and his rays were lighting up the dew-gems on a thousand blades of grass, and making the leaves glitter as if studded with diamonds.

"How calm and beautiful!" said a voice near me. I turned, and one whose days were in the "sear and yellow leaf" stood by my side.

"But all is tame and commonplace," I answered. "We have this over and over again, day after day, month after month, and year after year. Give me something brilliant and startling, if it be in the fiery comet or the rushing storm. I am sick of the commonplace!"

"And yet to the commonplace the world is indebted for every great work and great blessing. For everything good, and true, and beautiful!"

I looked earnestly into the face of the old man. He went on.

"The truly good and great is the useful; for in that is the Divine image. Softly and unobtrusively has the dew fallen, as it falls night after night. Silently it distilled, while the vagrant meteors threw their lines of dazzling light across the sky, and men looked up at them in wonder and admiration. And now the soft grass, the green leaves, and the sweet flowers, that drooped beneath the fervent heat of yesterday, are fresh again and full of beauty, ready to receive the light and warmth of the risen sun, and expand with a new vigor. All this may be tame and commonplace; but is it not a great and a good work that has been going on?

"The tiller of the soil is going forth again to his work. Do not turn your eyes from him, and let a feeling of impatience stir in your heart because he is not a soldier rushing to battle, or a brilliant orator holding thousands enchained by the power of a fervid eloquence that is born not so much of good desires for his fellow-men as from the heat of his own self-love. Day after day, as now, patient and hopeful, the husbandman enters upon the work that lies before him, and, hand in hand with God's blessed sunshine, dews, and rain, a loving and earnest co-laborer, brings forth from earth's treasure-house of blessings good gifts for his fellow-men. Is all this commonplace? How great and good is the commonplace!"

I turned to answer the old man, but he was gone. I was standing on a high mountain, and beneath me, as far as the eye could reach, were stretched broad and richly cultivated fields; and from a hundred farm-houses went up the curling smoke from the fires of industry. Fields were waving with golden grain, and trees bending with their treasures of fruit. Suddenly, the bright sun was veiled in clouds, that came whirling up from the horizon in dark and broken masses, and throwing a deep shadow over the landscape just before bathed in light. Calmly had I surveyed the peaceful scene spread out before me. I was charmed with its quiet beauty. But now, stronger emotions stirred within me.

"Oh, this is sublime!" I murmured, as I gazed upon the cloudy hosts moving across the heavens in battle array.

A gleam of lightning sprang forth from a dark cavern in the sky, and then, far off, rattled and jarred the echoing thunder. Next came the rushing and roaring wind, bending the giant-limbed oaks as if they were but wands of willow, and tearing up lesser trees as a child tears up from its roots a weed or flower.

In this war of elements I stood, with my head bared, and clinging to a rock, mad with a strange and wild delight.

"Brilliant! Sublime! Grand beyond the power of description!" I said, as the storm deepened in intensity. "An hour like this is worth all the commonplace, dull events of a lifetime!"

There came a stunning crash in the midst of a dazzling glare. For some moments I was blinded. When sight was restored, I saw, below me, the flames curling upward from a dwelling upon which the fierce lightning had fallen.

"What majesty! what awful sublimity!" said I, aloud. I thought not of the pain, and terror, and death that reigned in the human habitation upon which the bolt of destruction had fallen, but of the sublime power displayed in the strife of elements.

There was another change. I no longer stood on the mountain, with the lightning and tempest around me; but was in the valley below, down upon which the storm had swept with devastating fury. Fields of grain were level with the earth; houses destroyed; and the trophies of industry marred in a hundred ways.

"How sublime are the works of the tempest!" said a voice near me. I turned, and the old man was again at my side.

But I did not respond to his words.

"What majesty! What awful sublimity and power!" continued the old man. "But," he added, in a changed voice, "there is a higher power in the gentle rain than lies in the rushing tempest. The power to destroy is an evil power, and has bounds beyond which it cannot go. But in the gentle rain that falls noiselessly to the earth, is the power of restoration and recreation. See!"

I looked, and a man lay upon the ground apparently lifeless. He had been struck down by the lightning. His pale face was upturned to the sky, and the rain, shaken free from the cloudy skirts of the retiring storm, was falling upon it. I continued to gaze upon the face of the prostrate man, until there came into it a flush of life. Then his limbs quivered; he threw his arms about. A groan issued from his constricted chest. In a little while, he arose.

"Which is best? Which is most to be loved and admired?" said the old man. "The wild, fierce, brilliant tempest, or the quiet rain that restores the images of life and beauty which the tempest has destroyed? See! The gentle breezes are beginning to move over the fields, and, hand in hand with the uplifting sunlight, to raise the grain that has been trodden beneath the crushing heel of the tempest, whose false sublimity you so much admired. There is nothing startling and brilliant in this work; but it is a good and a great work, and it will go on silently and efficiently until not a trace of the desolating storm can be found. In the still atmosphere, unseen, but all-potent, lies a power ever busy in the work of creating and restoring; or, in other words, in the commonplace work of doing good. Which office would you like best to assume—which is the most noble—the office of the destroyer or the restorer?"

I lifted my eyes again, and saw men busily engaged in blotting out the traces of the storm, and in restoring all to its former use and beauty. Builders were at work upon the house which had been struck by lightning, and men engaged in repairing fences, barns, and other objects upon which had been spent the fury of the excited elements. Soon every vestige of the destroyer was gone.

"Commonplace work, that of nailing on boards and shingles," said the old man; "of repairing broken fences; of filling up the deep foot-prints of the passing storm; but is it not a noble work? Yes; for it is ennobled by its end. Far nobler than the work of the brilliant tempest, which moved but to destroy."

The scene changed once more. I was back again from the land of dreams and similitudes. It was midnight, and the moon was shining in a cloudless sky. I arose, and, going to the window, sat and looked forth, musing upon my dream. All was hushed as if I were out in the fields, instead of in the heart of a populous city. Soon came the sound of footsteps, heavy and measured, and the watchman passed on his round of duty. A humble man was he, forced by necessity into his position, and rarely thought of and little regarded by the many. There was nothing brilliant about him to attract the eye and extort admiration. The man and his calling were commonplace. He passed on; and, as his form left my eye, the thought of him passed from my mind. Not long after, unheralded by the sound of footsteps, came one with a stealthy, crouching air; pausing now, and listening; and now looking warily from side to side. It was plain that he was on no errand of good to his fellow-men. He, too, passed on, and was lost to my vision.

Many minutes went by, and I still remained at the window, musing upon the subject of my dream, when I was startled by a cry of terror issuing from a house not far away. It was the cry of a woman. Obeying the instinct of my feelings, I ran into the street and made my way hurriedly towards the spot from which the cry came.

"Help! help! murder!" shrieked a woman from the open window.

I tried the street door of the house; but it was fastened. I threw myself against it with all my strength, and it yielded to the concussion. As I entered the dark passage, I found myself suddenly grappled by a strong man, who threw me down and held me by the throat. I struggled to free myself; but in vain. His grip tightened. In a few moments I would have been lifeless. But, just at the instant when consciousness was about leaving me, the guardian of the night appeared. With a single stroke of his heavy mace, he laid the midnight robber and assassin senseless upon the floor.

How instantly was that humble watchman ennobled in my eyes! How high and important was his use in society! I looked at him from a new standpoint, and saw him in a new relation.

"Commonplace!" said I, on regaining my own room in my own house, panting from the excitement and danger to which I had been subjected. "Commonplace! Thank God for the commonplace and the useful!"

Again I passed into the land of dreams, where I found myself walking in a pleasant way, pondering the theme which had taken such entire possession of my thoughts. As I moved along, I met the gifted one who had called my work dull and commonplace; that work was a simple picture of human life, drawn for the purpose of inspiring the reader with trust in God and love towards his fellow-man. He addressed me with the air of one who felt that he was superior, and led off the conversation by a brilliant display of words that half concealed, instead of making clear, his ideas. Though I perceived this, I was yet affected with admiration. My eyes were dazzled as by a glare of light.

"Yes, yes," I sighed to myself; "I am dull, tame, and commonplace beside these children of genius. How poor and mean is the work that comes from my hands!"

"Not so!" said my companion. I turned to look at him; but the gifted being stood not by my side. In his place was the ancient one who had before spoken to me in the voice of wisdom.

"Not so!" he continued. "Nothing that is useful is poor and mean. Look up! In the fruit of our labor is the proof of its quality."

I was in the midst of a small company, and the gifted being whose powers I had envied was there, the centre of attraction and the observed of all observers. He read to those assembled from a book; and what he read flashed with a brightness that was dazzling. All listened in the most rapt attention, and, by the power of what the gifted one read, soared now, in thought, among the stars, spread their wings upon the swift-moving tempest, or descended into the unknown depths of the earth. As for myself, my mind seemed endowed with new faculties, and to rise almost into the power of the infinite.

"Glorious! Divine! Godlike!" Such were the admiring words that fell from the lips of all.

And then the company dispersed. As we went forth from the room in which we had assembled, we met numbers who were needy, and sick, and suffering: mourners, who sighed for kind words from the comforter: little children, who had none to love and care for them: the faint and weary, who needed kind hands to help them on their toilsome journey. But no human sympathies were stirring in our hearts. We had been raised, by the power of the genius we so much admired, far above the world and its commonplace sympathies. The wings of our spirits were still beating the air, far away in the upper regions of transcendent thought.

Another change came. I saw a woman reading from the same book from which the gifted one had read. Ever and anon she paused, and gave utterance to words of admiration.

"Beautiful! beautiful!" fell, ever and anon, from her lips; and she would lift her eyes, and muse upon what she was reading. As she sat thus, a little child entered the room. He was crying.

"Mother! mother!" said the child, "I want——"

But the mother's thoughts were far above the regions of the commonplace. Her mind was in a world of ideal beauty. Disturbed by the interruption, a slight frown contracted on her beautiful brows as she arose and took her child by the arm to thrust it from the room.

A slight shudder went through my frame as I marked the touching distress that overspread the countenance of the child as it looked up into its mother's face and saw nothing there but an angry frown.

"Every thought is born of affection," said the old man as this scene faded away, "and has in it the quality of the life that gave it birth; and when that thought is reproduced in the mind of another, it awakens its appropriate affection. If there had been a true love of his neighbor in the mind of the gifted one when he wrote the book from which the mother read, and if his purpose had been to inspire with human emotions—and none but these are God-like—the souls of men, his work would have filled the heart of that mother with a deeper love for her child, instead of freezing in her bosom the surface of love's celestial fountain. To have hearkened to the grief of that dear child, and to have ministered to its comfort, would have been a commonplace act, but, how truly noble and divine! And now, look again, and let what passes before you give strength to your wavering spirits."

I lifted my eyes, and saw a man reading, and I knew that he read that work of mine which the gifted one had condemned as dull, and tame, and commonplace. And, moreover, I knew that he was in trouble so deep as to be almost hopeless of the future, and just ready to give up his life-struggle, and let his hands fall listless and despairing by his side. Around him were gathered his wife and his little ones, and they were looking to him, but in vain, for the help they needed.

As the man read, I saw a light come suddenly into his face. He paused and seemed musing for a time; then his eyes gleamed quickly upwards, and as his lips parted these words came forth: "Yes, yes; it must be so. God is merciful as he is wise, and will not forsake his creatures. He tries us in the fires of adversity but to consume the evil of our hearts. I will trust him, and again go forth, with my eyes turned confidently upwards." And the man went forth in the spirit of confidence in Heaven, inspired by what I had written.

"Look again," said the one by my side.

I looked, and saw the same man in the midst of a smiling family. His countenance was full of life and happiness, for his trust had not been in vain. As I had written, so he had found it. God is good, and lets no one feel the fires of adversity longer than is necessary for his purification from evil.

"Look again!" came like tones of music to my ear.

I looked, and saw one lying upon a bed. By the lines upon his brow, and the compression of his lips, it was evident that he was in bodily suffering. A book lay near him; it was written by the gifted one, and was full of bright thoughts and beautiful images. He took it, and tried to forget his pain in these thoughts and images. But in this he did not succeed, and soon laid it aside with a groan of anguish. Then there was handed to him my poor and commonplace work; and he opened the pages and began to read. I soon perceived that an interest was awakened in his mind. Gradually the contraction of his brow grew less severe, and, in a little while, he had forgotten his pain.

"I will be more patient," said he, in a calm voice, after he had read for a long time with a deep interest. "There are many with pain worse than mine to bear, who have none of the comforts and blessings so freely scattered along my way through life."

And then he gave directions to have relief sent to one and another whom he now remembered to be in need.

"It is a good work that prompts to good in others," said the old man. "What if it be dull and tame—commonplace to the few—it is a good gift to the world, and thousands will bless the giver. Look again!"

An angry mother, impatient and fretted by the conduct of a froward child, had driven her boy from her presence, when, if she had controlled her own feelings, she might have drawn him to her side and subdued him by the power of affection. She was unhappy, and her boy had received an injury.

The mother was alone. Before her was a table covered with books, and she took up one to read. I knew the volume; it was written by one whose genius had a deep power of fascination. Soon the mother became lost in its exciting pages, and remained buried in them for hours. At length, after turning the last page, she closed the book; and then came the thought of her wayward boy. But, her feelings toward him had undergone no change; she was still angry, because of his disobedience.

Another book lay upon the table; a book of no pretensions, and written with the simple purpose of doing good. It was commonplace, because it dealt with things in the common life around us. The mother took this up, opened to the title-page, turned a few leaves, and then laid it down again; sat thoughtful for some moments, and then sighed. Again she lifted the book, opened it, and commenced reading. In a little while she was all attention, and ere long I saw a tear stealing forth upon her cheek. Suddenly she closed the book, evincing strong emotion as she did so, and, rising up, went from the room. Ascending to a chamber above, she entered, and there found the boy at play. He looked towards her, and, remembering her anger, a shadow flitted across his face. But his mother smiled and looked kindly towards him. Instantly the boy dropped his playthings, and sprung to her side. She stooped and kissed him.

"Oh, mother! I do love you, and I will try to be good!"

Blinding tears came to my eyes, and I saw this scene no longer. I was out among the works of nature, and my instructor was by my side.

"Despise not again the humble and the commonplace," said he, "for upon these rest the happiness and well-being of the world. Few can enter into and appreciate the startling and the brilliant, but thousands and tens of thousands can feel and love the commonplace, that comes to their daily wants, and inspires them with a mutual sympathy. Go on in your work. Think it not low and mean to speak humble, yet true and fitting words for the humble; to lift up the bowed and grieving spirit; to pour the oil and wine of consolation for the poor and afflicted.

It is a great and a good work—the very work in which God's angels delight. Yea, in doing this work, you are brought nearer in spirit to Him who is goodness and greatness itself, for all his acts are done with the end of blessing his creatures."

There was another change. I was awake. It was broad daylight, and the sun had come in and awakened me with a kiss. Again I resumed my work, content to meet the common want in my labors, and let the more gifted and brilliant ones around me enjoy the honors and fame that gathered in cloudy incense around them.

It is better to be loved by the many, than admired by the few.

MODEL COTTAGE.

Dwelling for a small family.

Accommodation.—It contains on the ground-floor, an entrance-porch or lobby, a; a wash-house, with a place for an oven to heat the kitchen-floor with a flue, b; a kitchen or living room, c; a large closet under the staircase, d; a pantry, e; fuel-house, f; water-closet, g; closet, h.

The chamber-floor contains a bedroom, i; a clothes or lumber closet, k; child's bedroom, l; and staircase, m.

General Estimate.—9,528 feet, at ten cents per foot, $952 80; at five cents, $476 40.

POETRY.

LINES ON LONGFELLOW'S "HYPERION."

How sweet at summer midnight, when the universe is still,
And starlight and the moonlight roam over it at will;
When Silence reigns omnipotent, and naught that lives may stir—

But all things pause in awe, and kneel submissively to her;

Save now and then, as mournfully the pinions of the breeze Brush, with a rustling motion, o'er the branches of the trees;

And tell them tales of sorrow they have heard beyond the main,

In strange, wild lands of beauty they may never see again:

How sweet, on such a night as this, to feel the golden streams

Of music mingling in our sleep, and kissing us in dreams!
Which bear us from the crazy world, till meets the dazzled eye

The sapphire walls of Heaven and the splendor of the sky!

We lie in blissful transport, and drink in with ear and soul
The soft, bewitching melodies that o'er our spirits roll;
And people air, and earth, and sky with beings not of clay,
More wondrous than the angels, and as glorious as they.

We dream it is a dream we have, "and yet not all a dream,"
And wish that it may stay with us, and thus forever seem:
But even while the glory lasts we feel a change begin—
The vision fades, the music ceases, the daylight breaking in.

We rise and pace the paths of men, and mingle with the tide
That hurries on forever to the ocean yawning wide:
But ever 'mid the tumult and amidst the hum of life
That vision, and the melody, and memory are rife.

Even so in waking slumber, when our buoyant hopes depart,
And sadness spreads a veil between the sunlight and the heart,

And we are almost dead to life, and would the gloomy day,
With all its crushing troubles, were forever passed away;

We sometimes hear a strain arise, so tremulous and far,
It seems a whisper of the saints who throned in glory are:
And nearer comes and lovelier, till sinks the soul beneath
The deep and crystal river, like a star in morning's sheath.

Not music this of sound that charms, but music of the brain—

Discours'd through books as instruments, nor ever heard in vain:

And played by skillful players, such as most have touched the keys,

Who know the best to form the notes which cannot fail to please.

High is this mental melody above all else to me,
And one there is who breathes it oft, and so exquisitely,
That I could pause to hear it in the mighty "world to be"—
May choicest blessings ever fall, brave Longfellow, on thee!

As when we hear of nightingales, or birds of paradise,
Of ice-environed vultures, or of eagles of the skies,
And know they must be noble, as their very names imply.
Great spirits that would be alone, alone would clear the sky:

So, when we list to other names, to names of books or men—
So different from the millions, they are ne'er forgot again—
We fancy there is something great, distinguishing, profound,
Like grandeur to the thunder's roar, attaching to the sound.

Thus is "Hyperion" apart; and, though the mind at first May think that something beautiful from every page will burst,

Yet, when the Rubicon is crossed, shall thought and soul and sense

First know its depths of interest, how absorbingly intense.

And when the spell is broken, and we heave a sigh of pain,
That ne'er by such another we may be enthralled again;
It seems to follow after us, and in the distance gleams,
Like the glory of the angels, through the iv'ry gate of dreams.

THE SLEEPING BEAUTY.

AN INCIDENT.

BY W. WALLACE DAVIS.

WALKING with a friend one night,
 When Luna's beams were out of sight,
 And only little stars were winking, winking on the world below;
 Many gentle couples moving
 Back and forth, in whispers loving,
 Seemed to utter a reproach because we did together go,
 Instead of having each a lady—
 Each a charming, gentle lady,
 Slowly walking, gently talking—entertaining belle and beau:
 We approached a well-known dwelling,
 And with bosoms beating, swelling,
 Straight into the porch and parlor without knocking did we go.

Both our hearts were wildly beating
 At the prospect soon of meeting Eyes as bright as diamonds glowing in Golconda's famous mine;
 When, upon a chair reclining,
 Unto sleep her thoughts resigning,
 Sleeping as she sat, and smiling—smiling in her dreams divine—
 Looking as if "distant Aiden"
 Had but loaned the sleeping maiden Unto earth for some rare purpose which no mortal could define—
 Saw we one whose presence often
 Served our sterner thoughts to soften,
 In that parlor, all unconscious that we worshipped at her shrine.

Every grace in perfect keeping;
 Heavens! (thought I,) if, when sleeping,
 So much beauty, such perfection, are unconsciously displayed,
 What, oh! what must be her powers
 In her wakeful, thoughtful hours,
 When her eye, with all its fire, comes that witching smile to aid;
 When she tries a heart to waken
 By the means so often taken—Practiced both in jest and earnest by each matron and each maid—
 To bewilder so the lover
 That his eyes may not discover
 Aught but angel, yet uncertain of her power, of her grade?

Then her eyelids gently raising,
 And upon us softly gazing
 With a glance whose magic power memory evermore shall keep;
 With a smile that lent attraction;
 With a sudden graceful action;
 With a half-excusing sentence, in a tone so rich and deep,
 Bids us welcome, and then, chatting,
 So bound up our spirits that, in After dreams, recumbent Graces upon silv'ry clouds did sleep;
 Visions bright were set before us,
 Holy feelings crowded o'er us,
 Angels round us did assemble—did their watchful vigils
 keep.
Norfolk, Va.

SONG.—TO AN ABSENT ONE

BY VIRGINIUS HUTCHEN.

I KNOW not where thy parents be,
 Or where thy lot is cast;
 My mem'ry can but trace for me
 The home where we met last:
 Time's never-pausing wing hath borne
 Eight weary years away—
 And I seem living but to mourn
 Their fleeting and decay.

I have missed thee, loved one, long—
 My heart's a hermit's now;
 I cannot hear thy low, sweet song—
 I cannot kiss thy brow;
 That brow, which snow-drops blushed to see—
 Those cheeks with roses set—
 That they are gone now saddens me—
 Their absence wakes regret.

I love thee as the Naiads love
 Their crystal-flowing streams;
 I see thee, where no feet may rove,
 In the fairy Land of Dreams;
 I hear thy voice in every breeze
 That hymns a tune to even;
 And then my spirit mounts and flees
 To seek thine in the heaven.

The stars of night (her eyes that shine),
 And their concave of blue,
 Remind me of those orbs of thine,
 And their cerulean hue;
 And vines that twine, in garden bowers,
 Around some favorite tree,
 Remind me of those halcyon hours
 When my arms encircled thee.

When I clasped, I loved thee, idol one,
 As the song-birds love sweet May;
 But passion burneth as the sun
 Since thou art gone away.
 Thy mem'ry lingers with me still,
 Though I know not where thou art;
 Thy own is still the hand to trill
 The "harp-strings of my heart!"

SOFTLY O'ER MY SPIRIT STEALING.

BY V. R. F.

SOFTLY o'er my spirit stealing,
 Comes the spell of memory
 Softly, like the moonlight gleaming
 O'er the slumbers of the sea;
 Softly, like soft billows lav'ing
 On the dim and distant shore,
 When the waves have ceased their heaving,
 And the tempest ceased its roar.

Like soft music sweetly blending
 Sadness with its strains of light;
 Like the pensive stars now lending
 Lustre to the gloom of night;
 Like the dreamy twilight flinging
 Shadows o'er the flow'ry lea;
 Pensive as the night-bird's singing,
 Are the charms of memory!

THE ENGLISH LAND.

[Written off England.]

BY NADEEMDA.

HURRAH! hurrah! for the Englishman!

He loveth his land full well!

Yet why he loveth the Ocean Isle,

Oh, how can a Yankee tell?

He loveth it for its bright-green fields,

Each lovely hill and dale,

Its running streams, with their flowery banks

That such sweet perfumes exhale.

He loveth it for its ancient piles,

Its castles high in air,

Where the belted Earl, in the hour of war,

Embowered his lodge fair.

He loveth it for its holy heights,

The Rolem or old Minster's wall,

Where they worshipped in the olden time,

Though they quailed 'neath the despot's thrall.

The lordly castle hath inmates few,

And now when its halls they greet,

'Tis not to be safe from the warrior band,

But for revelry they meet.

And, oh! where is now the ghostly throng

That the minster's aisles once trod?

They are gone—all gone from their ancient haunts;

Their spirits—all fled to God!

Then hurrah! hurrah! for the Ocean Isle!

Its cliffs may we soon behold!

And then may ye find, when your hearts are warm,

A Yankee's cannot be cold.

For, England, our mother-land art thou!

And thy truant children we!

Then scorn us not that we've rent the band,

And rebelled that we might be free.

MEMORIES.

BY HELEN HAMILTON.

A DRAUGHT from Lethe's sunless wave,

Oh, were it mine to drain!

'Twould still the fevered agony

That throbs within my brain.

'Twould blot from out my heart a name

Too deeply graven there;

A name I dare not utter now,

Not even in a prayer.

But, oh! forgetfulness is not

A boon to mortals given;

We hear the echoes of past griefs

Till they are hushed in Heaven.

And Sorrow's icy waves still drown

My life beneath their flow,

For Memory liveth in my heart,

Where Hope died—long ago!

Yet I must smile before the world,

And gayly play my part;

I wear the roses on my brow—

The thorns are in my heart!

TO A BUTTERFLY.

BY CORNELIA J. ORSE.

VAIN creature! why fatigue your wing

In ceaseless sport upon the gale?

The lustre of the budding Spring,

Like yonder cloud's, will quickly fall!

The crimson cup in which you feast,

Your dewy drink upon the thorn,

Will close before the reddening east,

And vanish with the glowing morn.

Upon the lovely virgin rose,

That wooes a while your amorous stay,

The burning god will soon repose,

And ravish all her sweets away.

The blush that beams on Nature's cheek,

Her breath which now embalms the grove,

A little while, you'll vainly seek—

A little while, you'll cease to love.

The song of each responsive bird,

The murmur of the shady stream,

Shall soon, alas! no more be heard,

Or shed a soft enchanting dream.

The Summer's rays shall Spring disarm,

Exhale each verdant fountain dry,

Dissolve the rose's fragrant charm,

And bid the purple tulip die.

Or if the scorching solar ray

Should spare the lily's pallid flower,

Autumnal storms shall sweep away

Each lingering trace of vernal power.

The choral strains will then be hushed;

The vivid landscape smile no more;

The sparkling fount that, living, gushed,

Shall cease its nectared lymph to pour.

Nature her woes must then prolong,

And every sound her plaints repeat;

The moaning blast her funeral song—

The snow-drift be her winding-sheet.

Gay insect! why so careless still,

And waste your rainbow bias in air?

Autumn your fluttering breast will chill!

Stern Winter spread your frozen bier!

Thus man a phantom life enjoys,

And, reckless of his future doom,

Sports for a while with fading toys—

And then descends into the tomb!

TO THE ORIOLE.

BY H. B. WILDMAN.

O song, my little minstrel bird,

And let me in thy bower recline;

For ne'er have I in forest heard

Such sweet and silvery tones as thine!

Now Nature, from her azure dome,

Looks brightly out upon the sea;

The streamlet, from its mountain home,

Goes merry dancing to the sea.

The winds are hushed in soft repose;
The summer sky is beaming fair;
The bee is folded in the rose,
Or rocking in his lily lair.

Morn's censer-urn a fragrance breathes,
O'er dewy lawn and flowery bed;
The dewdrops hang in diamond wreaths
Around thy little minstrel shed.

The lark, in yonder hazel-bush,
Is closing up his morning strain;
The blackbird and the merry thrush
Seem waiting for thy song again.

Then let thy music float along
Upon the spicy-breathing air;
For while I hear the liquid song,
My soul forgets to dream of care.

From yonder temple-rearing pine,
Dear minstrel, let thy numbers flow;
Oh! let this breaking heart of mine,
In hearing thee, forget its woe.

EVENING HYMN.

BY JULIETTE ST. L. H. BEACH.

DAY is gone, and shadows deep
Noiselessly around us creep;
Silent snow-flakes, meek and soft,
Are sleepily floating from aloft;
And my heavy eyelids fall
Like a curtain, hiding all.
I am weary—let me rest,
Nestled closely in thy breast.

Yet, before we fold our hands,
And in sleep's delicious lands
Send our dreaming souls to roam,
And bring back some heavenly tone,
Pray thou to our gentle Father—
Pray for thee and me together;
Sleep thou, then, and angels bright
Guard thy slumbers well—Good-night!

There will come a longer night,
Colder sky, and dimmer light,
When these eyes shall darkly close
Under lids as pale as snows:
In that coming night of gloom,
In that breathless sleep of doom,
Saviour, on thy pitying breast
Let thy weary trembler rest.

TO THE SPIRIT OF BEAUTY.

THE ancient bards, in their devotion, sought
Fountains of beauty; and, thereafter, true
To the divinity which in them wrought,
From Beauty only inspiration drew.
All elements that unto life belong,
The valor and the love of gods divine,
Were blent in beauty in the deathless song
Of the first masters of the tuneful Nine;
Who, when the art, ideal, was rude and young,
And lofty beauty its unbroken lore
Inspired, to the entranced nations sung
Their glorious epics of primeval war;

The strife of heroes of gigantic mould,
Who dwelt enthroned, and guided battles when
The gods from clouds—so runs the fable old—
Came down and mingled in the feuds of men.

Spirit of Beauty! thou that didst inspire,
Coeval with the infancy of Time,
The prophet's vision and the poet's lyre
With wisdom and with melody sublime,
Still, as of old, thou hast thy shrines and fountains,
And temples in dense groves of odorous trees;
Thy thrones far distant on the cloudy mountains,
And palaces in the enchanted seas!
And evermore, as in the days of old,
The fancy of the bards embodied thee
In every beautiful image they beheld,
Engraven on the earth, or sky, or sea.
Thy form ethereal to the poet's eyes,
Nor in his dreams alone, unveiled appears;
Nor yet as unto men in mysteries,
Its splendor dim as stars beheld through tears.

And still, as ancient bards, by thee inspired,
In tuneful song the deathless fable made,
How quivered Dian, by his beauty fired,
Awoke Endymion dreaming in the shade—
All after poets, enamored of the theme,
Therefrom new beauty, with new art, create;
Unfold some mystery of the Latman's dream,
Some ecstasy of his imagined state.
And still, as in their song the "bards sublime,"
Who first thine unveiled presence did behold,
Have made their own a consecrated clime,
With the great fable of the gods of old—
So, in the centuries and the years that make
The train of ages, some high bards have sung,
The echoes of whose strain not yet forsake
The mountains and the groves they dwelt among.

CRAZY AGNES.

BY ANSON G. CHESTER.

A PALE, sweet face, and a mournful eye,
As blue as the beautiful summer sky,
A wealth of negligent, nut-brown hair,
Buoyed by the breath of the loitering air;
A measured gait, and an absent mien,
Half like a maiden and half a queen,
That tells, like a voice, how the thoughts of her breast
Have flown from the things on her path that rest—
From the birds that sing and the brooks that purr!
Such is sweet Agnes, the crazy girl.

She moaneth a fragment of plaintive song,
That her heart and lip have cherished long;
Some chance strain, saved from her life's lost hours,
And hid in her breast as the dew in flowers;
And sadder she grows, as her spirit hears
That musical message from other years;
For touching its tones as a weeper's wall,
Each note a remembrance, each word a tale:
And the messenger-birds of forgotten things
Are called by the sound of the song she sings.

She has plaited of straw a russet crown,
And placed it upon her hair so brown,
And her thin hand holdeth manifold flowers,
Chosen from brook-sides, and banks and bowers:
She answers the nod of the fragrant grass,
And deems that the waves, as they throb and pass,

Are sent to breathe in her dreaming ear
A story sweet, that she only may hear;
And a random smile, like a sunbeam bright,
Illumines her lip with its pleasant light.

But the silver chimes of the marriage-bell
Are borne, by the breeze, to that quiet dell;
And the smile departs from its rosy home—
Will the sunbeam stay when the cloud hath come?—
She spurneth the blossoms she loved but now,
And the hot blood mounts to her cheek and brow,
And a dew of tears, like the dew of the sky,
Distils from the blue of her heavenly eye;
For the wildest pain of a wildest thought,
By that merry chime, to her heart is brought.

For it tells of the hours that have passed away,
As the meek stars pass at the blush of day,
When the eagle came to the trusting dove,
And won her heart with its mines of love;
But a falsehood dwelt on his trait'rous tongue,
And a venom lurked in the song he sung;
And she learned to mourn, as she mourneth now,
At his shattered faith and his truthless vow:
He left her naught, when they came to part,
Save a 'mind diseased' and a broken heart.

Like a captive pent in a prison cell,
Is the secret hid that she cannot tell;
Like a portrait limned by the hand of art,
His features dwell in her brooding heart:
And the day will come when her vengeance dread
Shall fall, like a shower, on his guilty head.
Heaven be kind to the maiden fair,
Record her tears and receive her prayer:
Oh, who, from the serf to the haughty earl,
Would merit the hate of the crazy girl?

The injured lamb hath the lion's ire;
The wounded dove hath the eagle's fire;
And who shall say that her vengeful thirst,
By the God of Right, shall be held ascurt?
All is not sin which is deemed as such;
The logic would change were ye wronged so much!
Each heart knows best what its wrongs have been,
And a righteous hate is devoid of sin.
Let Mercy and Love their banners unfurl
Above the head of the crazy girl!

She has gone from the dell, and the flowers are there
That she twined but now in her leaf-brown hair;
And long will it be ere that haunt so sweet
Shall echo the sound of her thoughtless feet;
Then shall the loving repeat their hymns,
And children sport 'neath the emerald limbs,
And blossoms shoot from the velvet sod,
And look with a lifted eye to God:
The birds shall sing, and the brooks shall purr;
But not for sweet Agnes, the crazy girl!

FADING, STILL FADING.

BY WM. LOFTIN HARGRAVE.

FADING, still fading! As fleets in the morning
The rose-tinted light, which, with delicate ray,
First kisses the dew-drops each flow'et adorning,
Then, shining on, ruthlessly dries them away:
So ever, alas! from the joyous heart, glowing
With life's early dream, fades the rosy light shed

On the flow'ets of Hope, a sweet freshness bestowing,
Then, changing and bright'ning, to wither them dead!

Fading, still fading! The things that we cherish,
Like sweet dreams, beguile us, and lo! they are passed!
Whatever we love the most fondly will perish,
Or, languishing, linger and fade to the last.
And they, the dear hearts that most tenderly love us,
With love passing all, braving danger and death,
Oh, fade they not often, like green leaves above us,
That die in the sunshine they turned from our path?

Fading, then, fading! As onward we wander,
The noon withers much that the morning had spared;
And Friendship and Love break their own ties asunder,
Till the heart itself fades, and the bosom is seared!
But where spreads the shade by some murmuring river,
The birds sing all day, and the flowerets bloom:
So joys, if unlighted, might linger forever,
Or vanish not wholly ere winter has come.

Fading, still fading! The same light at even,
Which glittered at morn on the dew-drops so bright,
Seems rosy again ere it melts into heaven,
And Life fades away into Death's dreamless night!
But no! scarce the beams from the clouds have departed,
Ere the moon and the stars catch them up in the sky!
Sweet Hope! oh, how sweet to the desolate-hearted!
That, fadeless, our spirits live thus when we die!

SHE GAVE ME HER HEART.

SHE gave me her heart when the spring blossoms came,
Herself but the shade of a flower,
I spoke of sweet buds that had died on the stem—
She gave me her heart in the bower.

She sang of her love when the soft summer ray
Enlivened its holler fire;
I told her of sadness, in love's sweetest lay—
She gave me her heart at the lyre.

I found her still trusting, what ever deceives,
That hectic, when autumn was near;
I spoke of bright hopes that would fade like the leaves—
She gave me her heart with a tear.

The wild winds of winter, the sound of adieu,
Repressed ere the whisper was o'er;
I spoke of a world for the constant and true—
She gave me her heart never more.

SONNET.—WAR.

BY WM. ALEXANDER.

DESTRUCTIVE demon, War! away! away!
Deep desolation ever marks thy track,
Nor do thy blood-robed victims e'er come back,
Since o'er them goes thy car destroyingly.
Cities depopulated ever are by thee,
Or, as great Moscow, in ten thousand fires
Sink down their battlements and lofty spires;
Plains saddened, which erewhile looked pleasantly.
The innumerable wrecks which thou hast wrought
No human eye can dry and tearless see;
When scattered lie man's bones still bleachingly—
So are thy works with ruin ever fraught.
"With good advice make war;" yet better peace;
No garments rolled in blood, but plenty and increase.

VESTS AND CAPS.

Fig. 1.

Fig. 2.

Fig. 3.

Fig. 4.

We have the last "Moniteur de les Modes" for our authority in the matter of vests, their remaining ascendancy being a question here as well as in Paris.

It is said the waistcoat is no longer in favor among the Parisian ladies, that its reign is already over; but it is not one of those vulgar fashions which every one can adopt and wear. For it to be really elegant, several conditions are indispensable: first, a slender and easy figure; secondly, a corset admirably modeled and well made. Corsets are no longer instruments of torture, but are now serving the proper purposes of their invention, to shape and correct the female figure. The two favorites are the Louis XIII. and Louis XV.; they are entirely distinct in style, one being intended for vest bodies, and the other for the Marquise corsage.

Several large Maisons de lingerie, under which last term is included everything in muslin or linen that can belong to a lady's wardrobe, have brought out novelties in vests. We give two: Fig. 1 is a close vest of Marseilles, of most correct form, intended for a riding-habit or promenade-dress. Fig. 2 is one of the later styles, intended for summer wear, and composed of muslin and embroidery in the chemisette style.

We give also two caps: Fig. 3, composed of lace and ribbon quillings, ornamented with knots of ribbon on each side of the face. Fig. 4 is more simple, and is intended for a dinner-cap at a small party, the ornaments being bands of ribbon, and a few fine flowers near the face.

CROCHET.—YOUNG LADY'S CUFF.

Materials.—One ounce of shaded scarlet, or violet Berlin wool, six skeins of white wool; Penelope crochet No. 2.

With white make a chain the width of the arm; unite the first loop to the last, and work ten rounds in close long stitches.

With scarlet, work one round in double crochet, and one in long stitches.

3d round.—1 double crochet, 5 chain, miss 1; repeat.

4th round.—Chains of 5 united to the centre stitch of former round.

Work seven more rounds like 4th; then 1 round 1 double crochet in centre stitch of chain, 1 chain;

repeat. Work two rounds in double crochet in every stitch; then repeat twice again from 3d round, continuing to work with colored wool. Now draw the colored part over the white, and crochet the first round of white and the last of colored together. Work one round long stitches, one round double crochet, and finish with the following

EDGE.—1st round.—1 double crochet, 1 long worked in one stitch, 3 double long in one stitch, 1 long, 1 double crochet in one stitch, 5 chain, miss 2; repeat.

2d round.—1 double in double crochet, 7 chain; repeat.

KNITTED BERRIES AND FRUIT.

PEAR.

Four needles (No. 19) are required. Cast on six stitches on each of two needles and three on the third.

Knit one plain round with green purse twist.

Second round.—Knit one, make one, knit two, make one, knit one, make one, knit two, make one, knit one, make one, knit two, make one, knit one, make one, make one, knit two, make one, knit one, make one.

Third and Fourth rounds.—Plain.

Fifth round.—Knit two, make one, knit one, make one, knit four, make one, knit one, make one, knit four, make one, knit one, make one, knit four, make one, knit one, make one, knit two.

Sixth and Seventh rounds.—Plain.

Eighth round.—Knit three, make one, knit one, make one, knit six, make one, knit one, make one, knit six, make one, knit one, make one, knit six, make one, knit one, make one, knit three.

Ninth and Tenth rounds.—Plain.

Eleventh round.—Knit four, make one, knit one, make one, knit eight, make one, knit one, make one, knit eight, make one, knit one, make one, knit eight, make one, knit one, make one, knit four.

Twelfth and Thirteenth rounds.—Plain.

Fourteenth round.—Knit five, make one, knit one, make one, knit ten, make one, knit one, make one, knit ten, make one, knit one, make one, knit ten, make one, knit one, make one, knit five.

Fifteenth and Sixteenth rounds.—Plain.

Seventeenth round.—Knit six, make one, knit one, make one, knit twelve, make one, knit one, make one, knit twelve, make one, knit one, make one, knit twelve, make one, knit one, make one, knit six.

Eighteenth and Nineteenth rounds.—Plain.

Twentieth round.—Knit seven, make one, knit one, make one, knit fourteen, make one, knit one, make one, knit fourteen, make one, knit one, make one, knit fourteen, make one, knit one, make one, knit seven.

Twelve plain rounds, then work one round, taking two stitches together on each side of the stitch which was between increases, and work thus altogether four decreasing rounds, with two plain rounds between each decreasing one; then decrease for four rounds one stitch only (by taking two together) as straight as possible, in continuation of the decreasing stripes, with three plain rounds between each decreasing one, and four more decreasing rounds, with four plain rounds between. When twelve stitches only remain (four on each needle), work six plain rounds, then one round, decreasing one stitch on each needle; two more plain rounds, and finish off by gathering the stitches. Make a stalk with a spring wire cut in two, and covered, first with cotton wool, then with brown floss on half twist silk; insert it in the narrowest end of the pear; fasten the gathered stitches as close as possible to the stalk; fill the pear with coarse bran* as firm as possible; gather the stitches of the other aperture; place a clove in it, and fasten the gathered stitches round the stalk of the clove. A leaf may be added with good effect. The pear-tree leaf is of an oval shape, and so simple, that no directions to make it will be needed by those who have worked the far more difficult oak leaves, or any other leaf.

* As the bran would soil the wool, it will be found necessary to knit a second pear, somewhat smaller, in white cotton, and insert it in the first before filling it up.

MOUCHOIR CASE, IN PATCHWORK.

(See Cut, in the beginning of the Book.)

Materials.—Black satin; various silks, of very light shades, and some much darker; half a yard of colored sarsenet; a yard and a half of chenille edging, of the same color as the lining; and four large fancy buttons, also of the same color.

Cut out the patches to form a box pattern, according to illustration, making the lightest color the top of the box; sew the patches together, and, when sufficient is made to form the two sides, double it in half; line it with the sarsenet, and put a pocket on each side; sew the gimp round it, and a button on each corner of one side; make a bow and ends of the gimp, and place at the back. Tassels, if preferred, may be used instead of buttons.

BERLIN WORK.—BOOK MARK.

Materials.—Perforated cardboard, two inches broad, and one-eighth of a yard long; two shades of green, two of brown Berlin wool; half a yard of ribbon, rose color or blue, and silk to correspond.

Split the wool, and work, in tent stitch, the pedestal in dark green, and the column in the shade of brown, the ivy with the light green, and the motto with the silk. Form a loop with the ribbon, one nail in length; stitch the cardboard to the remainder of the ribbon.

PATTERNS FOR SILK EMBROIDERY.

These patterns are for collars. The thick lines may be wrought with fine lines, if preferred.

COTTAGE FURNITURE.

Fig. 1.

Fig. 2.

Fig. 3.

Figs. 1 and 3 are fancy chairs for the drawing-room.

Fig. 2 is a Gothic chair.

EDITORS' TABLE.

"His education forms the common mind;
Just as the twig is bent the tree's inclined."

We need not waste words to prove the truth of Pope's axiom. It is acknowledged by all who examine the subject, that the training of the individual from infancy to adolescence forms the character. From this cause comes that particular phase of thought and habit which marks the distinctive differences in nations, sects, and orders of mankind. To note at a glance the mighty difference training or education makes in men, compare the Quaker with the Thug; the follower of Jesus with the worshiper of Juggernaut! The infant of the East is as susceptible of moral impressions as the infant of the West. There are differences in individuals of the same nation; but we cannot doubt that all, by a right method of education, might be made to improve. "Train up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old he will not depart from it," is the declaration of Divine truth.

To whom does this important task of education belong? Has not the Creator specially confided the care of the young to woman? Has He not indicated by this that female influence should be paramount, from infancy to youth, over sons as well as daughters? History and observation both testify that wherever woman is degraded, deprived of the educating influence, either by her own ignorance or the policy of priests and rulers, the moral character of the people is low, and their improvement nearly impossible. Men are not fitted by nature to be the teachers of the young. Even boys are more usually taught by their preceptor how to detect evil in others than how to correct it in themselves. Men govern children by fear, women rule by love; the difference in this process alone would have an almost transforming effect on many minds. Fear, like frost, kills the buds of promise because they are tender, thus leaving more room for the upspringing weeds of sin; while love, like the soft sunshine of spring, calls out the early flowers, and thus overshadows and stifles the latent seeds of evil in the disposition.

Every good man bears testimony to the worth of female influence and teaching in forming his character.

And yet, even in our brave New World, where woman is so highly favored, how little has been done for female education! The endowed Colleges and High Schools are all for boys and young men. The sons of the republic have great advantages of learning—not professional—denied the daughters. The EDUCATOR is left uneducated, or, at best, very superficially instructed. Is this wise?

We gave last month some statistics, showing the proportion of female teachers, now employed in the public schools of Massachusetts and other States, to be very large in comparison with male teachers: in Philadelphia it is as eight to one. These are good omens.

The most satisfactory proofs, however, of the fitness of woman as an educator, have been given by the Board of National Popular Education. This association was formed for the purpose of sending female teachers from the Eastern States, where the education of young ladies is best provided for, to the West and Southwestern portions of our land, where such instructors were wanted.

During the five years this association has been operating, the Board has sent out TWO HUNDRED AND FORTY-EIGHT young ladies—teachers, chiefly from New England and New York. These 248 teachers have been sent as follows: 69 to Indiana; 60 to Illinois; 24 to Wisconsin; 18 to Michigan; 13 to Ohio; 12 to Iowa; 10 to Missouri; 8 to Tennessee; 5 to Pennsylvania; 8 to Minnesota; 3 to Kentucky; 3 to North Carolina; 3 to Alabama; 2 to Texas; 5 to Oregon; and one to the Shawnee Mission, destined to New Mexico.

Of their fitness for the responsible stations they fill, and the advantages of employing female teachers, the agent, Hon. Wm. Slade, thus speaks:—

"In considering the question of the effectiveness of human power, we do not sufficiently consider the matter of adaptation—the peculiar capacity of different individuals, or different classes, for particular departments of human effort. Let a lawyer—strong-minded it may be, and well-versed in the principles and technicalities of his profession—be turned suddenly into a schoolmaster, and placed in a school-house, with a group of children around him, and there will be an illustration of our meaning. Now dismiss the lawyer, and place a woman in the midst of that group of children, and see how she will draw and bind them to her; with what a ready instinct she will understand their mental and moral peculiarities; with what tact and skill she will communicate instruction to them; and with what all-enduring patience she will ply her energies, and tax her invention to overcome the difficulties that lie in the teacher's way. If there is in woman any one adaptation of mind and heart distinguished above all others, it is the capacity to teach and govern children; we do not mean little children merely, but the young, in all the stages of their progress to manhood."

In another place, he remarks of these teachers, after stating that various religious denominations are represented in the Board:—

"They excite no jealousy—provoke no opposition. Their presence wins the children. They can govern them better and teach them better than men. And then, it is a leading purpose of our Board to combine Religious and Moral with Intellectual training; to cultivate the affections; to make the conscience sensitive; to draw the children into the paths of righteousness; and, for this purpose, to lead their minds and hearts up to God. And who can do this so well as woman? The world needs just such a type of Christianity as woman is eminently fitted to impress on the mind and heart of childhood—the Christianity that is 'pure, peaceable, gentle, easy to be intreated, full of mercy and good fruits, without partiality and without hypocrisy.'"

The better way, however, of learning what the teachers have done, is to read their own account. We will give extracts from a few of the many letters written by these young ladies, which show how they govern and how they teach.

INDIANA, December, 1851.

"Our school is in a flourishing condition, numbering a present one hundred and seventy pupils—three teachers [This teacher has charge of the young ladies' department. We have thirty young ladies and gentlemen from abroad. The school has a very good name throughout the country. It has the best school-house that Indiana can boast. W.

am now trying to get up a library for the school. I am one of a committee to go round from house to house soliciting aid. We have done very well so far; and, I think, shall succeed without trouble."

"INDIANA, December, 1851.

"I found that there was some prejudice against female teachers, never having employed one before. I commenced my school the Monday after I arrived, and am now teaching the ninth week. I have between forty and fifty pupils, mostly between the ages of twelve and twenty-two. I have a large number of young men and women; and the number is increasing every week. My scholars are ignorant, but eager to learn; the most so of any I ever taught; and, of course, they improve rapidly. They are naturally intelligent, and their minds active; and only need cultivation to make them useful members of society."

"ILLINOIS, June, 1850.

"I feel that, like the blade of grass, though I cannot compete with the oak, I will add my mite to beautify the great moral garden of the West. More and more I feel the nobleness of the work undertaken by the Society, viz., to aid in training the crude mass of western children for usefulness and happiness. May God prosper it in the work! Alas, indeed, are the elements to be found here in the West, among these tillers of the soil. From these materials are to be wrought, if I mistake not, some of the grandest pillars for the support of our Republic. You may think me enthusiastic; but, were you conversant—as perhaps you may be—with the growing minds of these western children, you would not wonder at one's growing enthusiastic among them. They have such keen perceptive faculties; such ingenuous manners; such warm and generous affections—that I would defy any one to live among them, and not become interested in them."

From a Married Teacher.—"WISCONSIN, December, 1851.

"Though I have left the service as teacher, yet more than ever do my thoughts and feelings linger around that 'Board of Popular Education.' Its great aim seems more necessary to be attained, in my mind, as I have not only labored under its patronage, but have linked my destinies with those of the West. I love to think of what it has done, is still doing, and is destined to do, for the thousands who are filling this part of our country.

"They are ready to welcome those coming from the East; but, with such provision as this State makes for common schools, they are anxious to see their daughters and sisters avail themselves of these means, to become thorough scholars and efficient teachers.

"There might be trained in almost every village, a number of young ladies to engage in teaching; and, so far as I have had an opportunity of judging, they would be found standing as high as teachers in the Eastern States."

"WISCONSIN, December, 1851.

"My school consists of thirty-three pupils, of all ages from four to twenty. There are several young ladies who would like to prepare themselves for teachers. They apply themselves very closely, and I think will be very successful, although they are not far advanced now. I find it necessary to begin at the very first principles in all the common branches. I have scholars that have been over their studies very superficially, and need a thorough review; and, therefore, I have only Orthography, Reading, Writing, Geography, Grammar, and Arithmetic in school, yet. I am very much pleased with my school; I never had scholars that I felt so much interest in."

"WISCONSIN, December, 1851.

"My school numbers thirty-five scholars, three of whom are young men over twenty-one years of age. Two of these have been my pupils all the winters since I came here, and have made good progress in the common branches. The other came this winter for the first time, and has to spell two words out of three in the most simple reading-book for children. Three young ladies, who were my pupils last winter, were teachers last summer, and one is this winter."

"MICHIGAN, December, 1850.

"I design to make this a school of the highest grade. I have classes in Chemistry, Natural Philosophy, Astronomy, Algebra, (one in Davies's Bourdon,) French, Latin, and Drawing. I have an ambitious school, and some of my classes are performing twice as much as I have ever had done in the same branches before. It is a pleasure to teach them; and, as for government, I have no trouble at all. The school is opened by reading the Scriptures, and praying, with singing. My pupils are all connected with the Sabbath School; but my practice is, usually, to deduce general instruction from the chapter read each morning. I am very happy in my school."

"MICHIGAN, December, 1851.

"My school is large, and is increasing. People are moving to this place from their farms in the woods; that their children may have the benefit of a school. We have applications we are obliged to refuse. My expectation is that the people will build a new house and receive all that apply. Years will be required to effect the change I expect will yet take place in this village. It is a fine location—quiet—central—being the county seat—just the place for a school of high order. Last winter I had 130 scholars; last summer 100; now the house is full."

"IOWA, December, 1850.

"A kind Providence has seemed to smile on me, ever since I decided to leave my home and come to the far West, and never for one moment have I regretted having made that decision; indeed, I never was happier than I have been since I came here. I have found a pleasant home in a pious family, from which the voice of prayer and praise daily ascends. The prejudice which at first existed in the minds of some of the people against female teachers seems to have disappeared, so that I am now treated with kindness and attention by the people generally; and I think I have the confidence of all my pupils.

"This is a beautiful and healthy country, and there is a wide field for usefulness in Iowa, which calls loudly for faithful, devoted teachers, who are willing to do and suffer the will of their Heavenly Father."

"MISSOURI, December, 1851.

"My school now numbers thirty-five, and there is a prospect of more. A large number are young men and women. My summer school numbered thirty-nine; and the whole number which have attended during the year is one hundred and ten. I have been very much prospered in my school, every way, since I came here; each session seems pleasanter and more interesting than the previous one; and I can truly say that I have no school trials. I have not seen the first desire or inclination to disobey or break any rule which I make; and each session I am able to draw the reins a little tighter; and whispering is banished from among us as a habit, and is only an accidental occurrence; and I consider that a great march of improvement.

"The school has a good name, generally, and is gaining more and more in the confidence of the community. One lady said to me, a few days since, 'This is the only school that I have ever known, where the children did not learn mischief.' If all can say as much, I shall be thankful; for I feel the weight of my responsibility, and the influence which I am exerting over these future men and women. In all my movements here, I look to the future as much as the present, and I endeavor to make it easy for whoever shall succeed me."

"OREGON, September, 1851.

"I open my school with reading the Scriptures, and prayer, frequently asking questions upon the portion read, giving explanations, et cetera. My experience is the same as the other teachers, that, without the Bible and Prayer, I could not teach. The weight of responsibility sometimes seems pressing me down; but, 'Casting all thy care upon God, for he careth for thee,' comes like a cordial to the soul, imparting new strength and vigor.

"Two gentlemen went into my school-room, early one morning; after looking round, one says, 'I like the looks of the school-room much; but where is the whip?' The other replies, 'Our teacher neither whips nor scolds, yet she has the stillest school that has ever been taught here.' When I first commenced teaching here, complaints would come to me, daily, about the boys fighting. I thought of it for some days. One afternoon, when things had gone pleasantly, I told the boys I wished to make a few remarks to them. I said, 'I frequently hear you saying, "There comes the teacher, she will see you fighting." Now,' said I, 'you might as well fight before me as before each other.' They looked up surprised. 'God sees you fight, whether I do or not. Is it right to fight?' I asked. 'No,' was the unanimous reply. 'Would you like to leave it off?' 'Yes; but—and—but.' 'I might punish you, and make you afraid of fighting before me; but that is not my object. I wish to make you afraid of fighting before God. I cannot make you leave it off; but you can do it yourselves. Would you like to?' 'Yes, ma'am.' 'You will find it hard work sometimes; but you can do it. Whenever you feel like striking any one, think—God sees me—and run away, for fear you might be tempted to strike. Each one watch himself. Will you try?' They all promised; and, since that day, I have neither seen nor heard of fighting."

We might swell these interesting extracts largely, but sufficient has been given to show the importance of the enterprise, and its wonderful success. Consider the matter for a moment; there are elements of national improvement here worthy the attention of the Statesman as well as Christian. The daughters of New England, in the bloom of early womanhood, leaving their pleasant homes for the arduous duties of the teacher, are swaying the minds and destinies of the free, gifted, but untrained youth of the western prairies. They do this with an ease that seems almost magical. Pupils of both sexes are often older than their teachers—the latter being generally between the ages of eighteen and twenty-two—yet these young ladies find no trouble in maintaining order. Moral elevation gives them power and dignity; they set the example of obedience to the laws of God, in their faithfulness, gentleness, and reverence of His Word; the pupils feel the truth and beauty of this system of government, and soon learn to govern themselves. This is the only system of training to make good citizens and truly great men.

How shall such a system of education become universal in our land? That it is imperatively needed, no reflecting mind will doubt.

"About 5,000,000, probably, of the present population of the United States, are between the ages of five and twenty. Within fifteen years, the youngest of these will have reached the age of manhood. The character of the country, intellectual and moral, social, civil, and religious, will take the direction of the character of that portion of this 5,000,000 which shall survive, and pass into the period of life between the ages of twenty and thirty-five. If a want of education, or a wrong education, of this mass shall give its mind and heart a wrong direction, who can arrest the downward progress of our country, which will be visible fifteen years hence? Moral forces will have gathered a strength and momentum, in the neglected children, which nothing will be able to withstand.

"We affirm, without fear of contradiction, that female influence is, more than any other influence, needed in the West. We mean, of course, the influence of intelligent, well-educated Christian women. Of its general importance and bearings we have not time to speak. It is with its power over childhood and youth that we are more especially concerned. Here it is that woman appears in her position of greatest power; here that she may claim decided superiority to the other sex. And this superior power was given her for some purpose. What that purpose is, it becomes the friends of education well to consider.

"The field for enterprise in our country is boundless; and few young men can be found who will turn away from the glittering prize in prospect, to the sober, patience-taxing, thankless business of 'teaching school.' Where shall teachers be found for the myriads of children, native and foreign, who must be educated—speedily educated, or lost, worse than lost, to their country? Nowhere, in numbers making any approach to adequacy, unless the Young Women of the nation come to the rescue. And they must come. They will come. An enlightened public sentiment will demand, and suitably reward, their services; for on them, it is manifest, is to devolve the high duty of becoming the educators of the children of the nation."

Thus says the "Board of National Popular Education." Agreeing with these views, that to prepare female teachers for the wide field of duty now opening before them, is of paramount importance, we venture to suggest a new plan, and trust to the noble spirit of American men to make it effectual. On behalf of the friends and patrons of the "Lady's Book," who represent the true cause of woman in our republic, we present the following

Petition to the Honorable Senate and House of Representatives, in Congress assembled:—

That, from the foregoing facts and statements, showing the importance of woman's agency in the instruction of the young, and the pressing need of Female Teachers in the Common Schools throughout the land, we venture to request that your honorable body would make some provision for the suitable education of those young ladies who are willing to become teachers, if the way is opened before them.

We respectfully ask the attention of Congress to this subject. While the public domain is parceled out and granted for internal improvements and plans of national aggrandizement, we would humbly suggest that a small portion be set apart and allotted for the benefit of the Daughters of the Republic. Three or four millions of acres of land would be sufficient to found and endow one Free Normal School for the education of Female Teachers in every State of the Union. These institutions could be modeled and managed in each State to suit the wishes of its inhabitants, and young ladies of every section would be trained as instructors for children in their own vicinity. This would be found of immense advantage in the States where schools have hitherto been neglected. In short, the value of all the physical improvements in our country will be immeasurably enhanced by this provision for Female Education; because in the influence of intelligent and pure-minded women lies the moral power which alone can give safety and permanence to our institutions, prosperity and true glory to our nation.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—The following articles are accepted :
 "Influence of External Nature on Man," "Home," "Ella Lee," "The Voyager," "The Dream of Bliss," "My Sister's Death," "Bless the Children," "The Flower of Spring," "The Maiden Wood and Woe," "The Boon," "Christmas Lines," "To my Mother in Heaven," "The Wedding," "Lines on a May Morning," "Woman," and "Genius."

The following are declined, though several are deserving of revision : "Emma Elworth," "The Serenade of the American Tar," "The Sea," "Faded Flowers," "Only One," "Sonnet," "The Wasted Fountain," "Morning Hymn," "The Pet Robin," "To Fannia," and "My Dream."

Several articles are under consideration. We are greatly obliged to our friends for their favors. Eminent writers are sending their articles a free offering to the "Lady's Book," because they feel that in no other way can American literature be sustained, while English Reviews and magazines are republished here without cost of copyright.

OUR TREASURY.

MY MOTHER.

BY HON. MRS. MORTON.

My mother! often does my heart retrace
 My childhood's vision of thy calm, sweet face;
 Oft see thy form, its mournful beauty shrouded
 In thy black weeds, and coil of widow's woe;
 Thy dark, expressive eyes all dim and clouded
 By that deep wretchedness the lonely know :
 Sifting thy grief, to hear some weary task
 Conned by unwilling lips, with listless air,
 Hoarding thy means, lest future need might ask
 More than the widow's pittance then could spare.
 Hidden, forgotten by the great and gay,
 Enduring sorrow, not by fits and starts,
 But the long self-denial, day by day,
 Alone amidst thy brood of careless hearts!
 Striving to guide, to teach, or to restrain,
 The young rebellious spirits crowding round,
 Who saw not, knew not, felt not for thy pain,
 And could not comfort—yet had power to wound!
 Ah! how my selfish heart, which since hath grown
 Familiar with deep trials of its own,
 With riper judgment looking to the past,
 Regrets the careless days that flew so fast,
 Stamps with remorse each wasted hour of time,
 And darkens every folly into crime!

EDUCATION

BY ROBERT BROWNING.

Culture's hand
 Has scattered verdure o'er the land;
 And smiles and fragrance rule serene
 Where barren wild had usurped the scene.
 And such is man : a soil that breeds
 Or sweetest flowers or wildest weeds;
 Flowers lovely as the morning light,
 Weeds deadly as an aronite :
 Just as the heart is trained to bear
 The poisonous weed or floweret fair.

Literary Notices.

FROM E. LITZELL & Co., Boston, and G. P. PUTNAM, New York :—

LEAVES FROM THE NOTE-BOOK OF A NATURALIST. By W. J. Broderip, Esq. A most delightful book of "LEAVES," fascinating as a romance, and instructive as a philosophical treatise. Indeed, the comparison does injustice to this work ; none of the ologies, elaborate as they may be, are so well adapted to make the study of the animal creation popular. The author and reader are companions at once, and the latter gathers instruction which, being pleasing as useful, will be retained. The book is excellent for family reading, and will deeply interest all classes.

FROM LINDSAY & BLAKISTON, Philadelphia :—

THE AGAMEMNON OF ESCHYLUS. Translated from the Greek. By William Porter, A. M. The translator of this world-renowned tragedy has done good service to the cause of literature in other productions ; but none has given more decided proof of his high attainments as a scholar, and his genius and taste as a poet. The old Greek bard seems to live again in this spirited version.

MEMOIR OF PHILIP AND RACHEL PRICE. Printed for Eli K. Price and Philip M. Price, Philadelphia. We are greatly obliged to the author of these biographic sketches, for the privilege of reading such a precious memorial of true goodness. The book is not published, only printed for the friends and relations of the dear and honored dead. A tribute of filial affection most beautifully rendered.

FROM LEPPINCOTT, GRAMBO & Co. (successors to Grigg & Elliot), No. 14 North Fourth Street, Philadelphia :—

THE HISTORY OF KENTUCKY, from its Earliest Settlement to the Present Time. By T. S. Arthur and W. H. Carpenter.

THE HISTORY OF GEORGIA, from its Earliest Settlement to the Present Time. By T. S. Arthur and W. H. Carpenter.

These volumes form the first two of a series of State histories, the publication of which has just been commenced under the general title of "Lippincott's Cabinet Histories of the States." The gentlemen whose names appear in the title-pages are well known to the public for their abilities, their impartiality, and truthfulness, and are every way competent to furnish such a history of every State in the Union as will be acceptable to every family desirous of obtaining correct information. The two volumes now before us present the most reliable assurances which the public could desire, that "no sectarian, sectional, or party feelings will bias their judgment, or lead them to violate the integrity of history."

HAMILTON, THE YOUNG ARTIST. By Augusta Browne. With an Essay on Sculpture and Painting, by Hamilton A. C. Browne. This little volume embraces an affecting memorial of a late student in the New York Academy of Design, to the members and students of which institution it is dedicated.

FROM C. M. SARTON, Agricultural Book Publisher, New York, through LEPPINCOTT, GRAMBO & Co., Philadelphia :—

RURAL ARCHITECTURE. Being a complete description of farm-houses, cottages, and out-buildings, comprising wood-houses, workshops, tool-houses, carriage and wagon-houses, stables, smoke and ash-houses, ice-houses, dairy or bee-house, poultry-house, rabbitry, dovecote, pigstye, barns, and sheds for cattle, &c. &c. Together with lawns, pleasure-grounds, and parks; the flower, fruit, and vegetable garden. Also, useful and ornamental domestic animals for the country resident, &c. &c. Also, the best method of conducting water into cattle-yards and houses. By Lewis F. Allen. Beautifully illustrated. Our country friends, and those who may be preparing for agricultural pursuits, will find this work an admirable companion and assistant.

From FOWLER & WELLS, Clinton Hall, New York, through STOKES & BROTHERS, Philadelphia:—

CHILDREN, THEIR HYDROPATHIC MANAGEMENT IN HEALTH AND DISEASE. A descriptive and practical work, designed as a guide for families and physicians. Illustrated with numerous cases. By Joel Shew, M. D., author of various works on Hydropathy. This work contains a great deal of information highly interesting to parents and others, whose duty it may be to watch over the health, and to investigate the diseases of children.

From J. S. REDFIELD, Clinton Hall, New York:—

LYRA, AND OTHER POEMS. By Alice Carey, author of "Cloven Nook; or, Recollections of our Neighborhood in the West," and one of the authors of "Poems by Alice and Phoebe Carey." The numerous admirers of Alice Carey's poetical genius have now an opportunity of purchasing a neat volume, containing upwards of seventy of her poems on various subjects.

MEN AND WOMEN OF THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY. By Arsene Houssaye. In two volumes. We cannot say that we admire the general characteristics of the men and women of the eighteenth century, as displayed by the author in this collection. Many of them, however, must already be familiar to those acquainted with the history of France during the eventful century embraced in the work, as well as to those who have perused any of the numerous volumes of romance and gossip successively dedicated to the infamy and infidelity of that age. It is a consoling reflection, nevertheless, that the characters here introduced were not the only men and women of France, even at that dissolute period.

NOVELS, SERIALS, PAMPHLETS, &c.

From A. Hart (late Carey & Hart): "The Spanglers and Tinklers." This is still another sparkling volume to be added to "Hart's Library of Humorous American Works." In our last number, we noticed, incidentally, a comic work entitled "As Good as a Comedy; or, the Tennessean's Story." We have since had an opportunity to read it with as much care and attention as its burst of humor, wit, and satire would permit us to bestow upon its pages, and we must say that the author, who, it appears, is "an editor," in many respects, and in many of his descriptions, is quite equal to Dickens in some of his very best efforts.—"Adventures of Colonel Vanderbomb (of Slough Creek) in Pursuit of the Presidency. Also the Exploits of his Secretary." By J. B. Jones, Ex-Editor of the "Official Journal." Another satirical volume added to the "Library of Humorous American Works."—"The History of the Consulate and Empire under Napoleon." By M. A. Thiers, late Prime Minister of France, author of "The History of the French Revolution." Translated from the French by D. F. Campbell. With Notes and Additions by Henry W. Herbert. This is Part 9 of "Thiers's Life of Napoleon." Price 12½ cents.

From Lippincott, Grambo & Co., Philadelphia: "The Initials: a Story of Modern Life." Three volumes of the London edition in one. Third American edition.—"Lynde Weiss: an Autobiography." By Geo. H. Throop, author of "Nag's Head," etc.

From T. B. Peterson, Philadelphia: "The Two Brides: a Story of Real Life." By T. S. Arthur. Price 25 cents.—"Poor Jack: a Tale of the Sea." By Captain Marryatt.—"Jack Hinton, the Guardsman." By Charles Lever, author of "Charles O'Malley," etc. Complete in one volume.—"The Abbey of Innismoyle: a Story of another Century." By Grace Kennedy, author of "Donallen," etc.

From Harper & Brothers, New York, through Lindsay & Blakiston, Philadelphia: "Pictorial Field Book of the Revolution." No. 21.—"A Story Without a Name." A Novel. By G. P. R. James, Esq.—"Falkenburg: a Tale of the Rhine." By the author of "Milford Vernon," etc.

From Dewitt & Davenport, Tribune Building, New York: "The Swamp Steed; or, the Days of Marion and his Merry Men." A Romance of the American Revolution.

Codey's Arm-Chair.

"REVIEWS" AND "NOTICES."—It requires a very considerable amount of learning, research, and industry, to review a book with ability, justice, and candor. Honest reviews are therefore the works of honest and impartial men, men of leisure, and men of talent. To "notice" a book, however, beyond the mere title, with any degree of perspicuity, imparting to the reader an idea of the author's intentions, requires the exercise of a peculiar tact, which is not always attained, even by the best reviewers. To write a long essay, embracing any subject that comes first to hand, whether applicable to the work under consideration or not, and to call it a review, is, comparatively, a work for the erudite and the profound. Such essays make a great display upon paper, no doubt. But, after all, the reader rises from their perusal as ignorant of the true character of the book reviewed, as he was before he sat down. The reviewer has, indeed, as in many instances, taken great pains to show off his own learning and familiar acquaintance with quite an array of subjects which the author reviewed has never touched, and the reader is thus left entirely in the dark as to the real character of the latter, and the pretensions of his work, until, perhaps, the summing up, or conclusion. At this point, tired of his labors, and disgusted with the literary labyrinths into which he has been drawn, his theme having been exhausted but not yet explained, the reviewer comes to a close, declaring, in the bitterness of his heart, that the author for whom he has taken so much interest, and expended so much gravity, is nothing more than an illiterate knave, a wretched compiler, a miserable thief and plagiarist, or a downright unmitigated simpleton! This is not, however, their invariable "conclusion." Under very peculiar circumstances, some of which involve the author's popularity, the wealth and respectability of his family, or the ascertained number and influence of his friends, he is then set forth as a prodigy of wisdom, an original writer of the first magnitude, and a genius of trans-endent brilliancy. In a book notice, a month or two since, we had the imprudence to quote a few lines from a popular author, and at once our "notice" was construed into malignancy and rivalry! Just as if we ever had, or could entertain the least business or poetical rivalry with a gentleman who is not himself a business man, while we make no pretensions to poetry!

CONSULT THE LADIES.—Richardson, the celebrated author and printer, even in the latter years of his life, entertained the greatest confidence in the literary taste and judgment of his female friends. Nor was this confidence confined to ladies of mature years, inasmuch as he often selected very young persons, to whose judgment he in a manner submitted his literary productions before trusting them to the criticisms of his rivals and cotemporaries. We have all doubtless heard the story related of Dean Swift, who, having no other person to whom he could read his manuscripts, was in the habit of calling in his female servant, and, though she does not appear to have been a woman of education, yet he carefully watched her countenance while he read to her, and, in that way, discovered the probable fate of his sermons and other writings before they were submitted to the decision of the public. We know political as well as literary editors who have long been in the practice of reading their leading articles to their wives, relying in a great measure upon their advice and judgment. And our own observation will bear us out in saying that we have scarcely ever known a lady who was not competent to give sound opinions on all such matters, and to give which seems to require a discernment which does not depend so much upon a refined education as upon those refined and delicate sentiments and instincts which appear to be the natural endowments of the sex. It is a common saying with some men, when they desire to escape a bad bargain, that they must go home and consult their wives. Our belief is that fewer bad bargains would be made, and that fewer troubles would find their way into the domestic circles, were husbands more generally to consult their wives on all occasions, small or great.

LADIES' SEWING BIRDS.—Our Yankee friends are always contriving something useful, neat, and practical in some of the departments of social and business life. We have received from the manufacturer, C. E. Storm, of Middletown, Conn., a very convenient article, to which the inventor has given the name of "Sewing Bird." This Bird is fastened to the table by a screw, and holds in its beak the material upon which the lady is employed with her needle. The present practice is to pin the article to the dress, which has the effect of placing the body in a stooping position, tending to round the shoulders, and to injure the lungs. The "Sewing Bird," however, obviates all these difficulties, by allowing the person to sit upright in a natural position, and to pursue her work with greater ease and facility. Believing such to be its advantages, from a neat lithograph which is now before us, we commend the "Sewing Bird" to the protection of the ladies.

WAITING FOR A GUEST.—Nothing, perhaps, is more annoying to a host who has invited a dinner party than to have to wait for one of his guests, especially if that guest be a person of more than ordinary pretensions. And not only is the generous entertainer rendered impatient at perceiving how fast the piquancy and flavor of his costly dishes are wasting away, but he has also the mortification of seeing, in the half-suppressed irritability which rests upon the countenances of those who have attended punctually, plain manifestations that the warmth of his meats is being diffused through the temper and conversation of his guests. It would be well for diners-out, especially for literary lions, who are commonly supposed to be somewhat tender to pungent criticisms, to bear in mind the knowing remark of a celebrated French wit, who was asked why he was so particular in coming early when invited out to dine. "Because," said he, "I have frequently noticed that the faults of one who is waited for invariably present themselves to those who wait for him."

RULES vs. JUDGMENT.—In the following anecdote from the German, evidently the production of some unfortunate poet whose cherished epic had fallen upon the public attention like snow upon a mountain stream, there is a delicate stroke of satire, directed against those critics whose brains are stored with rules which they have not the judgment to apply with propriety and fitness:—

A peasant, who had noticed that old people used spectacles to read, went to an optician and asked for a pair, which were politely handed him. Taking up a book, he examined it very attentively for a few moments, and then laid the spectacles down, saying that they were not good. Whereupon the spectacle-maker hunted out the best glasses the shop could afford, and placed them, one after another, upon his customer's nose. The peasant, however, rejected them all, still complaining that they were not good. A bright idea seemed to spread over the honest merchant's countenance. "Ah, my good friend," said he, "perhaps you cannot read at all?" "If I could," tartly responded the peasant, "I would not want your spectacles."

Alas! there are many in the world quite as blind as the poor peasant; but few possess his blunt and open honesty. If they have the spectacles, they must of course be able to read.

"AM I NOT MY OWN MASTER?"—When we hear these words coming boastfully from the lips of a young man just entering upon his majority, we cannot forbear recalling the reply of a French prince to a stranger whom he encountered in one of the rooms of his palace. "Pray, sir," said the prince, "to whom do you belong?" "To myself," gruffly replied the stranger. "Ah, my dear sir," was the ready retort, "what a pity it is you have such a stupid master!"

CONFUSION OF KNOWLEDGE.—The many evidences of almost unpardonable ignorance now and then presented by our transatlantic brethren in the fields of literature forcibly remind us of the glorious confusion of knowledge exhibited in the following question of a somewhat notorious sprig of nobility from the island of chalky cliffs, who, on being presented with the Countess of Albany's card, exclaimed—"The Countess of Albany! Ah! true—I remember. Wasn't she the widow of Charles the Second, who married Ariosto?"

A HINT FOR MONARCHS.—For the benefit of "the nephew of his uncle," and for that of sundry others of our modern "descendants from the Cæsars" who seem disposed to check the tongues of their so-called slanderers and defamers by enforcing a change of climate, we resuscitate the following: Philip, father of Alexander the Great, being advised to expel from his dominions a man who had been speaking ill of him, "I shall take care not to do that," said he, "for then he would go and slander me everywhere."

WHY WE NEVER MENTIONED HIM.—One of our very good friends in the State of Ohio expresses his surprise that we have never once mentioned the name of a certain celebrated man who has been received with the greatest honors by the inhabitants of every city and town through which he has passed since landing on our shores. Now, the most particular reason we can give our friend for not having made a public parade of our feelings in regard to the illustrious individual alluded to, is the fact that we are too good-natured for a politician, and by no means ambitious enough for a patriot. But we have other reasons for our modest course in this matter, one of which is that we have been constantly reminded, in view of the honors showered on the guest by most of the cities and towns through which he has passed, of the following touching anecdote:—

It is related that a very poor town went to a considerable expense in feasts and illuminations on the occasion of its prince passing through. The latter expressed much surprise at it. "It has only done," said a courtier, "what it owed your majesty." "That is true," said another, "but it owes all that it has done."

PRINCE LUCIEN MURAT, whilom of Bordentown, N. J., is now one of the great men of Paris. We remember him well, and also his wife, formerly Miss Fraser, of South Carolina. The following, we suppose, is considered a compliment:—

"The baptism of the infant of Prince and Princess Murat took place at the Elysée. The infant was held at the baptismal font by the Prince President and the Princess Mathilde."

Her Majesty of England is determined to dress well, no matter how her subjects may fare. Here is a description of her dress at a late reception:—

"The Queen wore a train of white watered rainbow silk, trimmed with white satin ribbons and tulle. The petticoat was of white satin, trimmed with white satin ribbons and tulle. Her Majesty's head-dress was composed of emeralds and diamonds"

On another occasion the following was her dress:—

"The Queen wore a train of blue and gold brocaded silk, trimmed with blue and gold ribbon and white tulle. The petticoat was of white satin, trimmed with white tulle and blue and gold ribbons. Her majesty's head-dress was composed of rubies and marabout feathers.

THE "London Punch" is hard upon the Bloomers. It says:—

"Mr. Punch fearlessly challenges the civilized universe, not excepting even the Editor of 'Notes and Queries.' To und a single convert to Bloomerism among the 'Maids of Jerry England,' those at the 'Public' Bar alone excepted."

A LITERARY gentleman in London writes to a friend in this city as follows: "We have had enough of Bloomers here of late. They serve at the bars of public houses, dressed in pants, straw hats, and ostrich feathers; also in the cigar and coffee shops—the sign-board being, 'A genuine Bloomer serves constantly here.'"

WHAT AN ELECTION COSTS IN ENGLAND.—"The recent contest for the borough of Greenwich has cost the successful candidate £6,000 ($30,000)!"

CREDIT TO WHOM CREDIT IS DUE.—A more courteous gentleman than Mr. Russell, the present manager and treasurer of Welch's Olympic, does not exist; and a more delightful place of amusement to spend an hour or two with the children cannot be found.

A VERY amusing Book is for sale by Peterson, 98 Chestnut Street, price only twenty-five cents, "My Friend Wiggle's," his adventures, misfortunes, &c., full of humorous engravings.

WE cannot answer the question about Putnam's publications; we do not receive them. There is a paper in this city, whose circulation is about one thousand, that does. Some of our publishers make great mistakes in this way. The circulation of the "Lady's Book" is the largest but one of any magazine in America; it goes into every large town and village, and circulates everywhere.

THE MOST PLEASING INTELLIGENCE TO HUSBANDS.—One of the Paris papers states that "dresses are now worn shorter, and a female foot may once more be seen."

WE TOLD YOU SO.—The editor of the "Picton Gazette" says of the "Lady's Book": "There are some beautiful specimens of ladies' work, and the directions, we are assured by a lady friend skilled in these matters, are always correct, which is far from being the case with some magazines that profess to teach the mysteries of knitting, netting, and crochet."

SOME GOOD IN CORSETS, AFTER ALL.—The Queen of Spain, in the late attempt to assassinate her, was saved by the dagger's striking against the whalebone in her stays.

THROWING BOUQUETS AT THEATRES.—"Who throws the bouquet to-night?" was the question asked by Manager Crummels, in Dickens's "Nicholas Nickleby." In Paris, the actors provide their friends with the bouquets that are to be thrown on the stage. We remember hearing of the mother of a celebrated actress being very angry at finding only eleven bouquets, when she knew that she had furnished twelve to be thrown. The same bouquets answer until they become so faded that they will not hold together.

GOOD NEWS FOR THOSE FOND OF READING.—This will be No. 2 of our double numbers. It is our intention to continue them. Plenty of reading in future, and plenty of engravings.

A SMALL THIEF.—A rogue in Ohio received $1 25 from a lady for thirteen months' subscription to the Lady's Book: he also promised to pay the postage for the time.

Since writing the above, we have had another complaint, from a person in Michigan. We need hardly say that the fellow is an impostor.

WE have had several applications for our autograph since we published how it might be obtained. Several remittances, with a particular request that the receipt should be signed by myself, have been received. We can still accommodate a large number; and, in every case where it is requested, our name in full will be placed to the receipt. How pretty it would look framed!

SUBSCRIBERS must remember that remittances must be made directly to us, as we have no travelling agents. Bills were sent to all in arrears in the May number; so please hurry along the remittances. Living is very high now in Philadelphia: butter forty cents, and shad three levies, which, being translated into United States English, means 37½ cents each.

THE beautiful plates that we have at times published on our cover, can as readily be bound with the "Lady's Book" as any plate that is published in it. Any binder can place it properly. It should be the leading plate of the volume; and, with the January number, it will answer as a title-page.

THE tinted cottages in this number are also from Rantlett's celebrated work, which can be had of Dewitt & Davenport, New York. Our subscribers will see how easy, and at how little expense, common cottages may be changed to ornamental ones.

WE continue, in this number, our series of useful articles. We commenced with steam; but we do not end in steam. "Cotton Bleaching" is the first of a series of articles beautifully illustrated, which we are sure will please all our readers. Our reading matter is nearly doubled. A mezzotint and line engraving, and two tinted engravings, with a host of other illustrations, will show our subscribers that, while we increase the size of the "Book," we do not lessen the number of illustrations.

CONGRESSIONAL PUBLIC DOCUMENTS.—Our thanks are returned to Messrs. Borland and Letcher for several public documents; but, as we had no particular use for them, we handed them to our friend Scott, of "Scott's Weekly"—a very excellent family paper, by the way.

DICKENS'S "Bleak House," No. 1, has been received, and it opens well. The Harpers have brought it out in a very neat style.

F. E. F. NEW YORK.—We have written you six times, and will write no more, unless you will allow the letter directed to the care of some person. Look over the advertised list in the newspapers, commencing February last.

Receipts, &c.

THE following receipt for cleansing feathers of their animal oil gained a premium from the Society of Arts: Take for every gallon of clean water one pound of quicklime, mix them well together, and, when the undissolved lime is precipitated in fine powder, pour off the clean lime-water for use. Put the feathers to be cleaned in another tub, and add to them a quantity of the clean lime-water sufficient to cover the feathers about three inches, when well immersed and stirred about therein. The feathers, when thoroughly moistened, will sink down, and should remain in the lime-water three or four days; after which, the foul liquor should be separated from them by laying them in a sieve. The feathers should be afterwards well washed in clean water, and dried upon nets, the meshes of which may be about the fineness of cabbage-nets. The feathers must be, from time to time, shaken on the nets, and, as they dry, will fall through the meshes, and are to be collected for use. The admission of air will be serviceable in drying. The process will be complete in three weeks; and, after being thus prepared, the feathers will only require to be beaten to get rid of the dust.

TO TAKE RUST OUT OF STEEL.—Cover it with salad oil well rubbed in it, and in forty-eight hours use unslaked lime, finely powdered, and rub till the rust disappears.

TO MEND BROKEN GLASS.—An excellent cement for uniting broken glass may be made by dissolving in a pipkin over the fire—taking especial care that it does not boil over—one ounce of isinglass in two wineglasses of spirits of wine. This will be a transparent glue.

TO PRESERVE PICTURE-FRAMES FROM FLIES.—Boil three or four young onions in a pint of water; then, with a gilding-brush, wash over with the liquid. It will do no injury to the gilded frames.

TO PRESERVE ORANGES.—Wholly grate or peel the oranges taking off only the thin outside portion of the rind; cut off a piece of the stalk, making a small incision at the place; squeeze out as much of the juice as can be obtained, and preserve it in a basin with the pulp that accompanies it. Put the oranges into cold water, let them stand for three days, changing the water twice; then boil them in fresh water till they are very tender, and put them to drain. Make a syrup with sugar and water sufficient to cover them, and let them stand in it for two or three days, and drain them well; then put double its weight of sugar to the pulp and juice; boil it together until the scum ceases to rise; then put in the oranges and boil them once more; cover them in the pots with this syrup. They will be fit for use in a week.

TO PRESERVE STRAWBERRIES IN WINE.—Put a quantity of the finest strawberries into a bottle, and strew in three large spoonfuls of fine sugar; fill up with good sherry.

PEA SOUP.—The liquor in which a leg of mutton or a calf's head has been cooked, makes good stock. Put this on to boil, slice into it a head of celery, a carrot, and turnip, with two onions; boil the peas in fresh water, putting them in when it boils fast; and, when they will mash, add them to the broth, with a crust of bread the size of a roll. Boil for half an hour; then run through a sieve, and season to taste.

TO DRY FLOWERS.—Take some fine white sand; wash it repeatedly until all dirt is removed, and the water remains clear; dry it thoroughly, and half fill a stone flower-pot; in this, stick freshly-gathered flowers when they are dry, and cover completely, taking care not to injure the leaves. Place the vessel in the sun, or in a room where a fire is kept, and let it remain until the flowers are perfectly dry; then carefully remove the sand, and clean with a feather brush. The process succeeds best with single flowers.

TO WASH MOUSSELINE DE LAINE.—Boil a pound of rice in five quarts of water, and, when cool enough, wash in this, using the rice for soap. Have another quantity ready, but strain the rice from this and use it with warm water, keeping the rice strained off for a third washing, which, at the same time, stiffens, and also brightens the colors.

ARROWROOT BLANCHMANGE.—Beat up two ounces of arrowroot, with a little milk, to the thickness of cream; then pour upon it three gills of boiling milk, stirring it all the time; flavor with essence of bitter almonds, and sugar to your taste; boil it ten minutes, stirring it all the time. Pour it into moulds. This should be made the day before it is to be used.

It should never be forgotten by those of studious habits that the delicate springs of our frail machinery lose their activity and become clogged with obstructions when we totally desist from exercise; from which, consequences arise which necessarily affect the brain. A mere studious life, therefore, is one equally prejudicial to mind and body.

AN echo returns a monosyllable at forty feet distance. Sound of all kinds travels at the rate of thirteen miles in a minute. The softest whisper travels at the same rate as the loudest thunder.

THE custom adopted by brides of wearing orange flowers was derived from France. It is there a matter of much pride and importance, inasmuch as it is not only a token of the purity of the bride herself, but also bears witness to the integrity and morality of her relations.

Centre-Table Gossip.

THE CONSERVATORY.

ONE of the most beautiful, and, at the same time, novel species of flowering plants, is that now attracting such general attention in Europe, known as the orchid, or air-plant family. The several varieties are found in great beauty in South America, from which country they are principally imported, though we know so little about them here. This is more from the expense of their importation and culture than from a necessity of great attention, all that they require for their support being a warm, moist atmosphere, a block of wood, bark, or a moss basket, to depend from.

We learn this, with many other interesting particulars with regard to their discovery and introduction into Europe, from an address delivered before the Horticultural Society of Delaware, by our townsman, Dr. G. Emerson, to whose courtesy we are indebted for a copy. Apart from the desire to see and cultivate these beautiful creations, a description of their freaks and forms is very curious. In some conservatories near Philadelphia, the pitcher plant and butterfly flower are found. The first is not the single large green leaf so common in the woods of the Northern and Middle States, and sometimes known by children as "Jack in the pulpit." At the extremity of each leaf there is a small pitcher, of graceful shape, with a close-fitting lid, that opens or shuts, as the pitcher is full or empty.

The imitations of life most common among them are of birds and animals, and these are so close as scarcely to be believed. The "swan plant," we are told, is the most remarkable. It has the graceful curved neck, the swelling bosom, mimic head, turned back as if in pride. Then there is the snow-white dove, native to the celebrated Isthmus of Panama, where it is regarded by the ignorant as a religious symbol. It has all the appearance, Dr. Emerson tells us, "of a beautiful dove descending, the wings expanded, the head stooping—in a word, just such a figure as the old masters depict in the scene where our Saviour comes from the waters of John's baptism."

It may be imagined that these rare plants are beautiful only to the eye; but we are told that their fragrance is delicious, "soothing, delicate, and never cloying." As an example of the interest their introduction excited in England, a vessel was fitted out by M. Deschamps for the express purpose of importing them. It was loaded at Vera Cruz with no other freight than orchids and cactuses, which novel cargo reached England in safety. We should think that, with the constant communication we have at present in the Isthmus and South America, they might easily be procured for the conservatories of our fair ladies, to whom we suggest their culture. A demand for any article will be followed by its importation; and we are sure the infinite beauty and variety of the blossoms would soon reward them.

THE well-known writer who sends us the following sketch, de la T. Haynes Bayley, assures us it is not a "personality." There was scarcely a necessity for the voucher. The slip-pers will fit too many pretty feet for any one to quarrel for possession. We are promised other chapters in the future.

"YOUNGLADYHOOD."

IN VARIOUS CHAPTERS.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "MISS BREMER'S VISIT TO COOPER'S LAND-ING," "GETTING INTO SOCIETY," ETC.

THE CALL.

SCENE.—A fashionable drawing-room in Walnut Street; two young ladies, in very flowing undersleeves, rush towards each other with frantic kisses and embraces.

"Well, sweetest! how are you this evening?
I declare, it's an age since we met!
What, practicing scales for Pirelli?
Dorago you've ceased to regret.
Come, quit those roulades and cadenzas;
I called to invite you to walk;
My bonnet came home only Wednesday,
And I long for a sociable talk.

"And you have a glimpse for the summer?
That came from Miss Wharton's, I know.
Have you seen those mantillas at Levy's,
With bugles, which now are 'the go'!
My scarf—'tis real India, you notice—
Pa imported expressly from France:
By the way, did you know that in Paris
They've invented a charming new dance?"

"It was time; for the Polka's so vulgar!
The Schottish I never could bear!
See, there goes the beauty, Miss Lawson,
How badly she dresses her hair!
And how is your dear little sister?
I always vote children a bore;
But she's such a sweet little creature—
You're musle she's pulled to the floor!

"Now, yesterday I was so busy!
I scarcely looked up all the day;
I tried a fantasia by Strakosh,
And learned a new stitch in crochet.
Then uncle insisted on reading
A poem, by no one knows who;
And, what's more, he obliged me to listen!
He's rich, and what was I to do?"

"Mamma's afraid he'll get married,
So he's not introduced half the time:
For bachelor uncles to dream of
, Such folly, I think is a crime.
There's the library at his disposal,
He may sit there all day with my aunt,
And the nursery's equally open—
What more can an invalid want?"

"Dear me! I declare, what a toilet!
I'm ashamed to go out by your side!
With that lovely blonde veil on your bonnet,
You can easily pass for a bride.
But, dear, how old fashioned and prudish,
Such a dress buttoned close in the waist!
Now a veet, with your elegant figure,
Would be in such exquisite taste!

And what! does your father oblige you
To wear winter gaiters—thick soled?
Now men are so fussy and cautious,
As if we should ever take cold!
See, I have silk stockings and slippers:
When one has a tolerable foot,
I think it's a shame—when you know it—
To go covering it up with a boot!"

HOUSEKEEPER'S KEYS.—No. I.

"Centre-table gossip" would never be complete, we are sure, without passing comments on the difficulties and pleasures of housekeeping. What ten ladies ever assembled, with books and work, for an evening's chat, without reference to that all-important occupation? Not that we consider the coup d'état of the kitchen cabinet at all entertaining as a staple in conversation, like the soup stock a French cook always has on hand for any emergency; on the contrary, we would not have them wholly banished as an ingredient, for variety's sake, and being a matter on which every lady has more or less interest. The chataleine, corrupted now by the effeminacy of gold or platinum imitations of useful implements, had its significance when, in the good old times, a housekeeper was known by the bunch of keys suspended from her waist, as she overlooked the domestic kingdom. We of the nineteenth century have, in a measure, dispensed with these clanking accompaniments of our morning's occupations, save in the South, where the rigors of this household law compel exaction. When the mistress is not unfrequently informed that the meal-bag has disappeared—without hands, of course—from the storeroom, or the sugar has given itself out with wonderful rapidity, the basket of keys can by no means be laid aside, the collection being quite too heavy for the support of a girdle.

But we were intending these keys to symbol those practical advices and instructions known as receipts, or the more passing hints which housekeepers often gain from each other in a pleasant chat, unlocking the mysteries of many an excellent time and labor-saving process. Under this head, therefore, we shall, from time to time, communicate practical experiences, at the same time soliciting aid from those of our lady readers who are interested in the matter. Many an admirable receipt is handed down from mother to daughter, and has never yet been stained with printer's ink. Let the happy possessors of such secrets remember that

"Charity begins at home,
But does not always stay there!"

CASHMERE SHAWLS.

The last "Moniteur" announces that Delisle, the celebrated Parisian importer, has concluded an arrangement with one of the chief Indian factories to send him the most magnificent cashmeres Hindostan can produce. As they will no longer be at the great expense of sending an especial agent to Bombay or Cashmere, the shawls will be more reasonable in price; or, as our informant says, with true French emphasis, "Indian cashmeres will no longer be a tantalizing dream to our young ladies!"

The new Bagdad shawls promise to be great favorites this year: they have palm leaves a foot long, on a Turkish green ground, apparently illuminated by rays of the sun. This is not done by a woven thread of gold, as might be imagined, but with a very lustrous gold-colored silk; this makes it much softer, and less glaring, than gold embroidery would be. Shawls will always continue to be worn more or less; and the only excuse for the apparent extravagance of an India shawl, is that they can, by care, be preserved from generation to generation, making a tasteful bequest, from mother to daughter, and frequently prized the more for this very reason. We believe there are more fine Indian cashmeres in Boston than any city in the Union. We never have heard an explanation suggested; but the fact is generally conceded. Cashmere scarfs for the neck are very common in Philadelphia.

CHANGE IN JEWELRY.

Colored stones, so long voted out of taste in a full toilet, are once more to be worn. Amethysts, emeralds, and rubies are used in the elaborate evening toilets of our fair ladies. For ourselves, we cannot say we like them, as they are too often worn incongruously with colors of dresses not at all suited. The simple hue of pearls, so chastened and softened, as it were, will always be ladylike. We notice that antique sets of pearls are once more brought forward. Bracelets, necklaces, and ear-rings that have reposed on their velvet cushions since the times of our grandmothers, now see the light again. We were lately shown, by Mr. Warden, a curious spray of pearls intended for a brooch, or an ornament for the hair, in the shape of an eagle with outspread wings; the folding of the plumage was curiously imitated by rows of large and small pearls. The eye was a single diamond, and a pendent of large pearls was clasped by the beak. It was displayed at the Great Exhibition the past year.

POETICAL ENIGMA.

We commend the following historical enigma to our lady friends for its clever significance; and, at the same time, if they are so disposed, solicit a poetical response.

How dull and gloomy is the day!
Fast rolls each sombre cloud;
The sun denies the faintest ray
To cheer the gathering crowd,
Who, with grave mien, assemble round
Yon tower with age so gray,
From whence proceeds a dismal sound—
The knell for Lady Grey.
See, the dread instruments of death
Aloft are raised there;
And now all, with suspended breath,
In pity drop a tear,
As they see that form so graceful,
With face of beauty rare,
Issue from beneath yon portal,
Intent on earnest prayer.
You see the vizored headman there,
How indifferent he stands!
Carelessly waving in the air
The keen axe in his hands.
Now see, that lady—noble, great,
And lately made a bride,
So lately dressed in regal state—
Throws her rich robes aside,
And of a few takes her farewell,
In tones most soft and sweet;
Then, whilst loudly rings her parting knell,
Goes her last end to meet.
Her head upon my first is laid;
And soon the fatal blow
The headman gives, quite undismayed,
That lays my second low.
My whole is of the human kind,
By Wit's bright light unblest;
To learning's value he is blind,
And certainly a pest.

U. M.

Fashions.

NOTICE TO LADY SUBSCRIBERS.

Having had frequent applications for the purchase of jewelry, millinery, etc., by ladies living at a distance, the Editors of the Fashion Department will hereafter execute commissions for any who may desire it, with the charge of a small percentage for the time and research required. Bridal wardrobes, spring and autumn bonnets, dresses, jewelry, etc., will be chosen with a view to economy, as well as taste; and boxes or packages forwarded by express to any part of the country. For the last, distinct directions must be given.

Orders, accompanied by checks for the proposed expenditure, to be addressed to the care of L. A. Godey, Esq., who will be responsible for the amount, and the early execution of commissions.

Instructions to be as minute as is possible, accompanied by a note of the height, complexion, and general style of the person, on which much depends in choice. Dress goods from Levy's or Stewart's, bonnets from Miss Wharton's, jewelry from Bailey's, Warden's, or Tiffany's, if requested.

CHITCHAT ON PHILADELPHIA FASHIONS FOR JUNE.

Crape shawls being laid aside with the cold weather, that may now be supposed to have taken its final departure, the demand for scarfs, mantillas, etc., becomes imperative. We find from the importations that summer shawls will be worn more than for many seasons past. Of these, Levy has infinite variety. There are the printed berage long shawls, of cashmere patterns; they are lighter than the cashmeres—we do not mean Indian cashmeres, but those covered with the small palm leaf, and so long worn under that name—and fall more gracefully to the figure. The centre is filled with some neat pattern on a white ground, and the border is in the dark, rich Indian cashmere colors. The square berage shawls are in great variety. Those of plain white are well adapted to the toilet of a middle-aged matron, and combine cheapness with utility, coming at three dollars. They have the same neat effect as a plain crape, and, as will be seen, cost far less. With dresses in every shade of gray or fawn, they are particularly becoming. These have fringe. Others we find with plain centres, white, green, or blue, in delicate shades, and a cashmere pattern border in brilliant colors. These have no fringe. The gossamer berages are still more delicate and beautiful. They are principally long shawls, the texture as transparent as the finest silk tissue, and the pattern extremely rich and beautiful. These range as high as twenty dollars.

But, for young ladies, we think mantillas much more graceful. Those in white silks are not now made, except to order, when the new fringe, the heading knotted in diamonds, makes a little change from those of the last season. It was a tasteful fashion, and so brief only because so universally adopted and imitated. Black will be the favorite color for the present season. We find black silk dresses once more in vogue, for young as well as old; lavender a favorite shade; and it is but natural that black mantillas should resume their reign, the more so that it is the original color, that graceful article of dress having been introduced and modified from the national Spanish costume. The most graceful pattern is the scarf form. It is not quite so long as the simple silk scarf, and is hollowed out slightly to fit the shoulders, and widens a little on the back, where the form is rounded; the ends are also rounded en tablier. It is made to come very far off the shoulders, to display the collar, chemisette, etc., and falls on the arm in graceful folds.

They are trimmed variously. A favorite style is an insertion of plain black lace about a finger in width, ornamented with rows of silk piping, put on in waves and scallops. This is again edged with a fold of silk the same width. The whole should not fall far below the waist. Diamond-knotted fringe a finger and a half in depth, lace, or gimp ornamented with bugles, and folds of silk, are all used. We still prophecy that bugles will have a short reign; they are too heavy for summer, and too easily imitated. Heavy gimp, ornamented with bugles, is selling at five dollars per yard. Closer mantillas are made for those who prefer them; but, as they are intended only for the summer, we recommend the scarf form.

White lace bonnets embroidered with straw, drawn crapes and thulies, straw gimps, with puffs of silk inserted, or ruches of ribbon made to imitate puffs, are much worn. Plain and common gimp straws sell from seventy-five cents to three dollars, at our straw stores.

There is no decided change in dress bodies and sleeves. The Marquise waists will be worn for some time to come, as they can be made to answer the purpose of full or plain dress by a change of chemisettes and undersleeves. A high fichu and undersleeves gathered at the waist, or a rich lace chemisette and flowing sleeves, make the change.

The hair is still worn in twists and plaits at the back. We have plates of two styles, the one a French twist, with the front hair in full bandeaux, and forming a coil under the loop of the twist on either side, behind the ear. The other is a round mass of braids, flat on the back of the head, and covered with a net of silver thread, the front hair in wide puffs.

Hair nets are once more in vogue: they are composed of silk or gold and silver twist, and are ornamented with bugles, beads, etc., in the diamonds. A plain silk net, of the brown called "hair color," is much used for young girls; but ornamented nets for full dress are very becoming to some styles. A Grecian contour is always improved by one; and we have often regretted the passing away of this graceful and classical style of coiffure. The hair should be disposed rather low upon the back of the head, in flat coils or braids, in the Grecian style, the net a little more than covering it. It is fastened by ornamented pins or tassels; sometimes a spray of silver flowers is worn. Wreaths are still worn in evening-dress by young ladies: the prettiest one of the season is composed only of green leaves of various shades, with silver pods and tendrils. It can be worn with a dress of any color but blue. Drooping flowers, or cords of velvet, are still mixed with the side bandeaux; but the loops and rings of the last season are gone out. For married ladies, there is a pretty network of velvet and pearls; blonde caps are once more worn. We should say, in passing, that nets for the hair is still an English fashion, but one that will be much adopted before the present season has gone by.

FASHION.

526
~~~~~

IMMENSE INCREASE OF READING MATTER!

NEW VOLUME OF GODEY'S LADY'S BOOK,

Commencing with July the Forty-fifth Volume.

Twenty-third year of Godey's Lady's Book, and during the whole of that time it has been published by L. A. Godey. There is no other instance in America of a work having been for so long a period under the superintendence of one person.

GODEY'S SPLENDID ENGRAVINGS ON STEEL.

It is the fashion with many magazines to announce in their advertisements, "Splendid Engravings, Fashion Plates," &c. What is the disappointment of the duped subscriber when he receives the numbers of a magazine thus advertised, to find all his splendid engravings dwindled down to paltry wood-cuts—as contemptible in design as in execution!

The publisher of the "Lady's Book" performs all he promises, and, as some of our exchanges are kind enough to say, "more than he promises." Each number of the "Lady's Book" contains at least either in LINE, STIPPLE, or MEZZOTINT, and sometimes THREE and FOUR.

TWO ENGRAVINGS FROM STEEL PLATES, ENGRAVED BY THE BEST ARTISTS,

Model Cottages, printed in Tints, in every Number, with Interior Plans and full descriptions, Garden Plans and Ornamental Gardening, Model Cottage Furniture, and Patterns for Window Curtains.

GODEY'S RELIABLE FASHION PLATES

are published monthly, and are considered the only really valuable fashion plates that are published. They have been the standard for over twenty-one years. In addition to the above, every month selections from the following are given, with simple directions that all may understand:—

Undoubted Receipts, Model Cottages, Model Cottage Furniture, Patterns for Window Curtains, Music, Crochet Work, Knitting, Netting, Patchwork, Crochet Flower Work, Hair Braiding, Ribbon Work, Chenille Work, Lace Collar Work, Children's and Infant's Clothes, Capes, Caps, Chemisettes—in fine, everything that can interest a Lady will find its appropriate place in her own Book.

TERMS FOR GODEY'S LADY'S BOOK FROM JULY TO DECEMBER INCLUSIVE.

|                                                                                    |                           |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------|
| 1 copy six months, $1 50.                                                         | 2 copies six months, $3. |
| 5 copies six months and a copy for six months to the person sending the club, $5. |                           |
| 8 " " " " " " " " " " " "                                                          | 7 50.                     |
| 10 " " " " " " " " " " " "                                                         | 10                        |

- Small notes of the different States are received at par for Godey's Lady's Book
- Club subscribers will be sent to different towns.
- Additions of one or more to clubs are received at club prices.
- REGISTER your letters, and, when remitting, get your postmaster to write on the letter "Registered." The money will then come safely. Remember, we have no traveling agents now, and all money must be sent direct to the publisher.
- A Specimen or Specimens will be sent to any Postmaster making the request.
- We can always supply back numbers for the year, as the work is stereotyped.
- The Lady's Book is for sale by all Booksellers in the United States.

Address, L. A. GODEY,
No. 113 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia,

GODEY'S LADY'S BOOK

ONE YEAR, AND

ARTHUR'S HOME GAZETTE

ONE YEAR,

WILL BE SENT TO ANY PERSON OR PERSONS ON RECEIPT OF FOUR DOLLARS.
THE PRICE OF THE TWO SEPARATELY WOULD BE FIVE DOLLARS.

TABLE OF CONTENTS

VOL. XLV.

|                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |     |                                                                                                                                                                                                               |               |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------|
| Absent Friends, by William H. Hart ,                                                                                                                                                                                                                           | 284 | First and Second Love, by Helen Hamilton ,                                                                                                                                                             | 155           |
| A Chapter on Watches, by Mrs. White ,                                                                                                                                                                                                                          | 471 | Florence Sefton; or, the Border Warfare, byMiss B. Gariland ,                                                                                                                                      | 191, 273, 321 |
| A Chat upon Window Curtains,                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          | 227 | Florine Greenway, by Mrs. S. A. Wentz ,                                                                                                                                                                | 350           |
| A Confession, by Beata ,                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       | 397 | Friendship's Offering, by Joannes Burlingtonius ,                                                                                                                                                      | 426           |
| A Gossip about Gloves, by Mrs. White ,                                                                                                                                                                                                                         | 313 | Gertrude Lee, by W. Fletcher Holmes, M. D. ,                                                                                                                                                           | 155           |
| A Lady's Nightcap in Crochet,                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         | 398 | Godey's Arm-Chair,                                                                                                                                                                                            | 409, 515      |
| A Love Waif, by Henrie Hollis ,                                                                                                                                                                                                                                | 434 | Haleyon Days, by Robert G. Allison ,                                                                                                                                                                   | 80            |
| American Artists in Rome,                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             | 293 | Hand-Screens and Cushion,                                                                                                                                                                                     | 84            |
| American Artistes at Home,                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            | 293 | Helen and Bella, by P. Lantus ,                                                                                                                                                                        | 355           |
| American Female Authorship, by Alice B. Neal ,                                                                                                                                                                                                                 | 145 | How American Women should Vote,                                                                                                                                                                               | 293           |
| An Appeal to American Christians on behalf ofthe Ladies' Medical Missionary Society, byMrs. Sarah J. Hale ,                                                                                                                                            | 185 | How the "Maine Liquor Law" may be sustained,                                                                                                                                                                  | 293           |
| An Eastern Scene, from Victor Hugo , by E. ,                                                                                                                                                                                                            | 286 | How Time Passes! by Penny Patch ,                                                                                                                                                                      | 446           |
| An Expensive Woman,                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   | 404 | I'm Kneeling at the Grave, by C. T. Pooler ,                                                                                                                                                           | 81            |
| A Portrait, by Miss E. R. Cable ,                                                                                                                                                                                                                              | 219 | Individual and Universal Action, from the Ger-man,                                                                                                                                                        | 80            |
| A Sketch, by R. T. Conrad ,                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    | 284 | Influence of Woman, by Hon. Daniel Webster ,                                                                                                                                                           | 90            |
| Aunt Tabitha's Fireside, by Edith Woodley ,                                                                                                                                                                                                                    | 13  | "I Sleep, but my Heart Waketh," by Mary A.Fay ,                                                                                                                                             | 218           |
| Benedictus, by R. T. Conrad ,                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  | 62  | James Watt, Improver of the Steam-Engine, byJ. D. ,                                                                                                                                                | 241           |
| Berlin Work.—Book Mark,                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               | 509 | January and May, by Alice B. Neal ,                                                                                                                                                                    | 301           |
| Berlin Work.—Gentlemen's Braces,                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      | 400 | Keziah Jones's Apple Bee, by Noadiah Buck-thorne, M. D. ,                                                                                                                                         | 54            |
| Centre-Table Gossip.—Spring-time in the City,412; En Train, 412; Pennsylvania Avenue,412; The Use of Sunshine, 413; HurriedWooin, 413; The Conservatory, 519; TheCall, 519; Housekeeper's Keys, 520; Cash-mere Shawls, 520; Poetical Enigma, 520. |     | Knitted Berries and Fruit,                                                                                                                                                                                    | 292, 402, 508 |
| Chemisetos,                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           | 398 | Knitting for the Nursery.—A Knitted Pelisse,87; Infant's Lace Sock, 224                                                                                                                                   |               |
| Chinese Slipper,                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      | 161 | Knotted Neck-Tie,                                                                                                                                                                                             | 223           |
| Cooks, by Kate Sutherland ,                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    | 392 | La Frivolité,                                                                                                                                                                                                 | 291           |
| Costumes of all Nations, 45, 138, 189, 259, 331,                                                                                                                                                                                                                      | 469 | Latin Poem, by Wm. Alexander ,                                                                                                                                                                         | 80            |
| Cottage Furniture, 162, 290, 403, 510                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |     | Le Mélange.—More Employments for Womenmuch needed, 469; Employments of Women,469; Miseries of Idleness, 469; Disappoint-ment in Marriage, 469; Pleasure Grounds,their Moral Application, 470. |               |
| Crazy Agnes, by Anson G. Chester ,                                                                                                                                                                                                                             | 505 | Leonora Ainslie, by Ella Howard ,                                                                                                                                                                      | 113           |
| Crazy Mary; or, the Determination to Marryfor Wealth, by J. M'Girr, M. D. ,                                                                                                                                                                                | 254 | Leopardi, by Henry T. Tuckerman ,                                                                                                                                                                      | 123           |
| Crochet,                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              | 290 | Life, by Helen C. Lewis ,                                                                                                                                                                              | 15            |
| Crochet.—Young Lady's Cuff,                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           | 508 | Life's Seasons, by Richard Coe ,                                                                                                                                                                       | 154           |
| Deo Gratias, by D. H. B. ,                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     | 285 | Lines on Longfellow's "Hyperion,"                                                                                                                                                                             | 502           |
| Disappointed Hopes,                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   | 493 | Lines to —, by Mrs. Emily Pierpont Leadner ,                                                                                                                                                           | 154           |
| Doest thou remember, Love? by James H. Brown ,                                                                                                                                                                                                                 | 253 | Literary Notices, 90, 164, 230, 295, 406, 514                                                                                                                                                                 |               |
| Dress Net for the Hair,                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               | 160 | Lord Byron, by the "Bard of Baltimore,"                                                                                                                                                                       | 218           |
| Dusk, by Emily Herrmann ,                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      | 12  | Lord Chesterfield, by Henry T. Tuckerman ,                                                                                                                                                             | 7             |
| Editors' Table, 88, 163, 228, 293, 404, 511                                                                                                                                                                                                                           |     | March.—Inscribed to Fanny Fales , by Miss N.H. Hubbard ,                                                                                                                             | 248           |
| Education, by Robert Browning ,                                                                                                                                                                                                                                | 514 | Matin Anthem, by R. T. Conrad ,                                                                                                                                                                        | 148           |
| Ella Morton, by Villa C— ,                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     | 76  | May,                                                                                                                                                                                                          | 404           |
| Elseneur, by Nadezhda ,                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        | 285 | Memories, by Helen Hamilton ,                                                                                                                                                                          | 504           |
| Embroidered Purse,                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    | 401 | Men's Rights Convention at —, from Ourown Reporter, Ohericot ,                                                                                                                              | 268           |
| Embroidered Sachet,                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   | 288 | Model Cottages,                                                                                                                                                                                               |               |
| Embroidered Screens,                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  | 289 | 59, 101, 176, 202, 240, 287, 362, 417, 501                                                                                                                                                                    |               |
| Evening, by Catharine ,                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        | 220 | Mouchoir Case in Patchwork,                                                                                                                                                                                   | 419, 509      |
| Evening Hymn, by Juliette St. L. H. Beach ,                                                                                                                                                                                                                    | 505 | "Moving" in the Country, by a Villager ,                                                                                                                                                               | 204           |
| Evening Revue, by F. N. Zabrickie ,                                                                                                                                                                                                                            | 461 | Mrs. Harriet Lee,                                                                                                                                                                                             | 427           |
| Every-day Actualities, by C. T. Hinckley ,                                                                                                                                                                                                                     | 421 | Mr. Harrison's Confessions,                                                                                                                                                                                   | 373, 441      |
| Fables, by the late Wm. A. Jones ,                                                                                                                                                                                                                             | 181 | Mrs. Smith and Mrs. Brown.—A Domestic Dia-logue,                                                                                                                                                          | 310           |
| Faded Bridal Flowers, by Mrs. L. G. Abell ,                                                                                                                                                                                                                    | 330 | Music, by D. H. Barlow ,                                                                                                                                                                               | 304           |
| Fading, still fading, by Wm. Loftin Hargrave ,                                                                                                                                                                                                                 | 506 | Muslin Canezou and Le Gilet,                                                                                                                                                                                  | 83            |
| Fanny Wharton; or, Woman's Love, by JohnM. Evans ,                                                                                                                                                                                                  | 120 |                                                                                                                                                                                                               |               |
| Fashions, 95, 170, 235, 298, 413, 521                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 |     |                                                                                                                                                                                                               |               |
| Fashion in Newport, by Park Benjamin ,                                                                                                                                                                                                                         | 82  |                                                                                                                                                                                                               |               |
| Female Eloquence, by Elizabeth Starling ,                                                                                                                                                                                                                      | 295 |                                                                                                                                                                                                               |               |
| Female Writers,                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       | 229 |                                                                                                                                                                                                               |               |

|                                                                  |                         |                                                               |                    |
|------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------|--------------------|
| My Book, by Alph of the Manor ,                           | 219                     | The Dark Closet, by Mrs. Sarah J. Hale ,               | 441                |
| My Brother Tom, by Patience Price ,                       | 347                     | The Debardeur's First Love, by J. B. J. ,              | 426                |
| My Childhood's Home, by J. S. Wilson ,                    | 284                     | The Dream of Memory,                                          | 82                 |
| My Cousin.—A Story, by K. R. P. ,                         | 130                     | The Emigrant Family, by Mary S. B. Shindler ,          | 16                 |
| My Engagement, by D— ,                                    | 67                      | The English Land, by Nadeshda ,                        | 504                |
| My Mother, by Hon. Mrs. Morton ,                          | 514                     | The Enthusiast, by Clara Moreton ,                     | 361                |
| My Mother.—A Dream, by Marie J. Clare ,                   | 319                     | The First and Second Marriage, by F. E. F. ,           | 35                 |
| Myra Bell; or, Second Love, by I. W. Bryce ,              | 47                      | The First Born, by Ann E. Porter ,                     | 220                |
| My Six Last Cooks,                                               | 486                     | The Flowing River, by G. R. Read ,                     | 396                |
| Needles,                                                         | 63                      | The Forsaken, by Geo. A. Merritt ,                     | 156                |
| New Year, by Abby Allin ,                                 | 79                      | The Happy Family, by Alice B. Neal ,                   | 6                  |
| Notes of Travels and Progress, by John Duffey ,           | 151                     | The Heart's Pictures, by Ann D. W. Sweet ,             | 220                |
| Novel Vase Stand,                                                | 85                      | The Intercepted Letter, by Edith Hervey ,              | 105                |
| Oak Planting, by Washington Irving ,                      | 406                     | The Ladies' New England Art-Union of Needle-                  |                    |
| Of the Stars, by Mrs. Mary Somerville ,                   | 480                     | work,                                                         | 405                |
| On the Death of an Obscure Citizen, by W. Gil-            |                         | The Lady's Leap, by Henry William Herbert ,            | 462                |
| more Simms ,                                              | 81                      | The Legend of Indian Hole, by "Esperance,"                    | 109                |
| Our Hopes, by Hettie Harebell ,                           | 5                       | The Mother's Lament, by a Lady of Virginia ,           | 388                |
| Our Seat beneath the Bower, by D. Ellen Good-             |                         | The Mother's Love, by Mrs. Ellis ,                     | 163                |
| man ,                                                     | 219                     | The Morning of the Heart, by W. Wallace Shaw ,         | 44                 |
| Our Treasury,                                                    | 163, 229, 294, 406, 514 | The Nursery,                                                  | 158, 222, 235, 299 |
| Outward Bound, by D. ,                                    | 155                     | The Old Farm Gate, by Richard Coc ,                    | 248                |
| Patterns for Silk Embroidery,                                    |                         | The Phantom of the Wabash, by William E. Gilmore ,     | 320                |
| 86, 157, 226, 291, 403, 510                                      |                         | The Philadelphia Riding School,                               | 61                 |
| Persons and Pictures from the History of Eng-                    |                         | The Pilgrim's Arrival at Home, by George John-         |                    |
| land, by Henry William Herbert ,                          | 30, 141                 | son,                                                          | 285                |
| Plans for Flower Gardens,                                        | 184                     | The Pioneer Mothers of Michigan, by Mrs. E. F. Ellet , | 266, 317           |
| Pleasing the Parish, by the Author of " Miss              |                         | The Pioneer Mothers of the West, by Mrs. E. F. Ellet , | 71                 |
| Bremer's Visit to Cooper's Landing ," etc. etc.,          | 24                      | The Poor Lover's Song, by Maurice O'Quill, Esq.        | 119                |
| Poetry, by Mrs. Wm. S. Sullivan ,                         | 140                     | The Present,                                                  | 404                |
| Politeness, by George S. Hillard ,                        | 294                     | The Saxons, by T. Hempstead ,                          | 252                |
| Publisher's Department,                                          | 93, 168, 232, 296       | The Sleeping Beauty, by W. Wallace Davis ,             | 503                |
| Receipts, &c.,                                                   | 95, 169, 234, 298, 518  | The Soldier's Dream, by Henry Wm. Herbert ,            | 178                |
| Rome, by Helen Hamilton ,                                 | 333                     | The Soldier's Son; or, the Triumph of Virtue,                 |                    |
| Ruth Norton's Trial of Patience, by Alice B. Neal ,       | 474                     | by Mary, of Flemington, N. J. ,                        | 363                |
| Sabbath Evening on the Baltic Sea, by Na-                 |                         | The Spirit of the Past, by Mysteria ,                  | 217                |
| dezhda ,                                                  | 396                     | The Spirit's Revelation, by J. Wm. Weidemeyer ,        | 82                 |
| Scenes in Real Life, by Charles Blackburne ,              | 389                     | The Sunny South, by Shuqualak ,                        | 397                |
| Seasons of Life, by R. Penn Smith ,                       | 80                      | The Time to Die, by David F. Cable ,                   | 153                |
| She gave me her Heart,                                           | 506                     | The Troubles of a Poet,                                       | 228                |
| Sister, I miss thee, by J. B. Durand ,                    | 395                     | The Two Stars, by N. T. R. ,                           | 155                |
| Sketches of Southern Life, by Pauline Foreyth ,           | 367                     | The Wanderer, by J. J. Baker ,                         | 286                |
| Softly o'er my Spirit stealing, by V. R. F. ,             | 503                     | The Working Women of France, by L. Aimé-Martin ,       | 89                 |
| Some Thoughts on Letter Writing, by H. Hast-              |                         | The "Wrong Passenger," by the Author of                       |                    |
| ings Weld ,                                               | 249                     | " Miss Bremer's Visit to Cooper's Landing ,"           | 211                |
| Song,                                                            | 487                     | Thoughts Concerning English Women, by Mrs. Jameson ,   | 163                |
| Song, by Jack Leeway ,                                    | 183                     | To a Butterfly, by Cornelia J. Orne ,                  | 504                |
| Song.—To an Absent One, by Virginus Hutchen ,             | 503                     | To a Geranium Leaf,                                           | 340                |
| Sonnets, by Wm. Alexander , 129, 177, 284, 346,           | 506                     | To an Eagle, by a Gothamite ,                          | 221                |
| Sonnets on the Parables, by Rev. H. H. Weld ,             | 5                       | To a Snow-Bird, by M. E. H. ,                          | 79                 |
| Sorrows and their use, by Frederika Bremer ,              | 230                     | To Miss —,                                                    | 112                |
| Speak to that Youth, by Robert Johnson ,                  | 221                     | To Nina, by R. James Keeling ,                         | 156                |
| Spring on the Prairies, by R. C. Bierce ,                 | 283                     | To the Oriole, by H. B. Wildman ,                      | 504                |
| Spring's Morn, by Robert G. Allison ,                     | 201                     | To the Spirit of Beauty,                                      | 505                |
| Stanzas, by a Stray Waif ,                                | 395                     | Twilight Reminiscences, by J. H. Dixby ,               | 137                |
| Statistics of Female Teachers,                                   | 405                     | Two Nights and Two Days in Upper Assam, by                    |                    |
| St. Valentine's Day, by Hickory Broom ,                   | 149                     | an Officer's Wife ,                                    | 429                |
| The Artist's Dream,                                              | 286                     | Vests and Caps,                                               | 507                |
| The Beautiful Sempstress, by Samuel Laurence              |                         | Vicissitudes of Fortune, translated from the Ger-             |                    |
| James ,                                                   | 309                     | man of Schiller ,                                      | 19                 |
| The Brilliant and the Commonplace, by Morton              |                         | Visit to the Protestant Sisters of Mercy at                   |                    |
| Colman ,                                                  | 497                     | Kaiserswerth, by Fredrika Bremer ,                     | 488                |
| The Call, by Mary May ,                                   | 445                     | What Women are doing,                                         | 228                |
| The Campbells and the Cliftons, by Miss Meta              |                         | Wild Flowers, by Harland Coultas ,                     | 372, 485           |
| M. Duncan ,                                               | 260, 334, 435           | Woman, by Edward D. Mansfield ,                        | 406                |
| The Consumptive, by M. W. ,                               | 396                     | Wooing the Widow, by the Author of " Miss              |                    |
| The Contented Wife, by Nilla ,                            | 221                     | Bremer's Visit to Cooper's Landing ," etc.,            | 341                |
| The Cottager's Sunday Morning, by Rev. H. Hastings Weld , | 177                     | Wonderful Children, by Lady Morgan ,                   | 229                |
| The Country Graveyard,                                           | 285                     | Work Basket,                                                  | 224                |
| The Crowned, by Caroline Chesebro' ,                      | 218                     |                                                               |                    |

The First Tribute.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

The First Tribute.

Digitized by Google

A SUMMER-HOUSE.

A NOVEL design, intended to be composed chiefly of unbarked wood, which is naturally the first of trees of the kind seen in nature. To receive these native pieces, a framework is to be erected, to which the pieces are to be fixed, and here the ingenuity of the selector of the materials would be fully employed, for much of the beauty of the structure depends on the form of the wood, and so that by its color it may claim attention, independent of its outline and general appearance.

The various sizes of the material, the color and texture of the bark when peeled, and the various colors of the wood, afford ample means for an effective display of taste, particularly as they are to be used in a variety of ways, and are to be covered with reed thatching.

The summer house is to be placed in a garden, or in a park, at a short distance from the residence. Here, it would add relief and force to its surroundings, and induce the visitor more satisfactorily to contemplate the prospects its site affords.

METROPOLITAN HOTEL, BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

DEAREST, WHEN EVENING

BALLAD, WRITTEN, COMPOSED AND ARRANGED FOR PIANO AND GUITAR,

BY J. G. WHITEMAN.

The musical score is written for three parts: Guitar, Voice, and Piano. The key signature is one sharp (F#), and the time signature is common time (C). The tempo is marked Moderato.

GUITAR: The guitar part begins with a series of chords and single notes, providing a harmonic accompaniment for the voice. It includes a melodic line in the upper register and a bass line in the lower register.

VOICE: The voice part is a ballad melody. The lyrics are: "Dear - est, when ev' - ning". The melody is simple and expressive, with a range of an octave.

PIANO: The piano part is a ballad accompaniment. It features a melodic line in the right hand and a bass line in the left hand. The piano part includes a series of chords and single notes, providing a harmonic accompaniment for the voice. It includes a melodic line in the upper register and a bass line in the lower register.

The score is divided into two systems. The first system contains the first two staves (Guitar and Voice) and the first three staves of the Piano part. The second system contains the remaining staves of the Piano part.

And an - gels guard thy down-y bed,

Sleep - ing, wilt thou dream of me, As I sleep - ing dream of thee? Dream of thee?

ritard.

SECOND VERSE.

Dearest, when morning's light appearing,
Tints the sky with golden rays,
And the joyous sunlight cheering,
Warns the flow'rs to sing his praise,
Waking, wilt thou think of me,
As I waking think of thee?
Think of thee?

COTTAGE FURNITURE.

Fig. 1.

Fig. 2.

Fig. 3.

Fig. 4.

Figs. 1 and 2 are easy-chairs. They may be covered with morocco or with cloth corresponding with the other furniture, as the sofas or window-curtains, of the same apartment.

Fig. 3 is a large hall-chair of cast-iron, with numerous perforations. It may be imitated in wood.

Fig. 4 is a lady's work-table, with drawers and bag.

GODEY'S

LADY'S BOOK.

PHILADELPHIA, JULY, 1852.

EVERYDAY ACTUALITIES.—NO. II.

ILLUSTRATED WITH PEN AND GRAVER.

BY C. T. HINCKLEY.

CALICO-PRINTING.

THE art of impressing in color various figures and patterns upon calico, silk, and other fabrics, is one of great importance to the world, and forms a branch of what is the most extensive of the mechanic arts. It was the custom formerly to print upon linen fabrics; but, since the modern improvements in the manufacture of cotton cloths, it is now seldom practised. This arises not only from the expensiveness of linen, but also from the greater facility in printing upon cotton, from the nature of the material; cotton possessing more affinity for coloring matter than flax.

BLOCK-PRINTING.

The art is of very ancient date in India, and takes its English name from Calicut, a town in the province of Malabar, a district where it has been practised with great success from time immemorial. Homer notices the variegated linen cloths of Sidon as magnificent productions, and Herodotus says that the inhabitants of Caucasus adorned their garments with figures of animals, by means of an infusion of the leaves of a tree, and that the colors thus obtained were durable. Pliny gives a description of the art as practised by the Egyptians, which bears a great resemblance to the modern method. He says, "They take white cloths, and apply to them not colors, but certain drugs, which have the power of absorbing or drinking in colors; and, in the cloths so operated on, there is not the smallest appearance of any dye or tincture. These cloths are then put into a caldron of some coloring matter, scalding hot, and, after having remained a time, are withdrawn all stained and painted in various colors. This is, indeed, a wonderful process, seeing that there is in the said caldron only one kind of coloring material; yet from it the cloth acquires this and that color, and the boiling liquid itself changes according to the quality and nature of the dye-absorbing drugs which were at first laid on the white cloth. And these stains and colors, moreover, are so firmly fixed as to be incapable of being removed by washing. If the scalding liquor were composed of various tinctures and colors, it would doubtless have compounded them all in one upon the cloth; but here one liquor gives a variety of colors according to the drugs previously applied. The colors of the cloths thus prepared are always more firm and durable than if the cloths were not dipped into the boiling caldron."

The cotton chints counterpanes of great size, called pallampoors, which have been manufactured in Madras from the earliest ages, have, in like manner, peculiar dye-absorbing drugs applied to them with the pencil, as also wax, to protect certain parts of the surface from the action of the dye, and afterwards immersed in a staining liquor, which, when wax is applied, is usually the cold indigo-vat; but, without the wax, is a hot liquor similar to the Egyptian. In the cabinet of the "Société Industrielle," at Mulhouse, there are many interesting specimens of this curious mode of printing, together with the native implements used for applying the wax and coloring basis. In the same collection, is a sample of an ancient pallampoor, five French yards long, and two and a half broad, said to be the labor of Hindoo princesses, which must have taken a lifetime to execute. Cortez noticed in Mexico that the inhabitants wore garments ornamented with colored figures. The North American Indians have also been long acquainted with the art of applying different-colored patterns to cloth, as may be seen in the various museums in this country.

The art of calico-printing was practised in Asia Minor and the Levant several centuries before its introduction to Europe. It was not till the close of the seventeenth, or the beginning of the eighteenth century, that Augsburg became celebrated for its printed cottons and linens, and that city was long a school for the manufacturers of Alsace and Switzerland. The art was introduced into England, about the year 1676, by a Frenchman, who established works on the banks of the Thames, near Richmond. More extensive works were established soon after at Bromley Hall, in Essex.

Printed goods which, half a century ago, were sold for fifty-six cents per yard, may now be had for twelve and a half cents or less; and a cotton print, sufficient for a complete dress, may be had for one dollar or less. It is stated, as an example of the prodigious increase of calico-printing, that, in 1829, 89,862,433 yards of all descriptions of printed goods were exported from England; whereas, in 1841, there were exported of printed cottons alone, 329,240,892 yards.

The object of calico-printing is to apply one or more colors to particular parts of cloth, so as to represent a distinct pattern, and the beauty of a print depends on the elegance of the pattern, and the brilliancy and contrast of the colors. The processes employed are applicable to linen, silk, worsted, and mixed fabrics, although they are usually referred to cotton cloth, or calico.

There are various methods of calico-printing, the simplest of which is block-printing by hand, in which the pattern, or a portion thereof, is engraved in relief upon the face of a block of sycamore, holly, or pear-tree wood, backed with deal, and furnished with a strong handle of boxwood. The block varies in size from nine to twelve inches long, and from four to seven inches broad. In some cases, the pattern is formed by the insertion into the block of narrow strips of flattened copper, the interstices being filled with felt. This gives a very distinct impression. The block is charged with color by pressing it upon a surface of woollen cloth stretched tightly over a wooden drum. This, which is called the sieve, is made to float in a tub of size or thick varnish, for the purpose of giving it elasticity. The sieve is covered with the coloring-matter by a child, called the tearer—probably from the French tireur—who takes up with a brush a small quantity of the color from a pot, and spreads it uniformly over the surface of the sieve, and every time that the man presses his block upon the sieve, in order to charge it with color, it is the duty of the tearer to brush over the woollen surface, in order to erase the mark of the block; for, if this were not done, the block would not be equally charged with color.

HAND-BLOCK.

The calico having been prepared for printing by singeing, bleaching, and calendering [see BLEACHING], a number of pieces are stitched end to end, and lapped round a roller, or arranged in folds in the printing-shop, which is a well-lighted apartment, the air of which is kept warm, in order to dry the colors soon after they are applied, for which purpose the cloth is passed over hanging rollers, so as to expose a large surface. The printing-table is about six feet long, and is made of mahogany, marble, or flagstone, or any material capable of forming a flat, hard surface. This table is covered with a blanket, upon which the calico is spread, and the block being charged with color as above described, the man applies it to the cloth in the exact spot required, and, in some cases, strikes it on the back with a wooden mallet, in order to transfer the impression fully. Thus, by repeated applications of the block, a pattern is produced in one color. Care is required to place the block in the exact spot, so as to make one impression exactly join or fit in with the previous impression; and, for this purpose, the block is furnished with small pins at the corners, which make holes in the cloth, and serve as a guide to the printer. If the pattern contain three or more colors, there must be as many blocks, all of equal size, the raised portions in one, which take up color, corresponding with depressed portions in the others which do not take up color. In order therefore to print a piece of cloth twenty-eight yards long, and thirty inches broad, with three blocks, each measuring nine inches by five, there must be six hundred and seventy-two applications of each.* But, if the design consist of parallel stripes of different colors, they may be applied with one block at a single application on the same part of the cloth, by arranging the colors in small tin troughs, and transferring a portion from them to the sieve by means of a small wire brush, and the color is then distributed evenly in stripes over the surface by a roller covered with woollen cloth. In those patterns in which the colors are blended into one another at the edges, in what is called the rainbow style, they are first blended by a brush on the sieve before being taken up by the block. Stereotyping has been applied to the production of printing-blocks. A small mould is produced from a model of the pattern, and copies are then made by pouring fusible metal into it. A number of these plates are joined together, and mounted in a stout piece of wood, and thus form a printing-block.

*Our engraving of block-printing shows the general arrangements of the printing-room in printing by hand. The printers are working in the discharge style (which will be noticed further on): the acid used to discharge the color is supplied to the sieve by means of an inverted bottle, as shown in the cut, so that the services of the tearer are not required. (See cut, p. 6.)

A machine called the Perrotine, in honor of its inventor, M. Perrot, of Rouen, is in use in France and Belgium as a substitute for hand-block printing. It is thus described by Dr. Ure: "Three wooden blocks, from two and a half to three feet long, according to the breadth of the cloth, and from two to five inches broad, faced with pear-tree wood, engraved in relief, are mounted in a powerful cast-iron framework, with their planes at right angles to each other, so that each of them may, in succession, be brought to bear upon the face, top, and back of a square prism of iron covered with cloth, and fitted to revolve upon an axis between the said blocks. The calico passes between the engraved blocks, and receives successive impressions from them as it is successively drawn through by a winding cylinder. The blocks are pressed against the calico through the agency of springs, which imitate the elastic pressure of the workman's hand. Each block receives a coat of colored paste from a woollen surface, smeared after every contact with a mechanical brush. One man, with one or two children for superintending the color-giving surfaces, can turn off about thirty pieces English per day, in three colors, which is the work of fully twenty men and twenty children in block-printing by hand."

Copper-plate printing, similar to that used in the production of engravings, has also been applied to calico-printing; but the perfection to which cylinder-printing, next to be described, has been brought, rendered the extension of this method unnecessary.

The invention of cylinder, or roller-printing, is the greatest achievement that has been made in the art, producing results which are truly extraordinary: a length of calico equal to one mile can, by this method, be printed off with four different colors in one hour, and more accurately and with better effect than block-printing by hand. One cylinder-machine, attended by one man, can perform as much work in the same time as one hundred men attended by one hundred tearers. The effect of this beautiful machine has been greatly to cheapen cotton prints, and to create an enormous demand for them, so that, while apparently superseding labor in one direction, it creates a demand for it in all directions.

The invention of this machine is attributed to two persons, who had no connection with each other: the one is a Scotchman named Bell, who, about the year 1785, practised at Monsey, near Preston, England; the other was named Oberkampf, a calico-printer at Jouy, in France. We will endeavor, with the assistance of a diagram, to explain the principle of the machine as arranged for printing a pattern in three colors. The cylinders upon which the pattern is engraved, one cylinder for each color, are shown in section at e, and a view of one of them. Each cylinder is mounted on a strong framework, so as to revolve against two other cylinders, d and e: the cylinder e is covered with woollen cloth, and dips into a trough t, containing the coloring-matter properly thickened, so that as e revolves it takes up a coating of color and distributes it over the engraved roller c. D is a large iron drum covered with several folds of woollen cloth, so as to form a somewhat elastic printing surface: an endless web of blanketing a a is made to travel round this drum, which serves as a sort of guide, and defence, and printing surface to the calico b b which is being printed. Now it is obvious from this arrangement, that the cylinder e in revolving must spread the color uniformly over the engraved cylinder c, whereas it is wanted only in the depressed or engraved parts; the excess of color has therefore to be removed before the roller comes in contact with the calico, or instead of being ornamented with a pattern it would be disfigured with an unmeaning patch of color. The superfluous color is removed by a sharp-edged knife or plate d, usually of steel, called the doctor.*

* The origin of this term has been explained by Mr. Baines in his "History of the Cotton Manufacture." When Mr. Hargreaves, a partner in the factory at Monsey, near Preston, where cylinder-printing was first introduced, as already noticed, was making some experiments with the process, one of his workmen said, "All this is very well, sir; but how will you remove the superfluous color from the surface of the cylinder?" Mr. Hargreaves took up a common knife, and pressing the edge parallel with the axis of the revolving cylinder, at once showed its action in removing the color. After a short pause, the operative exclaimed, "Oh, sir, you have doctored it!" a common phrase for "You have cured it;" and the contrivance has ever

This is so arranged that the color scraped off shall fall back into the trough i. Each engraved cylinder is usually provided with two doctors, one called the color doctor, d, and the other the lint doctor, d'. The object of the latter is to remove the fibres which the roller acquires from the calico. Doctors are made of gun-metal, bronze, brass, and iron alloys, as well as of steel, that metal being used which is least acted on by the coloring materials and mordants used in the troughs.

CYLINDER PRINTING MACHINE.

Our large engraving is a view of a cylinder-machine for printing colors. Some of the machines are very complicated in appearance, as many as eight colors being printed at once by one machine; but this complication is only apparent, for it is produced by the repetition of similar arrangements eight times over, each engraved roller, provided with its own color trough, &c., revolving against the iron drum n; but very great nicety of arrangement is required to bring all these rollers to bear upon the cloth, so as to print at the exact spots required for forming a complicated pattern; but when the proper adjustment is made, a machine for printing eight colors acts with as much precision and regularity as a machine arranged for a fewer number of colors.

As fast as the calico is printed, it is drawn through a long gallery or passage, raised to the temperature of nearly 200°, by means of a furnace flue which traverses its whole length. The upper surface of since retained the name of the doctor. Another account is, that the word doctor is a corruption of the Latin, abductor.

the gallery is covered with rough plates of cast-iron which radiate heat upon the printed goods. A piece of calico of twenty-eight yards is drawn through the gallery in about two minutes, during which the colors become dried and set.

The printing cylinders vary in length from thirty to forty inches, according to the width of the calico: the diameter varies from four to twelve inches. Each cylinder, a, and in section c, as shown in the following figure, is bored through the axis d d, and accurately turned from a solid piece of metal. For some styles of pattern the engraving is done by hand; but, as this is expensive, it is usual to adopt Perkins's method of transferring engravings from one surface to another by means of small steel rollers, b. The pattern is first drawn upon a scale of about three inches square, so that this size of figure being repeated a number of times will cover the printing cylinder. The pattern is then engraved upon a roller of soft steel about one inch in diameter, and three inches long, so as to occupy its surface exactly. This small roller, which is called the die, is next hardened by heating it to redness and suddenly quenching it in cold water. The roller thus hardened is then put into a rotatory press, and made to transfer its design to a similar small roller in a soft state, called the mill. The design which was sunk in the die, now appears in relief on the mill. The mill in its turn is hardened, and being put into a rotatory press, engraves or indents upon the large copper cylinder the whole of the intended pattern. This is, of course, a work of time, and requires considerable care to make the numerous junctions of the small roller exactly fit each other upon the printing cylinder. By this process, however, a pattern may be imparted to a large cylinder at the cost of about one-eighth of what it could be done by hand. By the method just described, a worn cylinder can be renewed and made equal to a new one. The pattern is also sometimes produced by etching, in which case the cylinder is covered with a thin coat of varnish, and on this the pattern is traced with a diamond or steel point. Aqua-fortis is then applied to the surface, which bites into or corrodes the parts which have been removed by the point. This point or tracer is sometimes applied in a manner similar to that of the eccentric chuck of a lathe, by which means the surface is covered with patterns, or a groundwork for patterns of great variety and beauty. The electrotype has also been used for producing the design on the printing cylinder. The design is also sometimes cut in relief upon wooden rollers; or formed by the insertion of flat pieces of copper edge-wise. This is termed surface printing, probably from the circumstance of the thickened color being applied to a tense surface of woollen cloth, against which the cylinder revolves and takes up color. A combination of wooden and copper rollers forms what is called the union printing-machine.

Another method of calico-printing remains to be described, namely, press-printing, by which several colors can be printed at once. The cloth to be printed is wound upon a roller at one end of the machine, and the design, which is formed in a block of mixed metal about two and a half feet square, is supported with its face downwards in an iron frame, and can be raised or lowered at pleasure. The face of the block is divided into as many stripes, ranging cross-wise with the table, as there are colors to be printed. If, for example, the pattern be made up of five stripes of different colors, and each stripe be six inches broad, and as long as the breadth of the cloth, the colors have to be applied without mingling or interfering with each other. This is accomplished in the following manner: The side edges of the table are furnished with a couple of rails similar to a railway, and upon this is a shallow tray or frame, capable of moving backwards and forwards upon wheels. Within this frame is a cushion of about the same size as the printing-block, and by its side are five small troughs containing the thickened colors. By means of a long piece of wood, formed so as to dip into all the troughs at once, the tearer applies a small portion of each color to the surface of the cushion, and spreads them evenly into five portions or stripes, taking care not to mix them; but making their breadth equal to that of the stereotype rows on the block. The cushion being prepared, the frame is rolled along the railway until it is immediately under the printing-block, which the pressman then lowers upon the cushion, by which means the five stripes of the block become charged, each with its proper color. The block is then raised, the frame rolled away, and the block brought down upon the cloth, which it prints in five rows of different colors. On raising the block, the cloth is drawn forward about six inches in the direction of its length, or exactly the width of one stripe on the block; the tearer again pushes forward the cushion with the colors renewed, and the block is again charged and applied to the cloth. Now, as a length of the cloth equal to the width of a stripe is drawn from under the block at each impression, every part of the cloth is brought into contact with all the stripes on the block. Great care is required so to adjust all the moving parts of the press, that the colors may not mingle and distort the pattern.

The mechanical portion of the art of calico-printing having occupied so much space, we will have to give the chemical portion in our article next month.

SIR HENRY SIDNEY.

THE following letter was written by Sir Henry Sidney to his son Philip, then twelve years of age, at School at Shrewsbury:—

"I have received two letters from you, which I take in good part; and, since this is my first letter that ever I did write to you, I will not that it be empty of some advices, which my natural care of you provoketh me to wish you to follow as documents to you in this your tender age.

"Let your first action be the lifting up of your mind to the Almighty God by hearty prayer; and feelingly digest the words you speak in prayer, with continual meditation, and thinking of him to whom you pray, and of the matter for which you pray; and use this at an ordinary hour, whereby the time itself will put you in remembrance to do that which you are accustomed to do in that time. Apply your study to such hours as your discreet master doth assign you, earnestly; and the time, I know, he will so limit as shall be both sufficient for your learning, and safe for your health. And mark the sense and the matter of that you read, as well as the words; so shall you both enrich your tongue with words, and your wit with matter; and judgment will grow as years growth in you. Be humble and obedient to your master; for unless you frame yourself to obey others, yea, and feel in yourself what obedience is, you shall never be able to teach others how to obey you. Be cautious of gesture, and affable to all men, with diversity of reverence, according to the dignity of the person. There is nothing that winneth so much with so little cost. Use moderate diet, so as, after your meat, you may find your wit fresher and not duller, and your body more lively and not more heavy. Seldom drink wine, and yet sometimes do; lest, being enforced to drink upon the sudden, you should find yourself inflamed. Use exercise of body, but such as is without peril of your joints or bones; it will increase your force and enlarge your breath. Delight to be cleanly, as well in all parts of your body as in your garments; it shall make you grateful in each company; and, otherwise, loathsome. Give yourself to be merry; for you degenerate from your father if you find not yourself most able in wit and body to do anything when you be most merry. But let your mirth be ever void of all scurrility and biting words to any man; for a wound given by a word is oftentimes harder to be cured than that which is given with the sword. Be you rather a hearer and bearer away of other men's talk, than a beginner or procurer of speech; otherwise you shall be counted to delight to hear yourself speak. If you hear a wise sentence, or an apt phrase, commit it to your memory, with respect to the circumstance when you shall speak it. Let never oath be heard to come out of your mouth, nor word of ribaldry; detest it in others, so shall custom make to yourself a law against it in yourself. Be modest in each assembly; and rather be rebuked of light fellows for maiden-like shamefacedness, than of your sad friends for pert boldness. Think upon every word that you will speak before you utter it, and remember how nature hath rampired up, as it were, the tongue with teeth, lips, yea, and hair without the lips, and all betokening reins or bridles for the loose use of that member. Above all things tell no untruth; no, not in trifles. The custom of it is naught; and let it not satisfy you that, for a time, the hearers take it for a truth; for, after, it will be known as it is, to your shame; for there cannot be a greater reproach to a gentleman than to be accounted a liar. Study, and endeavor yourself to be virtuously occupied, so shall you make such a habit of well-doing in you that you shall not know how to do evil though you would."

THE FIRST TRIBUTE.

BY REV. H. HASTINGS WELD.

(See Plate.)

THE child's first tribute! Surely He who spake
His kind approval of the widow's mite
Shall hold this "first fruit" precious in His sight!
Train up the child to love, for Jesus' sake,
The suffering and the poor; to feel and know
The claims of penury, and the rights of woe.
Whoso, the Lord hath promised, in my name
The poor, imprisoned, and the sick shall seek,
The wounded comfort, and raise up the weak,
And, in the fulness of a Christian heart,
Blessings to these, my brethren, shall impart,
Bearing the cross, and fearing not the shame—
The almsdeeds that he doth shall counted be
As precious gifts bestowed, through my beloved, on me!

A small thing that the humble righteous hath
Is better than the wealth of godless pride:
A cup of water many sins may hide,
If given for Christ's sake, and in modest faith;
While he to whom all human praise is given,
Whose ostentatious bounty sounds abroad,
Finds in that human fame his sole reward,
But stands in naked guilt before just Heaven.
Oh, rather train the child to seek His ear
Who hears in secret, and to court His eye
Who marks the humble paths of poverty:
Teach him to give—but not for human praise,
But seek high witness, and the thoughts to raise
To God in Heaven, nor heed what men may see or hear.

F A N S.

BY MRS. C. A. WHITE.

WITH the aid of literary and historic association, "trifles as light as air" become charmingly important; but perhaps none more so than the subject of our paper, every fold of which is replete with interest, and filled with classic and poetic memories.

Incentive in itself to pleasant talk, the fan leads us by the short cuts of imagination to its place of origin, the East, where nature, in the leaves of the fan-palm-tree, seems to have set the type of its fashion, and where, in all probability, these natural screens preluded the use of artificial ones.

In the Orestes of Euripides, the Phrygian slave who relates the death of Clytemnestra, was employed in waving round the fair shoulders of Helen a fan like a palm branch, or open leaf, when the matricides burst into the wretched queen's apartment; and in the Elgin Saloon of the British Museum, we find a bas-relief representing Hygieia feeding a serpent out of a patera, and holding in her left hand a fan in the shape of an ivy-leaf.

But these primitive and simple forms appear soon to have given place to others; and from the descriptions of Propertius and Claudian, feathers mounted, as well as fans made of linen stretched over a light frame and painted, were generally used. Sometimes we find them made by simply fastening together, back to back, a pair of wings, and attaching them to a handle; but in every case, according to the editor of the "Dictionary of Greek and Roman Antiquities," however elegant in form, or delicately colored, or costly in material, they were stiff and of a fixed shape, incapable of being furled or unfurled; nor were they carried by the ladies themselves; "Flabellifers," or female fan-bearers, forming, when Plautus wrote, part of every fine lady's retinue.

Not that such attendants were confined to women, for the minions of the tyrant Aristodemus at Cumæ, are described by Dionysius Halicarnassensis, as followed, whenever they went to the gymnasium, by female slaves bearing fane and parasols, the use of both of which had been borrowed from barbarian nations.

Occasionally, beautiful boys held this office, and in the luxurious passage of Cleopatra on the Cydnus,

"On each side of her
Stood pretty dimpled boys, like smiling Cupids,
With diverse-colored fane, whose wind did seem
To glow the delicate cheeks which they did cool,
And what they undid, did."*

Even Augustus himself seems not to have been a shade less luxurious than this "triumphant lady," and the "curled Antony," for Suetonius describes him in the heat of summer reclining in his peristyle with a slave fanning him while he slept.

But though the waving of the flabellum so as to produce a cooling breeze was the especial duty of an attendant, it was gallantry in a gentleman to take it in his own hand and make use of it in compliment to a lady. Fans appear to have had a religious use amongst the Egyptians from a very early period; they were suspended from the roofs of the temples, like the pankas of India at the present day; and were also employed to keep off flies from the sacrifices, as well as for the purpose of exciting the sacred fires.

Mention is made, in the "Dictionary of Greek and Roman Antiquities" before alluded to, of a painting of a sacrifice to Isis, in which the priest is seen fanning the fire upon the altar, with a triangular flabellum, such as is still seen in Italy.

Staveland, in his "Church History," informs us that in the middle ages fans became part of the church furniture, for the purpose of chasing away flies from the holy elements during the administration of the Eucharist; and Moreri has described a magnificent fan of this kind, preserved in the Abbey of St. Philibert de Tournus, which resembled those used by ladies, but was much larger, and with a longer handle. It was richly decorated with images of saints, and bore inscriptions in bad Latin verse, abounding, after the manner of the monks, in false quantities. These fans were held by the deacons on either side of the altar, as they continue to be in the Greek Church during the celebration of the sacrament.

In Japan, where Siebold informs us, neither sex wear headdresses to shade the face, the fan is seen in the hand or girdle of every inhabitant, and even priests and soldiers wear them.

His fan is to the Japanese dandy what the whale-bone switch is to the London exquisite. Ladies and gentlemen receive and offer presents on them; the schoolmaster uses his in lieu of the ferule; the beggar who asks an alms holds out his fan for its acceptance, and it is even said that when presented on a peculiar kind of salver to a high-born criminal it becomes the warrant of his death.

But the most absurd service in which we have found the fan figuring is that suggested by a sepulchral tablet in the Egyptian Room of Antiquities at our Museum, representing Tete, flabellum-bearer to the Sun!

* Antony and Cleopatra.

It is a matter of question whether the fan came direct to us from the East during the Crusades, in the reign of Richard II., or was imported from Italy in that of Henry VIII., more than a century afterwards. At any rate, it is not until the time of Elizabeth that we find it popularly used; but at this period, both sexes wore it, and young gentlemen who would have thought it shockingly effeminate to be seen in a coach, made no scruple of carrying fans and feathers in their hands, which in war, continues our authority, "their ancestors wore on their heads." In the "Book of Table Talk," (a modern work,) we learn that men, in the south of Italy, continue to use them, and that it is no unusual thing, in sultry weather, to see a captain of dragoons, moustached and "bearded like the pard," fanning himself with all the graces and dexterity of a young coquette.

In a collection of ancient costumes we find the fan making its first appearance in the simple form of a single ostrich plume; but soon after it is formed of three or four feathers fastened into a handle; the more costly of these handles being composed of gold, or silver, or ivory, curiously wrought and occasionally set with precious jewels. Wharton, in the Sidney Papers, mentions a fan presented to Queen Elizabeth, the handle of which was studded with diamonds; and Nichols, in his progresses of the same royal lady, in a list of jewels presented to her at New Year's Tide, in 1589, mentions a "Faune of fethers, white and red, the handle of gold enamelled with a half moone of mother of perles, within that a half moone, garnished with sparks of dyamonds and a few seede perles; the one side having her Majesty's picture, and on the other a device with a crown over it."

This superb trinket was the offering of Sir Francis Drake. Looking-glasses were sometimes set in the broad part of these fans, as we still see them at Du-volléro's, in those intended for the use of the ladies of the Harem. They were placed at the summit of the handle just below the feathers, which were very frequently the beautifully colored one's of the peacock's tail.

These fabled eyes of Argus had been a favorite material for the flabellum of the ancients; but the Elizabethan form and mode of mounting them was a great improvement on that of the ancients, who, after binding the separate feathers at the base, further united them by a thread passing along their tips, and another tied to the middle of the shaft of each feather, after which they were attached to a handle nearly two feet long,* and were thus fixed, and except when moved bodily, inflexible.

The feather fans of the sixteenth century, on the contrary, were light, graceful, and easily handled; and we learn from Marston's Satires that as much as forty pounds were occasionally given for them; a large sum in these days, but insignificant compared with the price of some modern ones, of which we shall have occasion to speak.

* Some wooden fan-handles, from Memphis, in the R. B. Museum, measure from 1 ft. 5 in. to 1 ft. 6 in. length.

In an old comedy of 1610, called the "Fleire," it is said: "She hath a fan with a short silver handle, a description which reminds us that the handle of the fan, when Shakspeare wrote, was the most valuable part of it; and lets us into the secret of Falstaff's observation in the second act and second scene of "The Merry Wives of Windsor," where the Knight upbraids Pistol with the obligation he is under to him, and amongst other matters reminds him that "when Mistress Bridget lost the handle of her fan," he "took 't upon his honor he (Pistol) had it not." Steevens, in his notes upon this passage, has given four cuts of these fans, one from the frontispiece of a play of 1616, ("Englishmen for My Money,") the others from drawings by Titian and his brother Cesare Vecelli, in "Habiti Antichi e Moderni di tutto il Mondo," (Venice, 1598.)

It is rather singular, that in Herbé's "Costumes Français," the fan does not make its appearance till between 1540 and 1550, although it is stated, on good authority, that as early as 1522, the master fan-makers made one of the Companies of Arts and Manufactures of Paris and its environs; a circumstance which proves that even at this period the business had become one of considerable importance.

It was not until many years subsequent to the first East Indian voyage from this country, which was in 1591, that the folding fan of the Orientals superseded the ever-open ones of our ancestral fashions; and though Herbé has placed one in the hands of a demoiselle so early as the time of Catherine de Medici, other authors date their introduction into France to the return of some missionaries from China, in the reign of the luxurious Louis Quatorze.

The quaint and elaborate carving of the Chinese, till within the last few years, was better known to our sex through the medium of the card-case and fan, than from any other articles of commerce; and exquisitely as the tiny watch-spring saw used by the French artificers enables them to work the most delicate designs in the bone, or ivory, or mother-of-pearl brins of the French fan, the miracles of minutiae effected in the same space by the patient craftsmen of the Celestial Empire, surpass whatever European fan-makers have hitherto executed in this branch of their art; and, at the present time, China may be considered the only country that prevents the French from enjoying a monopoly in the manufacture of this article.

Madame de Genlis, who appears to imagine the fan a pure invention of French modesty, informs us, that prior to the Revolution it was worn of a large size, and served the ladies who often blushed, at once for a veil and a countenance. "By agitating the fan," continues the Mother of the Church,* "the female concealed herself. In the present time ladies blush but little, and are not at all timid; they have no desire whatever to conceal themselves, and they carry only invisible fans," (des éventails imperceptibles.)

* "La Mère de l'Eglise," a name given to Madame de

Lady Morgan, with her usual archness, reminds us that those vaunted times of excessive delicacy—so far as the fan was concerned—were those of Agnes Sorel, Diana of Poitiers, Mdes. de Montespan, Pompadour, and Du Barri; a series suggestive of the pretty hypocrisies of the periods, as well as of the coarseness and freedom of conversation and manners which subjected the fair companions of kings and courtiers to the reality or affectation of such a frequent repetition of blushing.

The ladies of the court of our Charles the Second, in whose time as well as that of his successor, fans became very fashionable, if not less faulty dames than Madame de Genlis's Dianas, as Lady Morgan calls them, were at least more frank:—

"The modest fan was lifted up no more,
And virgins smiled at what they blushed before."

Or, if they did blush at the Bull in Vere Street, Clare Market, or afterwards at Drury Lane, at the comedies acted there by Killigrew's company in broad daylight, it was under a mask. The fan was reserved for less serious business, and became, for all the purposes of flirting, wonderfully potent in the hands of the Hampton Court beauties.

The marriage of James the Second with the princess of Modena, maintained for our subject the popularity it had gained in the preceding reign; but it was not until the latter part of that of Anne, in 1709, that it became of sufficient importance as a branch of national manufacture, to bring about the incorporation of the Fan-makers' Company in London.

During this Queen's reign, which may be called the "golden age" of fan-making, as well as of some other matters, this "ornamental trinket" was used by women of almost every degree, "to hide their faces at church, and to cool them by gently exciting the air, in sultry weather and close places." It was indeed the high tide of the fan's fashion, no lady's dress being complete, whether at ball, or supper, morning promenade, or evening drive, unless one hand held the indispensable fan, which was either painted or composed of feathers. High art was at this period occasionally employed in ornamenting them; and amongst other exquisite specimens with which our researches for this paper have acquainted us, we were shown, at an elegant repository of antique fans, one, the mount of which, representing a Greek wedding, was painted in those days by Watteau.

Arcadian scenes, such as the French painters still often choose with which to decorate them, appear to have been the most usual subjects; and Addison, in his charming paper on the exercise of the fan,* alludes, in his paragraph on unfurling it, to the effect of this manœuvre, discovering on a sudden an infinite number of Cupids, garlands, altars, birds, beasts, and rainbows. We were treated the other day to the sight of one, that, if not Watteau's, looked very like his; it represented a trio in a triumphal car in the centre, drawn by lions led by Cupids, with nymphs dancing, with musical instruments before them, and others scattering fruits and flowers in the path. But occasionally, less poetical subjects were chosen, and in the reign of George the Second, we find a fan-painter named Loggan,† sketching, for his professional purpose, from the windows of his house, at the south end of the walk at Tunbridge Wells, the most remarkable characters that appeared amongst the company; with such fidelity, Richardson tells us, that they were immediately recognized by their forms.

It was in Addison's time that the discipline of the fan appears to have reached its perfection; the constant use of it familiarized ladies with all those graceful and coquettish motions of which the instrument is capable; and by many allusions in the writings of the period, it appears to have been almost as dangerously fascinating in the hands of English ladies then, as it still is in those of the Spanish donnas.

"Women," says the essayist, "women are armed with fans, as men with swords, and sometimes do more execution with them; an expression playfully seconded in his Chapter on the "Mother of Poetry," by one or two cases on a list of metaphorical deaths, one of which reports "Tim Tattle killed by the tap of a fan on his left shoulder by Coquetilla, as he was talking carelessly with her in a bow-window;" while Sylvius is shot through the sticks of one at St. James's Church. These are precisely such effects (figuratively speaking) as the novelists are fond of giving to the fan in the hands of a Spanish lady, who to a natural grace of action and consummate practice in the use of the implement (which, from her third year, is scarcely ever out of her hand), adds all those piquant arts which the love of coquetry, and the consciousness of surveillance inspires; and, as flowers in the East, from similar causes, have grown eloquent, so the love of intrigue on the one hand, and the necessity of deceit on the other, have given language to the movements of the fan in Spain; and ladies are said to make appointments by means of them, the peculiar manner of opening, holding, and shutting them indicating the how, when, and where. After the French revolution of 1789, which introduced Madame de Genlis's "éven-

* Spectator, No. 102.

† He had been dwarf to the Prince and Princess of Wales, and, in spite of his diminutive size, appears to have been a person of considerable intellect.

Genlis, on the occasion of her publishing "La Religion Considérée."—LADY MORGAN.

tails imperceptibles," the manufacture of fans fell almost wholly into English hands, and both the American and Spanish markets were, for the most part, supplied by English makers.

The only peculiarities of the Spanish fan are its size and shape (the half circle we at present make use of), and the necessity, in technical phrase, of its playing easily. Without this virtue, however otherwise attractive, it would not please the Iberian dames; who never use more than one hand in practising the fan; its evolutions for the most part being effected by the turn of the wrist, so that any stiffness of the rivet which confines the radiants at the base, would of course preclude this ease of motion, and the graceful effects consequent upon it.

The battle of Waterloo appears to have been as fatal to this branch of manufacture in England, as the revolution had been in France.

With the peace, this branch of art, in common with others, began to revive at Paris and elsewhere. The scattered artificers returned to their ateliers, and French fans, not only from their elegance, but comparative cheapness, extinguished the English trade. In point of fact, there are no fan-makers in London; those who call themselves so, simply dealing in the article, which is imported from China and France. The largest manufactory in Paris is that of M. Duvelléroy. This house alone employs more than two thousand men, and fans are manufactured in it from the value of a halfpenny to several thousand francs each; yet the commonest of these, as well as the most costly, passes through the hands of fifteen individuals, before it is ready for use, or for the retailer. Not only the different parts which compose the fan, but those parts themselves, give occasion for a division of labor; the leaf, which is sometimes simple, but more frequently made of two pieces pasted together, passes through the hands of the printer, paster, colorist, and painter, before it is mounted—this last operation being usually performed by women; the process of plaiting is executed by means of a board, cut for that purpose, upon the principle of a crimping machine, upon the exactness of which the perfection of the fan in folding depends. Beside mounting, the fan passes in the women's workshop through the hands of the borderer, who fixes the edge; the borderer, who finishes it; and, finally, through those of the examiner, who minutely scrutinizes every part of the work.

In the meanwhile, the other portions of the toy have given employment to no less than seven individuals; the handle or wood, as it is indifferently called, which forms the frame of the fan, and upon the radiants of which the leaf is pasted, has passed from the smoother who planes, to the fashioner who cuts it out, then to the finisher who polishes it; afterwards to the carver who cuts the designs on the ivory, tortoise-shell, mother-of-pearl, ebony, horn, or any other material of which the handle is formed. It is then handed to the engraver, who ornaments the metal, after which it passes from the gilder to the riveter, who fastens the two outside ends (which the French call the panache), and the brins, or radiants, with a rivet passing through the base of them all; sometimes set with diamonds or other precious stones, or it may be gold, or mother-of-pearl, or simply wood, according to the price of the article.

One most exquisite specimen which was shown us amongst the antique fans before mentioned, had the leaf formed of the most delicate point d'Angleterre, mounted on carved mother-of-pearl brins, finished with a brilliant rivet; it was at once so simple and elegant, that all we afterwards saw could not displace the impression of its superiority.

Its superiority, we should remark, was acquired from the lace of which it was composed. The idea, we believe, originated with the proprietor, and we were told it was the only house that possessed anything of the kind.

In the latter part of the eighteenth century, sun-fans made of green silk, or paper, and of an immense size, were worn instead of parasols, and for a time gave considerable employment to the manufacturers, while the spangled fans so popular in the young days of our mammas afforded a respectable livelihood to numbers of our sex—an income of from fifty to sixty pounds per annum being easily earned at it.

Female reigns have always proved auspicious to our subject. It grew into vogue in that of Elizabeth, reached the climax of its popularity with us in that of Anne, and why may we not hope for the revival of its manufacture in that of Victoria, the noble Patroness of Art and Science?

---

I'M LONELY HERE WITHOUT THEE.

BY CLARA J. H.

I'm lonely here without thee,
Though others round me are;
I miss from day its sunshine,
And from the night its star.

The green trees look not half so green,
The flowers not half so bright;
It is thy presence, love, I want,
To give them clearer light.

Then come to me: my heart awaits,
With greeting warm and true,
Thy loved caress; it droops without,
As flowers for want of dew.

I've none to tell of all the love
I've garnered up for thee:
My heart will break if it must keep Such heavy secrecy.

Then come, oh come! I'm lonely here,
Though others round me are;
I miss from day its sunshine,
And from the night its star.

COSTUMES OF ALL NATIONS.—THIRD SERIES.

CHAPTER VIII.

THE TOILET IN THE MOGUL AND BIRMAN EMPIRES.

THE dress of the princes and nobles in Homer's time resembled the jama, girdle, and kincob drawers, flowered with gold and silver, now worn by the Moguls, as we find by the description of Ulysses in his royal attire; and it is worthy of notice that the custom of making presents of garments, as mentioned in the last two lines, has continued ever since, and is still prevalent among Eastern nations. In the description of the reception of the ambassadors sent by the Uzbek Tartars to Aureng-Zébe, we read that he commanded there should be given to each of the ambassadors a seraph, or vesture from head to foot—namely, a vest of brocade, a turban, and a sash of silk in embroidery.

The dress of Hyder Ali, the most formidable enemy the English ever met with in the East, like that of most of the natives of India, consisted of a robe of white muslin, with a turban of the same. The vest, which is fashioned much like the gown of a European lady, is fastened at the body and sleeves by strings; the rest of the robe hangs loosely in folds, so that the grandees of India, when they walk, have a page to support their train.

Forbes gives the following description of the dress of a Mogul lady: "Her drawers of green satin, flowered with gold, were seen under a chemise of transparent gauze, reaching to her slippers, which were richly embroidered. A vest of pale blue satin, edged with gold, sat close to her shape, which an upper robe of striped silver muslin, full and flowing, displayed to great advantage. A netted veil of crimson silk, flowered with silver, fell carelessly over her long braided hair, which was combed smooth and divided from the forehead, where a cluster of jewels was fastened by strings of seed pearl. Her earrings were large and handsome—the ring worn in her nose, according to our idea of ornament, less becoming. A necklace, in intermingled rows of pearl and gold, covered her bosom, and several strings of large pearls were suspended from an embroidered girdle set with diamonds; bracelets of gold and coral reached from her wrist to her elbow, golden chains encircled her ankles, and all her toes and fingers were adorned with valuable rings."

The silk-net veil of a crimson or purple color, embroidered in silver, which the Mogul ladies wear, either to cover the face or to throw back over the shoulders as an ornament, is similar to that mentioned in the "Odyssey" as being presented by Helen to Telemachus:—

"The beauteous queen, advancing, then displayed
A shining veil, and thus endearing said:
'Accept, dear youth, this monument of love,
Long since in better days by Helen wove;
Safe in thy mother's care the vesture lay,
To deck thy bride and grace thy nuptial day.'"

The court of Hyder Ali was the most brilliant of his time in India. His company of comedians was very celebrated, both on account of their riches and the beauty as well as the harmonious voices of the Bayadères or dancing-girls. The dimpled cheeks of these lovely creatures are tinged a yellow color, which, though a strange adornment in the eyes of a European, is much admired by the Orientals. Their black hair hangs in flowing tresses to the ground. Their dress is always made of fine gauze, very richly embroidered with gold, and they are covered with jewels. The head, neck, ears, breast, arms, fingers, legs, and toes, have each their own peculiar ornament, and even the nose is adorned with a diamond. Small bells are frequently used as ornaments by these fair maidens.

"A zone of sweet bells Round the waist of some fair Indian dancer is ringing."

The Sikhs, the most rising people of modern India, next come under our observation. Runjeet Singh, their celebrated chief, like Hyder Ali, had a great taste for the adornments of fashion, and was imitated in his love of fine clothes by his whole court, which was in this respect unequalled in all the East.

The Sikhs wear a small flat turban, which becomes them well, and a short tunic, which only descends as far as the knee, leaving the rest of the leg exposed. Costly brocades and shawls lined with fur are employed by the great for these tunics. The Sikhs wear their hair long; the ladies of the tribe knot it at the crown, and throw over the head a robe, which also envelops the body, and gives them a singular appearance. They pull the hair so tight to form this knot that the skin of the forehead is drawn with it, and the eyebrows are considerably removed from the visual organs.

The glowing descriptions in the "Arabian Nights" are not more gorgeous than the realities often met with in India.

A scene which took place at the Maharaja's court at Lahore is worthy of description. "The hall of audience is built entirely of marble, and is the work of the Mogul emperors; part of the roof was gorgeously decorated by a pavilion of silken cloth, studded with jewels. The Maharaja himself wore a necklace, armlets, and bracelets of emerald, some of which were very large; the nobles likewise displayed upon their persons vast quantities of jewels, and all the court was habited in yellow, the favorite color of the nation."

The neighbors of the Sikhs, the Scindians, from religious motives, wear garments of dark color, and form their turbans of tight and round folds of cloth.

The weaving and embroidery of India are justly celebrated, and have been so for many ages. The stuffs of Mooltan and Bhawalpoor are now interwoven with gold, and frequently of a purple color; and we read that Aureng-Zébe had a tent lined with Masulipatam chintzes, figured with flowers, so natural in appearance, and of such vivid colors, that the tent resembled a real parterre.

The muslin drawers worn by the women in India are frequently most richly and beautifully embroidered with needlework, and some of them are of so fine a texture as only to allow of once putting on. Satins and silks are also embroidered in the hand, in great quantities. One of the garments worn by Aureng-Zébe is described as having been a vest of white delicately-flowered satin, adorned with a silk and gold embroidery of the finest texture and the brightest colors.

In this country men as well as women devote much time to embroidery; and it is not unusual to see several of the former seated cross-legged on a mat, employed in a manner that in Europe would be considered effeminate, and quite below the dignity of the nobler sex. But in India the needle does not belong exclusively to woman; her prerogative is there invaded; and the most delicate patterns of tinted flowers, or muslins fine as the spider's web, are ornamented in gold and silver threads by these industrious workmen.

With the Birmans many articles of daily use as well as of ornament indicate the rank of the possessor. The shape of the betel-box, which is carried by an attendant after the people of distinction; the ear-rings, cap of ceremony, horse furniture, and even the metal drinking-cup, all indicate the different degrees of society; and woe be to him who assumes the insignia of a rank to which he has no legitimate right!

The common dress of a man of distinction consists of a tight coat with long sleeves made of muslin, or of very fine nankeen, and a silk wrapper fastened at the waist. The court-dress of the nobility is very becoming: it is formed of a long robe, either of flowered satin or velvet, reaching to the ankles, with an open collar and loose sleeves. Over this there is a scarf, or flowing mantle, that hangs from the shoulders; and on their heads they wear high caps made of velvet, or silk embroidered with flowers, according to the rank of the wearer. Ear-rings are an indispensable part of the attire. Some of them are made of gold tubes about three inches in length, expanding into a ball at the lower end; others consist of heavy masses of gold, the weight of which often drags the ear down to the extent of two or three inches.

The Birman women have their distinguishing ornaments as well as the men: their hair is tied in a bunch at the top of the head, and bound round with a fillet, the embroidery and jewels of which mark their respective ranks. Their dress consists of a short chemise, and a loose jacket with tight sleeves. Round their waist they roll a long piece of silk, or cloth, which reaches to the feet, and sometimes trails on the ground.

When women of distinction go abroad, they put on a scarf, or shawl, made of silk, which they throw around them with much grace and elegance. Women in full dress stain the palms of their hands and their nails of a red color, and rub their faces with powder of sandal-wood, or of a bark called sunneka. Both men and women tinge the edges of their eyelids and their teeth with black, which in the latter case gives them a disagreeable appearance. The lower class of females often wear only a single garment, in the form of a sheet, which, wrapped round the body and tucked in under the arms, descends to the ankle.

Men of the working classes also wear a very limited quantity of clothing; a mantle or vest is, however, highly prized in the cold season.

Their neighbors, the inhabitants of Siam, wear very little clothing, which may, perhaps, be accounted for by the excessive heat of the climate. People of rank tie a piece of calico round the waist, and allow it to hang down to the knees. The lower classes wear a garment that resembles breeches. All have a muslin shirt without a collar, and open in front, with large loose sleeves, and no wristbands. When the weather is cold they throw a piece of painted linen over their shoulders, like a mantle, and twist it round their arms.

The women's dress is much the same. They wrap a cloth round the waist, and let the ends hang to the ground; they also cover the neck and shoulders, but never wear any ornament on the head. They cover their fingers with rings, and wear numerous bracelets and immense ear-rings. All classes have very pointed shoes, but no stockings.

The king is distinguished by a vest of rich brocade satin, with tight sleeves to the wrist; and it is unlawful to wear this dress unless it is presented by the sovereign as a mark of favor to a subject.

The court wear red dresses, and the king a cap shaped like a sugar-loaf, surrounded by a circle of precious stones, and fastened under the chin. Officers of rank have coronets of gold or silver. In travelling, hats are used, but in general no covering is worn on the head: the hair is very thick, and both sexes cut it quite short to the ears; the women make it stand up straight from the head. Beards are never worn in Siam.

REAPING.—TO A. C.

BY CAROLINE CHESEBRO'.

His harvest is not yet, who, long ago,
Went scattering broadcast the small seeds of truth;
And thou, bethink thee! faintest in thy youth,
Complaining that to suffer is to know!
What if thy cup with sorrows overflow,
As His did? What if, in extremest need,
The strong world passes o'er thee for a weed?
Or, if thy feet are set on heights of snow?
For every prayer thou shalt have blessing sure;
For every deed wrought out in humble faith
Sweet answer, in a good that shall endure—
Thou canst not be an idle, fruitless wail:
Build of the snow, if need be, pyramid;
Or—in the mines work there—thy deeds will not be hid!

And, if thy hands be soiled, it is not clay
That will pollute; stains that the eye can see
Are not the proofs which will dishonor thee;
Such broken cisterns yield, to wash away:
But, murmurings of sloth in face of day,
And plaints of pride, and wails of selfishness,
And words (the falsest tokens of distress),
Leave record difficult to wash away—
Give penitence to the air which circles round
The feeble heart—give sorrow to the weak—
And stumbling-blocks to youth; wouldst thou be found Reaping such fruitage? Well! thou needst not seek Harvest of coming Harvest out from Thee;
What fruit thy heart bears now, thy Future's All will be!

SONNET.—THE COUNTRY.

BY WM. ALEXANDER.

DELIGHTFUL is the peasant's peaceful lot,
Permitted o'er the fields to roam at dawn,
When early dew-drops sparkle on the lawn
Around his lowly, ever-happy cot:
For him, Life's vale is ever decked with flowers;
A tuneful choir charms him in every shade;
Birds sporting merrily in every glade
Make pass in love and harmony his hours.
Here let me dwell, from folly far away,
Till old age steal the roses from my cheek:
Here let me calmly live to show "I seek
That upper country" where ne'er comes decay;
Where golden clouds forever deck the sky,
And Heaven's fair flowers bloom everlastingly.

PROVIDENTIAL: OR, THE FIRST WEDDING.

BY MRS. SARAH J. HALE.

"Thou didst not leave them, mighty God!
Thou wert with those that bore the truth of old
Into the desert from the oppressor's rod,
And made the caverns of the rock their fold,
And met when stars met, by their beams to hold
The free heart's communing with Thee—and Thou Wert in the midst, felt, owned."

"How did you say the young man was named?" inquired Mr. Zechariah Long, gently touching the elbow of Governor Winthrop, and directing him by a glance of the eye to the object of his curiosity.

"His appellation is master Oliver Temple," replied the governor.

"A kinsman of Sir John Temple of Devonshire?" pursued Zechariah Long, raising his forefinger to his nose.

"I do not know his family," returned the governor. "The young man was introduced to me by the worthy Mr. Johnson, who said the youth had letters of recommendation from a pious friend of his, as one who wished to leave all for righteousness' sake. And truly, since he hath been on board, his conduct hath been very seemly."

"I saw he showed the courage of a true soldier of the cross when we were preparing our ship to give battle to the Dunkirkers," observed Zechariah. "I never noticed him before or since except he had a book before his face, or was otherwise leaning on the railing of the vessel as at this moment, and looking as if he was watching the clouds or counting the stars. But when the word was given that the Dunkirkers were at hand, how he bestirred himself! I think he must have been a soldier, governor. I marvel Mr. Johnson does not communicate to you who the young man is."

"It may be such course would not be prudent, Mr. Long," said Governor Winthrop, calmly. "The young man may have reasons for not wishing to have his family known. This is the time when a man's foes are often those of his own household; when great sacrifices must be made for conscience' sake. You know who hath said—'he that loveth father or mother more than me, is not worthy of me.'"

"Ah! governor," responded Mr. Zechariah Long, again raising his finger to his nose, "you are a learned man—learned to expound the law spiritual as well as the law temporal—but there are signs of the times and signs of the heart which those who are, like myself, but as babes, and to be fed with the milk of knowledge, may nevertheless understand.

Though the countenance of Governor Winthrop was mild, it had usually an expression of deep gravity that many mistook for sadness; but now, in spite of his apparent efforts, a smile curled his lip, and the spirit of mirth glistened in his eye, betraying that the infantile comparison of Mr. Zechariah Long was not, even to his accustomed ear, wholly divested of the ludicrous. Zechariah boasted that he was the tallest man in the company's service, being six feet four inches in height—and seldom was the point disputed, as his upright and rigid air gave him the appearance of being even taller than he asserted. He was long-limbed, and large-jointed, with a spare, sinewy frame, that looked as if it would have required a ton of flesh before the sharp angles would have been rounded into any resemblance to the dimpled beauty of an infant's form. Then his face, it was long, lank, lean, and covered with a skin of the color and apparent toughness of parchment; his features were large, the nose in particular standing out with a curve as bold as Cæsar's—and his eyebrows thick, black, and overhanging, beneath which his small gray eyes gleamed out with a brightness that gave animation, indeed somewhat of interest, to a face otherwise repelling.

The smile of Governor Winthrop seemed checked involuntarily as he met the glance of Zechariah Long's eye, and, with a tone of more deference than even Christian humility would seem to prescribe to one so much inferior in station, he inquired what might be his opinion of the person in question.

"If you ask my opinion, governor, I am bound to answer faithfully," responded Zechariah, drawing himself up to his greatest altitude, and speaking very slowly—"I have observed the youth carefully ever since, as I told you, I noted his bold bearing when we prepared for the battle that by the goodness of God was not to prove unto our hurt, but the rather to our joy, inasmuch as we found friends where we expected enemies; but, had it fell out otherwise, I am persuaded the young man would have been of great assistance, and therefore I would that he was truly as we are."

"Wherefore would you cast suspicions on the stranger?" inquired the governor, regarding Zechariah rather sternly.

"I am not prone to evil-speaking, governor," replied the other in a tone so calm and assured that Mr. Winthrop actually felt rebuked. "I am not one who watches for matters of accusation; but I confess I have watched that young man, and this is my judgment, that his motives for joining us were not all dictated by duty or conscience."

"What then did induce him?—or perhaps your vision does not extend so far," observed the governor, rather dryly.

Zechariah's small quick eye shone with the lustre of a certain triumph as he replied: "His passions, governor, his earthly passions have prompted him to go forth in search of a resting-place; but, verily, unless he does become more heavenly-minded, I fear he will be of little comfort to us, or enjoy little comfort himself."

Zechariah then walked slowly away towards the steerage, and soon the deep peculiar twang of his voice was heard joining in a hymn which some of the passengers were singing. Governor Winthrop was left alone standing on the larboard side of the deck, nearly opposite the young man who had been the object of the colloquy; and who was, by the conclusion thereof, represented as obnoxious to those suspicions which are not the less forcible for being indefinite. The longer he pondered on the circumstances that had hitherto come under his observation respecting the said Oliver Temple, the more mysterious they appeared. And yet the sagacious governor could not believe that the young man would be found a deceiver. There is something in the countenance of an ingenuous youth that so ill accords with the subtlety of the crafty manager intent on stratagems or crimes, that the heart of a good man will be slow to tax such an one with enormous guilt. Folly may be predicated of the young, but vice seems too gross to be harbored in the soul so simple as to receive pleasure from the thought of a flower, or the sight of a bird. And Governor Winthrop had seen young Temple smile, and it was the only time he had seen him smile, while assisting the Lady Arabella in arranging some flower-pots containing specimens she was carefully transporting to the New World, but which had been nearly destroyed in the preparations made to give battle to the Dunkirkers. And he had heard him, too, remonstrating with a passenger who wished to shoot some of the birds that were continually flitting around the vessel.

"He showed a merciful spirit, and such shall obtain mercy," thought the governor. "And yet I wish I knew his history. The Lady Arabella can perchance inform me. She once observed that she thought I would like him, and that she thought he looked like me. He is not a wicked youth. Zechariah Long is a zealous saint, but he is sometimes prone to be suspicious—a fault for which he must be reprimanded. I will seek the Lady Arabella, and endeavor to learn who Oliver Temple may be."

Thus resolving, he descended to the cabin appropriated to the ladies, purposely passing in his way thither near the place where Oliver was leaning on the railing of the deck, his gaze steadily fixed on the setting sun. There was a calmness on his countenance that seemed more like resignation than happiness; yet no one would have called him miserable; nor was he, though he had endured, in his short career, more real distresses than a novel-writer would invent, unless his imagination were very prolific of horrors, to prove the fortitude of his hero.

The history of Oliver Temple was briefly this. He was the only son of a gentleman of ancient family, but small fortune. His father was a younger brother, and the title and a large estate were expected to descend to Oliver, as his uncle, a decrepit old bachelor, seemed as unlikely to seek for a partner as the man in the moon. So his nephew was bred with the expectation of becoming in due time Sir Oliver Temple. He was a gay youth, but nevertheless possessing a good deal of that decision of character which is imparted by a consciousness of integrity of purpose. He was also an excellent scholar, fond of poetry, and, as his father often boasted, an adept in history, particularly in what related to ecclesiastical polity. This mood of mind was no doubt fostered, if not engendered by the character of the times, as religious opinions were then, and had been for many years, the grand lever by which the whole Christian world was moved and agitated with a power that shook the foundations of civil society, and threatened to overturn or alter many of the most important forms of the existing governments. Oliver's relations were all loyal and orthodox defenders of the kingly prerogative and priestly habiliment. Yet Oliver sometimes, in his own mind, doubted the expediency of punishing men because they did not wish to wear a square cap, a scholar's gown, a tippet, and a linen surplice. And as Oliver grew in stature and reason, he doubted still more, and all the arguments and invectives he heard urged against non-conformity only confirmed him the more in thinking the Puritans a very unfortunate, if not injured people.

Till he was eighteen, he had never heard them mentioned except with contempt or execration. At eighteen he saw Rebecca Welden. The seeming chance that first introduced them to each other was one of those events which, appearing casual, perhaps trifling, have yet an influence on the fate of the individuals concerned, which in those days was recorded as providential.

The parents of Rebecca Welden were non-conformists, and had died martyrs to their religious belief. They were not literally burnt or beheaded; but fell victims to the thousand tortures which a persecuting spirit, when armed with arbitrary power, has the means of inflicting. Fines, stripes, imprisonment, and the confiscation of their once ample estate they suffered, till finally their hearts were broken, and they both died within a few days of each other, leaving two children, Robert and Rebecca, who had been for some time under the care of an aunt. This lady, though a Puritan, was a very prudent woman, and she managed to compromise the matter between her creed and her conscience by reflecting that if she boldly avowed her principles, and suffered in consequence, the poor orphans would lose their only stay. So she attended a regular church on the Sabbath, and spent the week in praying that her sin of lip worship might be forgiven her. But, as if to atone still further for her own lax observation of the tenets she believed, she labored to instil them, in their most severe and uncompromising spirit, into the souls of her nephew and niece. She succeeded, and when Oliver Temple first became acquainted with Rebecca Welden, and her brother, they were as strict and stern Puritans as the Rev. John Robinson would have desired.

With a young man of Oliver Temple's feelings and temperament, the persecutions these young people had endured in the persons of their parents would make an impression favorable to their cause; and Robert Welden was, like most of his sect, well versed in the theory of his religious opinions, and above all well acquainted with the history of the corruptions and oppressions of the hierarchy.

It would be impossible, without more speculations than we have time to pursue, even to guess whether Rebecca's virtues and beauty, or Robert's zeal and eloquence, had the most effect on Oliver Temple. Be that as it may, he soon became a thorough convert to the peculiar creed of the non-conformists, and what would of course be foreseen, a suitor for Rebecca's hand. An application to his father for consent to the union revealed to his parents not only the state of his heart, but his faith. The quotation that "the course of true love never did run smooth," would but poorly portray the storm, the tempest, the whirlwind that seemed loosened to work its fury on the devoted heads of these young sufferers. This result is all that can be told. They were separated. Oliver was sent into Northamptonshire, there to abide with a friend of his father's, as was reported. But he was carried to a castle and kept in the close confinement of a prisoner, not being permitted to see or speak with any one except his bigoted jailer, who thought the crime of daring to differ from the established form of church government was the most heinous and impious a subject could commit, except to question the divine right of his king.

Young Temple was confined in his apartment, which might very properly be styled a dungeon, nearly a year, as he could not escape, and would not purchase his freedom by the only alternative offered, which was that of taking a solemn oath to abjure forever the abominable heresy of non-conformity and Puritanism in all their forms. This oath he was resolute in rejecting, although threatened with a worse punishment than imprisonment. But at last his father, as if convinced that severe measures were of no avail, wrote to him very kindly, and after telling him of the illness of his uncle, who was not expected to continue long, and hoping that the time he had spent in solitary reflection had convinced him of his errors, &c., informed him that a carriage had been sent, in which he might return to his home and his friends, who were anxious to see him.

To the poor youth who had so long been detained from all intercourse with the world, the privilege of returning to his family appeared such a favor that for a time all the resentment he had felt for the wrongs he had endured was nearly obliterated. He almost resolved to take the oath his father had prescribed, and probably would have voluntarily offered such a pledge of obedience to his parent—so much more easily is a generous mind subdued by human kindness than by threats of human vengeance—had not the recollection of Rebecca, and the hope that they might meet, and be one day united, operated to make him resolve still to hold fast the faith which was dear to her.

His parents received him with every demonstration of gladness, and no allusion was permitted to be made to the unhappy subject of his banishment. But Oliver was not long in discovering that, though he was ostensibly at liberty, yet a strict watch was kept to prevent him from holding any communication with the obnoxious party he was supposed to favor. His solitude had not been idly or unprofitably spent. He had been furnished with books and writing materials, and then the daring plans he had formed, and once or twice nearly executed, to obtain his freedom, had given him the habit of depending on himself, which his father considered as a very dangerous sentiment for a young gentleman to entertain. So he took him up to London that he might acquire the tone of flattery and obsequiousness so necessary to those who would shine at court.

Oliver had made repeated inquiries concerning Rebecca Welden and her brother; but had never been able to find a person who could give any information respecting them. He learned their aunt was dead, before he left his confinement; but what had become of her heretic nephew and niece, none of the loyal and true believers could be supposed interested to know.

In London, Oliver Temple passed several months, occupied with the usual pursuits and recreations of his age and station, apparently seeking happiness in society, but in reality searching for some clue whereby he might discover the place where Robert Welden and his sister had retreated. He did not dream that retreat was the grave! This truth was at last revealed to him. He saw accidentally, in London, a gentleman whom he knew was acquainted with the Weldens. After several unsuccessful efforts, he at length obtained an interview with the man, who told him that Robert Welden, in a desperate attempt to escape from a prison where he had been thrown for his religion, had wounded his jailer, as it was thought dangerously, and that, to avoid an ignominious death, which he knew awaited him, he committed suicide.

"And Rebecca, what became of Rebecca?" exclaimed Oliver, clenching his hands and drawing in his breath with the deep gurgling sound of a drowning man.

"She died the day after her brother."

"A self-murderer was she?"

The gentleman looked at Oliver; the veins of his neck and temples were swelling with the tide of passionate emotions which he could scarcely restrain from bursting into the violent paroxysm of insanity. He went to him, took his hand, and said in a soothing tone, "Mr. Temple, this is a sorrowful business; but to the Lord we must resign ourselves and all that we hold dear. Remember, the Lord doth not willingly afflict."

"Then she did not kill herself?"

"No, no—she died of a fever, calmly as an infant falls asleep, and is now an angel in heaven."

Oliver's joints relaxed, his countenance lost its stern expression of passionate grief, his lip quivered, his eyelids drooped—one moment he struggled to suppress the outburst of his sorrow—but it might not be; nature triumphed over manly pride, he sank into a chair, and, covering his face, wept and sobbed as audibly as a child.

From that time, Oliver Temple was a changed man. There was a solemn severity in his countenance that announced, without the form of words, the Puritan in spirit. He considered himself as dead to the pleasures and hopes of this life, and the intensity of his thoughts and affections was directed how to secure the heavenly inheritance. To advance the cause for which Robert and Rebecca Welden had suffered was, as he believed, the only motive that induced him to wish to survive them. But in his own family he could hardly hope his efforts would be of any avail. He heard of the expedition to the New World, that was to be undertaken by godly men who went forth in the faith and strength of the Lord of hosts, to found a nation where man should be free to worship according to the commands of Scripture and the dictates of conscience.

In the mood of mind Oliver Temple then cherished, the expedition of the Puritan colony was just the one he would have chosen to join, rather than have been proclaimed ruler of the whole earth. He wrote to Mr. Johnson, of whom he had heard much good, and communicating the most important events of his life, besought his aid to enable him to escape from the temptations by which he was surrounded. In short, he wished to join the expedition unknown to his father or family. Mr. Johnson, though he would not have advised this step, did not think it his duty to oppose it. The young man was, by the civil law, of age to act for himself; and though the parental authority was highly venerated by our ancestors, among themselves, yet, like all who have a particular creed to support, involving what they consider the eternal welfare of its believers, they were sometimes too intent on advancing their Master's kingdom to attend to the minor point of earthly claims. "He that loveth father or mother more than me, is not worthy of me," was a favorite text with the Puritans.

"Oliver Temple is willing to leave father and mother, yea, and houses and lands and title, for Christ's sake: shall I discourage this zeal, or throw obstacles in the way of its immediate accomplishment, which may in the end prove a stumbling-block to this young Christian, even to the peril of his soul?" said Mr. Johnson to his wife.

She agreed with him that such would be sin for those who professed to be willing to endure every cross rather than disobey God.

Oliver Temple was accordingly admitted secretly on board the ship, in which Mr. Johnson and his wife, with Governor Winthrop and others of the most important members of the emigrating company, sailed in the spring of 1630.

There was no point of faith in which our ancestors were more fully established than in the firm belief of an overruling providence, which watched in a particular manner over them. In all their conversation, this belief was apparent. Neither was it, as some may suppose, the language of cant, or mere form of words. The faith that enabled them to endure unrepiningly the terrors and hardships of the wilderness, was that of the soul. The thought that God demanded the sacrifice of every selfish consideration animated them to endure privations; and though now, in these days of peace and plenty, liberty and liberal principles, we may sometimes feel inclined to smile at what we are pleased to term the credulity of those primitive Christians, yet the energy and consistency of their conduct, and the glorious results that have followed those labors they endured for their faith, should awe us from ridicule.

Indeed, if we would but call up the scene when those self-exiled men bade adieu to their homes in that pleasant land where their fathers had dwelt, and severing the ties of soul, which seem the sinews of our life, embarked on a wide and gloomy ocean in search of a resting-place in a new and almost unknown world, we should feel that they needed the high and holy excitement of a "faith that could remove mountains." They were not driven forth by the necessities of temporal want. They moved in obedience to the dictates of what they felt assured was the Spirit of God; and no wonder, therefore, that their language should be imbued with those thoughts which filled their hearts. Hence arose their frequent inference that Providence, in a particular and especial manner, directed their path; a sentiment which, if it cannot be deduced from philosophical principles, was, in their opinion, far more conclusively proved than mere human reason could have established—it was taught in the Bible.

"All things shall work together for good to them that love God!" was pronounced in a triumphant tone by Governor Winthrop when he would animate the ship's crew for the battle which was expected momentarily to begin. The odds were fearfully against the Puritans, yet the band of Leonidas was not more determined on victory or death. "It is the will of God that we should be tried," continued the governor; "if our faith faint not, the crown of victory, either of life or death, will be ours."

There was not a pale cheek or lip among the men, nor a tear seen, or a cry heard among the women and children. That Providence would direct the issue for their best good, all believed, trusted; and when they discovered those they had mistaken for Dunkirkers were indeed their own countrymen, the good Providence that had sent the trial, and yet shielded them from injury, was still more apparent. And it was thus every event that marked their passage to America was interpreted.

Did fair weather and fair winds prevail?—how providentially it was ordered that they might have a quick voyage when so much depended on their arrival early in the season! If they were retarded by storms and contrary gales, God had seen that it was good for them to be afflicted; and by a dispensation of his Providence was testing their patience and submission.

And thus, when Governor Winthrop had, from Mr. Johnson and his wife, learned the particulars of Oliver Temple's history, did he discover, in every misfortune which had befallen that young man, some particular bearing on his future destiny, on the part which Providence was fitting him to perform. And he felt persuaded that Oliver was to become a distinguished Christian, a shining light in that sanctuary from persecution, that pure church, which was to be founded in America. Yet the governor was not a visionary; he calculated with the shrewdness of worldly prudence when worldly things were under discussion; and he calculated that Oliver Temple would be a more active, and consequently a more useful man, could he be aroused from the torpor of sorrow which seemed to benumb his faculties, and was evidently preying fast on his health. But the sagacious governor did not trust to arguments merely to effect his purpose. He knew that words were never more idly used than in endeavors to combat by reasoning the indulgence of those griefs which the mourner's heart has consecrated as sacred. But he calculated that, if he could interest the young man's affections, those sensibilities which bind the human heart in fellowship with its kind, he would soon appear soberly cheerful as became his age and character.

The governor communicated his views and feelings on the subject to the Lady Arabella and her husband. They both agreed it would be judicious.

"If it is practicable," said the governor, "what do you think of promoting a match between this young man and your friend Lucy Perry?"

The lady smiled with that kind of meaning which argued satisfaction.

"I have marked her modest deportment and pious attention to religious duties with much approbation," continued the governor, "and I own I have felt that the young lady must make a great sacrifice of inclination to duty in going thus solitary to a strange land. I know she has excellent and dear friends in your ladyship and Mr. Johnson, but still I do think a kind protector, one of our strong and firm sex, is peculiarly necessary for the support of a delicate woman who ventures to be a sojourner in the wilderness."

The Lady Arabella looked on her husband with that expression of trusting love that told on whom she depended; the smile that answered her appeal spoke how fondly her confidence was appreciated. The governor raised his handkerchief, as if clearing his eye of some mote that pained him, but the pain was at his heart; for at that moment the thoughts of his own wife, whom he had left, perhaps never to be united again, rushed so tumultuously on his mind, that, firm as he was, it unmanned him, and he strove to conceal the tears he could not restrain.

"I think Lucy Perry will make an excellent wife," observed Mr. Johnson.

"And I have no doubt Oliver Temple will be a kind husband," said the Lady Arabella.

"I believe their meeting thus together on board the vessel was providential; and that we shall be in the way of duty to endeavor to promote a marriage between them," said the governor.

So the affair was settled, and, though nothing like a modern match-making was undertaken by the governor or his coadjutors in the plan, yet they contrived sometimes to bring the young people together, either to join in singing a particular tune in which it had been remarked their voices harmonized wonderfully, or else Lucy sat by the Lady Arabella as a listener, while Oliver was persuaded to read a chapter in "Precious Consolations for Weary Souls," or some other of those quaint and devout books that formed the light reading of our ancestors.

Day after day thus passed, and though Oliver Temple had paid no more attention to Lucy than the ceremonious civility of those days, which was most conspicuous in the frequency and flexibility of the bows of a gentleman, required, yet the governor was firmly persuaded of the success of his scheme. He conferred with the Rev. Mr. Wilson respecting it, and his approval seemed still further to stamp it as designed by Providence. And Zechariah Long's opinion was a coincidence that appeared almost miraculous, or at least prophetic.

The governor had thought it his duty to confer with that somewhat stern and peculiar, but yet esteemed and pious man, concerning Oliver. He found the suspicions of Zechariah were first awakened by hearing Oliver sigh and groan repeatedly in his sleep, as if his mind was burdened, and then he overheard him one day lamenting, in bitter terms, to the Lady Arabella, for the death of some person. "And so," said Zechariah, "I found his sorrow was for the decease of some one, and I thought it could not be a relation, as he was not clothed in mourning garments, and he had come on board privately, and no person knew him save Mr. Johnson and his lady, and so I inferred that he was a son of some of their friends, and that he had in a quarrel—such things happen among the children of this world, and are called honorable—slain a man, a friend perhaps, especially as I thought he showed guilt with his grief."

"You judged hardly," said the governor.

"I do repent me of it, since you have told me his history. And I wish we could devise something whereby the sadness of his countenance might be changed."

"I can join in your wish," said the governor.

Zechariah raised his finger twice before he spoke; as if the weight of his subject required deliberate pondering, then he came close to the governor, and said, in what he meant for a whisper—it might have been heard three paces—

"I have a thought; if it may be spoken, governor, to you I will say it. Would it not be well if the young man should find among us a companion who would comfort him for the loss of his first love? There is Lucy Perry; the maiden is comely, and seems heavenly-minded."

Zechariah paused, fearing he had said too much on so worldly a subject; but the smile of the other reassured him.

"If such is the will of Providence, it would exceedingly rejoice me," replied the governor.

And from that time he felt assured it would be the will of Providence, and even spoke confidently to the Rev. Mr. Wilson respecting the marriage which he might hold himself ready to solemnize.

Their long voyage at length drew to a close.

The cold winds of spring, that hitherto had chilled the passengers, were exchanged for the warm breath of a summer gale laden with the perfume of fruit and flower, as if to welcome them to the shore where such treasures of the earth abounded. It was the season when the approach to our then wild country was the most inviting. The forest foliage was sufficiently expanded to conceal the rudeness and desolation that a leafless mass of trees presents; and it had not that dense, dark aspect which, in its full maturity and verdure, made it look frowning and almost impenetrable. Some of the wild trees, the dogwood in particular, were in bloom, and their blossoms contrasted beautifully with the bright green of the young leaves, thus softening the majesty of the scene. They had been for more than two months confined on board a crowded ship, and the idea of liberty to range abroad on the shore before them was of itself sufficient to bring rapturous exclamations from almost every tongue. But there were higher and holier considerations that called for rejoicing. They had been preserved amid the perils of the deep; the land they had sought as their place of rest was reached, their home!

"There, my Arabella, must be our home; can you be contented to dwell there?" said Mr. Johnson to his wife, as he pointed to the sea of forest that stretched in the distance, far as the eye could penetrate.

The tear that was gathering in her dark eyes did not fall, it only brightened their expression, as she met her husband's gaze, and calmly replied, "It will be home to me wherever you dwell, my husband."

"I wish the young man had better improved the opportunity that so providentially placed him in her society. But we must be content. It is, however, impressed on my mind that you will shortly be called to bless his nuptials," said Governor Winthrop to Mr. Wilson. They were both regarding Oliver Temple, who seemed, as he stood gazing on the shore, so rapt in the contemplation of the new and strange scene before him, that he was totally unmindful of the questions and exclamations his companions were pouring forth, as a boat from the harbor approached the vessel. Mr. Endicott and some others were in the boat.

"Welcome, welcome to Salem," was the greeting. Oliver did not regard it. His eye was caught by a young man who remained in the boat; the cry of "Robert Welden! is it you?" burst in a shriek from his lips; and the next moment they were in each other's arms.

Robert and Rebecca had escaped. The tale of their death was an invention of Oliver Temple's father, to efface, as he hoped effectually, the romantic dream of his son, that he should ever obtain the sister.

"How providential it was that this young man and Lucy Perry did not fall in love!" said the governor to Mr. Johnson a few days after they had landed. "We may see by this how easy it is for the wisdom of man to be turned into foolishness. I thought I had laid a mighty prudent plan; but lo! I now see my folly. We must submit ourselves and all that we have to God. He will in his good providence order events for our best happiness."

When the fleet, that brought over the colonists, had all arrived safely, a day of thanksgiving was appointed. This was July 8th, 1630, and on that day of rejoicing Oliver Temple and Rebecca Welden were married.

This was the first wedding celebrated in the colony that laid the foundation of Boston. There was great joy and many congratulations, and none of the guests appeared more disposed to kindly feelings on the occasion than Mr. Zechariah Long. His suspicions were all removed, and he stood so erect that his superior altitude was never afterwards a matter of question.

"How beautifully everything is ordered by Providence!" said the governor.

VEGETABLE PHYSIOLOGY

BY HARLAND COULTAS.

WHEN we examine the various plants around us, and notice their phenomena, we at once see that all are subject to certain fixed and immutable laws, which operate with as much constancy and regularity as the laws governing the motions of the ponderous worlds that roll in the depths of space.

Thus all plants have a definite period of life assigned them, more or less limited, during which time we see them, as it were by successive increments, slowly elaborated out of the earth and atmosphere, arrive at the full perfection of their growth and beauty, reproduce themselves, and then die. With the cessation of life plants become disorganized or chemically decomposed, decay, and disappear, the materials out of which their fabric was constructed being reunited unto other bodies by the influence of that mutual attraction which subsists not only between worlds, but amongst atomic particles of matter, however small.

The law of material attraction may be thus expressed: Matter may attract matter at all distances, from zero to infinity. This attraction takes place with a force varying directly in proportion to its quantity and inversely as the square of the distance. Now when matter collects into masses, as we see it has done in the case of the starry heavens and planetary bodies, the bodies thus mutually attracting each other separate sometimes to distances all but infinite, but according to fixed and determinate laws which may be calculated by the higher mathematics, the distance increasing in the ratio of their respective magnitudes. We call the name of this species of attraction gravity. But when matter retains its elementary condition and exists in the form of those invisible particles called atoms, two or more mutually attracting particles must be brought by the same law infinitely near to each other before they can exercise any mutual influence; and we give the name of chemical affinity to this kind of attraction.

To apply this philosophy to plants. They are the result principally of the atomic or chemical affinity, combined with other agents, and are a beautiful pile of matter borrowed from the atoms in the earth and air, and united together by the operation of natural laws for a little space of time. Fabricated by nature as material for the building up of higher organic forms, they perform their part in the ever-shifting scenery of life. Some of them become incorporated as food into animal bodies; others retain their state as plants, and are the instruments used by nature to extract fertilizing principles from every falling shower and passing breeze, which they impart to the soil on which they finally decay. The end of being accomplished, these beautiful and evanescent forms decay, they become disorganized, the pile of matter falls, and is restored by the influence of secret, invisible affinities to the air and earth from which it was borrowed for a little while.

The period of time during which these phenomena take place varies according to the peculiar organization of each species. Thus plants whose organization is very simple, as ferns, mosses, and many of our flowering plants, come to perfection, reproduce themselves, and then die, and this all in a single season. In those, however, whose organization is higher, the duration of life is proportionably longer. But the forest tree, lifting its massive stem for centuries to the light of day, has an appointed period to its life as regular as the lowly moss that grows beneath its shade. The duration of these phenomena is alone different. The phenomena themselves are precisely analogous. The growth of the humble moss with its beautiful little reproductive mechanism is only a simpler expression of the same law which operates in the production of the forest tree. A few months, however, suffice to perfect the one, whilst many centuries are required by nature before she can build up the other. It would seem from this that the study of the simple plants ought to take precedence of those whose structure is more complex and intricate. It is these plants which first clothe the surface of the barren rock. They are the first settlers on those new lands which, after unnumbered ages, according to geologists, rise from their parent waves. Successive generations of these plants die, and form by their decay a humus for the growth and nutrition of higher plants.

We will take nature for our guide. We will follow the footsteps of her successive creations. We are satisfied that the plan and structure of her higher organizations may be successfully studied in detail in the humbler. Let us begin at the beginning. How can we possibly comprehend what is intricate when we stumble at what is simple? It is a philosophical as well as a scriptural truth that "all flesh is as grass." We depend on plants for the materials of our own growth; the development of our own being is closely connected with that of the vegetable world; and, if we know nothing of wild flowers, how is it possible that we should know anything properly of ourselves? The highly organized body of man can never be thoroughly understood unless the whole series of forms of life beneath him engages his attention.

A R I S T O C R A C Y.

THE world has been frequently entertained with descriptions given of the manners of the great, by fortunate individuals who, with the help of "letters of introduction," and the practice of suave obsequiousness, have climbed to the "summits of refinement" in Europe, and in wondering admiration have surveyed, from the height, the world of "white Kid-dom" around them. Intoxicated perhaps by the "thin air" which pervades those regions, their descriptions of the aristocracy have become tintured with a kind of servile amazement—an envious idolatry—which will provoke the quiet contempt of wise men, and excite wonder and imitation in the foolish. A young tourist—fresh from a republican country—visiting for the first time the land of his ancestors, and mingling with the noble and the high-born, is apt to be dazzled by the glare that surrounds him, and to forget that tinsel glitters as brightly as pure gold. He cannot perceive in a match-making countess the practice of arts which, when stripped of their fashionable cloak, a green-grocer's wife would spurn—nor detect under the bland smile of conventional coldness, a wreck of good feeling, a blight of genuine nature, and a frigid selfishness, that are too often to be found in their withering perfection among these envied classes.

We listen to his excited narrative—some with delight and others with charitable patience. In perfect good faith he assures us how that, one fine morning, he sat with Lady X. in her ladyship's boudoir; how that her ladyship was attended by a sky-blue page who handed her a scented note on a silver salver—he becomes learned in millinery, and minutely describes her ladyship's dress, and informs us that in the important côte à côte he enjoyed with her ladyship, she said that "she was fond of Americans." To all this we attend with laudable gravity; we bless the penetration of our tourist, and Lady X. is immortalised in our thoughts.

Lady X. does not tell him that she is voted a bore by the élites at Almack's—that her life is spent in petty intrigues—that her expenditure exceeds her income, and she condescends to be mighty humble to plebeian creditors, and coax French milliners with fashionable scandal. We have seen gentlemen of this kind who have left home, plain citizens and good men, and, during their sojourn in Europe, have merged manhood in fashion, and native goodness in second-hand foppery; drowned nature in fastidiousness, and sacrificed nationality to puerile imitations of foreign follies.

There is an aristocracy of the country as well as the town, and in this paper the writer will endeavor to portray the manners of the class in their rustication, both of those whose permanent residence is in the country, and those votaries of fashion who visit it during the interregnum of the London "season."

The residences of these great people in England are in the vicinity of small country towns, in which no manufacture is carried on, and whose inhabitants are supported in fact by their trading with them. Their houses embrace every style of architecture, from the modern mansion with its three or four hundred acres of land, to the old turreted castle, embosomed in its wide domain of hill and dale, woods and lawns. These establishments during the greater part of the year present a dull and desolate appearance. An over-fed butler with a pompous housekeeper exercise a despotic viceroyalty over a troop of inferior domestics. The coach-houses and adjacent offices are hermetically locked, and no signs of life are visible except among grooms "breathing" the horses, or a dozen dogs leaping to the extreme length of their chains from their kennels, to fright an intruding stranger with their aristocratic yelping. The mantle of command descends at these intervals from the proprietor to the butler, who makes the most of such opportunities to impress the lower servants and the towns-people with an immense idea of his importance. The dreariness infects the towns, and the shopkeepers grumble away their mouths in deploing the badness of trade, and the degeneracy of things in general.

But a change comes o'er the spirit of the scene in September and October, when parliament is prorogued and "all the world" flies into the country to slaughter domesticated game, and destroy hecatombs of tame hares in fashionable battues. The Marquis of A., an old peer whose park wall bounds the town on one side, whose trees pry into the windows of some of the houses, and whose rooks keep up an eternal clamor above the streets, returns from his arduous parliamentary duties of dining at his club, and sleeping his dinner off in the House of Lords, to the halls of his ancestors. He is accompanied by his two sons, the Earl of B. and Lord Frederick C., his right honorable daughters the Ladies C., and a high-bred gout, of very ancient pedigree; yet lively withal, aristocratic, imperious, and yet painfully eccentric.

The Marquis's arrival is soon followed by that of other noblemen and gentry who reside from two to seven miles around; and the dosing townsmen, whose respect for rank is hereditary and extreme, shake hands with each other in fervid congratulation, and invite the servants of the establishments (who have profitable patronage to bestow) to snug evening parties in the taverns, where they make laborious speeches and drink solemn toasts. The quiet streets are distracted with mounted horsemen in gaudy liveries, who are dispatched for perfumeries for ladies-maids, and physic for horses, fish-sauces for the cook, and boluses for his Lordship's gout, letters and lozenges for her Ladyship, and dog-lashes and horse-girths for the stables.

The Marquis (who may be taken as a sample of the whole tribe) is inviolable for a few days, and the townsmen shake their sagacious heads and propagate dim rumors among themselves, that "it's the gout," or that "there's a screw loose up at the Hall," "things have not all gone right in his absence," and such like, while he, good gentleman, is overhauling the accounts of his steward, learning of defaulters in rent, or prosecutions for poaching. The young sprigs of nobility are examining the shrubbery and gardens, listening to the feats performed by one or two favorite thoroughbreds, or trying the scent and training of a few young pointers. After business is attended to, and a few days immurement in the hall has proved a bore, the different members of the noble family begin to emerge from their splendid solitude, to make morning calls upon the surrounding gentry, and condescend even to go "a shopping" on fine mornings.

The reader has perhaps some crude notion of shopping, but I doubt if he (or she rather) have any just idea of the mysteries of that important science, as practised by these classes. Let us suppose an elegant barouche of a light-brown color, pricked out with dark-green, with a full-grown coat of arms surmounted with a coronet upon the panel. To this vehicle are attached four "bright bays," each seventeen hands high, glittering in silver-mounted harness, arching their shining necks and snorting in contemptuous pride as they spurn the ground. These animals are managed by two boys (one boy to each pair) of fourteen years old, clothed in small tight green jackets buttoned up to the chin, and displaying in front three rows of round gilt buttons, two of which pass over their shoulders and penetrate a short distance down their backs; they have faultless white gloves and silver-handled whips, their legs are bound in stainless breeches and Lilliputian top boots, and their business is to look straight before them without moving a muscle of their necks, and rise and fall at the same moment in their saddles, with the undeviating regularity with which infantry soldiers, on their own horses, "keep step." At the back of the carriage is a tall human being, who has cheated Nature by forsaking the sphere of usefulness for which he was sent upon earth, and voluntarily torturing himself into that biped anomaly—a footman, or flunkey—there is some excuse for a bear that is compelled to learn the art of dancing, but no apology can be formed for a rational animal, who submits of his own free will to the tricks of lackeyism. This gentleman is superb in flaming livery and shoulder-knot, and sublime in white silk stockings, into which he has inserted two false calves making—with one real one—a total of three. His duties are to hold on to the carriage, to preserve a stolid gravity in his face, a small frown of importance on his brow, an unwrinkled state of spruce erection in his white cravat, to leap from his stand when the carriage stops, to touch his hat whenever he is looked at, and to treat the lady's maid with a kind of deferential familiarity, which he wishes to impose upon the world for love-making.

One would naturally suppose that this brilliant equipage was called into action to do honor to some important occasion of infinitely greater consequence than shopping; but so it is. In the carriage are two young and handsome ladies of eighteen or thereabouts, reclining in attitudes of Eastern voluptuousness, and a young man of unimpeachable moustaches and cravat, loling luxuriously back, smiling and biting a rose-bud, in order to show his white teeth. A young gentleman invited "down" probably, on some speculation of alliance, perhaps merely because he has gained celebrity as a "diner-out," and has a happy knack of saying smart things at a dull season. At his side on cushions are seated two Blenheim spaniels; and an Italian greyhound, with a silver collar and chain, is standing "rampant," with his two forefeet upon the carriage door, barking with a tiny snappish voice at foot-passengers. The carriage is also accompanied—by way of foot-guards—by two large spotted Danish dogs, running one on each side of it.

The elegant "set out" now stops at an apothecary's shop, the tall fellow behind leaps from his standing place; and, walking to the door of the carriage, assumes a demure look, and touches his hat. The proprietor of the shop, in his haste forgetting to remove his white apron, runs to the carriage and shows a shining bald head to the ladies, as he bows obsequiously. They order him to send a few bottles of eau de cologne to the Hall; this he promises to do, with a profusion of compliments and thanks for their patronage. You may observe, while they are stopping, half a dozen fellows who were talking gossip in a group about forty yards distant; three of them hastily retire to their shops in expectation of a call, and the others instinctively "hem" to clear their throats, although they have no idea of speaking, and walk with a sanctified gait past the carriage, merely to have the gratification of lifting their hats to the great people. You may perceive, also, that every horseman, and every other passenger, ease their consciences by performing the same action; and you may notice likewise, if you are a person of acute observation, that a couple of beggars (one of whom is blind, and led by a young girl) who have assailed every person they have met with importunities, leave off begging, as if by some tacit agreement, as they near the carriage, and hurry past it like convicted criminals. To all these obeisances the young gentleman lolling in the carriage returns a lazy nod, and the young ladies a stare which, from such charming creatures, would be acknowledgment enough, if it were only accompanied by a smile.

The Marquis himself rides out on horseback, attended at a respectful distance by two mounted grooms, and surrounded close at hand by half a dozen hounds. He makes a point of dressing very plainly in a black coat and velvet waistcoat; the only remarkable portions of his attire being a starched muslin cravat tied à la Brummell, and a pair of Hessian boots with aristocratic tassels. He is altogether a jolly-looking fellow, and his manly cheeks gracefully protrude over his shirt collars, while his countenance exhibits that appearance of dignified nobility and ill-temper which is the immemorial perquisite of overwhelming ancestral honors, and eternal—remorseless—gout. The Marquis has learned that one of his best tenants requires some repairs done to his barn; and, being a man of business, in these rabid anti-cornlaw times, he deems it best to conciliate all men by a display of incredible condescension, and pay a visit to the farmer, to inspect the premises in person. He therefore arrives at the homestead of his tenant just at one o'clock, when the farmer is at dinner; and while his footmen are flogging away his hounds, which have commenced a furious attack upon the dogs in the farm-yard, the old farmer hurries from his dinner with his head bare, and his wife, to the utter dismay of the laborers, sweeps away all vestiges of the unfinished meal, and commands them to retire, lest "his lordship" should condescend to enter the house and find it in an uproar, from clowns having perpetrated the enormity of eating.

Now, as the farmer was never behindhand with his rent, the Marquis, addressing him by his surname, lowers his dignity so far as to ask him about the state of the late crops, and the markets, and the old man is enraptured; but still the old fellow—who in his heart does not care a great deal for a Lord, so long as "he is able to pay his way"—obstinately informs him that times are "dreadful bad," and an honest man can't live, and reminds him of the state of his barn, whereupon the Marquis assures him that he has given orders to his steward to have it repaired, and humors the old farmer by asking for a glass of his "home brewed." If he is in an extraordinary good-humor, he will dismount and enter the house; where he will find "the dame," who has hastily donned her Sunday cap and a clean apron, with her daughters in the same articles of dress recently adopted, courteseying lowly, and silent with profound respect, until he familiarly accosts the old lady, and jokes the young ones upon matrimonial matters, in a short, abrupt manner, finishing every sentence with an "eh, eh?" not giving them time to answer him, which, indeed, they are too much "frustrated" to do: so he just sips a little of the ale that is brought to him, and, wishing them a condescending "good morning," mounts his horse, and canters home, dismissing them from his thoughts for another six months.

This slight sketch may serve to give the reader some idea of the manners of the great when rusticationg.

THE HEIRESS AND HER WOOERS.

BY MRS. ABDY.

"As the Diamond excels every jewel we find,
So Truth is the one peerless gem of the mind!"

A NEW tragedy was about to be brought forth at the Haymarket Theatre. Report spoke loudly of its merits, and report touched closely on the name of its author. Either Talbot or Stratford must have written it; those regular attendants at rehearsal, who seemed equally interested in every situation, equally at home in every point, throughout the piece. Some said that it was a Beaumont and Fletcher concern, in which both parties were equally implicated; and this conjecture did not appear improbable, for the young men in question were indeed united together in bonds of more than ordinary friendship. They had been schoolfellows and brother-collegians; each was in the enjoyment of an easy independence, and their tastes, pursuits, and ways of living were very similar. So congenial, indeed, were they in taste, that they had both fixed their preference on the same lady! Adelaide Linley was an accomplished and pretty heiress, who, fortunately for them, was the ward of Mr. Grayson, an eminent solicitor, with whom they had recently renewed an early acquaintance. Rivalry, however, failed of its usual effect in their case, it created no dissension between them; indeed, the manner of Adelaide was very far removed from coquetry, and although it was evident that she preferred the friends to the rest of her wooers, she showed to neither of them evidence of any feeling beyond those of friendship and good-will.

The night of the tragedy arrived. Mr. and Mrs. Grayson, their ward, and two or three of her "woosers," were in attendance before the rising of the curtain; they were just as ignorant as other people touching the precise identity of the dramatist about to encounter the awful fiat of the public. Talbot and Stratford were sheltered in the deep recesses of a private box; had they been in a public one, nobody could have doubted which was the hero of the evening. Talbot's flushed cheek, eager eye, and nervous restlessness, plainly indicated that the tragedy was not written on the Beaumont and Fletcher plan, but that it owed its existence entirely to himself.

The curtain rose; the tragedy was admirably performed, and many of the speeches were beautifully written; but it lacked the indescribable charm of stage effect, so necessary to stage success; the last act was heavy and uninteresting, great disapprobation was expressed, and finally another piece was announced for the succeeding evening!

Adelaide was much concerned; it mattered nothing to her whether the play was written by Talbot or Stratford; she wished well to each of them, and sympathized in the disappointment of the author. Talbot, who had anticipated stepping forward to the front of the box, and gracefully bowing his acknowledgments to the applauding audience, now found himself under the necessity of making an abrupt exit, muttering invectives on their stupidity; and Stratford repaired to his own lodgings, aware that Talbot, in the present state of his mind, was unfitted for the society even of his favorite friend. The next morning, Stratford had half finished breakfast when Talbot entered the room. Stratford was about to accost him with a lively remark, that "he hoped the severity of the audience had not spoiled his night's rest;" but a momentary glance at his friend told him that such a remark would be cruelly sarcastic; it was quite clear that his night's rest had been spoiled; it was quite clear that what had been "sport" to the public had been "death" to the dramatist; it was quite clear that the "Russian Brothers," although they had ceased to exist on the stage of the Haymarket Theatre, were still hovering about, like shadowy apparitions, "to plague the inventor!"

"Read these papers," said Talbot, placing four or five newspapers in the hands of Stratford, "and do not wonder that I look and feel miserable at having thus exposed myself to the derision of the world."

Stratford hastily finished a cup of coffee, and pushed away a just broken egg; it seemed quite unfeeling to think of eating and drinking in the presence of so much wretchedness. He turned to the dramatic article of one newspaper after another, expecting to find his friend victimized, slandered, and laughed to scorn; but in reality, as my readers may perhaps be prepared to hear, the critics were very fair, reasonable critics, indeed; and it was only the sensitiveness of the author which had converted them into weapons of offence.

"I am sure," said Stratford, after the scrutiny was concluded, "the dramatic critic of the 'Times' speaks very kindly of you; does not he say that there is much beauty in many of the speeches, only that the drama is unsuited for representation?"

"Exactly so," replied Talbot, dryly; "the only defect he finds in it is, that it is perfectly unsuited for the purpose for which it was written!"

"But," persisted Stratford, "he says that he is certain you would succeed better in a second attempt."

"As I shall most assuredly never make a second attempt," replied Talbot, "his opinion, or that of any one else on the subject, is of very little importance to me."

"Surely, however," said Stratford, "it is better to receive the commendation of writers of judgment and ability, than the applause of the one shilling gallery. Arbuscula was an actress on the Roman stage, who laughed at the hisses of the populace, while she received the applause of the knights."

Talbot only replied to this anecdote by a muttered exclamation of impatience.

And here let me give a few words of advice to my readers. Whenever you condole with those in trouble, do it in the old-fashioned cut-and-dried way; it is true that your stock-phrases and tedious truisms may cause you to be called a bore, but thousands of highly respectable, condoling friends have been called bores before you, and thousands will be called so after you. But if you diverge at all from the beaten track, and attempt to introduce a literary allusion, or venture on a classical illustration, depend upon it you will be cited ever afterwards as an extremely hard-hearted person, intent alone on displaying your own wit or wisdom, instead of properly entering into the sorrows of your friend.

"The 'Morning Chronicle,'" resumed Stratford, "speaks highly of the scene between the brothers at the end of the second act."

"Yes," replied Talbot, "and the 'Morning Chronicle' winds up its critic by advising me never to write another drama."

"Did you not say just now that you never intended to do so?" asked Stratford.

"How I wish, Stratford," exclaimed Talbot, impetuously, "that I could make you enter into my feelings. How very differently you would think and speak if you were the author of a condemned tragedy!"

"I do not consider," said Stratford, "that if such were the case, I should in any respect think or speak differently. I should feel far more pleasure in knowing that I had written a work which deserved to be successful, than mortification at the want of good taste in a mixed and misjudging audience, which had caused it to fail of success."

Stratford, having been unfortunate in his previous attempts at consolation, had taken some pains to devise a prettily turned speech; but he little thought how completely successful it would prove; the countenance of Talbot actually lighted up with pleasure.

"Are you really sincere in what you have said?" he replied. "I have a particular reason for wishing to know; do not reply to me in a hurry; take a few minutes for consideration."

Somewhat surprised, Stratford began the course of mental examination prescribed by his friend; and the result of it was that, although he had only meant to speak civilly, he found that he had been speaking truly; for Stratford had a great admiration for literary talents, and a great wish to possess them; he also knew that Adelaide Linley was a warm admirer of dramatic poetry; he could not doubt that her judgment would lead her to approve of the "Russian Brothers;" and, in regard to its condemnation, she, like every other intelligent person, must be fully aware that the plays that read best in the closet are often least adapted to the stage.

"I have considered the matter again," said Stratford, after a pause, "and I repeat what I previously said; I should be glad to be the author of the 'Russian Brothers,' even although it has been condemned; but after all, Talbot, how useless is this conversation! no good wishes on your part, or aspiring wishes on my own, can make me the author of a drama to which I never contributed an idea or a line."

"Yet," said Talbot, "I do not see why the business might not be arranged to our mutual satisfaction. You wish to be known as the author of this play; I, perhaps foolishly and irritably, repent that I ever wrote it; no one but ourselves is aware which of us is the author; why should you not own it? I will most joyfully give up my claim to you."

Stratford was a little startled at this proposition.

"But should the deception be discovered," he said, "people will allege that, like the jay, I have been strutting in borrowed plumes."

"Not at all," replied Talbot; "your plumes are not borrowed, but are willingly bestowed upon you by the owner; besides, how should any discovery ensue, except from our own disclosures? You, of course, will not wish to disown what you consider it a credit to gain; and, for myself, I give you my word that, should the 'Russian Brothers' be destined to attain high celebrity at a future day, I shall never assert my rights of paternity—they are the children of your adoption; but, remember, you adopt them for life."

"Willingly," replied Stratford; "and now let us pay a visit at Mr. Grayson's house. Doubtless the fair Adelaide will be impatient to pour balm into the wounds suffered by one of her adorers; pity is sometimes akin to love."

"It is more frequently akin to contempt," murmured Talbot, in too low a voice to be heard; but nevertheless the friends proceeded on their way, talking much less cheerfully, and looking much less contented than might be supposed, when it is considered that they had recently entered into a compact so satisfactory to both of them. I wish I could say that conscience bore any share in their quietude, and that each felt grieved and humiliated at the idea that he was violating the sacred purity of truth; but such was not the case. Either Talbot or Stratford would have shrunk from the idea of telling a falsehood of malignity or dishonesty; but the polite untruths of convenience or flattery were as "household words" in their vocabulary. A dim foreboding of evil, however, now seemed to overshadow them. Talbot had something of the same sensation which a man may be supposed to have who has cast off a troublesome child in a fit of irritation. His tragedy had been a source of great disappointment and mortification to him; but still it was his own; it had derived existence from him; he had spent many tedious days and nights watching over it before he could bring it to perfection; he was not quite happy in the idea that he had forever made over all right and title in it to another. Stratford also was somewhat dispirited; he could not help thinking about a paper in the "Spectator" concerning a "Mountain of Miseries," where Jupiter allowed every one to lay down his own misery, and take up that of another person, each individual in the end being bitterly dissatisfied with the result of the experiment. Stratford had laid down his literary insignificance, and taken up the burden of unsuccessful authorship; should he live to repent it? This in the course of a little time will appear.

Adelaide Linley sat in the drawing-room of her guardian, eagerly awaiting a visit from her two favorite admirers. She was not alone, neither was one of her "wooters" with her. Her companion was a quiet-looking young man, whose personal appearance had nothing in it to recommend him to notice, although a physiognomist would have been struck with the good expression of his countenance. His name was Alton, and he was the confidential clerk of her guardian. He had never presumed to address the heiress, save with distant respect; but she valued him for the excellent qualities which had made him a high favorite with Mr. Grayson, and always treated him with kindness and consideration. On the present occasion, however, she was evidently somewhat out of humor, and accepted the sheet of paper from him, on which he had been transcribing for her some passages from a new poem, with a cold expression of thanks. Alton lingered a moment at the door of the room. "There is peculiar beauty," he said, "in the closing lines of the last passage."

"There is," replied the heiress, carelessly; "but I should scarcely have thought, Mr. Alton, that you would have taken much interest in poetry: why did you not accompany us last night, to see the new tragedy, although so repeatedly pressed to do so?"

"I had a reason for declining to go, Miss Linley," said Alton.

"Probably you disapprove of dramatic representations," said Adelaide; "in which case I approve your consistency and conscientiousness in refusing to frequent them."

Alton would have liked to be approved by Adelaide; but he liked to speak the truth still better.

"That was not my reason," he replied; "I do not disapprove of the drama, nor could I expect anything that was not perfectly excellent and unexceptionable from the reputed authors of the tragedy in question—I had another reason."

"May I beg to know it?" said Adelaide, half in jest and half in earnest.

Alton's cheek became flushed, but he replied, "I am not in the habit of withholding the truth, when expressly asked for it. I never go to public amusements, because I object to the expense."

Alton could scarcely have made any speech that would more have lowered him in Adelaide's estimation. The young can make allowance for "the good old gentlemanly vice" of avarice, in those who have lived so many years in the world that gathering gold appears to them as suitable a pastime for age as that of gathering flowers for childhood; but avarice in youth, like a lock of white hair in the midst of sunny curls, seems sadly out of its place. Adelaide knew that Alton received a liberal stipend from her guardian, and that he had also inherited some property from a cousin; he had not any near relations, he was doubtless hoarding entirely for his own profit; he was a gold worshipper in a small way, accumulating the precious metal by petty economies in London, instead of going out manfully to dig it up by lumps in California! She therefore merely replied, "You are very prudent, Mr. Alton," with a marked and meaning intonation of the last word, which converted it into a severe epigram, and took up a book with an air of such unmistakable coldness, that the discomfited economist was glad to beat a retreat. Adelaide's solitude was soon more agreeably enlivened by the arrival of Talbot and Stratford. Talbot quickly dispelled all embarrassment as to the subject of the tragedy, by playfully saying, "I bring with me an ill-fated author, who I am sure you will agree with me deserved much better treatment than he has met with."

Hereupon Adelaide offered words of consolation, and very sweet, kind, and winning words they were; indeed, Stratford deemed them quite sufficient to compensate for the failure of a tragedy; but then, we must remember that Stratford was not really the author of the "Russian Brothers;" his wounds were only fictitious, and therefore it was no very difficult task to heal them. Possibly Talbot might have felt a little uneasy at Adelaide's excess of kindness, had he been present during the whole of Stratford's visit; but Talbot had soon made his escape to his club; he had several friends there, who suspected him of having written the tragedy of the preceding night; a few hours ago he had dreaded the idea of meeting them; but now he encountered them with fearless openness, expressing his concern for the failure of Stratford's tragedy, and remarking that "the poor fellow was so terribly cut up about it, that he had advised him to keep quiet for a few days, and let the affair blow over."

Talbot and Stratford dined together; both were in good spirits; neither of them had yet begun to feel any of the evils of the deceptive course they were pursuing. A week passed, and the sky was no longer so fair and cloudless. Adelaide's pity for Stratford was evidently far more akin to love than contempt; she was an admirer of genius, and was never wearied of talking about the tragedy, which had really made a deep impression upon her. She requested Stratford to let her have the rough copy of it; the request was not so embarrassing as might be supposed, for Stratford had been obliged to ask Talbot to give it to him, that he might be able to answer Adelaide's continual questions as to the conduct of the story and development of the characters; the handwriting of the friends was very similar, and the blotted, interlined manuscript revealed no secrets as to its especial inditer. "Remember," said Adelaide, as she playfully received it, "that I consider this as a gift, not as a loan; it will probably be introduced into various circles."

Talbot was present at the time, and felt a pang of inexpressible acuteness at the idea of the offspring of his own brain being paraded in "various circles" as the production of Stratford. He could not offer any opposition to Adelaide's intentions; but he revenged himself by constant taunting allusions to the mortifications of an unsuccessful dramatist, abounded by the manager, scorned by the performers, and even a subject of sarcastic pity to the scene-shifters!

These speeches hurt and offended Stratford, especially as they were always made in the presence of Captain Nesbitt, another of the "woocers" of the heiress, who shared Talbot's newly-born jealousy of Stratford, and consequently was delighted both to prompt and keep up any line of conversation likely to humiliate him in the presence of his lady-love. A short time ago Talbot and Stratford had been generous and amicable rivals; but they had ceased to walk together in peace from the period when they entered the crooked paths of dissimulation. When Adelaide had attentively read the manuscript tragedy, she transcribed it in a fair hand; she had already fixed on a destination for it. One of the oldest friends of Adelaide's late father was a fashionable London publisher. Adelaide had kept up frequent intercourse with him, and waited on him with her manuscript, secure of being kindly received, even if he did not grant her request. Fortunately, however, for her, he had been present at the representation of the "Russian Brothers," and had been extremely struck with the beauty of the dialogue, and he readily agreed to print it. When the proofs were ready, Adelaide, quite sure that she should be giving great pleasure to Stratford, announced to him what she had done.

Stratford nervously started, and gave a hurried, apprehensive glance at Talbot.

"It will be certain to be a favorite with the reading public, will it not?" said Adelaide, addressing Talbot.

"I am sure it will," answered Talbot, with animation, forgetting for the moment everything but that he was the author of the 'Russian Brothers,' and that the 'Russian Brothers' was going to be printed. "How well the scene will read between the brothers at the end of the second act!"

"It will, indeed," returned Adelaide, with an approving glance at Talbot, whom she had lately suspected of being somewhat envious of the genius of his rival; "really, we must try and inspire our friend with a little more confidence. I don't think he is at all aware of his own talents."

"I don't think he is, indeed," said Talbot, with a distant approach to a sneer.

"But my favorite passage," pursued Adelaide, "is the soliloquy of Orloff, in the third act. Will you repeat it, Mr. Stratford?"

Stratford began to repeat it as blunderingly and monotonously as he had been wont to repeat "My name is Norval" in his schoolboy days; but Talbot quickly took possession of it, and recited it with feeling and spirit.

"How strange it is," said Adelaide, "that authors rarely give effect to their own writings! But how beautiful is the sentiment of that speech—more beautiful, I think, every time one hears it. How did you feel, Mr. Stratford, when you wrote those lines?"

Stratford declared, with sincerity, that he had not the slightest recollection how he felt; and Adelaide asked Talbot to repeat another speech, and praised his memory and feeling, in return for which he praised her good taste. Poor Talbot, he was somewhat in the position of the hero of a German tale; a kind of metempsychosis seemed to have taken place in relation to himself and his friend, and he did not know whether to be delighted that his tragedy should be admired, or angry that it should be admired as the composition of Stratford. All contradictory feelings, however, merged into unmistakable resentment and discontent when the tragedy was published; it became decidedly popular; the Reviews accorded wonderfully in their commendation of it, and the first edition was speedily sold off. Stratford's name was not prefixed to it, at his own especial request: he did not want to plunge deeper into the mazes of falsehood than he had already done. But Talbot had proclaimed with such unwearied perseverance that Stratford was the author of the condemned tragedy, that his name on the title-page would have been quite an unnecessary identification. Poor Talbot! he certainly had much to try his patience at present. Stratford received abundance of invitations, in virtue of his successful authorship; he went to many parties in the character of a lion, where he was treated with much solemn reverence, and his most commonplace remark was evidently treasured as the quintessence of wit and judgment. These festivities Talbot did not wish to share. But frequently Stratford was invited to literary, real literary parties, where everybody in the room was celebrated for doing something better than it is done by people in general; and were any half-dozen guests taken at random from the assemblage, they would have sufficed to stud an ordinary party with stars. Here Stratford was introduced to brilliant novelists, exquisite poets, profound scholars, and men of searching science. Here, also, he met with literary women, as gentle and unassuming as they were gifted and celebrated, who wore their laurels with as much simplicity as if they had been wild flowers; and who, so far from possessing any of the old-fashioned pedantry which has aptly been defined as "intellectual tight lacing," were ready to converse on the most trite and every day subjects—casting, however, over every subject on which they conversed, the pure and cheering sunshine of genius.

All these new acquaintances of Stratford's were extremely kind and encouraging in their manner towards him, inquiring into his tastes and employments, praising him for that which he had already done, and encouraging him to do more in future. Such society and such conversation would have realized Talbot's earliest aspirations, and he could not willingly cede those privileges to a man who had never written half a dozen lines to deserve them. Yet Talbot was not a vain nor a selfish man; had Stratford been really gifted by nature with superior abilities to his own, he would have been quite satisfied that he should have reaped the harvest of them. But that Stratford should be distinguished at once by the notice of the gifted ones of earth, and by the smiles of Adelaide Linley, and that he might himself have been occupying that doubly enviable position, had he only kept in the simple path of truth—it was indeed a trial to the nerves and to the temper. At length, one day, when the rivals were alone, the smouldering fire burst forth.

"I am very much surprised, Stratford," said Talbot, flattering himself that he was speaking in a remarkably cool, self-possessioned tone, when in reality his cheeks were flushed with excitement, and his voice trembled with irritation—"I am very much surprised that you can continue from day to day to enjoy literary celebrity to which you must feel that you have not the shadow of a claim."

Stratford did not return an angry answer to his friend; he was on the winning side, and successful people can always afford to be good-tempered. "I do not see," he replied, "how I can possibly escape all the marks of kindness and distinction that are shown to me."

"Have you any wish to escape them?" asked Talbot, sneeringly.

"Before you reproach me," said Stratford, "I think you should remember at whose suggestion the deception was first entered into."

"I did not foresee the consequences," said Talbot.

"Pardon me," said Stratford; "the consequences were foreseen by both of us. I remarked that I was unwilling to strut, like the jay, in borrowed plumes; and you replied that if the 'Russian Brothers' attained the greatest celebrity, you would never assert your rights of paternity."

"You certainly possess an excellent memory," said Talbot, sarcastically, "whatever other mental attributes you may be deficient in. I remember the promise of secrecy to which you allude, but no promise was made on your part; therefore if you are inclined to descend from your usurped position, and give it up to the rightful owner, there is no cause why you should refrain from doing so."

"And can you really," asked Stratford, with surprise, "expect that I should expose myself to the censure and ridicule of society for the purpose of reinstating you in rights which you voluntarily made over to me?"

Talbot paused some time before he replied. "I feel," he said, "that I have expected too much. I rescind my proposal. I will only require you to make known the truth under a strict promise of secrecy to one individual."

"And that individual is Adelaide Linley, I conclude," said Stratford. "It is," replied Talbot; "let Adelaide but know me as I really am, and I do not heed—at least I will endeavor not to heed—the opinion of the world; besides, Stratford, recollect that if you marry Adelaide, she must certainly find out the deception eventually; she can never believe that the fount of poetry has suddenly dried up within you; no doubt, indeed, she has already begun to wonder that you have not given vent to 'a woful sonnet made to your mistress' eyebrow.'"

Stratford returned no answer, but the conversation left a deep impression on his mind; and he felt that it would indeed be the most honest and upright course that he could pursue, to confess the whole truth to Adelaide, and then silently to withdraw himself from the literary society of which he was so little calculated to be a member. Nor was this resolution of Stratford's so great a sacrifice as might be imagined; he had for some time felt himself very little at ease among his brilliant new associates; he was aware that he was only "cloth of frieze," although circumstances had for a time matched him with "cloth of gold." He could not respond to the literary quotations and allusions constantly made in his presence. He had heard some wonder expressed that he had no scraps in his portfolio to show confidentially to admiring friends; and the editor of a leading periodical had kindly suggested to him a subject for a tale in blank verse, which, if written at all in the style of the tragedy, should, he said, receive immediate attention from him. Then, in other circles, young ladies had requested contributions for their albums, and Adelaide had more than once expressed her wish to have new words written for some of her favorite old airs.

Stratford, the morning after his conversation with Talbot, sought the presence of Adelaide, resolved that, if his courage did not fail him, he would make a confession of his misdeeds, and an offer of his hand and heart before he left the house. He found Adelaide, as he had wished, alone; she was reading a letter when he entered, and it dropped on the ground as she rose to receive him; he lifted it up, and recognised the hand in which it was written; it was that of Captain Nesbitt, and the letter appeared to be of some length. Stratford felt disposed to be rather jealous; Captain Nesbitt was well connected, remarkably handsome, very lively, and had, like Captain Absolute, "an air of success about him which was mighty provoking."

"Do not let me interrupt your perusal of that letter," he said, rather coldly and stiffly.

"You have doubtless," said Adelaide, with a smile, "seen the handwriting; you do not prevent me from reading the letter—I have just finished it; and although your visit may cause my answer to it to be delayed a little while longer, the delay is of no manner of importance, since I shall only write a few lines of no very agreeable purport."

"I pity the poor fellow from my heart," exclaimed Stratford, and he spoke with sincerity; he could afford to pity Captain Nesbitt when he knew that Adelaide was about to reject him.

"He does not deserve your pity," said Adelaide.

"Can the gentle and kind-hearted Adelaide express herself so harshly?" asked Stratford, feeling more and more generously inclined towards his rival, when he saw how much he was disdained.

"I must explain myself," said Adelaide; "for I should be very sorry that you (and the delighted lover actually fancied that he detected a slight emphasis on the word you) should believe me to be hard-hearted and unkind. Captain Nesbitt has considerably fallen in my estimation during the last few days. I have received abundant proofs that he does not always love and respect the truth."

Stratford began to feel rather nervous; he had a particular dislike to conversation which turned on the subject of love and respect for the truth.

"Captain Nesbitt," continued Adelaide, "when he first became acquainted with me, informed me that, although his present property was but limited, he expected to succeed to the estates of an old and infirm uncle residing in Wales. I was lately in company with a family who happened to live in the immediate neighborhood of this wealthy old uncle; he has indeed large estates, but he has two sons in excellent health, to inherit them."

Adelaide here paused, expecting to hear an exclamation of indignant surprise from Stratford; but it was not uttered. Stratford was by no means troubled with an over development of conscientiousness, and it appeared to him that Captain Nesbitt had committed a very venial offence in keeping two Welsh cousins in the background, who might have interfered so materially with his interests.

"Doubtless," he at length remarked, "this subterfuge on Captain Nesbitt's part was owing to the excess of his affection for you."

"I doubt it very much," said Adelaide; "affection is always prone to overrate the good qualities of its object; now Captain Nesbitt must have greatly underrated mine, if he could deem it likely that, possessing as I do an ample sufficiency of the goods of fortune, it could make any difference to me whether the lover of my choice were wealthy or otherwise."

"Could you not in any case deem an untruth excusable?" asked Stratford.

"In none," replied Adelaide; "but there are cases in which I deem it particularly inexcusable: the falsehoods of pride or vanity, the assumption of being better, or richer, or wiser than we really are—these are, in my opinion, as contemptible as they are reprehensible."

"Men of the world," pursued Stratford, "are apt to think very little of an occasional deviation from truth."

"Pardon me," said Adelaide, "if I entirely differ from you. Should one man of the world tax another with the violation of truth in homely, downright phrase, what is the consequence? the insult is considered so unbearable, that in many cases the offender has even been called on to expiate his words with his life. Now, if a departure from truth be so mere a trifle, why should not the accusation of having departed from truth be also considered as a trifle?"

Stratford was silent; his shallow sophistry could not contend with Adelaide's straightforward right-mindedness, and he was rejoiced when the entrance of visitors put an end to the conversation. A tête à tête with Adelaide had on that morning no charms for him; he lacked nerve for either a confession or a proposal! Perhaps, however, it would have been better for Stratford if he could have summoned courage to have outstaid the visitors, and revealed everything to Adelaide; for discovery was impending over his head from a quarter where he could not possibly expect it, inasmuch as he was ignorant of the very existence of the person about to give the information. Every one must have been repeatedly called on to remark, that in society there seems to be a mysterious agency perpetually at work, bearing news from one quarter to another apparently quite unconnected with it. In every class or set we meet with some person who makes us cognizant of the sayings and doings of another class or set, from which we have been hitherto removed at an immeasurable distance. Often the information thus gained is desultory and uninteresting, and it passes away from our mind almost as soon as we receive it; oc-asionally it strikes upon some connecting chord, and we eagerly listen and respond to it.

When Adelaide Linley left school, she had, like most young girls, a favorite friend, with whom she kept up a regular correspondence, at the rate of three sheets of rose-colored note-paper a week. Emma Penryn, however, lived in Cornwall; and as year after year passed by, and the friends never met, the correspondence decidedly slackened. Still, however, it was never wholly given up, and Adelaide had written to her friend shortly after the introduction of Talbot and Stratford to her, mentioning their names, and speaking of them as likely to prove pleasant and desirable acquaintance. The day after Adelaide's interview with Stratford, a letter arrived for her from Emma Penryn. She apologized for her long silence, and gave an excellent reason for it; she had been receiving the addresses of a very desirable admirer, who had at length proposed, and been accepted; he was a Cornish man, and his property lay within a few miles of that of her father. After entering into numerous details regarding the carriage, the trousseau, and the marriage settlement (young ladies in the nineteenth century are very apt to talk and write about the marriage settlement), the bride-elect continued—

"I am quite sure you will hear an excellent character of my dear Trebeck, if you mention his name to Mr. Talbot; only think of their being great friends; indeed, Mr. Talbot was quite confidential with Trebeck a year ago, when staying with him in the country-house of a mutual friend, and actually was so kind as to read to him the beautiful tragedy of the 'Russian Brothers,' to which he had just put the finishing stroke. Mr. Talbot did not let any one else know a word about it, and in fact extracted a promise of the strictest secrecy from Trebeck; the reason was, that he meant to produce the tragedy on the stage, and had a terrible nervous fear of failure, a fear which was unfortunately realized by the event; I suppose because it was too good for the audience to understand. Trebeck kept the secret most admirably, never breathing a word of it even to me, till the brilliant success of the published play of course took off the embargo of silence, and now we tell it to everybody; and Trebeck, I assure you, is not a little proud of the confidence reposed in him by his literary friend."

Adelaide read this part of the letter with incredulous surprise, imagining that Emma was under some misapprehension; but when she came to reflect on past events, she could not but see that it was very likely to be true; she had several times been much struck with the inconsistency of Stratford's conversation and his reputed literary talents, and had felt surprised that he should so invariably have resisted all persuasion, even from herself, to give any further proof of his poetical abilities. It might seem astonishing that Talbot should so freely have acquiesced in this usurpation; but Emma's letter threw light on the subject, by alluding to Talbot's nervous horror of failure, and Adelaide's quick apprehension soon enabled her to see the real state of the case, and to become sorrowfully convinced that Captain Nesbitt was not the only one of her "wooters" who had shown himself regardless of the sacred laws of truth.

Reluctantly, but steadily, did the young heiress prepare herself to act as she considered for the best under the circumstances. She wrote to Talbot and to Stratford, requesting that they would each wait upon her at the same time on the following day. Neither of them suspected the reason of this summons; Talbot had indeed almost forgotten the existence of the silly, good-natured Trebeck; he had read the "Russian Brothers" to him, because, like most writers, he felt the wish, immediately after completing a work, to obtain a hearer for it; and because, like some writers, he had a great deal of vanity, and had been flattered by the deferential admiration of a man much inferior to him, and from whom he need not fear any distasteful criticism. Talbot knew Trebeck to be perfectly honorable, and if he had ever thought of him at all, he would have remembered the promise of secrecy he had exacted from him, and would have felt quite at ease. It never entered his mind that circumstances might happen which would induce Trebeck to consider himself absolved from his promise, and that, as the "Russian Brothers" had been published without a name, it was perfectly natural and probable that the Cornish squire might be ignorant that the London world of letters imputed the authorship of it to Stratford, and not to Talbot. The rivals were punctual to their appointment, anticipating nothing more important than that they should be invited to join a party to a flower-show or the opera-house. Adelaide did not keep them in suspense, but said that she wished to read to them part of a letter which she had recently received. When she had finished, she told them that she had considered it right to make them acquainted with this statement, and asked if they had anything to say in refutation of it. They looked confused, and were silent. Stratford was the first to speak. "Forgive me for my seeming assumption of talents not my own," he said; "and remember that my motive was to save a friend from the mortification of acknowledging a defeat."

"I cannot conceive that such was your only motive," replied Adelaide; "you evidently took pride and pleasure in your new character. Did you attempt to suspend the publication of the drama? Did you shrink from the distinctions that followed it? No; you courted popularity, and enjoyed it, knowing all the time that you had done nothing to merit it, and that the whole of the applause that you received was in reality the right of your friend!"

Adelaide's words sounded a knell to the hopes of Stratford, but they seemed "merry as a marriage-bell" to the eager ears of Talbot. "Dearest Adelaide," he said, "how kindly, how gratifying do you speak of my talents! They are entirely dedicated to you; all the laurels that they may hereafter gain for me shall be laid at your feet!"

"Do not trouble yourself to be so very grateful Mr. Talbot," replied Adelaide. "You will be little obliged to me when you have listened to all that I have to say to you. Your talents are undoubtedly great, but I do not consider that vividness of imagination and elegance of composition constitute a man of really fine mind, any more than a suit of regimentals and an acquaintance with military tactics constitute a brave soldier. I may continue the parallel. You entered the field of battle by your own choice, knowing that it was possible you might meet with defeat. Your first defeat came, and what was the course you pursued? Did you resolve to try again with added vigor? No, you determined to conceal that you had tried at all; you deserted the noble ranks to which you belonged, to sink into the mass of commonplace beings; and should your conduct ever become generally known, rely upon it that all literary men who sit in judgment upon you will unanimously sentence you to be cashiered for cowardice!"

Stratford breathed a little more freely during this speech; it was a great relief to his feelings to hear his friend so severely reproofed.

"I will not," pursued Adelaide, "dwell upon the offence that you have mutually committed in departing from the straight, clear, and beautiful path of truth; you well know my opinion on the subject. I could never feel happy in a near connection, or even in an intimate friendship, with any one who did not know and revere truth as I have always done. I shall probably occasionally meet again with both of you, but we must meet hereafter only on the footing of common acquaintance."

The disconcerted "wooters," now no longer rivals, took a speedy departure: they exchanged a few sentences on their way, in which there was much more of recrimination than of condolence, and then coldly separated. Their friendship had long been at an end; and, in the midst of all their recent mortifications, each felt consoled at the thought that he was not compelled to cede Adelaide to the other.

It was easy for Adelaide to avoid future intimacy with her two rejected lovers, without causing any remark among her circle of acquaintance.

It was now nearly the end of June; Mr. Grayson was quite a man of the old school: he did not stay in London till the middle of August, and then repair to Kissengen or Interlachen. He had a pretty country-house a few miles from London, and always removed to it at midsummer. Mrs. Grayson, who enjoyed nothing so much as her flower-garden, was delighted to escape from the brown, dusty trees of a London square; and Adelaide, although she liked public amusements, liked them as "soberly" as Lady Grace in the "Provoked Husband," and always professed herself ready to rusticate as soon as the roses were in bloom. Three days after her interview with Talbot and Stratford, she removed from the bustle of London to a region of flowers, green trees, and singing-birds. The former friends—now, alas! friends no longer—travelled abroad. They had each studiously contrived to depart on a different day, and to visit a different point of the continent; but they happened accidentally to meet on a mountain in Switzerland. They passed each other merely with the remarks that "the scenery was very grand," and that "the panorama of the Lake of Thun, at the Colosseum, had given one a capital idea of it!"

Stratford returned to London in January: Captain Nesbitt was the first person of his acquaintance whom he encountered. Now Captain Nesbitt possessed an infallible characteristic of a narrow-minded, mean-spirited man: he never forgave a woman who had refused him, and never omitted an opportunity of speaking ill of her. After having anathematized Adelaide and her coquetties for some time, he proceeded—

"Her marriage, however, will shortly take place, and it is, I think, a fitting conclusion to her airs and graces. Perhaps, as you have only just arrived in England, you are not aware that she is engaged to her guardian's clerk?"

"To Alton!" exclaimed Stratford. "To that quiet, dull young man! Impossible! She used to ridicule his unsocial habits, and also was very severe on his propensity for hoarding money."

"However that might be," replied Captain Nesbitt, "he has proved himself not too dull to devise and succeed in an admirable matrimonial speculation: and, as for his system of hoarding, perhaps the fair Adelaide, although she objected to it in an indifferent person, may not disapprove of it in a husband. Heiresses are always terribly afraid of marrying men who are likely to dissipate their money."

"When is the marriage to take place?" asked Stratford, with affected carelessness.

"I believe in a few weeks," said Captain Nesbitt; "that is, if nothing should happen to prevent it. I think I could set it aside at once, if I took interest enough in Adelaide to make it worth my while to do so. I could communicate to her something respecting Alton which would decidedly lower him in her opinion."

"Indeed!" exclaimed Stratford, eagerly. "Has Alton, then, been guilty of any deviation from the truth?"

Poor Stratford! "He that is giddy thinks the world turns round;" and he had no idea that a lover could offend in any other way than by deviating from the truth.

"I do not know that Alton has told any untruth," said Captain Nesbitt; "but I have reason to think that he has kept back the truth."

"That may do quite as well," thought Stratford, "when one has to deal with so scrupulous a person as Adelaide;" and he requested Captain Nesbitt to explain himself.

"Alton's father," said Captain Nesbitt, "did not resemble the father in an old song of O'Keefe's—

'Who, dying, bequeathed to his son a good name!'

He was, like his son, a confidential clerk—not, however, to a solicitor, but to a Liverpool merchant. He repaid the confidence of his employer by embezzling sundry sums of money, which he hazarded at the gaming-table. At length, the frequency of his losses occasioned him to commit a more daring act than a breach of trust: he forged the name of the merchant to a banking-house check; discovery ensued, and he only escaped the punishment of the law by committing suicide. This event happened five years ago, and is fresh in the remembrance of many persons in Liverpool."

"But do you not think it likely that Alton may have revealed these facts to Adelaide?" asked Stratford.

"I do not think it in the least likely that he should have proved himself such a blockhead!" replied Captain Nesbitt. "Adelaide would never marry the son of a man who only escaped hanging by suicide!"

"They do not hang for forgery in these days," said Stratford.

"So much the worse," said Captain Nesbitt. "It is a crime that cannot be too severely punished. I remember hearing that, many years ago, a man was hanged for forging the ace of spades: I wish those good old times would come back again."

Stratford was silent; not all his pique, nor all his jealousy, could induce him to think that it would be desirable for the times to come back again, when a man was hanged for forging the ace of spades!

The next day, Stratford called at Mr. Grayson's, and found Adelaide alone in the drawing-room. She looked a little surprised at seeing him, but received him as she would have done a common acquaintance. Stratford congratulated her on her future prospects, and uttered some forced commendations on the excellence of Alton's character.

"He affords a convincing proof," he said, with a little trepidation, "that the son of an unworthy father need not necessarily tread in his steps."

"There are so many similar instances of that fact," said Adelaide, "that I think there is nothing astonishing in them. The good or bad qualities of a father are not, like landed estates, entailed upon his son."

"Then you do know," said Stratford, "that Alton's father was an unworthy man?"

Adelaide looked at him with grave, earnest surprise. "You have chosen a strange subject of conversation," she said; "but I have no objection to satisfy your curiosity. I heard of the circumstance to which you allude from Alton himself."

"I conclude," said Stratford, "that Mr. Grayson insisted on his being candid with you, previous to your engagement being concluded?"

"You are quite in the wrong," returned Adelaide. "Mr. Grayson is much attached to Alton—whom he is on the point of taking into partnership—and was very desirous that he should propose to me. He enjoined him to keep secret the melancholy circumstances connected with his father, as they could only tend to give me uneasiness; and it was quite certain that no one else would be so deficient in kind feeling as to mention them to me." Stratford felt rather embarrassed and uncomfortable as Adelaide uttered these words. "Alton's strict and honorable love of truth, however," pursued Adelaide, "led him to disregard this counsel; some weeks before he proposed to me he made known to me every particular of his father's transgression; and I assured him, in reply, that I did not consider him in the smallest degree lowered in excellence by having become good, conscientious, and truthful, without the aid of parental precept or example."

Stratford was determined to discharge a parting arrow at the provoking heiress. "You have shown yourself extremely liberal in your opinions," he said; "and you have the very comforting reflection that, from Mr. Alton's known and remarkable habits of frugality, he is never likely to fall into the same snares that proved fatal to his father, but will distinguish himself rather by saving money than by squandering it."

"As you appear," said Adelaide, "to speak in rather an ironical tone concerning Alton's economy, I think it due to him to enter into a short explanation of his motives. When Alton first paid me those marked attentions which I knew must lead to a proposal, I sometimes rallied him on his strict frugality, and sometimes gently reproved him for it: he was not only sparing to himself, but I felt grieved to remark that, although ever willing to devote time and thought to the poor, he rarely assisted them with money. He assured me that he had a reason for his conduct, and that he was certain that I should not blame him if I knew it. He added that the necessity for economy would soon cease, and that he should then have the pleasure of indulging his natural feelings of liberality. I was not satisfied with this reply: I required him to give a direct answer to a direct question, and to tell me what were his motives for saving, and why they should exist at one time more than another."

"It was very merciless of you," said Stratford.

"Not in the least," replied Adelaide. "Alton had given me such proofs of his truthful and honorable nature, that I knew, if he held back any communication from me, he could only do so because it was creditable to him, and because he wished to avoid the appearance of boasting of his own good deeds: and so it, indeed, proved to be. Alton had for five years been denying himself every enjoyment suitable to his age and tastes, for the purpose of saving the sum of money of which his father had defrauded his employer. When he first began this undertaking, it seemed likely to prove a very tedious one; but, two years ago, he happily received a legacy from a relation, which more than half realized the amount that he required; still, however, he did not slacken in his laudable energy; and, shortly after the conversation to which I have alluded, he was enabled to pay over the whole sum, with the accumulated interest, to the Liverpool merchant, who sent him a letter full of the kindest expressions of approbation, concluding with the assurance that he should make his noble act of atonement generally known among all his friends. Therefore, by this time, every one who has censured the faults and frailties of the father, is engaged in lauding the honor and honesty of the son."

Stratford had heard quite enough; he took a hasty leave, sincerely repenting that he had ever thought of troubling the bride elect with a morning call.

Alton and Adelaide were married in the course of a few weeks: two years have elapsed since that time, and I am of opinion that the unusual happiness they enjoy is greatly to be attributed to the truthfulness which is the decided characteristic of both of them. I am aware that many of my readers will say that it is of little importance whether a married couple, whose interests necessarily bind them together, should mutually love truth, or mutually agree in sanctioning the thousand and one little falsities of worldly expediency; but I think that those who hold such an opinion cannot have had many opportunities of closely observing the domestic circles of their friends and neighbors. Had they done so, they would have been aware that the beginning of matrimonial unhappiness repeatedly arises from the detection by one party of some slight violation of truth on the part of the other. Often such a violation is committed with no ill intent; nay, often, indeed, is it done with the kind motive of sparing some little trouble or anxiety to the beloved one. A trifling trouble is concealed, a small expense kept in the background, the visit of an intrusive guest unmentioned, or a letter read aloud with the omission of a short part of it, which might be supposed to be unpleasant to the listener. These concealments and misrepresentations, in themselves so seemingly slight, become of terrific account when frequently repeated; confidence is shaken; and, when once that is the case, conjugal happiness is soon at an end. Adelaide and her husband are on the most confidential terms, because neither of them ever thinks whether a true remark or communication is agreeable or not: they speak it because it is the truth; and, if a moment's pain be thus given, the passing cloud breaks almost as soon as it is perceived; no tempests are suffered to gather in the distance, and the heiress constantly congratulates herself that she chose not the handsomest, the cleverest, or the most fashionable, but the most truthful, of her "wooters."

Of these wooers I have but little to say. Captain Nesbitt is on the point of marriage with a middle-aged widow of good fortune; he was successful in impressing her with the belief that he must ultimately inherit his uncle's property; but she was more cautious than ladies of fewer years and less experience might have been, and made so many inquiries about the state of health of the old gentleman, that his nephew was obliged to improvise an apoplectic fit for him! This intelligence caused the widow to fix the day; but she is providing a very limited trousseau, since she anticipates the "melancholy pleasure" of giving large orders, in the course of a few weeks, at one of the "Mansions of Grief" in Regent Street!

Talbot and Stratford seldom meet; indeed, if one becomes introduced into a family, the other almost invariably ceases to visit there. However, there are two points in which they show great sympathy and congeniality of mind. They particularly dislike to hear of the failure of a new piece at the theatre; and there is no work for which they feel such unmitigated detestation, as one which still engrosses much of the public notice—the tragedy of the "Russian Brothers!"

INTERVENTION.

A SEQUEL TO "PLEASING THE PARISH."

BY THE AUTHOR OF "MISS BREMER'S VISIT TO COOPER'S LANDING," "GETTING INTO SOCIETY," "WOOLING THE WIDOW," ETC.

"If you don't like it, let it alone," is a very excellent and pithy aphorism, when the advice can be followed.

In politics now, your non-interventionists are having the game mostly to themselves, and, as we write, are spending the money contributed by the sovereign people for the specific purpose of law-making, in very flourishing, and, for the most part, eloquent, denunciations of a course no one ever intended to pursue; enlivened or relieved by an occasional pause to pass the appropriations of the aforesaid funds to their own especial pocket-money.

In fashion, moreover, the system answers very well. There is that recent innovation, the vest, with its close fitness to an elegant figure, the coquettish roll of the collar, the jaunty pockets, the richly jewelled or enamelled buttons. What right has Prudery to deny its assumption by our sex, or to urge that it is unfeminine to imitate any garment that has been sacred to the wardrobe masculine heretofore? Are not the close corsets still left to choice? Has any one denied the shrinking conservative free election?

And society, with its sparkling current of wit, and beauty, and style; who has a right to point out the quicksands of wasted time, and the wreck of reputation, the detraction and sarcasm that bars the arrows of repartee, the selfishness that lurks under the blindest proffers of service, or the honeyed flatteries that fall so soothingly on the ear of the novice? If the cavillers have looked beneath the surface, and cannot have the heart or conscience to remain one of the gay throng, society will not miss their withdrawal! Their places can be easily, and perhaps more pleasantly, filled! Society is impatient of strictures, and has no leaning towards the reading of homilies. It is a system in which no Lent is recognised, and the mad revellers of the Carnival do not choose ashes for their adornment.

So says the mere observer; and yet one cannot always follow the advice so complacently offered. The rector's wife found it so, when she would gladly have stepped aside for the retirement of her home, the simple round of domestic joys and pleasures. Her son—for the nursery had its cradle now; her pretty Etta, full of all winning, childish ways—her husband, with his ever-affectionate manner, and their united tastes, gave all that she could wish of interest and variety to her life. Particularly when she found so little pleasure in the formal visiting which she was expected to pursue. The frigid morning calls; the tea-drinkings, rarely enlivened by music or rational conversation, and never by dancing; but, nevertheless, the weary round must be gone through, or offence would be given; and, where the congregation was so large, invitation followed invitation with never-ceasing regularity. The Christmas week at Mrs. Lovel's had been an oasis in her social existence. Her host and hostess, in themselves delightful, had gathered a pleasant circle about them, and, in this charming domesticated intimacy, each seemed to contribute their utmost to the general enjoyment. Mrs. Stone had particularly liked Miss Lovel, and Dr. Howell and his young wife, the last a niece of their host, and, when they separated, had said that she hoped to meet them often, as they were both residents of the city. She had breathed a congenial atmosphere, more like that of her own home, and her new friends promised to see her frequently. She returned to — Place, invigorated and refreshed by change of scene and society, and quite prepared to do all that was right and proper in her difficult position as the rector's wife, to bear the affronts of Mesdames Jenkins and Skimpton with sweetness as well as composure, and try, if possible, to regain the good-will of the offended parties.

* See "Lady's Book" for January, 1852.

It is the work of Sisyphus to keep up a large round of acquaintances in a city. No sooner do you begin to congratulate yourself that you have nearly paid a list of owing visits, than you find half of them already returned by people that have more leisure or fewer acquaintances than yourself, and the toilsome labor is to be recommenced. Mrs. Jones reminds you that you have owed her neighbor, Mrs. Smith, a call since before Christmas. Mrs. Brown's gray beaver recalls her sister-in-law, Mrs. Green, and her friend, Mrs. White, to your recollection. Mrs. Thompson offers to go with you, and return visits in her set, which you had overlooked when you were in that neighborhood; and, though you are fully aware that neither Mrs. Smith, Mrs. White, nor Mrs. Green care one whit to see you, or would do more for your memory than a ceremonious call of condolence on surviving relatives, you are equally sure of their displeasure and its gossiping effects of unpopularity, if you do not keep up the acquaintance.

Therefore, as we have said before, Mrs. Stone could not "leave it alone," much as she "did not like it." "Popularity was a duty with her," said Mrs. Skimpton, the first visit she paid to the offended lady, with all sincere desires for pacific measures, and a consequent humility of deportment.

"Her husband's usefulness depended on it, unity in church measures depended on it," she urged still more vehemently, emphasizing her remark with a decided tap of her gold thimble upon the work-table before her. "For the good of the church, every clergyman's wife ought to sacrifice her own private views to popularity!"

Poor Mrs. Stone! How little she had realized the vast responsibility thrown upon herself by her husband's acceptance of the call of St. John's Parish!

Mrs. Skimpton held her hand to the light, and took up the stitches of the thin place she was darning. Mrs. Skimpton considered economy a chief virtue, and therefore mended the stockings of the household; she could not trust it to any one else; and the parlor window-seat was therefore frequently adorned with a heaped-up willow basket of ungraceful hose.

"Speaking of that reminds me," she continued—though what was the train of association Mrs. Stone in vain attempted to discover—"that the reason I advised you to have the Venetian pattern on the stair-carpet, is that the threads are so much closer, and it wears longer. But I noticed, the last morning I called at your house, that it is beginning to go."—(No wonder, with the multitude of feet that trod the way to Dr. Stone's study, where he was never secure from interruption.)—"When you have it taken up—I suppose you will begin to clean in April—you must go over it carefully, and darn all the thin places, being particular to use worsted of the same color in every thread. Just now I observed the hall door open, just before you came over; it was when Dr. Jackson was let in, you remember: Mary often leaves the door open for ten minutes together. She is a careless creature; I would never put up with her. Any one might have gone into your parlors, and carried off dear knows what all. But, as I intended to say, the oilcloth seems to have worn very badly. You should have chosen one of the last year's patterns. The colors have had time to dry in, and it wears twice as well. I never chose a fashionable oilcloth for that reason."

Mrs. Skimpton seemed to forget that she had urged Mrs. Stone to this particular purchase, assuring that "stone colors wore better than any others, and were the most fashionable for entrances now."

However, she had condescended to offer her advice once more, and Mrs. Stone saw in it an omen of good. Mrs. Skimpton had used her eyes in all her late visits at the rectory, but had closed her lips in a painful, but, nevertheless, firm silence with regard to what she saw. But Mrs. Stone asking her advice about the baby's cloak, in the commencement of her call, had somewhat mollified her; the fair had been numbered with "accomplished efforts," and their unusual success, realizing nearly two thousand dollars, and a vote of thanks from the committee to herself, for her active superintendence, had made her more than usually forgiving. Besides, withholding advice was really too great a self-denial, involving a miracle of self-control, particularly with the constant opportunities her neighborship to Mrs. Stone presented.

Miss Angelica Tuttle also renewed her visits when she heard the Lovels had become friends of Mrs. Stone; for she had always wished to be intimate with them, not that she exactly liked their society, but that it was considered exclusive—a far greater charm than a lavish display of wealth and luxury. Miss Little, who was now devoting all her energies in behalf of the "Female Auxiliary Society, for the Evangelization of Southern Italy," condescended to call and solicit the aid of the rector's wife in this important undertaking; and, as the summer advanced, there was a truce at least to hostilities. Mrs. Stone began to be sorry that she had troubled her husband with any of the past discomforts, and to think she "might be happy yet."

Autumn came, with the return of the birds of passage, the opening and cleaning of houses, the putting down of carpets, and the putting away of brown Holland covers. Mrs. Stone had paid a short visit to her own home, and found much to occupy her in housekeeping on her return. She looked over the card-basket in dismay, at the accumulation not only of cards, but notes of inquiry, and notification, and invitation, that awaited response:

"The Union Benevolent would hold a meeting for the election of officers on October 14th."

"The Evangelical Society had chosen her as Secretary."

"The Treasurer of the 'Seaman's Friend' would be obliged for her aid to assist in soliciting subscriptions."

"A special meeting of the Directors of the 'House of Industry' was earnestly requested."

"Mrs. Tuttle's compliments, and would Mrs. Stone fix a day for visiting the 'Foster Home'?"

Mrs. Jenkins solicited a subscription for the silver pitcher about to be presented, as a mark of respect, to the lady of "our lamented pastor," the widow of Dr. Naylor's predecessor.

"Mrs. Smith's compliments, and would Mrs. Stone be so good as to look over the pamphlets relating to the shocking atrocities of the Thugs of India, and return them as soon as possible? Mrs. S. would be pleased if Mrs. Stone could prepare a short and pithy abstract of them for the next week's 'Church Witness.'"

Mrs. Jones would call an afternoon early next week, to finish visiting the district assigned to her in the Dorcas distribution. "Mrs. Jones was sure Mrs. Stone would feel it a great privilege to become acquainted with some of the pensioners of this admirable church institution."

A subscription was solicited by the committee appointed to report on the expediency of establishing a "Church Home" for colored orphans.

Mrs. Stone spread out the communications in dismay; she had not yet opened half of them. It is so wearisome to commence an accumulated round of duties, when every day has its "sufficient evil!" Yet there was Mrs. Skimpton's warning sounding in her ears, as distinct as when first uttered: "For the good of the church, every clergyman's wife ought to sacrifice her own private views to popularity."

But there was one invitation she was not at all disinclined to accept: "Mrs. Howell would see a few friends very socially at tea. She must beg Mrs. Stone not to disappoint her." Miss Little had fixed on the same evening for a meeting of the matrons of the "Female Auxillary," at her house. Yes, it was the same date, "Thursday, October 11th." Mrs. Stone compared them twice, and then sat in deep deliberation. She had always liked Mrs. Howell; she was sure of meeting a pleasant circle at her house, like that of Rhawood. Perhaps Miss Lovel would be there; and she should so enjoy her music! On the other hand, she had never approved of Miss Little's society, thinking the "Evangelization of Southern Italy" a work the ladies of Philadelphia were not specially called to; at any rate, while there was so much ignorance and destitution immediately around them. It had always reminded her of Sidney Smith's celebrated retort, "Madam, the Feegee's are at your own door!" If she accepted the membership and managership at all, it was as "a sacrifice" to the Moloch of "popularity," which, gaunt and spectral, ever rose before her. Besides, she had opened Mrs. Howell's note first, and mentally resolved to go. Could not that be considered "a previous engagement?" We cannot much wonder at Mrs. Stone's affirmative decision; nevertheless, as often as a thought of it came to her mind, it was accompanied by an uncomfortable feeling of disquiet, not very unlike a conscientious scruple, which destroyed all the pleasure of anticipation.

But, seeing that "Harry" was comfortably asleep, and charging the careful nurse with two unnecessary cautions at least, kissing Etta's rosy cheek, turned towards the light, as she lay with one little arm embracing the rounds of her crib—Mrs. Stone descended to the parlor, to await her husband's leisure as escort. But, in the hall, she was met by Mrs. Skimpton's maid Eunice, who shared in many of the peculiarities of her mistress, either from natural sympathy or the power of association. "Mrs. Skimpton had sent over to see if she should call and take her to Miss Little's, where the committee met; she thought Dr. Stone might be engaged, as there was a light in the study, and she knew Mrs. Stone would not like to be disappointed in going."

The sharp eyes of Eunice seemed to pierce the unhappy lady through and through, as she said, in a faltering tone, that it would not be possible for her to go to Miss Little's that evening. She was sure a full report of her toilet would be given to Mrs. Skimpton, and it certainly was not one intended for a quiet evening at home.

The bang which the departing Eunice gave the street door thrilled every nerve with a dread of "evil to come."

Sitting with head in hand, awaiting her husband, Mrs. Stone half resolved not to go; but she was glad she had not given way to it, when the warm welcome of Mrs. Howell and Miss Lovel laid all thoughts of Mrs. Skimpton and her displeasure at rest for the evening. There were about twenty present, all intimate family friends, except the young bride of Mrs. Howell's cousin, to whom the company was given. The entertainment was tasteful, but simple, conversation lively and agreeable. Mrs. Stone forgot her "popularity," and seemed to grow young again. Dancing was proposed at the close of the evening; but neither Mrs. Howell nor Miss Lovel played quadrilles, and none of the young ladies could be spared from their partners. Mrs. Stone could play at sight; "would she be so very good?" begged Jeannie Howell, the doctor's sister. Before her marriage, Mrs. Stone had been in general request at all their little gatherings as musician, the marked and excellent time which distinguished her style being so well suited to the lively measures. Certainly; Mrs. Stone would be very happy to oblige them. She rose at once, and, going to the piano, commenced a favorite set from recollection, every note recalling the pleasant days of her girlhood, and the associations which had brightened it. Then Jeannie Howell placed a new polka before her, and some of the young ladies were soon circling in the lively dance. A Schottish followed by Jeannie and her brother; none of the others had learned the then new figure. Mrs. Stone played this also, still reading at sight, and was warmly thanked for her goodness.

On the whole, it was a delightful evening; and Dr. Stone was pleased by his wife's good spirits, when she came home escorted by young Mr. Howell. He had been detained on parish business, and found it impossible to return for her. "Southern Italy" did not cross the mind of the rector's wife, except as a geographical existence, until she saw Mrs. Skimpton going to market the next morning. The new board of managers for the society was reported in the "Church Witness" the following week. Mrs. Stone saw, with a feeling of relief, that her name was altogether omitted. She little knew the storm it portended in her horizon.

Through cold and snow, Mrs. Stone pursued the weary tenor of her visits and engagements. Often a whole morning was lost by a continual succession of visitors. She was obliged to be ready to receive them at an instant's notice. Once she placed it upon record that, from nine in the morning until ten at night, there had been visitors in the house; but it was not a solitary instance. Though able to snatch but few moments for housekeeping, it was always necessary to provide for dinner company. It can readily be seen that, with the time occupied in societies and calls, there was little left for the nursery or sewing. It was well her old nurse, Etta's nurse, was so entirely trustworthy; after the morning's bath, accomplished usually before breakfast, poor Harry saw very little of his mamma. It must have been the same, if her place had been filled by an untrained Irish servant-girl. Sewing she was obliged to give out; but here she always made it a point to seek those in need of employment, and to pay them liberally. It was not so much physical fatigue—though this was all Dr. Stone dreaded, as he often insisted on her taking a carriage, when he saw her consulting a formidable list of people who lived at the extreme ends of the city—as the mental anxiety or harassment, lest something should be neglected, some unintentional offence given. Scarcely a Saturday night but that was shaded by a part of the week's engagements unfulfilled, and Monday brought its own duties in addition.

Mrs. Skimpton seemed to have passed over her neglect of Southern Italy; but Miss Little was still unforgiving. This Mrs. Stone was especially reminded of by the second annual report, in which was stated that, "notwithstanding the discouragement and cold neglect which the society had met with, even in high places, and where it was least expected"—the italics as pointed as printer's ink could make them—"they had been prospered far beyond their humble deserts and expectations." Mrs. Skimpton, by repeated attacks upon Mary, Mrs. Stone's waiter, by special settings forth of her many delinquencies, with which she seemed unaccountably acquainted, had induced the rector's wife to discharge her, and take a sister of Eunice, highly recommended by herself, in the place. Judith was indolent and a slattern; but Mrs. Stone did not dare to discharge her, or even complain. She charitably supposed Mrs. Skimpton to be in ignorance of these faults; but as Judith, whenever most wanted, had "run over to see Eunice a moment," she had the pleasant apprehension of being always under her neighbor's surveillance. In this she was not mistaken; with the range of front windows, and the full daily report of Judith to her sister, Mrs. Skimpton was in ignorance of very few facts relating to the household economy of the rector.

"I don't see how she can reconcile it to her conscience," Mrs. Skimpton remarked to Eunice, as she stood looking over a tray of clean clothes that had just been brought up from the kitchen. "Such neglect is as bad as downright robbery of the poor:—just hand me that shirt, it wants a button on the waistband. Dear knows what would become of my house, if I let things go on so—one, two, three, four, five; there's one of these fine napkins wanting, Eunice. Put Miss Jane's clothes in the left-hand side of the upper drawer. Doesn't count the wash? I shouldn't think she would know when she had a clean pocket handkerchief—there—not the other side, and put the stockings in my basket. As long as I've kept house—twenty-seven years, next April—I never saw Monday morning without counting my clothes. A minister's wife ought to set a good example—there, just look; is not that young Sidney Howell ringing over the way? The second time this week. She's never too busy to see any of that family; and they Presbyterians! Well, all is—my goodness, Eunice, don't fold those pillow-cases so! I should think you'd been with me long enough to know my ways—and he's gone in, of course."

Mrs. Skimpton's chamber commanded a view of the rector's parlor. Eunice gave one curious look, following the example of her mistress, who seated herself at the stocking-basket, as her handmaid removed the empty tray. Mr. Howell had gone in, and Mrs. Stone just appeared from the back parlor to welcome him. In justice to Mrs. Skimpton, we must say that Eunice did not go over to borrow the pattern of her sister's cape, ten minutes after, at her suggestion.

Mrs. Stone was preparing for a tea-party at Mrs. Green's one evening late in February. The long and busy winter was almost through, and she was jaded in spirits and weary in body. Etta had been attacked with croup frequently of late, causing her constant alarm; and not a day passed but some fresh domestic trial of temper arose, from the negligence or impertinence of Judith. She was weary of misapprehension from those around her, of half real, half imagined slights, and unkind remarks. A half finished report of the "Evangelical Society" lay on her writing-desk, beside a letter from home which she had just received, and watered with her tears. It was an exertion to dress and go out, still it was expected of her, and she must make the effort; though she would gladly have passed the evening in a dressing-gown in her own nursery. She did not anticipate any pleasure from the visit; she knew the stiff and formal circle she would meet, and she dreaded lest any should be there that she had offended by look, word, or deed. Dr. Stone did not seem to notice her dejection when he came in. His own tranquillity was disturbed. There had been a meeting of the vestry that afternoon. She longed to beg him to take her home; she had often checked this impulse; for she knew she had no right to attempt to influence him, when he was useful and satisfied with his choice of duty. As far as it was possible, she had spared him the knowledge of her own grievances, since her first lesson in "popularity."

Mrs. Green's guest-chamber, the reception-room, was filled with square and massive black walnut furniture. Nothing was out of place; for nothing looked as if it could be moved. There were stone-colored Venetian blinds at the windows; everything stiff, formal, and precise. The mistress of the place was the presiding genius, as one could see from her dress and manner, when she came in to welcome her guests. Cold, square, and undemonstrative, the visitors were ladies of her own heart, middle-aged, and many of them in mourning, with black kid gloves, as if it were a funeral, instead of a social gathering—an adornment at once unnecessary, and in bad taste. Gloves have no place out of a full-dress party, and those mourning ought never to intrude. They sat in a stiff, unbroken line about the stereotyped parlor, the exact counterpart of hundreds we pass daily with Venetian blinds at the windows. The panel wall-paper, the mirrors, the candelabras, the chairs, the heavy sofas, the "what-not," and the angular gas fixtures, are all there, if the blind was but drawn up. The very portraits of Mr. and Mrs. Green in the recesses, in their square gilt frames, would not be amiss in the parlor of Mrs. Brown or Mrs. Jones, having that family resemblance in coloring and posture which all portraits by third-rate artists bear to one another.

They talked of the weather: it was always freely discussed at Mrs. Green's tea-parties. Then the ladies who sat next to each other spoke of the bishop's last charity sermon, and commended his course, with frequent allusion to Bishop White and his mild paternal sway, the spirit of which, however, minds like theirs never could appreciate. The alterations in St. Stephen's, the last "Church Witness," in turn suggested the topics of conversation until tea came in, with the best china and the new silver service. Mr. Green, a small, rather retiring gentleman, went around with the tray, and made the same formal inquiry of every lady present, "Black or green?" The toast was uncommonly hard, the crumpets crisper than crumpets were ever known to be before; but that was in their favor, every one agreed. It was such a relief from the dire necessity of keeping up a conversation! The solemn silence was broken only by the click of teaspoons, or an interjectional "Thank you," "If you please," "Quite sufficient!" Every lady seemed to consider herself fully employed in the onerous task of balancing her tea-cup, so as not to deluge her own or her neighbor's dress.

Mrs. Stone enjoyed the respite particularly; she had not been able to extract one gleam of intelligence, or to call up one flush of animation from her right-hand neighbor. It was such a relief, as she turned to deposit her empty plate on the tray, to find herself seized on conversationally, by a lady she had not noticed before; one of those who never weary of discussing one theme, and require only a good listener to be perfectly contented for the evening. How she had happened to be admitted to Mrs. Green's solemn convocation was a mystery; but Mrs. Stone gladly resigned herself to be talked to for the remainder of the evening.

Mrs. Campbell was one of those people who, out of mere indiscretion and goodness of heart, make more mischief than any other members of society, the professed evil-speaker not excepted. She heard everything, notwithstanding she talked so much; but she never heard things quite right. In her repetitions, she always managed to be mistaken either in the words or the circumstances of the occurrence. Her particular forte was telling her acquaintances what others said of them—always from the kindest motives—either to warn them, or to show how she had defended them. She always did take the part of the slandered one, the very warmth of her defence often doing more harm than the passing unkind remark she caught at; for that might have passed unnoticed, but for her zeal, which, of course, fixed it on the memory of the listeners.

"Why, I had no idea that was you, Mrs. Stone! I was admiring your collar while you were talking to Mrs. Lea. It's a lovely collar! I saw one at Levy's, the very mate to it, at four dollars," was Mrs. Campbell's first remark, which naturally suggested the second. "I shouldn't have noticed it, only Angelica Tuttle was with me, and she said—I remember now—that you had one like it. Yes, I recollect; and how provoked I was with her at the time for calling you extravagant, as I told her it was none of her business if you chose to pay ten. But she said a minister's wife ought to set an example to the whole parish, Mrs. Skimpton said; and it was well known how wasteful you were in housekeeping, and how extravagantly you dressed. Mrs. Jenkins was by, and said, 'Yes; poor Dr. Stone goes actually seedy, and they never can afford to subscribe to any charity. No wonder!' I took it up for you, of course, and told them if Dr. Stone liked to wear an old coat in his study, it was no more than my husband did in his office; and, as for your housekeeping, you were a little young thing, and couldn't be expected to be as saving as us. It does provoke me to hear people talk about their neighbors!"

Mrs. Stone's face flushed deeper and deeper. She was mortified, indignant. She did not know what answer to make. Mrs. Campbell ran on.

"I shouldn't have minded that so much, only Miss Little always has something to say, when your name's mentioned, about your finding no time to do good, and going to parties, and dancing, and all that. As to the dancing, I always said I didn't believe you did; not that I see any hurt in it; but, you know, it would make talk, and I think it's best to avoid even the appearance of evil. And, if Sidney Howell does choose to visit you, and escort you about, I can't see any harm in it. I believe Angelica Tuttle has been making love to him herself, and I as much as told her so."

"Sidney Howell! I dance! Why, Mrs. Campbell, I do not understand this!"

"I never would mind it in the least, my dear; I wouldn't let it trouble me an instant. But I supposed you knew people said you danced the polka with Sidney Howell, and that he was at your house quite too often! I always take your part, and always will."

A great consolation, certainly, to a wounded spirit! Who wishes to know that their defence is ever needed? Such sympathy blisters rather than heals. Mrs. Stone moved mechanically for the rest of the evening; the tumult of shame and bitter feeling was scarcely typed by her cold exterior. Should she tell her husband, and beg to "go home" like a weary child? Should she meet her accusers face to face, and challenge them to substantiate their charges? or was it best to suffer silently, "bearing all things, enduring all things?"

"I am troubled, Mary," the rector said, as she entered the study, after a visit to the nursery. He had not taken off his overcoat, and stood leaning against the mantel. "There was a meeting of the vestry this afternoon; I could not tell you about it before we went out; but they do not seem pleased with my measures, or satisfied with the present success of the church. Mr. Tuttle says there is a great falling off of pew-holders this year, and Mr. Skimpton remarked the quarterly collections were much less than formerly, and no formal account had yet been rendered of their appropriation. I meant to have carried it in this afternoon; and it pained me a little. Not so much the words as the tone and manner. Perhaps I am too sensitive. But lately I grow more and more disheartened in trying to please my vestry and do good to my people. I look back with envy at the quiet days of my professorship, when I was accountable only to my conscience and my God. I am almost tempted at times to resign."

"Oh, if that could be!" Mrs. Stone said, involuntarily, clasping her hands in half entreaty. "I have not complained, have I? But I cannot bear it any longer. I would not mind it, if I could do right; but to be censured when I don't deserve it, to be bringing slander on the church and on you! Oh, if it was right to resign!"

Great was the wonder excited everywhere when Dr. Stone gave up the charge of St. John's Parish! Now that he had done so, he began to find that his efforts had not been all unavailing; many there were whom he had comforted, and who sorrowed that he would come no more among them. Defenders, unlike Mrs. Campbell, took up the cause of his long-suffering wife. Mrs. Lovel conquered her disinclination to general visiting, and went everywhere reducing the mountain of charges to its proper mole-hill level. Judith confessed that Mrs. Skimpton always wanted to know how things went on, and, when Mrs. Stone had reproved her for any fault, she had always thrown the blame on her mistress. Miss Little, with the air of an injured woman, shut her mouth as closely as the steel clasp of her reticule, and contented herself with an ominous shake of the head, when the matter of the dancing was explained to her; and Angelica Tuttle said, "How was she to know Mrs. Lovel had sent Mrs. Stone the collar from Levy's, when purchasing one for her daughter?"

There was a meeting of the parish called, which refused to accept the resignation, and resolutions were passed commending the account which Dr. Stone had rendered, at the same time, of his labors among them. But the late rector was firm; his inexperience in parish matters generally, his wife's health wasting, in the routine of city life daily, decided him to resume the more congenial duties of his professorship. He read that they who provided not for their own households had "denied the faith," and he could not see the "light of home" dying from its once steady radiance. Not that he shrank timorously from trial and responsibility, but there were other laborers in the harvest-field better fitted, by longer experience, to "bear the burden and heat of the day."

St. John's was crowded when his farewell sermon was given; but it breathed only of love and peace; and when, at its conclusion, he read most fervently a collect for his successor, many a heart inwardly promised he should tread a pleasanter path among them than Dr. Stone had ever known.

THE PHANTASCOPE.

PROFESSOR LOCKE, of the National Observatory, Washington, has invented an instrument to which he has given the above name, which illustrates very prettily and with simplicity many of the phenomena of binocular vision. It consists of a flat board base, about nine by eleven inches, with two upright rods, one at each end, a horizontal strip connecting the upper ends of the uprights, and a screen or diaphragm, nearly as large as the base, interposed between the top strip and the tabular base, this screen being adjustable to any intermediate height. The top strip has a slit, one-fourth of an inch wide, and about three inches long from left to right. The observer places his eyes over this slit, looking downward. The movable screen has also a slit of the same length, but about an inch wide. A few experiments, which we will describe, will illustrate its use.

First. Let there be two identical pictures of the same flower, say a rose, about one inch in diameter, placed the one to the left and the other to the right of the centre of the tabular base, or board, forming the support, and about two and a half or three inches apart from centre to centre. A flower-pot or vase is painted on the upper screen, at the centre of it as regards right and left, and with its top even with the lower edge of the open slit.

Experiment 1.—Look downward through the upper slit, and direct both eyes steadily to a mark, a quasi stem, in the flower-pot, or vase; instantly, a flower similar to one of those on the lower screen, but of half the size, will appear growing out of the vase, and in the open slit of the movable screen. On directing the attention through the upper screen to the base, this phantom flower disappears, and only the two pictures on each side of the place of the phantom remain. The phantom itself consists of the two images painted on the base optically superimposed on each other. If one of these images be red and the other blue, the phantom will be purple. It is not unfrequently that people see single objects double; but it is only since the establishment of temperance institutions that it has been discovered that two objects can be seen as one, which is the fact in the phantascope.

Experiment 2.—Let part of a flower be painted at the left, and the supplementary part to the right, on the lower screen; then proceed as in experiment first, and a whole flower will appear as a phantom.

Experiment 3.—Let a horizontal line be marked on one side of the lower screen, and a perpendicular one on the other; then proceeding as in experiment first, a cross will appear in the opening of the upper screen as the phantom. This might be called the "experimentum crucis."

Experiment 4.—If two identical figures of persons be placed at the proper positions on the lower screen, and the upper screen be gradually slid up from its lowest point, the eye being directed to the index, each image will at first be doubled, and will gradually recede, there being of course four in view until the two contiguous ones coincide, when three only are seen. This is the proper point where the middle or doubled image is the phantom seen in the air. If the screen be raised higher, then the middle images pass by each other, and again four are seen receding more and more as the screen is raised.

As all this is the effect of crossing the axes of the eyes, it follows that a person with only one perfect eye cannot make the experiments. They depend on binocular vision.

All these effects depend on the principle that one of the two primitive pictures is seen by one eye, and the other by the other eye, and that the axes are so converged by looking at the index or mark on the upper screen that those separate images fall on the points in the eye which produce single vision. To a person who has perfect voluntary control over the axes of his eyes, the upper screen and index are unnecessary. Such an observer can at any time look two contiguous persons into one, or superimpose the image of one upon the image of the other.

This apparatus will illustrate many important points in optics, and especially the physiological point of "single vision by two eyes." It shows also that we do not see an object in itself, but the mind contemplates an image on the retina, and always associates an object of such a figure, altitude, distance, and color, as will produce that image by rectilinear pencils of light. If this image on the retina can be produced without the object, as in the Phantascope, then there is a perfect optical illusion, and an object is seen where it is not. Nay, more, the mind does not contemplate a mere luminous image, but that image produces an unknown physiological impression on the brain.

A similar and superior instrument to this has been long known to the public and artists—the Stereoscope of Professor Wheatstone. But so many beautiful experiments may be made with this simple contrivance of Professor Locke's, that we are certain this description will be acceptable to our readers.

THE MAIDEN WOODED AND WON.

BY T. BISS BRADLEY.

A MAIDEN sat at eventide
Beside a flowing stream—
Majestic stream, with flowery banks,
And waves of golden gleam:
The maiden sure is in a dream,
Her haale eyes so pensive beam!

So young, so fair, why sits she there
With melancholy mien!
So motionless, her shadow still
Within the waves is seen:
The dusky twilight soon will come—
The maiden then should seek her home.

The maiden dreameth on; and sad
The waves' low music-swells
Upon the ambient atmosphere
With softest cadence dwells:
Just sad enough the waves' refrain
To link her thoughts' harmonious chain.

The maiden dreameth on; and lo!
Upon the river rides
A boat of gorgeous golden prow—
How noiselessly it glides!
See! through the twilight's dark'ning fold,
How gleams that burnished prow of gold!

Hark! loud above the waves' refrain,
In right commanding tone,
Full tender, yet as proud as if Demanding but its own,
A lordly voice the maiden hears
And these the words that reach her ears:—

"Thou maiden fair, of raven hair,
Of melancholy mien!
Within my dreams thine eyes' soft beams
Have long ago been seen:
I vowed it then to leave my home,
In quest of thee o'er earth to roam.

"I've kept my vow, roamed o'er the land,
And sailed upon the stream;
My cynosure the haale-beam
Years since I gazed on in a dream:
Oh! sail with me towards the sea,
Where wealth and honor wait for thee

"Where broad baronial lands extend Beneath a peaceful sky,
My palace rears its marble walls
In grand serenity:
Within the hall my slaves await
Thee, maiden, thee to share my state.

"Wilt come? If thou wilt be my bride,
Upon my turtle's gray
The earliest sun will shine, and e'er
The softest moonbeams lay:
A word, a sign, will e'er command
All that thy lightest wants demand."

"It may not be," the maiden said;
"Sail on unto the main!
Not wealth, not power, I crave for dower,
But heart for heart again.
Float, golden boat, unto the sea:
And leave me portionless, but free!"

The maiden dreameth on; again
Mute, motionless is she;
Again the waves' low music swells,
And soothes her reverie:
Upon her ear sweet accents fall—
Her guardian-angel murmured "Well!"

The maiden dreameth on; and lo
Upon the river rides
A boat, whose keel the waters kiss—
How gracefully it glides!
Although it boasts not prow of gold,
Its course how stately doth it hold!

Hark! chiming with the waves' refrain,
A voice, as low and sweet
As music's tone, steals gently on,
For ear of maiden meet:
Those wooing words of softest spell
Her heart within will ever dwell.

"Thou maiden fair, of raven hair,
Of melancholy mien!
Canst tell me why the dew-late swan,
On lake of sil'vry sheen,
Though limpid waters lave his breast,
Will lowly droop his pensive crest?

"Thou maiden fair, of raven hair,
Of melancholy mien!
Canst tell me why the dove doth mourn
In mead of brightest green?
Why plaintive song, the woods among,
The lonely bird doth e'er prolong?

"List, maid! the mystery I solve
By art that love believes:
The dove, upon the withered bough,
For absent loved one grieves.
Apart they mourn in lonesome grove—
Together live, together love.

"The swan upon the silver lake
His wand'ring mate doth woo;
His shadow is no company—
His shadow makes him lone.
Shall I, while gliding down this stream,
Behold a single shadow gleam?

"See! one by one bright stars appear
T' attest my solemn vow:
I swear alway to cherish pure
The love I offer now:
Oh! sail with me towards the sea—
A loving heart awaits but thee.

"Our souls will yield us sigh for sigh,
While sailing to the sea!
Our shadows, floating on with us,
Shall keep fond company:
In storm or calm, our hope is love—
Our trust is in our God above."

The boat glides down the stream of Life,
Soft downward to the main;
The waves' low music swells aloud
In tuneful nuptial strain.
Two souls there love, two shadows gleam:
God guide the boat safe down the stream!

PIONEER LIFE IN OHIO.

BY A WESTERN CONTRIBUTOR.

ELIZABETH HARPER.*

ELIZABETH BARTHOLOMEW, one of the pioneer band who made the earliest settlement in north-eastern Ohio, was born in Bethlehem, Hunterdon County, New Jersey, February 13, 1749. She was the sixteenth child of her parents, and had still a younger sister. She was descended, on the maternal side, from the Huguenots of France, and her ancestors were persons of wealth and respectable rank, firmly attached to the principles they professed, and willing to surrender all, and yield themselves unto death, rather than give up their religious faith. They removed to Germany, after the revocation of the edict of Nantz; and there is a family tradition that the grandmother of the subject of this notice, then a child, was brought from Paris concealed in a chest. She married in Germany, and in old age emigrated to America.

In 1771, Elizabeth was married to Alexander Harper, one of several brothers who had settled in Harpersfield, Delaware County, New York. At the outbreak of the revolutionary war, these brothers immediately quitted their peaceful occupations to enter into the continental service, Alexander receiving a commission to act as captain of a company of rangers. The exposed situation of that part of the country, and the frequent visits of Indians and Tories, made it necessary for the whig families to seek the protection of Fort Schoharie. Mrs. Harper repaired thither with her family, including the aged parents of her husband. In time of comparative security, she lived at the distance of about a mile from the fort. Here, when there was a sudden alarm, she would herself harness her horses to the wagon, and, placing in it her children and the old people, would drive with all speed to the fort, remaining within its walls until the danger was over, and then returning to her occupations on the farm. As peril became more frequent or imminent, the old people were removed to a place of greater security, while Mrs. Harper, with her four children, and a lad they had taken to bring up, remained at home. One night they were startled by the sound of the alarm-gun. The mother took the youngest child in her arms, another on her back, and, bidding the two elder hold fast to her clothes, set off to escape to the fort; the lad running closely behind her, and calling to her in great terror not to leave him. The fugitives reached the fort in safety; and for the present, Mrs. Harper concluded to take up her abode there. She would not, however, consent to live in idleness, supported by the labor of others; but undertook, as her special charge, the bread-baking for the whole garrison, which she did for six months.

During her stay, the fort sustained a siege from a party of Tories and Indians, commanded by British officers. Messengers were dispatched to the nearest forts for relief; but while this was slow in arriving, the commanding officer, in opposition to the wishes of all his men, determined on a capitulation, and ordered a flag of truce to be hoisted for that purpose. The announcement of his intention created a dissatisfaction which soon amounted almost to rebellion. The women, among whom Mrs. Harper was a leading spirit, had on that day been busily occupied from early dawn in making cartridges, preparing ammunition, and serving rations to the wearied soldiers, and they heartily sympathized in the determination expressed, not to surrender without another effort to repel the besiegers.

One of the men declared his willingness to fire upon the flag which had been ordered to be hoisted, provided the women would conceal him. This they readily agreed to do; and, as often as the flag was run up, it was fired at, while the commander was unable to discover the author of this expression of contempt for his authority. The delay consequent on this act of insubordination and the displeasure of the soldiers, prevented the capitulation being carried into effect, till the arrival of reinforcements caused the enemy to retreat.

In the spring of 1780, Captain Harper availed himself of an interval in active service to look after his property in Harpersfield. While there, with several of his friends, they were surprised by a party of Indians and Tories under Brandt, and taken prisoner, an invalid brother-in-law being killed. Harper and Brandt had been schoolfellows in boyhood, and the chief did not fail to show a remembrance of the days thus spent together. The Indian captor of Harper treated him with great kindness, taking him, however, to Canada. Here his exchange was effected soon afterwards; but he was not released until peace was concluded, being offered, meanwhile, large rewards by the British if he would enter into service on their side. Mrs. Harper remained in ignorance of his fate during the time of his absence; and supposing him killed, mourned for him, while she did not suffer grief to paralyze her efforts for the protection and support of her family. All her characteristic energy was devoted to keep them together, and do what she could towards improving their shattered fortunes.

* Written for Mrs. Ellet's "Pioneer Women of the West."

In 1797, a company was formed in Harpersfield to purchase lands in the country then called "the far West." Besides Alexander and Joseph Harper, the company consisted of William McFarland, Aaron Wheeler, and Roswell Hotchkiss; others joining afterwards. In June of that year, these individuals entered into a contract with Oliver Phelps and Gideon Granger, members of the Connecticut Land Company, for six townships of land in what was then called New Connecticut, in the Northwestern Territory. Three of these townships were to lie east, and three west, of the Cayahoga River. The Connecticut Land Company drew their lands in the same year, and the township now known as Harpersfield, in Ashtabula County, was one of those which fell to the company formed at the town of that name in New York. In September, commissioners were sent out by them to explore the country. They were much pleased with the locality called Harpersfield, and selected it as the township most eligibly situated for the commencement of a settlement. On the 7th of March, 1798, Alexander Harper, William McFarland, and Ezra Gregory, set out with their families on their journey to this land of promise. As the winter's snow was upon the ground, the emigrants came in sleighs as far as Rome, where they found further progress impracticable, and were obliged to take up their quarters till the first of May. They then made another start in boats, and proceeded to Oswego, where they found a vessel, which conveyed them to Quecstown. Thence they pursued their journey on the Canada side to Fort Erie, being obliged to take this circuitous route on account of there being no roads west of Genesee River, nor any inhabitants, except three families living at Buffalo, while a garrison was stationed at Erie, in Pennsylvania. At Fort Erie they found a small vessel, which had been used for transporting military stores to the troops stationed at the West, and which was then ready to proceed up the lake with her usual lading of stores. This vessel was the only one owned on the American side, and the voyagers lost no time in securing passage in her for themselves and their families, as far as the peninsula opposite Erie. As the boat, however, was small, and already heavily laden, they were able to take with them but a slender stock of provisions.

Having landed on the peninsula, the party was obliged to stop for a week, until they could procure boats in which to coast up the lake, at that time bordered by the primeval forest. After having spent nearly four months in performing a journey which now occupies but two or three days, they landed, on the 28th June, at the mouth of Cunningham's Creek. The cattle belonging to the pioneers had been sent through the wilderness, meeting them at the peninsula, whence they came up along the lake shore to the mouth of the stream. Here the men prepared sleds to transport the goods they had brought with them, the whole party encamping that night on the beach. The next morning, Colonel Harper, who was the oldest of the emigrants, and was then about fifty-five, set out on foot, accompanied by the women, comprising Mrs. Harper and two of her daughters, twelve and fourteen years of age, Mrs. Gregory and two daughters, Mrs. McFarland, the colonel's sister, and a girl whom she had brought up, named Parthena Mingus. Their new home was about four miles distant, and they followed up the boundary line of the township from the lake, each carrying articles of provisions or table furniture. Mrs. Harper carried a small copper tea-kettle, which she filled with water on the way to the place of destination. Their course lay through a forest unbroken except by the surveyor's lines, and the men who followed them were obliged to cut their way through for the passage of the sleds. About three o'clock in the afternoon they came to the corner of the township line, about half a mile north of the present site of Unionville, Ohio, where they were glad to halt, as they saw indications of a coming storm. The women busied themselves in striking a fire and putting the tea-kettle over, while Colonel Harper cut some forked poles and drove them in the ground, and then felled a large chestnut tree, from which he stripped the bark, and helped the women to stretch it across the poles, so as to form a shelter, which they had just time to gather under when the storm burst upon them. It was not, however, of long continuance; and, when the rest of the men arrived, they enlarged and inclosed the lodge, in which the whole company, consisting of twenty-five persons, great and small, were obliged to take up their quarters. Their tea-table was then constructed in the same primitive manner, and we may suppose that the first meal was partaken of with excellent appetite, after the wanderings and labors of the day.

The lodge thus prepared was the common dwelling for three weeks, during which time some of the trees had been cut down, and a space cleared for a garden. The Fourth of July was celebrated in the new Harpersfield by the planting of beans, corn, and potatoes. The next thing was to build log-cabins for the accommodation of the different families; and when this was done, the company separated. The location chosen by Colonel Harper was where he first pitched his tent, while his brother-in-law took a piece of land about half a mile east of Unionville, near the spot now occupied by the Episcopal Church, and Mr. Gregory put up his dwelling close to the river, where Clyde Furnace was afterwards built.

The settlers suffered from the sickness peculiar to a new country, when the season came. A hired man in Harper's service was taken ill in August, and soon after the colonel himself was seized with the fever, of which he died on the 10th of September. They had been able to procure no medical aid, and a coffin was made by digging out the trunk of a tree, and hewing a slab for the lid. This melancholy event was a peculiar and distressing affliction to the little band of pioneers, and its effects on them would have been paralyzing, but that the firmness and energy exhibited by the widow, who now found her exertions necessary to sustain the rest, restored the confidence and hope which had nearly been extinguished by the loss of their leader. Although the principal sufferer by the dispensation, she would not for a moment listen favorably to the proposition made to abandon the enterprise. When an invitation came from friends in Pennsylvania, for herself and daughters to spend the winter, both she and her eldest daughter, Elizabeth, declined; knowing how necessary was their presence to keep up the spirits of the little community, and that their departure would discourage many who had intended coming to join them in their forest home. The magnanimity of this resolution can only be appreciated in view of the hardships which they knew it would be their lot to share.

In the fall, another small vessel was built for use on the American side of the lake, and two of our pioneers were sent to Canada to procure provisions for the winter. They dispatched four barrels of flour by this vessel, and waited some weeks for the ether, the captain of which had agreed to bring provisions up the lake for them. Disappointed in this expectation, and hearing nothing of the vessel, they were compelled to return, when the season was far advanced, without supplies; finding, on their way home, the remains of the vessel, which had been wrecked near Erie. They found, also, that the vessel which had on board the flour they had purchased, had been driven into the basin, and was too fast locked in ice to proceed. They were obliged therefore to remain till the ice became so strong that the flour could be removed in sleds. They at length arrived at home just in time to bring relief from absolute want to the settlers, who had lived six weeks without any kind of breadstuffs, substituting salt beef and turnips, the supply of which was just exhausted. Some grain had been raised at Elk Creek, in Pennsylvania, but there were no mills in that neighborhood, and the wheat procured there afterwards was brought in hand-sleds on the ice to Harpersfield, and ground in a hand-mill somewhat larger than a coffee-mill, which the pioneers had brought with them. By keeping this constantly in operation, enough flour was obtained for daily use, mingled, of course, with the bran, from which they had no means of separating it, but having a relish and sweetness which such necessity only could impart to the coarsest food. There were no deer in the country at that time; but large droves of elk, the flesh of which resembled coarse beef, were frequently seen. The flesh of the bears was much more oily, and really very palatable; raccoons also were abundant, and easily obtained, and were much used by the settlers; although, in after years of plenty, they lost all relish for "coon meat." Hickory nuts were also abundant that year, and were found a valuable article of food when other provisions failed. It is worthy of notice that, in the severest straits to which the settlers were reduced, the utmost harmony and friendly feeling prevailed among them; and, whatever game or provisions chanced to be obtained by any one family, was freely shared with the other two.

Towards spring, the men were again sent for a supply of wheat; but, by that time, the ice was growing tender, and the weather tended towards thawing, so that they were detained on the way much longer than they had expected; and on their arrival at home, found the families reduced to the last extremity, having been without provisions for two days. In this time of distress, the fortitude and energy of Mrs. Harper aided to sustain the rest; she was fruitful in expedients, and for the last days they had lived on the wild leeks she had gathered from the woods and boiled for them. Their troubles did not terminate with the severity of the winter. As soon as the lake opened, the men set out for Canada in boats to procure provisions; but found so much ice as they went down, that they were unable to reach Buffalo without much detention. In the mean time, new difficulties arose in the little settlement. The mill, on which all depended, was broken beyond hope of repair, and there appeared no way of grinding the wheat, which they could not pound so that bread could be made of it, and which, when prepared by boiling, proved unwholesome food. In this extremity, some relief was afforded by the arrival, at the mouth of Cunningham's Creek, of Eliphalet Austin, who came to make preparations for a settlement at Austinburgh, and gave the pioneers what they needed for immediate use from his supplies of provisions, thus preventing them from suffering till the return of their messengers.

About this time an accident, not uncommon in this forest life, occurred to Mrs. Harper. She went out one morning to find the cows, which had strayed away; but, not having yet learned to tell the north side of a tree by the difference in the bark—a species of woodcraft with which she afterwards became familiar—she lost herself, and wandered all day along the banks of a stream that ran through the depth of the forest. Her family, of course, became alarmed at her lengthened absence, and blew the horn repeatedly; but it was not until the shades of night had fallen that she heard the signal, when she managed to light upon the township line, and followed it to the clearing.

In the summer following, her sons were obliged to watch closely the hogs they had brought from Canada, on account of the bears, which were very numerous and destructive to stock. The men being occupied in clearing and working the land, or procuring provisions, various outdoor employments were cheerfully assumed by the women. One evening,

Mrs. Harper, with her eldest daughter, went to look up the hogs, taking the path that led to the nearest neighbor's house. Presently, they were startled by seeing a small bear's cub cross the path just in advance of them; it was followed by another, and the old bear composedly brought up the rear, taking no notice of the females, who made their way home with all speed, unmindful of the pigs, which came to their quarters directly, unharmed. So frequent were encounters with wild beasts, that the men never went beyond the clearing without firearms.

In July, 1799, Major Joseph Harper, the colonel's brother, joined the colony with his family, while a relative of the same name, with some other families, commenced a settlement at Cognesaut, some thirty miles down the lake. This year wheat, corn, etc., were raised sufficient for consumption; but there was a scarcity of meat, the severity of the preceding winter having killed several of their cattle, and many of the hogs being devoured by the bears. They were under the necessity, therefore, of depending on wild game, and the ease with which they secured it in traps, or by the unerring aim of their rifles, with their iron strength for the endurance of fatigue when ranging the forest, might well entitle them to be called "mighty hunters." But they were heavily laden with daily cares and laborious duties, which even the pleasures of the chase could not induce them to neglect: the clearing of the land and the culture of grain and vegetables demanded incessant attention, and the grinding of the grain was a matter requiring the exercise of some ingenuity. Corn they soon contrived to pound in mortars scooped in the top of oak stumps, with pounders attached to spring poles; but they were obliged to send their wheat in boats down the lake as far as Walnut Creek, in Pennsylvania, where a mill was erected this year. The families of the new emigrants suffered considerably in the latter part of the summer from sickness, and Mrs. Harper went down to the settlement at Cognesaut to offer assistance in attending to them. She remained some weeks occupied in her ministrations of kindness, and was not ready to return home till the last of November. Travelling in open boats and on horseback were the only modes practicable among the pioneers. The season was too far advanced for the first, and, accompanied by her relative, James Harper, our benevolent heroine set out on her homeward journey, the only road being along the lake shore. Forging the streams at their mouth, they had rode some fifteen miles when they came to the mouth of Ashtabula Creek, across which a sand-bar had formed during the summer, but had now given way to the increased force of the waters, which flowed into the lake. Harper was not aware of the depth of the stream, into which he rode without hesitation, and presently found his horse swimming. He called out to warn his companion; but she was too anxious to reach home to heed his remonstrance, and followed him fearlessly. Both reached the other side with some difficulty, Mrs. Harper wet to the shoulders, and in this condition she rode the remainder of the way, arriving at home before midnight.

During the fall, there were some accessions to the colony; Judge Wheeler, who had married a daughter of Colonel Harper, came in October, with his family, and Harper's eldest son, who had been out the year before and returned. For a year and a half after the settlement was commenced, they were not visited by Indians, though they frequently heard their dogs, and learned afterwards that they had not escaped the observation of their savage neighbors, who had counted them, and had noticed all their occupations and new arrivals. The winter of 1799 was remarkable for the depth of snow upon the ground. In consequence of this, game could not be procured, and the Indians suffered severely. Some thirty of them, unable to procure anything to satisfy the cravings of hunger, came to the settlement to ask relief, and were treated with the most generous hospitality. They remained six weeks, sheltered and fed by the pioneers; and when the snow melted, they found plenty of game in the forest, which they showed their gratitude by sharing with their white friends. In March, 1800, Daniel Bartholomew brought out his family, accompanied by that of Judge Griswold, whose destination was Windsor. They came on the ice from Buffalo, arriving only the day before the breaking up of the ice left the lake clear as far as the eye could reach. In the winter preceding, the whole Western Reserve had been erected into a county, which was called Trumbull, the part of it comprising Ashtabula being then included in one township, and called Richfield. In May, there were still further accessions, in consequence of which a scarcity was experienced of provisions raised the previous year, and designed for the use of a much smaller number. The settlers were again compelled to send to Canada in an open boat, in June, for fresh supplies. In August, an election was held for the purpose of sending a delegate to a convention appointed to be held at Chilli-cothe in the ensuing winter, for the purpose of taking measures preparatory to the admission of Ohio as a State into the Union. The winter of 1800-1801 passed without any remarkable occurrence, the country being healthy and provisions abundant. In the following June, other families were added to the number of inhabitants, and the summer was signalized by the erection of a horse-mill, the first built in the county, and the only one, till others were built in Austintown. The sufferings of the settlers from scarcity of food and other privations were now over, the advance of improvement developing the resources of the country, and the farmers were able to enlarge their cleared lands, and cultivate the soil to better advantage. Their friends from the East continued to join them, and Mrs. Harper had the satisfaction of seeing her elder children settled around her. In 1802, a school was established in the settlement—supposed to be the first on the Reserve. The scholars came from a distance of two miles and a half; and as the reputation of the institution extended, they were sent from Windsor and Burton, twenty and thirty miles distant. The same year regular meetings were established by the "Lovers of Good Order," and the year following saw numerous accessions.

In about three years after the commencement of the settlement, the Indians began to visit them periodically. They were chiefly Ojibwas, and belonged to Lake Superior in the summer, but came down every fall in their bark canoes, and, landing at the mouths of the streams, carried their canoes on their heads across the portage to Grand River, seven miles from the lake. Here they took up their quarters for the winter, returning west in the spring. They showed a friendly disposition towards the white men, and as the pioneers gave them assistance in sickness and destitution, they endeavored to show their gratitude by bringing them portions of such large game as they killed. Many a choice piece of bear's or elk's meat, carefully wrapped in a blanket, has Mrs. Harper received from her savage friends. One day she saw a party of drunken Indians coming towards her house when the men were absent; and she had just time to conceal a small keg of liquor under the floor before they came in, demanding whiskey. They were told they could not have any, but, insisting that they would, they commenced a search for it, and finding a barrel of vinegar, asked if that would "make drunk come," as, if so, they would take it. Finding it not the right sort of stuff, they insisted, before leaving the house, on treating the women from a calabash of muddy whiskey which they carried with them.

During all the privations, trials, and sufferings which Mrs. Harper was compelled to undergo, she was never known to yield to despondency, but with untiring energy exerted herself to encourage all within the sphere of her influence, teaching them to bear up against misfortune, and make the best of the home where their lot was cast. Her own family knew not, until the hardships of pioneer life had been overcome, how much she had endured—how many sleepless nights and hours of anxiety she had passed in the days of darkness and disaster. She found her reward in the affection and usefulness of her children, several of whom filled important stations in their adopted State. During the war of 1812, the country was exposed to all the dangers of a frontier, liable, on every reverse of the American arms, to be overrun by hostile Indians. In time of peril, Mrs. Harper's advice was always eagerly sought, as one whose experience qualified her to decide on the best course in any emergency. Her granddaughter well remembers seeing her engaged one day at the house of her son-in-law in showing a company of volunteers how to make cartridges.

Her life was prolonged to her eighty-fifth year, and she died on the 11th of June, 1833, retaining unimpaired, until her last illness, the characteristic strength of her remarkable mind.

WAYSIDE STRUGGLES.

BY KATE CAMPBELL.

CHAPTER I.

"We might have been!—these are but common words,

And yet they make the sum of life's bewailing;

They are the echo of those finer chords,

Whose music life deprecates when unavailing—

We might have been!"

Our first chapter opens on an afternoon in early September, and upon a group in one of our western cities. The windows of a large and cheerful apartment looked upon the deep and rapid Muskingum; and, at the open casement of one, a girl of about twenty was seated, on whom the attention of the party within seemed riveted; from the mother, who sat in her comfortable rocking-chair, and occasionally looked up from her sewing, to the fair girl of sixteen, who fidgeted restlessly about, pausing oftentimes beside her sister, to throw her arms about her neck with ardent affection.

"Frank, you must not go!—you shall not go!"

VOL. XLV.—5

she exclaimed, at last, impetuously. "What shall we do without you?"

"Well enough, Carry, I dare say," replied the girl, withdrawing her eyes from the prospect without, and returning her sister's caress. "Well enough, now that you are home from school, and mother will not be lonely;" and her gaze sought that of her parent with fond solicitude.

"Well, I do not see how!" answered Carry, impatiently; "and you are just as calm as though going for six weeks, instead of six months. No one knows what may happen in that time: only this I hope and pray of all things, that you don't get married!"

Unconsciously, Frank glanced at the figure of a handsome young man, who was seated opposite her, with his arms resting upon the table before him, and his hands supporting his head; while, with his keen, forward, pressing eyes, he followed every movement. His lip curled now, and Frank blushed slightly, while she laughingly replied—

"How selfish, Carry! Before I come back, I shall be twenty-one. It is high time to look out for a husband."

"I do not think so," cried Carry; "at least, not there."

"But I, now, have an especial fancy for an eastern beau," Frank answered: "they are so much more intelligent and cultivated than our cavaliers, and"—

"Polished fools!" muttered Philip Arden, rising suddenly as he spoke, and overturning the small table with a crash.

"Oh, Philip! you have broken sister's beautiful vase, and all her beautiful flowers, too!"

"Confound them!" was his only answer, striding off towards the window, where Frank no longer sat, but stood pale and breathless. "Frank, come and walk with me; I want to talk to you! Nay, you must come!" he continued, as the girl proudly withdrew the hand he had taken, and turned away.

"Must!" murmured Frank Cushman, slowly, through her closed lips, and fixing her glittering eye full upon him.

Mrs. Cushman rose and left the room with a troubled air; and, at a sign, the light-hearted Carry followed. Frank looked around, to find herself alone with a man with whom, the day before, she had parted in passionate anger; vowing, as she tore a sparkling gem from her finger, and dashed it into the rapid river, that the memory of Philip Arden should perish in her heart as that diamond in the flowing Muskingum! Now the color rose to her brow, as she questioned the reason of his unwished presence.

"Yesterday, I told you we were parted forever, and to-day you are here again, with your ungovernable temper, to destroy the small remnant of happiness left!"

Philip Arden's eyes flashed.

"Frank, you never loved me!"

"Perhaps not," she said, with withering coolness, though her lip trembled the while.

"Oh, madness! madness!" cried the young man, traversing the room with passionate gestures. "So to love! so to lose!"

"Yes, Philip; our love has been all madness, all fire, and consumed itself by its own intensity. It were better, far better, to part thus, and now, than to have wedded, and waked to find ourselves victimized forever. So much alike—how could we ever love so madly?"

"Frank! Frank! do not talk thus; you will drive me frantic! I am so now, I believe!" And he dashed his hands wildly against his high and burning brow.

Frank sank upon her chair and hid her face; she dared not look upon such passion. Once again her hand was taken, and Philip Arden knelt before her.

"Oh, Frank!" and the scalding agony dropped from his brow upon her hands, "must it be so—as you have said? Can you not try me once again?"

If years of probation are needful, still give me hope at last!"

Now she spoke hurriedly, and with more softness—

"Philip, I have vowed, before high Heaven, that wed I will not, as we now are! Love is not immortal; it cannot stand such shocks as you have given mine daily by your constant, causeless, watchful jealousy. I lose my respect and trust when you thus degrade yourself; and I would not dare to marry without respect. Now I will tell you, while I am calm, my resolution. I will go to Philadelphia, as I have promised; and, when there, I will mingle constantly in society, and not seclude myself: that shall be the trial of my love for you. If I love not there—if, at morn and eve, at noonday and midnight, my thoughts turn homeward to you, then I shall be faithful—I shall know, indeed, my love is lasting. But, remember, I would not bind you with a hope, a chance; you also may change; but we shall know, when first our eyes meet on my return, whether the breath of the world hath been upon our hearts. If it be of one only, the other must be content to suffer; if of both, what matters it? But, if both are still the same, then"—

She stooped down, and, imprinting a fervent kiss upon Philip Arden's forehead, passed quickly from the room; while still he knelt, and gazed upon her vacant chair, as though she still were present.

CHAPTER II.

"Thine is a face to look upon, and pray That a pure spirit keep thee!"—WILLIAM.

"GIRLS! girls!" cried Fanny Ashton, rushing into the parlor of a large and handsome house in the western part of our own good city, where half a dozen maidens sat engaged in earnest conversation, "I have seen her! I have seen the beautiful Frank Cushman! Lend me your ears, and I will give you such a description!"

"Quick, then, quick!" cried many light voices, impatiently, and eager glances were bent on the new-comers. One was a showy, dashing girl, with few pretensions to beauty; but the other, her sister, was exceedingly handsome, though, at present, a tinge of melancholy obscured the radiance of her beauty.

"Well, then," cried the former, throwing down her bonnet and fanning herself violently, "this same Miss Cushman, about whose beauty and attractiveness such a commotion has been made for the last month, turns out to be just nothing at all! No style, no beauty, no pretensions of any sort, that I can discover; and I don't think I'm quite blind."

"Not beautiful?" exclaimed the blooming concave, with universal surprise.

"I think she is," half murmured her sister; but so faintly that no one heard her.

"No; that's a positive fact! Sarah and I were just going by Clara Hastings's, and she beckoned for us to come in; and who should be in the parlor but her sister! She arrived last night. Clara introduced us immediately; but Miss Cushman was so reserved and quiet, that Clara and I had the conversation to ourselves, after all."

"Well, that is very singular!" observed Amy Bryan. "Clara was forever talking about her sister. What did you think, Sarah?"

"Oh, don't ask Sarah! She is desperately taken with the lady, and thinks I have grown blind. She will rave, if you only give her a chance."

"Oh, that is delightful!—the very thing!" cried Amy. "I thought there must be two sides. Come, Sarah, now for your description."

The girls laughed. Sarah laughed, yet spoke enthusiastically.

"I do not wonder Clara praises her. I think she will queen it most decidedly. There is a sort of spell about her; you cannot be with her five minutes without feeling it, whether you acknowledge it or not."

"But tell us what she is like, can you not?" cried Amy Bryan, impatiently.

"Yes; only wait one moment," Sarah answered, with perfect good-humor. "At first, do you know, though her appearance was striking, I said, 'Why, she is not pretty!' but, the next moment, I had changed my opinion. She is not very tall, though you would think so at first, her figure is so slender; and her face is not round nor oval, nor any particular shape that I can describe, and her mouth is decidedly large; but, at either corner, lurk two of the most bewitching dimples! She cannot smile or speak without disclosing them, and they give such an innocent, loving expression to the lower part of her face, in itself so far from beautiful; but the upper part, that is perfectly exquisite! Her forehead is purely Grecian, with a profusion of dark hair parted plainly over it, and woven in a loose plait behind; and her eyes! I thought, at first, they were black, but they are gray, with those large dilating pupils and long, black lashes, fairly sweeping her cheek."

"And her complexion?" asked Amy.

"It is very white; but not a particle of color: but you never think of that."

"Oh, I'm sure I should!" replied Amy, herself displaying, at the moment, two round and rosy cheeks, which were justly the envy of many a pale-faced maiden. "But go on, go on!"

"I have finished," said Sarah, laughing. "But I do not think, after all, that Frank Cushman will trouble us much; I do not think she will become one of us: she conveys the idea of a superior being. Even Clara, accomplished as she is, and so much older, too, seems to look up to her in some things. Oh, girls, I warn you; we must look to our laurels!"

CHAPTER III.

"And can young Beauty's tender heart Nurse thoughts of scorn?"

MRS. HASTINGS sat at her writing-desk, directing a pile of invitations on the table beside her. She laid down her pen to speak to her sister, who sat quietly on the sofa, with her head thrown back and eyes half closed.

"Frank, dear, don't you think I had better put off this party, after all, till you are better? I don't think you are at all well."

"Oh yes, I am, Clara, perfectly so; only somewhat fatigued with my journey—jolting over the mountains."

"You do not look well, at all events, and I had just as leave put it off; only say the word."

"That I will not. I dare say society will revive me, and be the best possible thing, after all." But a weary sigh followed the assertion.

"Very well, then, if you think so." And Mrs. Hastings resumed her employment.

"Frank," she said again, after a while, "how did you like Sarah and Fanny Ashton?"

"Those were the girls who called here yesterday?" said Frank, languidly.

"Yes; the same."

"I like the beautiful one—Sarah: is that her name?—but not the other. I should dread her rattling tongue."

"Oh, as to that, Fanny is nice enough, and her tongue most amusing, when one has a fit of the glooms, or feels indisposed to converse themselves. But Sarah has half obtained my ill-will; for I fear she will disarrange my pet plan with regard to you."

"How?" asked Frank, with more interest, unclosing her fine eyes.

"Why, you see, the state of the case is this: Sarah Ashton, with her beauty and various accomplishments, has more than half succeeded in captivating the lion of our set, whom, in my heart, I had laid out for you to exercise your powers upon. Is it not provoking? He is just the man for you: no one else can appreciate you, or enter into your high-flown feelings, or—in short, I am thoroughly provoked that he should make such a goose of himself! Why could he not wait?"

"What is his name?" said Frank, with a smile.

"Quite a romantic one—Percy Bryan; and he writes verses, and sings enchantingly, and plays, and is most eloquent! And, to descend to vulgar particulars, is very handsome, and rich, and all that sort of thing, you know."

"Oh yes; I know," said Frank, with an amused expression of countenance. "He writes sonnets, does he, and 'strums the light guitar,' and perhaps dresses à la Byron, and has floating locks, and white hands? Ah, poor me! how sorry I feel! Is there no chance for me yet, think you?"

"Never mind, Miss Frank," said Clara, biting her lip with vexation; "I'll be revenged for this: just wait! I only hope you will fall desperately in love with him!"

"I hope I may," said Frank, laughing. "I do so long for some excitement!"

The bell rang ere Clara could frame an answer, and a servant entered with a card.

"Percy Bryan, as I live, Frank!"

"The old saw verified," remarked the girl, quietly.

"For shame, Frank! Did he ask for me or 'the ladies,' Thomas?"

"The ladies, ma'am. He mentioned Miss Cushman"——

"There now, Frank! you must go and dress; only be quick, there's a darling."

"I shall do no such thing," was the composed reply. "I might dress for a lady; but for a gentleman—oh no, thank you!"

"Why, Frank, that is too bad!" cried Clara, angrily. "Percy Bryan is the very model of elegance, and fastidious to a degree. Only just imagine yourself going down in that horrid wrapper, and your hair in that plight!"

"My dear Clara, the wrapper was not considered horrid at breakfast, I believe. On the contrary, if I recollect rightly, Mr. Hastings particularly admired it; and, as for my hair, really I thought I had arranged it quite nicely." And Frank walked towards the tall mirror and smoothed, with her small fingers, the raven mass parted so plainly on her fair white brow.

Fanny Ashton had been wrong in her assertion that Frank Cushman possessed no style; she had a very decided one; and, when she had finished speaking, she took from the arm of the sofa a crimson cashmere, and, folding it about her graceful figure, calmly followed Clara into the drawing-room, to be introduced to the irresistible Percy Bryan.

She saw, at a glance, that she had formed a wrong idea; but, with somewhat of perverseness, perhaps, seated herself at a distance, and answered in quiet monosyllables, a lurking smile just betraying her dimples, now and then, as she could not but see how worried, how angry poor Clara grew.

Percy Bryan might, indeed, have typified extreme elegance; for every movement of his fine form was replete with unstudied grace, and every word he uttered told flatteringly upon the ear; every feature of his handsome face beamed with subdued vivacity when he spoke, with the utmost deference when others were speaking. Unlike some men, who convey by every word and motion how far beyond the rest of the world they deem they have gone in the art of good-breeding, and whose constant aim is to produce on all around an overpowering impression, Percy Bryan no sooner entered an assemblage than the atmosphere of perfect ease, which he carried about him, seemed to diffuse itself through the room, to the comfort and self-satisfaction of everybody. Then he was, as Clara had said, gifted and talented, and fascinating; and, when we have enumerated all these various and excellent qualities, we were a most ungrateful member of society to pronounce him hollow-hearted.

But what was all this to Frank Cushman? What mattered it that his speaking eyes constantly sought hers, so resolutely veiled beneath their sweeping fringes that, on her merest remark, his fine head bent towards her with marked deference and profound respect? Perfectly independent as regarded her own actions, it suited her now to be silent; and silent she was through the whole of that rather long morning call.

Percy Bryan had been so accustomed to be courted, to see bright eyes grow brighter, and sweet smiles sweeter, on his approach, that, perhaps for the first time since boyhood, he experienced the sensation of amazement, in thinking over the hour just passed, while pursuing his way to call on the Ashtons.

"Singular, very, this Miss Cushman! Remarkably collected and cool"—as a cucumber, he would probably have added, had Percy Bryan ever imagined such an inelegant comparison. "Not beautiful, certainly; and yet she is, when she lifts those splendid eyes, or speaks. I must see more of her," was his concluding reflection, as he rung the bell at Ashton's residence.

Sarah Ashton was alone in the drawing-room. It had become quite an understood thing for the family group to scatter, when Percy Bryan entered the front door.

She was sitting at the piano, and trying to look cool, and seem absorbed in the song before her; still, before she raised her head to greet the visitor, who had not spoken yet, the warm color stole up to her temples, and down to her snowy throat, just disclosed by the gossamer fold of lace about the neck of her simple, yet exquisitely becoming morning-dress.

Sarah's beauty was of that superior kind which asserts its claims instantly. No one could presume to dispute that her complexion was not faultless, that her large and liquid eyes were not matchless, that her features were not all formed with the most chiselled exactness, and her figure with perfect symmetry. Still, her style was not peculiar; and, though few equalled her in the purity of their charms, many might be found, the character of whose beauty, more or less, resembled hers.

She was intelligent and amiable, with a large dash of romance in her composition, and somewhat singular, withal, from the warmth and simplicity of her nature; she had felt the world's breath, but had not received it, and this had formed her attraction in Percy Bryan's eyes. For the last few days, he had almost been tempted to launch his bark on the untrod sea of matrimony; but the preceding half hour had startled him somewhat; he shrank back from the dreaming house, passed but so lately. He said to himself, "Do not be in too great a hurry: wait awhile."

CHAPTER IV.

"Oh, much I fear thy guileless heart, its earnestness of feeling,
Its passions and its sympathies to every eye revealing;
I tremble for that winning smile and trusting glance of thine,
And pray that none but faithful ones may bow before thy shrine."—J. G. WHITTIER.

"Joy for the present moment! Joy to-day!
Why look we to the morrow?"—SARGENT.

FANNY ASHTON, with her own toilet completed for Mrs. Hastings's party, stood by her sister's dressing-table assisting, advising, and chattering.

"Percy Bryan not going with you, Sarah! That's odd, very!"

"I do not think so," said Sarah, laughing faintly, as she fastened a rose-bud in her beautiful hair. "Why should it be more singular than that Cousin Harry, or Tom Stephens, or—or any of the gentlemen we know, are not going with me?"

"Why, indeed? I'm sure I cannot tell, if you do not know. Of course, you understand your own affairs best. Only!"

"Only what?"

"Oh, nothing; only that lovers are generally more attentive than the one in this instance."

"A lover, Fanny! How perfectly absurd! No one but you would make such a speech!" said Sarah, reddening angrily.

"Well, my dear sister, we won't quarrel about terms; only, if he is not, in my humble opinion, he ought to be! I hope you have more spirit than to allow any man to trifle with you."

Sarah was silent. She would not for the world, and more especially at this time, have betrayed her feelings; so she choked down the rising emotion resolutely, and affected to be oblivious to her sister's insinuations.

Fanny Ashton had no idea how keenly her words struck home. She was indignant at Bryan, disgusted at what she supposed a proof of his fickleness: her anger exhausted, she became calm again, and offered her sister the loan of Tom Fenton's spare arm—Tom Fenton was her acknowledged lover—and Sarah laughingly accepted it.

Still, when Fanny found herself in the dressing-room at Mrs. Hastings's, her vexation returned.

"Is it not too bad, mamma, that Sarah should have no attendance? She, who has always made her entrée with such éclat, to be deprived of a beau to-night, because of that hated Percy Bryan's caprices! If he had not been so constantly in waiting lately, it would make no difference; but now there will be a world of remarks, particularly as I happen to know he is here to-night, and alone!"

"How do you know that?"

"Oh, never mind, mamma; trust to woman's wit to find out all she seeks to know."

"Well, dear, it cannot be helped; and really I do not see that it matters. I can make an excellent chaperone; and, once in the room, she will be surrounded: that must always be, with her beauty."

"Oh, pshaw!—I beg pardon, mamma. But, if we were not in a crowded dressing-room, I would deliver a long dissertation on the evils to which Bryan has subjected poor Sarah by his trifling. No one likes to play second fiddle—no one likes to be very attentive to a girl who has been jilted."

"Fanny, I am ashamed to hear you talk thus! Who has been jilted? Not Sarah Ashton, I am sure!" replied Mrs. Ashton, all a mother's pride in arms.

"What on earth are you talking about?" said Sarah, coming over to the dark corner where they stood. "You cannot see to do anything here, I am sure; and, Fanny, Tom will be tired waiting."

"Let him wait, then—till I am ready," Fanny replied, applying herself slowly to the arrangement of her toilet.

It was not a conspicuous position, by any means, that Frank Cushman had chosen; nevertheless, before the sisters had greeted their hostess, both had remarked her slight, graceful figure seated on an ottoman, and, standing beside her, the tall form of Percy Bryan.

"There!" Fanny exclaimed, involuntarily, and her penetrating eyes encountered her sister's. Her exclamation, her look, touched the prideful heart. Sarah drew up her stately figure, the beautiful head erected itself haughtily, and the short, red upper lip assumed its regal air.

"Bravo!" Fanny whispered; and Sarah could have smiled, had not her heart weighed down so heavily, when she caught a glimpse of herself in a splendid mirror.

Five minutes after, her merry laugh floated on the fragrant air. She started, it sounded strangely, not part and parcel of herself; and so it was with every word she uttered, every laugh that broke from her lips that evening. Many were round her, and soft and earnest the tones ministering to her vanity; but their idle compliments wearied her, and constant were the efforts she made to reply to them, to carry on the farce commenced. Once she disengaged herself for a moment, and stood quiet and alone. Her sister's voice aroused her.

"Well, I give up, Sarah; she is pretty; there's no denying it—fascinating! But I do not like her, for all—prejudice, perhaps—but I think her vain: only watch her!"

"Who?"

"Who? What a question! Frank Cushman!"

And you are looking straight at her, and ask me who."

"I beg pardon, sister; but I did not hear what you were saying. Some one's dress"—

"Oh, pehaw! Why you are crazy to-night, Sarah!"

The fair girl colored vividly.

"What did I say? I was absent. Have I made myself ridiculous?"

"No; as it was only to me you were speaking. But prenez garde, I implore you!" she whispered, as Percy Bryan moved towards them.

Little Amy Bryan stood under the chandelier, with rosy cheeks, and chattered volubly to a knot of admirers.

"Oh, I think she is superb! How can you say she is not? Sarah Ashton said she was beautiful; but I didn't believe it, because she declared she had no color, and none of us could fancy beauty without that. But it's just as she said; you never think of it. How desperately smitten Percy seems! How nice it would be to have her for a sister!"

"So, Miss Amy, you do not contemplate the possibility of your brother ever being an unsuccessful suitor?"

"Oh dear, no!" replied the little lady. "Why, if Percy were to make love to an angel, she would have to return it! Why, though I am his sister, I am sure I shall never like another man like him."

Then, of course, followed various gallant lamentations over such heart-rending intelligence, in the midst of which some one observed—

"And Sarah Ashton—what has happened there? I thought Percy was all devotion."

"What nonsense!" cried Amy, reddening. "That was only a flirtation."

"I wonder," said the same gentleman, smiling, and glancing at Frank Cushman, now thoroughly animated, and talking to Percy Bryan with great spirit—"I wonder if that is only a flirtation? and, if so, which will win the game, Miss Cushman or your brother?"

"No one can excel Percy, when he chooses to exert himself," was Amy's reply.

"Ah, that is the thing; any one can do that which one exerts one's self to do. But Miss Cushman seems to have the power to win her will without any extra trouble. What she is, she is, because she cannot help it; and she does not look as if any motive could be sufficiently strong to tempt her from her originality. I like her exceedingly!" And the gentleman sauntered off towards the object of his remarks.

Fanny Ashton had been fearful that her sister would disclose her wounded feelings in a conversation with Percy Bryan. She was therefore surprised at her perfect composure when he addressed her; nothing in her tones, looks, or words which could convey to the spectator that they were on other than the most indifferently friendly terms.

Then, with the impetuosity of her nature, she went to the other extreme; she was thoroughly vexed that Sarah had not been more dignified and reserved—had not shown plainly her full appreciation of his conduct. She was wrong, and Sarah right.

The impulse of a noble woman guided Sarah correctly; her feelings, regulated and subdued by true pride, were too delicate to obtrude themselves: she was almost the same as she had been in the early stages of their intimacy. The one sad thing in this was not perceptible, but, nevertheless, existing. She had not only taken a step forward in life, but, in so doing, some of youth's fresh bloom was lost from her spirit: inevitable consequence, and a wise one, perhaps; but sad, for all.

She was glad, after he had gone from her, that she had met him: she suffered, but she was calm; her delirious, flighty gayety exhausted her: now she moved about attended by her full faculties; before all was confusion. Yes; she was glad she had conversed with him.

Frank Cushman talked peculiarly. There was nothing conventional in her form of conversation; it differed from the current coin, in that its tone was higher and superior; still, no one could have accused her of pedantry; indeed, there was much more of sentiment than of intellect about her. She was not affected either; both her language and manner were perfectly simple; one only felt a pervading sense of the beautiful diffused, as it were, through the air around her, through her being.

Besides, Frank was both independent and dependent in her nature: not such an anomaly as it may seem. Independent in her thoughts, her views, her line of action, so long as her spirit stood alone, from a consciousness that there was nothing on which to lean; but ready, the moment such a stay offered, to yield all and repose. The yearning of her life was for repose: should she never find it? Perfect trust must be so delightful; yet she had never felt it.

Though, as a girl, she had devotedly loved Philip Arden, she had never for a moment felt that she could give up the direction of her life to him. What! a man who could not govern himself a fit support for her? Absurd! And yet she loved him, and not as a brother, she felt assured; the stream of tenderness ran too deeply. "But I do not respect him sufficiently," she said. "I know him too thoroughly. If he could only conceal from me his faults of disposition!—but no; all is open to me as the day." Yet she could not but acknowledge that, if ever he learned to govern himself, then Philip Arden for her against the world! One thing was certain though—she would not marry him unless he did.

Percy Bryan she liked; but she could never love him. He might be more elegant than Philip, more intellectual, perhaps—he was also less strong. He might lead many through life with happiness, and command their respect, too; but not her, with her strong mind, and strong feelings, and deep capabilities. What was love without respect—almost veneration? She could not conceive of it.

When the last guest had departed, and Clara would fain have detained her in the comfortable lounging-chair by the fireside, to talk over the events of the evening, she hastily bid her good-night, and ran up to her room. She threw on her dressing-gown and seated herself before her toilet in a large arm-chair; taking the comb from her hair, and suffering her magnificent tresses to fall over her neck and shoulders, she leaned back in abandonment. She felt so weary; as if life was such a farce, and its actors so pitiable! She often felt thus, but was not wont to give way to her emotions. She knew that such thoughts were opposed to religion; that religion which her excellent mother had striven so long to instil into her heart. She blessed God for a pious mother, without which she thought she had been in danger of straying into those easy paths which an imaginative, speculative mind lays out so constantly and involuntarily. She felt sometimes that she was like a perverse child—every way but the right way. She had imposed on herself this trial, this going from home; now she shrank from it; she felt herself looking forward to the future. After all, Philip might not be changed! What was there to alter him? And, then, what was to be done? Frank forgot Divine agency, which directs and controls human agency; she was giving up to her usual unbelief and unresisting nature. But, after all, it is very hard for the natural human heart to see a way for the accomplishment of its hopes. We may not condemn her.

She was sleepless that night; the struggle between impulse and principle wearied her, yet, at the same time, drove repose from her. Taking up a pencil, she strove to release herself from the troublesome bondage of thought by committing it to paper.

"I do not see why I should feel it incumbent on me to destroy my happiness with mine own hand—to leave scarcely a chance for brighter days! And yet I cannot shake off my mother's influence. She bade me ask my own heart if, in the face of Heaven, I could wed a man who feared not his Maker, and thus, by my actions, dare the misery sure to follow? And, when I did so, my heart answered, 'I would dare anything,' but my conscience—that it was which restrained me.

"But oh, when I think, it seems so calculating to love environed by such restraints! My impulse bids me become Philip's, and trust to fate; my principles bid me reject him, and trust my happiness to Providence!

"Why are my nature and my education made to war so constantly? And yet I shame to ask the question: I should rather bless God that it is so!

"Oh, how solemnly I declared my intention to forsake him! I know I could not do so now; but, just then, the passions of the heart were still, subdued by the effect of a mother's prayer. Just then, all I desired was to do right, and leave the rest with Heaven. It hath passed—that moment; I fear I shall never feel so again."

CHAPTER V.

"Her face was hidden in her hands; but tears trickled through her slight fingers—tears, those late Vain tributes to remorse."

"My desolation does begin to make A better life!"

THE next few months were passed by Frank in a whirl of gaiety.

Her sister, Mrs. Hastings, was a fashionable woman, living handsomely, frequenting excellent society; giving, herself, many extravagant parties, and called upon, in return, to bestow the light of her countenance on the assemblies of her friends—so called.

Frank was somewhat bewildered; she forgot her depression in constant excitement; right and wrong were not so clearly defined as they were wont to be. She was new—she queened it, as Sarah Ashton had predicted: she even did that for which she had always expressed the most supreme contempt—she flirted! and with Percy Bryan!

With the young ladies she was therefore unpopular; but the gentlemen, according to custom, adored her, or professed to adore. Her style of dress was pronounced whimsical and outlandish by the ladies; by the gentlemen, unique and refreshing.

"Would you believe it?" said Amy Bryan, one morning, quite confidentially, to a knot of girls who had gathered around her—"would you believe it? I went with brother yesterday to call on Miss Cushman—a formal morning call, mind you. Well, we caught her in the drawing-room! Caught, I say, because she looked as if attired for some tragic representation; her long hair curled, I suppose Percy would call it, but I should say waving upon her shoulders, and a shawl thrown around her. Then she was seated in a lounging-chair, with her eyes closed, and humming some sentimental song; and the strangest thing of all was, that she didn't express the slightest apology, or show any confusion, but got up, looking as pale and composed as though we had found her in the most elegant séjligée. Well, what do you think Percy said, after all? That he admired her dress a thousandfold more than mine! Than mine!" Amy repeated, glancing down at her rich silk dress and elegant velvet cloak—at her costly sables, and most richerché and becoming little bonnet!

"I left Percy there," she continued, after the various comments had been expended. "He grew so empressé, that I was frightened lest he should make a declaration while I was present!"

Amy possessed all her brother's fickleness; she had early taken a jealous dislike to Frank Cushman; and, while she was pouring forth what she had seen, and heard, and thought, Percy was making the offer of his hand to the unconscious object of her remarks.

And how Frank started! She had trod the same ground before; but never to feel the acute sting of conscience rising up to tell her how weak she had shown herself—how she had departed from her standard of right!

"Is it possible that I have given enough encouragement for this?" she said; and then she could not but answer, yes. A vivid recollection of how her time had been spent for many weeks presented itself with unpleasing distinctness: the long mornings, lounged away in Clara's own quiet sitting-room, where the sentimental song blended with the breathings of the harp or guitar, beguiled the swift-footed hours. Or the books which he was constantly bringing to read to her, while she busied herself in some quiet feminine occupation, listening to his deep, rich voice and animated remarks. Then the noonday walk or drive, and the evening meeting again at some crowded party or showy concert, where many eyes were upon them, watching her undisguised preference to his society above all others.

And now, after all this, she was to say "No," for instantly she felt it could be no other word; and tears of shame and contrition were aching in her eyes, which must not be shed.

He heard her quietly, not calmly, and left her. Perhaps he felt he deserved her rejection; perhaps he remembered—for, in his heart, he felt he had been trifled with—that on him, also, the charge might be laid.

Dashing away the blinding tears, Frank rushed from the room: on the stairs, a servant handed her a letter; closing her door, she threw herself on her knees and tore it open. Well she knew the handwriting; but she read it slowly, for her eyes were dim, and she could not see the lines her tears were blotting so sadly. It ran thus:—

"You forbade my writing to you, Frank—dear Frank!—but you must forgive me that I cannot obey.

What was it that you said to me that took from me my life, and strength, and energy—which placed an obstacle between our union which I feared could not be overcome?

"You could not marry me as I was; one who had so little control over self: I must be changed.

"Hopeless!" I said to myself. 'Has it not been my constant, unavailing effort, since childhood, to keep my temper in subjection, and now, at five-and-twenty, what encouragement have I to proceed?'

"For weeks after you had gone, Frank, I was mad, wild; and my temper, the very thing which had sent you away from me, was destroying me!

"Frank, did you ever thank God that he had given you a pious mother? That, morning and evening, through all your life, one had knelt to plead for you, to call blessings on your path? Oh, if you have not, do so now!

"They did not tell you how the fever in my veins brought on delirium; how days passed in ceaseless agony; or how one knelt by my side and prayed for me. How, through all my madness, that kneeling figure haunted me; and, when I woke from that long, dreadful dream, still it was there, with its calm eyes and heavenly peace. It was your mother! When I looked on her the fever stayed; when I listened to her words a holy yearning was born in me, and over the struggles of my soul, beyond hours and days to come of combat and trial, lay the strength for which I had wished. It was still in the future; but what of that? I had received the deep, the sincere desire to possess it, and that, with the help of Heaven, must prove its surety.

"And oh, how different the motives with which I regarded the future struggle from those with which, in former days, I strove to subdue my passions! Be not offended, Frank, when I tell you higher, purer motives now animate me. My thoughts before were, 'Give me Frank, and I have Heaven!' Now I feel, 'Give me Heaven, and I shall win my Frank!'

"I said to your mother, 'Now I have found the way to conquer; but you must aid me still by your prayers, and Frank also. I will write, and ask her not to forget me in her morning and evening petitions to Heaven.'"

Frank dropped the letter with a feeble, wailing cry. "While he has been struggling, what have I been doing? While he was lying in sickness, in pain, where was I? Oh, Philip! you have been faithful, but I!"

"Frank, I am well now; I am mingling again with life, and find how hard it is to be in the world, yet not of it. But by my side an angel walks, and your memory makes me strong. In the evenings I go to your mother, and she is ever ready to aid me by her sordial converse. Sometimes I ask her if I am changed—if Frank can respect and trust me now? And then she smiles, and pressing her hand upon my shoulder, says, with inexpressible affection, 'My son!'

"Do those words convey to your mind all that they do to mine? Such fulness of joy, such serene, unclouded hope?

"You see, I do not write as though I feared a change in you. When a doubt obtrudes, I think of your last fervent kiss; I feel it now. I measure you by myself: less devotion I could not believe you capable of."

"Oh, Philip! Philip! how you sting me!" cried Frank, wildly. "Oh, Father above, it is I who have been weak! What have I been doing? While I fancied that Philip was not strong, not perfect enough for me, I have been descending, descending, till I fear I cannot reach him!"

It was a bitter hour for Frank Cushman, but beneficial: she learned that even the strongest fail when trusting in themselves.

Now she must write to Philip; not much—she could not trust herself—but a few lines, just to show him how far she was beneath the Frank he pictured.

"DEAR PHILIP: I am glad you disobeyed me. I am glad you wrote. Your letter has saved me, I trust. I had sadly departed from your ideal; you would no longer have recognized me. I was dreaming, and the bright flowers in my path were luring me on to a dreadful vortex! A few more steps, and I had been lost to you forever, unfit for your new-born self! You will wonder at this; well you may; but I cannot explain till we meet. A few weeks more, and I leave this bewildering maze for a purer atmosphere—for my home! I am stretching my arms to it now. I long for it! Can that assurance comfort you?"

"Frank," said Clara, coming into her room some hours afterwards, "I fancied, somehow, that Percy Bryan had offered himself this morning. Am I wrong? Your swollen eyes would seem to tell a different story."

"Dear Clara, you have touched on a painful subject. I shall never marry Percy Bryan."

"If you do not, it is then because you have already refused him. Frank, you cannot deceive me; and yet I thought you loved him: you have given him every encouragement."

Frank put her hands before her face and wept bitterly.

"You never would have imagined, then, that I loved another while thus trifling? Oh, faithless! faithless!"

"Loved another, Frank?"

"Yes; and one the noblest—the noblest! And I left him because I fancied his temper warm, and that it would be imprudent to marry him! Left him to come here and trifle and debase myself! to mingle in scenes of folly and dissipation, while he was striving to make himself my ideal—a guide and protector; and now he has risen, and I have fallen—oh, so low! Clara, dear sister, there is nothing so hard to bear as the condemnation of your own heart!"

"Frank, don't talk so! What have you done? Nothing, I am sure, to distress you so severely. It is not wrong to join in innocent gayety; and, as for flirting, it is what every one does who is beautiful or disengaged."

What comfort for a remorseful heart! Frank could only shake her head and continue to weep. Clara continued—

"As for Percy Bryan, you need not trouble yourself about him! Men always recover from affairs of that sort; and, after a while, he will go back to Sarah Ashton, who is dying for love all this while; and then there will be an end to his trouble."

Frank heard but one sentence: "Sarah Ashton dying with love for him!"

"Why, you know, I told you Percy was desperately enamored before you came; and every one thought it would be a match."

"Oh, Clara! Clara! have I caused all this misery, too? You spoke so jestingly of his attentions to Sarah, that I did not dream of their truth; especially as I never saw him with her."

"No; that is the thing. From the first moment he saw you, he was fascinated. So cheer up now! How could you know that you were whiling him from another?"

"He was not worthy of her; so false, so fickle!" cried Frank.

"I do not believe she will hold that opinion long," was Clara's reply.

"If she is what I suppose her, she will scorn him!" Frank answered, with spirit; and there the conversation dropped.

CHAPTER VI.

"Good-by, proud world! I'm going home;
Thou art not my friend; I am not thine:
Too long through weary crowds I roam—
A river ark on the ocean brine,
Too long I am tossed like the driven foam:
But now, proud world, I'm going home!"

"How still Frank Cushman has become lately!" said Amy Bryan to Fanny Ashton. "Ever since Percy went to New York so suddenly! I declare, it is too bad for Percy to flirt so outrageously!"

"And Miss Cushman will go back to Ohio without a husband, after all!" remarked another maiden, with somewhat of glee at the thought.

"Well," exclaimed Fanny, with her usual impetuosity, "I despise a flirt or a flirtation from my very heart! At first, I disliked Frank Cushman, I own it; I misjudged her; and, latterly, her spells, which Sarah was so eloquent about, have charmed away my dislike. It does not strike me, moreover, that she looks like a victim."

"No, indeed!" cried Sarah, enthusiastically. "Her appearance rather conveys to my mind that her thoughts are far away from the gay scenes around her; she looks chastened and subdued, but not sorrowful. I should say that her spirit was merely waiting for some future happiness—for some great joy, which yet she feels she does not deserve."

One and all laughed at the beautiful visionary.

"My dear, good sister," said Fanny, good-naturedly, "I cannot pretend to follow you through your misty imaginings; I confine myself to common sense, and it is hard enough to get along with that sometimes."

And Sarah smiled—perhaps a little contemptuously—and whispered to herself, as many a young enthusiast has done before, hugging her ideal world still closer, "They cannot understand me; we feel so differently!"

"Who in the world, Frank, would believe that it was the end of March already? The winter has passed so quickly! I wish you would stay the summer out, and go to Newport with us; we shall have such a splendid time!"

Frank lifted her expressive eyes reproachfully.

"Can you press me to stay while Philip waits?"

And Clara laughingly allowed the omnipotence of the apology; only, as she observed—

"It was so intolerably stupid, Frank, for you to love Philip Arden! I wish he had been at the bottom of the Dead Sea, and then you would have married Percy Bryan, and I should have had a sister near me. It is too bad to think that all my family are contented to live away from me! I remember when I was a pet at home."

"Well, of all women, you are the most difficult to please! What in the world could you want more than your husband's love? And did you not leave all for him? Yet now you quarrel with your destiny!"

"Oh no! no! I would not exchange it for worlds!" cried Clara, with a merry laugh. "Harry Hastings for me!"

"And Philip Arden for me!" Frank answered, zealously.

"What in the world are you quarrelling about?" said Mr. Hastings, looking up from his newspaper with a comic grimace.

"Nothing; only Clara is running down her husband," said Frank, demurely.

"Oh, Frank, you scetch! what a story!" cried Clara, with a horrified expression of countenance, kneeling by her husband's side, with her arms about his neck. "Do you believe her?"

And, though he laughingly expressed his entire faith in Frank's statement, she did not cease her caresses; and he forgot, while pressing his lips to his young wife's brow, the "arrival of the steamship Britannia."

Mrs. Hastings gave a farewell party to her sister.

Never, perhaps, parted a beautiful young maiden from a gay and brilliant circle with such perfect delight. Frank was like a stream of light; wherever she moved, the merry laugh rose on the air; wherever she stood, the crowd besieged her.

For once, she had given up to Clara the direction of her dress. What was dress to her now? They might make a complete figure of her, for aught she cared! But Clara knew better; and her attire was the admiration of the room.

Once a flower dropped from her hair, and she ran up into the dressing-room: Fanny and Sarah were there.

"I declare, I never saw you look so beautiful in all my life!" said Fanny, bluntly. "No one would imagine you were suffering from Percy Bryan's fickleness. Pray tell me? Do you feel badly?"

Frank opened her bright eyes. Then she comprehended the whole, and laughed heartily.

"Poor Miss Cushman! how much she is to be pitied!" she said; then, recollecting, with a pang, what Clara had said about Sarah, she spoke gravely, looking, however, at Fanny. "I presume it is quite sufficient to tell you I left my lover in Ohio! I am going back to him."

Fanny stared.

"But Percy Bryan! no woman, who has the slightest regard for her happiness, will marry him! Believe me; I have studied him thoroughly. I know he is talented and fascinating; but there is no strength in his character—in his soul. No one could be happy with him through life, unless weak and heartless. One might for a time, but not lastingly."

She did not once look at Sarah while speaking; but the fair girl grew pale while she listened, and sank into a chair behind her sister.

"Darling! darling!" said Fanny, after Frank had gone, kneeling, and fondly embracing her; "did you hear? Oh, believe her!"

"Yes, yes, I heard!" cried Sarah, convulsively; "and I believe! Sister, I have made a resolution: one can conquer one's self; don't you think so?" looking up appealingly.

"To be sure!" murmured Fanny, stoutly. "There needs but the will; and I know you have got that, sister!"

CHAPTER VII.

"And I said, 'My cousin Amy, speak, and speak the truth to me;

Trust me, cousin, all the current of my being sets to thee!'"

"On her pallid cheek and forehead came a color and a light,

As I have seen the rosy red flushing in the northern night."—TENNYSON.

SHE had been clasped in a mother's embrace, and met fondly a sister's kiss; had wept and smiled by turns, and heard their loving welcomes; and now Frank Cushman stood alone, still in the centre of the room, but with her small hands clasped and her eyes drooping. She well knew the rapid step which sounded in the hall; but she did not raise her head, and her cheek grew blanched from deep emotion.

Philip Arden threw open the door, and rushed towards her; but then he stopped before he had received the wished embrace, frozen with a nameless terror. He remembered her last words: "We shall know, when first our eyes meet, whether the breath of the world hath changed our love."

But she did not look up. Did she fear, then, to show him she was changed?

"Frank," he said, huskily, "is it so?"

Still she bowed her head, growing perceptibly paler.

"Frank, oh, speak!" he continued, hoarsely, with a convulsive spasm about his chiselled lips. "Fear not to look on me; for the worst must be better than this horrid silence."

It did seem as though she tried to obey him; but the full lids might have been marble, so coldly, so immovably they fell over her dark eyes: she passed her small fingers over them once or twice, as though striving to dispel this nightmare rigidity, then gasped painfully.

Instantly he came near her, though with a broken, uneven step. He passed his arm supportingly around her, and her beautiful head sunk upon his shoulder, still with its pale and suffering features, with its drooping lids and long black lashes resting on the wan cheek.

"Be calm, Frank," he whispered; "I forgive you." And he touched with his lips her cold brow.

That touch! Now, at last, her eyes slowly unclosed, and she raised them to those sad ones above her, and in them, though at first he shrank, fearing to know too certainly his misery, he read a tale which sent back the warm blood to his heart, and lent new strength to his nerveless frame.

And over Frank Cushman's face there seemed to steal a light, swiftly and more swiftly lighting up the wild, dark eye, the pale cheek, and marble lips, which were parted now to give utterance to her broken words.

"Oh, Philip, I am true! Look upon me and say—but I am worthless. There was a cloud upon my hopes; I could not look, though I strove to. Oh, it was dreadful—that feeling—that anguish! I feared you would leave me, while I could not raise my eyes; and I thought, 'Must I lose all, when happiness seemed certain, with one so noble and so true?'"

"Dearest, how could you? Oh, faithless!" Philip whispered, fondly.

"I could not help it. I did strive; but the madness, the wildness stole upon me so suddenly; all seemed so vague, so unreal! I knew that you were there, and I so undeserving—but oh, to lose you! And will that not be, after all? Can you still love me when you hear all my weakness?" And Frank, relieved by this brief expression of her feelings, wept freely on his shoulder.

In the soft twilight hour of that day, a happy group once more assembled in the cheerful parlor overlooking the Muskingum. The good, the praying mother was there, peaceful and serene; and Carry, who had protested so loudly against the long visit, which was now accomplished, flitting about restlessly as usual, and smiling whiles upon her sister, who looked so beautiful, so peaceful, so full of repose at last. And beside Frank was Philip, just as handsome, yet not quite so stormy-looking as six months before. Now, his "Spirit had to manhood grown;"

and knowledge had for once brought happiness. What saith the best of books about he who ruleth his own spirit? Frank knew, else she had not smiled so sweetly, so confidingly, upon her chosen husband.

CHAPTER VIII.

"There is a gentle element, and man
May breathe it with a calm, unruffled soul,
And drink its living waters till his heart
Is pure: and this is human happiness."—WILLIS.

"We are not made to wander on the wing!
But, if we would be happy, we must bring
Our buoyant hearts to a plain and simple school."

"FRANK CUSHMAN," cried Carry, rushing into her sister's home, some months later—"Frank Cushman, here is a letter from Clara! Quick, read! mother wants to hear the news, and I'm appointed reporter!"

"My name is not Frank Cushman!" replied her sister, half playfully; yet with a little pride, too, in the new title which she had borne for two whole weeks—the wife of Philip Arden: and the happy wife, the trusting, the respecting wife; for each of these feelings mantled on her glowing cheek and beamed from her expressive eyes.

Carry laughed, and tossed her bonnet aside as she did so.

"I declare, you are so snug, so comfortable here, Frank—Mrs. Arden, I mean—that I could spend the evening, only mother was peremptory. So read, quick, read!"

But Frank was already absorbed in the epistle before her, and nothing could arouse her, save her husband's step upon the gravel-walk before the house.

"Oh, Philip!" she cried, springing to meet him, with the letter in her hand, "only think—poor Percy Bryan! I declare, it is too bad! I almost pity him! See what Clara says!" resigning to his hands the letter she was too modest to read herself. But we will not withhold from our readers the part which concerns our heroines:—

"Well, Frank, I dare say you are happy—of course, I can't disbelieve your protestations: but you know your old cavalier; I am dying to tell you about him! I said he would not break his heart: are you not sorry he did not? You had not been gone a month, before he returned to his former flame: quite desperately, every one said; the more so, that he had a rival, one of the finest men you ever saw—every inch a man, as my loving husband said when he saw him. Well, Frank—don't laugh—but last week poor Percy took another trip to New York; and, what is more pitiable, or amusing, whichever you choose to consider it, people seem to understand much more generally the cause of this second journey! Frank, you were too delicate by half! Not one person in twenty would conceal such an offer as you received. Not that I mean to say Sarah Ashton enlightened the public as to hers; but her sister Fanny proved an excellent reporter. Sometimes I feel disposed to give the folks an inkling of your conquest; but Harry hushes me up, adding an incomparable compliment to your incomparable self.

"I fancy Percy will be somewhat at a discount, if he returns, which is not at all certain. A common man may be refused a dozen times, and no one think the less of him for that; but let one of your starry throng suffer such a désagrément, and he is used up completely.

"Sarah Ashton looks more beautiful than ever, with the health entirely restored, which no one but me ever noticed was injured. So much the better for her prospects, then, which promise brilliantly, with this Boston celebrity at her feet!"

"Poor Percy! are you not sorry that he did not break his heart?" Philip repeated, half seriously, half mischievously, when he had finished reading.

"I ought to be, I know," Frank answered, with equal mischief; "but," and her eye exchanged its sudden sparkle for a look more loving, "somehow, my heart is too full of happiness to admit one sad sentiment." And then she was silent, in her perfect joy, till startled by her merry sister's voice.

"Well, Frank, you make a beautiful tableau, doubtless, you and your bonny husband; but please recollect that it is past seven o'clock, and your mother waiting all this while for news from the wanderer. Dear, but I'm glad, after all, that I'm not married! I'm sure I couldn't sit still so long. Are you not tired to death, Frank?"

LASTING ATTACHMENTS OF MEN OF GENIUS.

No records are more interesting than those which tell of the attachments of men of genius—attachments often suddenly formed, and yet as remarkable for their constancy as for their ferrency. Years may still speed on, but imagination supplies every charm of which they may have robbed the beloved one; the grave may have withdrawn her from other eyes, but still her pure spirit lingers by her lover's side, in the haunts where they so often met.

Love at first sight was exemplified in Raphael. His window overlooked the garden of the adjoining house, and there he saw the lovely girl who amused herself among her flowers; he saw her lave her beautiful feet in the lake; he fell passionately in love. He soon made his feelings known; his love was not rejected, and she became his wife. He is said to have been so passionately enamored of her beauty, that he never could paint if she were not by his side. The lineaments of that fair face still live in some of his sublime productions; and thus while she gave inspiration, he conferred immortality.

Though among poets the most remarkable instances of ardent and enduring attachment may be found, their marriages have not, generally speaking, been happy. Milton failed in securing the felicity of wedded love, which he has so beautifully apostrophized. Neither the home of Dante, nor that of Shakespeare, was one of domestic happiness. Racine's tender sensibility met with no responsive sympathy in his partner; and Moliere experienced all the bitterness of the jealous doubts and misgivings which he has so admirably depicted. Yet the poet is of all, perhaps, the most capable of strong attachments. His warm imagination throws its glow over all that he loves; home, with all its fond associations; "the mother who looked on his childhood; and the bosom friend dearer than all," are so impressed upon his feelings that they mingle with every mood of his fancy. True, some critics, of more ingenuity than judgment, have doubted the real existence of the romantic attachments by which some of the finest poets have been inspired; and endeavor to explain as ingenious allegories the impassioned and pathetic effusions which find their way to every heart. Beatrice—of whom we might have expected better things—sees, in the ardent expressions of Petrarch's devotion to Laura, the aspirations of an ambitious spirit for the laureate-crown; and Dante has been said to have allegorized his energy in the study of theology under the guise of a passion for Beatrice. But the great charm of Dante's poetry is its deep earnestness and truthfulness, and those touches of tenderness which are scattered throughout his sublime work, like the wild flowers of home unexpectedly met with in drear and remote regions; the facts of an imperishable attachment can be traced throughout his whole poetry. It is the custom in Florence for friends, accompanied by their children, to assemble together on the first of May, to celebrate the delightful season. A number of his neighbors had been invited by Folco Portinari to do honor to the day. Dante Alighieri, then a boy of nine years, was among them; young as he was, he was instantly attracted by the loveliness of one amidst the group of children. She was about his own age, the daughter of the host. Through all the vicissitudes of a long and eventful life, that early impression was never effaced—he loved her ever after with an intenseness of passion and unshaken constancy that gave a color to his whole existence—in the various paths of life which he was destined to tread, her image was ever present, inspiring the desire for distinction; their early intercourse, like the sweet May morning on which they had first met, was bright and happy; the purity and artlessness of youth made it so. The young companions of Beatrice rallied her on the devotion of the youthful poet, and the gay sallies with which she herself treated the ardor of his love, only served to make her the more engaging in his eyes. She was induced to bestow her hand elsewhere; more, it has been said, in accordance with duty than inclination; for it is supposed her heart was not insensible to the love of the gifted youth, whose devotion, purity, and intellectuality might have found their way to one harder than hers. Dante fell sick and slowly recovered; whether her marriage was a subject of which he could not bear to think, it is certain that it is not once alluded to in his poetry. Beatrice did not long survive her marriage; within the year she was borne to her grave. The anguish of Dante was so intense, that it brought on a fearful illness, in which his life was long despaired of. Boccaccio mentions that he was so altered by grief that he could scarcely be known. Beatrice occupied all his thoughts; on the anniversary of her death, he sat alone thinking of her, and portraying "an angel on his tablets." The influence which she had over him was as powerful in death as it had been in life—still to be worthy of loving, and of joining one so good and pure beyond the grave was his constant aim; all that he desired in renown, all that he wished for in fame, was to prove himself not undeserving of having devoted himself to her; in the camp—in the highest diplomatic positions, this was his great object in all his trials, and they were many and severe; this inspired him with a lofty dignity, and supported him under insults and injuries which would have broken many a proud spirit; but sublimed above the concerns of earth, his affection was such as might be felt for one translated to a celestial abode. By continually dwelling on but one subject, his mind became utterly estranged from passing events, and he often fell into such fits of abstraction and despondency that his friends, fearing that his reason would be completely upset, anxiously sought to give him some new interest in life, and at length prevailed on him to marry. This made him still more wretched; he could not if he would, detach his mind from dwelling on her who had been his early and his only love, and to all his other misfortunes that of an unhappy marriage was added.

Like the attachment of Dante for Beatrice, that of Petrarch for Laura was the result of a sudden impression; he had hitherto ridiculed the notion of the power of love, but he was yet to experience it in its most extreme intensity. He was twenty-three when he first saw Laura de Sade, then in her twentieth year; he has himself recorded over and over again the exact hour, day, and year; it was at six in the morning on the 6th of April, 1327; it was at the church of Santa Claire at Avignon. Everything connected with that memorable meeting has been dwelt on with fond minuteness by the poet; the dress which she wore, the green robe sprigged with violets; every movement, every look was forever treasured in his memory; the celestial beauty of her countenance bespoke the purity for which she was so remarkable in that age of licentiousness, and in contemplating her loveliness, reverence for virtue mingled with admiration. Petrarch and Laura often met in society, and became intimately acquainted; he was charmed with her conversation; she appears to have been in every way capable of appreciating Petrarch, and deserving of the influence which she possessed over him, which was exerted only to exalt his sentiments and strengthen his principles; though unhappy in her marriage, true to her vows, she preserved all that purity of thought which gave such an unspeakable charm to her beauty. The chivalrous spirit of the age encouraged a devotion to the fair sex, and platonic attachments were the fashion of the day, so that the dignity of Laura was not compromised when Petrarch made her the object of his poetical devotions, and the celebrity which he gained by this homage to her charms may have gratified much better feelings than those of vanity; the faith which she had pledged, though to an unworthy object, she held most sacred; she repressed the feelings of the enthusiastic poet whenever they appeared transgressing the bounds of friendship. Once, when in an unguarded moment he ventured to allude to his passion, the look of indignation with which she regarded him, and the tone in which she said, "I am not the person you take me for," overwhelmed him with shame and sorrow. The hopeless passion, of which he only dared to speak in song—and even the allowed indulgence of thus giving it expression, had a fatal effect; his health gradually declined; he grew pale and thin, and the charming vivacity which had been the delight of his friends utterly forsook him; he estranged himself from the society of his former companions, and was no longer met with in the circles of which he had been the darling. At length he made an effort to conquer feelings that were too powerful to yield, and sought in foreign travel and the pursuit of literature to dissipate the inquietude which was consuming him; but still the image of Laura haunted him through all his wanderings, and inspired that poetry whose purity, fire, and tenderness, have been the admiration of the world. He returned to Avignon, but again fled from the presence which was so dear to him, and sought in the solitudes of Vaucluse, to regain the peace which he was never to find. Shut in from the whole world by the rocks and hills, he found that solitude was "no cure for love;" through that sweet valley, among its shades and by its fountains, he sung the praises of Laura. And thus years passed on. It was during this seclusion that he got Simon Memoni, a pupil of Giotto, to take Laura's likeness. So delighted was the artist with the beautiful subject that the same lovely face was recognised in several of his pictures of saints and angels. On the 24th of August, 1340, Petrarch received two letters, each with an offer of the laurel crown; one from the University of Paris, the other from the Roman Senate; he decided on accepting it from the latter. He valued the honor as the meed of his celebration of Laura; all selfish considerations were lost in the one desire that the lover of Laura should be renowned and distinguished. The feelings with which Laura must have heard of the honors paid to the one so long and so devotedly attached to her have not been described, but they may be conceived. Thirteen years had now passed since they had first seen each other. When Petrarch and Laura met, time and care had wrought their changes in both. Petrarch's looks were already sprinkled with gray, and the animation of his countenance was saddened by sorrow; the bloom of girlhood had passed from Laura, and the traces of melancholy which an unhappy lot had left were but too visible; but all the tenderness and sympathy of other days remained. The jealous disposition of M. de Sade prevented Petrarch's being received at his house, but they often met and conversed together; and Laura would sing for him those songs to which he had so often delighted to listen; there was a tender sympathy in this intercourse, soothing to both. Petrarch's allusion to their last meeting is very affecting; he found her, as he describes, in the midst of a circle of ladies; her whole air betokened dejection, and the sorrowful look with which she regarded him, and which seemed to him to say, "Who takes my faithful friend from me?" made an indelible impression on him—his heart sank within him; and they seemed to feel at that sad moment that they were to meet no more. In the following year the plague broke out; Petrarch, who was at Parma, heard that it had reached Avignon; he was haunted by the recollection of the last moments that he had passed with Laura; it seemed to him as if the hand of death had been on her already. The most cruel forebodings tortured him by day and by night; his dreams represented her as dying or dead.

The dreaded news reached him—Laura was dead! An attack of the plague had carried her off in three days; she had died on the anniversary of that day on which they had first met. In all the bitterness of his grief, he recalled all that had passed at their last meeting; the melancholy solemnity of her adieu seemed to his memory as that of one on the confines of eternity; every kind word she had ever spoken, every kind look she had ever given, was dwelt on with passionate fondness; and the hope, the belief, that he had been dear to her was the only thing which could soothe. His dreams previously to her death appeared to his imagination mysteriously linked with that event; he has most touchingly described one of these visions, when he believed her pure spirit was permitted to visit and comfort him. His pathetic lamentations were heard throughout the world with the deepest sympathy, and wrung the heart of many a one who had in happier days shared "sweet counsel" with him.

The misfortunes of Torquato Tasso commenced in his early childhood; he was but eleven years old when political events obliged his father to quit Naples, and seek refuge in Rome. It had been settled that Torquato should follow him. The banishment from home, and from a mother on whom he doted, were sad trials. Some lines of touching tenderness commemorate the parting, and show how bitterly it was felt. They were never to meet again; in eighteen months after they parted she died. He was indeed a child that must have been regarded with the fondest tenderness and pride. To wonderful acquirements for his age, were added what can never be acquired—a feeling heart, and poetical genius of the highest order, which in all his wanderings, in all his trials, had magic influence to charm a world which had nothing but misfortune for him. His mother best knew how much his sensitive nature required the tranquillity of a home, and the sympathy and endearments of those who loved him. But his lot was to be cast among strangers, and some among them proved implacable enemies. A life of stranger vicissitudes is scarcely to be met with; sometimes courted and caressed, the companion of princes; at other times wandering in almost extremity of want; inspired by a sacred love of liberty, yet condemned to long years of the saddest captivity; with charms and graces to win the love of the fairest and the best, yet destined to feel all the pangs of a hopeless passion! A being more to be admired and more to be pitied than Tasso surely never existed. He was but twenty, when he received the most flattering office of employment from Cardinal Luizi d'Este, brother to the Duke of Ferrara, who was anxious to secure the services of one possessed of such genius. Though a connection with the D'Este family opened a brilliant prospect for a young man, yet the friends of Tasso, dreading for him the dangers of a court, endeavored to persuade him to decline the proposal; but it was too flattering to be refused, and he hastened to Ferrara, in compliance with the Cardinal's wish, who received him with every mark of distinction, and on occasion of his being appointed legate to France, introduced him at the French court, where he was received in the most flattering manner by Charles the Ninth, who was a warm admirer of his poetry. At Ferrara, Tasso became acquainted with the sisters of the Duke, who, intellectual and accomplished, could appreciate the gifted poet. His hours passed delightfully in their society. He has described the effect of his first interview with these fascinating ladies, in a rhapsody given to Tirsi, the character meant to represent himself in his "Aminta," in which the terms of goddesses, sirens, nymphs, minstrels, and luminaries are liberally bestowed, and show at least that the young poet was intoxicated with delight in their presence. On their parts they enthusiastically admired him and his poetry. But there was one among them eminently attractive, whom he soon loved with all the passionate earnestness of which his ardent feelings were susceptible. Many of Tasso's biographers say that she was not insensible to the varied graces of the youth; in truth, his personal advantages, his rare accomplishments, and, above all, the enthusiasm of genius, so captivating and so winning, made him a dangerous companion for the young princesses.

Leonora was the youngest of the three sisters, and just nineteen when she and Tasso met. The princesses interested the Duke of Ferrara in his favor, and he appointed him to a situation in which he was exempt from duty, that he might devote himself exclusively to poetry. There was a handsome salary annexed, and apartments in the ducal palace. An inmate under the same roof with Leonora, the predilection which the young people felt for each other could not but increase. Confessions and vows may have passed between them, or Leonora's heart may have kept its own secret; the delicacy of Tasso's affection is clearly proved by the mystery which rests on those passages of his life in which she was concerned; for while allusions expressed with infinite tenderness, found throughout his poetry, discover the state of his own feelings, there is not one word which can furnish a suggestion relative to hers. He had ventured, in accordance with the custom of the times, to celebrate her praises in verse; this, or some other circumstance, awakened the suspicions of the Duke; the intercourse of Tasso with the princesses was abruptly terminated, and they were not suffered to meet. The duke, to put an end to any vague hopes which he might entertain, pressed Tasso to marry, and suitable matches were proposed and declined. He withdrew for some time to Rome; on his return he felt that he was incessantly watched, and his sensitive nature could ill brook the want of confidence which this betrayed, and he left Ferrara again and again, wandering, while absent, reckless and restless, from place to place; and then, impelled by his passion for Leo-nora, he would return, notwithstanding all his resolutions to the contrary, and regardless of the suspicions and machinations of the duke. His melancholy increased, and his imagination continually represented that plots and designs against him were in agitation; he became irritable, and one day, in a fit of excitement, drew his dagger on one of the attendants; but he was instantly disarmed, and was confined, by order of the duke, within the precincts of the palace—he was, in fact, a prisoner; but on expressing the regret which he felt for the intemperate act, the restraint was removed, and the duke affected to treat him with his former kindness; but Tasso's feelings were too quick to be deceived; he felt that he was the object of the duke's dislike and displeasure. Unhappy and irresolute, he sometimes wished to retire to a convent for the remainder of his life; but thoughts of his early home and happy days would often recur to his mind, and he longed to see his sister, the companion of his childhood, whom he had not met for years; and he resolved to leave Ferrara secretly, and find his way to her. His sister was a widow, living at Torrento with her two children. One evening in the summer, as she sat alone, having sent the children out to amuse themselves, a shepherd brought a letter, which he had been directed to put into her hand—it was from Tasso, and told that he was in the midst of enemies and dangers at Ferrara, and that, unless she could devise some means to save him, his death was inevitable. She questioned the messenger; his recital confirmed the intelligence, and represented the misery to which her brother was reduced in such terms, that, overcome with anguish, the lady fainted away. When she revived, Tasso discovered himself, and in those moments of affectionate recognition, he told her that he would never leave her for a world of which he had had too much; but his resolves were of short duration; Ferrara and its attraction could not be withstood. It was on the occasion of one of his returns from his restless wandering that he saw Leonora; the surprise and delight of being again in her presence were so great that he uttered an impassioned exclamation; this gave the duke the pretext for consigning him to St. Anne's Asylum for Lunatics. "None but a madman would dare to act so!" was repeated over again. So hardly was poor Tasso dealt with for having indulged a hopeless, and it may have been an unrequited passion. At that time, and for very long after, the insane were treated as if they were not human beings, and the receptacles for them were under no regulations but those of caprice and cruelty. Tasso gives a most appalling account of his sufferings to his friend Gonzaga; it ends with these affecting words: "Above all, I am afflicted by solitude, my cruel and natural enemy, which even in my best state was sometimes so distressing that often, at the most unseasonable hours, I have gone in search of company. Sure I am, that if she who so little has corresponded to my attachment, if she saw me in such a condition, and in such misery, she would have some compassion on me!"

Even this abode of wretchedness could not extinguish his poetic fire, and from his solitary cell poems of surpassing beauty found their way to the world from which he was utterly shut out; they were read in every circle, and the genius of the author extolled; but his misfortunes found no helping hand for seven long years: at length, through the intervention of his friend Gonzaga, he was released. During his confinement Leonora had died: sorrow and sympathy may have had their share in bringing her to an untimely grave. Cruelty had done its part; the young and beautiful sunk beneath its weight, and the gifted mind had received a shock from which it never after thoroughly recovered. Tasso left Ferrara never to return; like the troubled spirit, he could find rest nowhere; but at length he took up his abode at Naples; his mother's property, which had long been unjustly withheld from him, was restored. The beauties of nature please when nothing else can, and they may not have been without their gentle influence on the stricken heart; but the haunts of childhood must have been mournfully contrasted with the dark scenes of after days. Tasso received an intimation from the pope, that a decree had passed the senate, awarding the laurel crown to "the greatest poet of the age;" "the honor," added the pope, "is to the laurel, and not to Tasso." Tasso accepted the honor with deep melancholy, and left Naples with a foreboding that he should see it no more. Though affliction had not extinguished a spark of poetic fire, it had not left a vestige of ambition; those that would most have delighted in his fame, and taken pride in his triumph, were in their graves, and he longed to be with them. The most gorgeous preparations were in progress, not only in the palace and capital, but in every street through which the procession was to pass. Tasso, with a prophetic spirit, declared the preparations were vain. Affliction, and his long confinement, had anticipated the work of years—the infirmities and languor of old age had overtaken him before their time; he fell ill—medical aid was unavailing—he was apprised of the approach of his last moments; he received the intimation with perfect calmness—all earthly concerns were lost in heavenly contemplations, and the only crown to which he aspired was that unfading crown which awaits the blessed in heaven.

The crowds were still collecting—fresh flowers were gathered to weave into the garlands that were to deck his triumph; but ere they had faded away the poet was dead!

HOME EXERCISES.

We only repeat an established truism, familiar to us all, when we say that there is nothing which conduces so much to the health and consequent happiness of our fair friends as moderate exercise, or voluntary labor. We very naturally compassionate the condition of those who are compelled to work at some sedentary occupation from "early dawn" to the mid-watch of the night, for a mere subsistence, shut in from the freshness and healthfulness of the morning and evening breeze; from the brightness of the sun, and, at this season of the year, from the enchanting loveliness of nature. And yet, we can scarcely feel less compassion for those who voluntarily fall into idle, listless, and enervating habits, which not only destroy the buoyancy and elasticity of the mind, but absolutely deform the beauty and paralyze the energies of the body.

However unfashionable the sentiment may appear to some of our more than usually romantic and fastidious readers, we shall not hesitate to confess the fact, that we seldom meet with a more agreeable sight on a bright sunny morning, as we trudge to our daily labor through a fashionable part of the city, than to behold the daughters of some of our opulent citizens dusting the sills of the windows, brush in hand, or, with broom in hand, sweeping the hall or parlor carpet. There is that in the bright eyes, and in the rosy flush of their cheeks, as they sparkle and bloom from beneath the closely drawn bonnet or hood, which to us are irresistible evidences of health and cheerfulness. There is something, indeed, in such a sight, not merely encouraging on account of the assurances it gives of the practical wisdom which pervades the whole family circle—the assurance that industry, comfort, peace, dignity, and purity of mind reign over all within the little republic—but it also affords us some assurance, amidst the prevailing strife for riches and aristocratic glory, of the perpetuity of all our great, yet simple republican institutions.

But besides a class of fashionables who may not choose to take regular exercise at the brush or broom handle, there is another unhappy class, the members of which, either through ignorance of, or inattention to the requirements of their bodies, or through forced mental labor while yet in their childhood, have in fact lost the muscular power to apply themselves to such voluntary labor as we have been describing. To both these classes, with whose necessities, infirmities, and prejudices we have been made somewhat familiar, we propose to recommend for their consideration, and for their adoption, should they follow our advice, a series of practical exercises which, we verily believe, will have the most beneficial effects on their systems, whether diseased, deformed, or simply suffering from the absence of those physical energies, and that buoyancy of spirit, which exercise scarcely ever fails to reproduce in those who apply themselves to it prudently, in time, and with a will.

The annexed figures are Nos. 1 and 2 of a series, by means of which we shall endeavor to illustrate to our readers the use of an instrument formed of two elastic bands, which is furnished with a hook and handle, or a catch, and can be fixed upon any object, either in or out of doors, and be at once ready for use without delay, such as the corner of a table, the handle or frame of a door, window-sill, or bed-post. The hook acts somewhat in the manner of a "claw," or pair of "dogs," viz.: the greater the strain the firmer the hold, and out of doors can be attached to the top of a wall, railing, or branch of a tree. The exercises to be performed by it are varied, numerous, entertaining, and exciting. They may be increased to upwards of two hundred, and have been recognized in England, where the instrument was first introduced, as the most conducive towards the full development of the bodily frame, and the increase of muscular power.

In the future illustrations of this subject, we shall avail ourselves of the opportunity which will be afforded of impressing upon our readers not merely the importance of the exercises it embraces, to the healthy, but to those who are laboring under diseases of the chest and spine. The information in relation to the origin and formation of such diseases will be drawn from unquestionable authority, and will be interesting to parents as furnishing the means of prevention, as well as affording to the afflicted the most probable means of relief, if not of cure.

OUR TALENTS.

BY HADDIE LANE.

MANY a smiling face grew sorrowful, and many a bright eye filled with tears, as the little band of school-girls assembled for the last time in the old school-room at Woodside. It was a beautiful evening in June; the gentle breeze wafted through the open window the perfume of thousands of flowers, and seemed, as it played with their sunny curls, to woo those fair maidens out on the scented lawn and into the balmy air which it was such luxury to breathe.

What charm could there be in that dark, low school-room, with its long rows of dusty desks, and quaint, three-legged stools, its sombre blackboards and frowning maps! The fair earth was smiling around them, glad voices were calling from without, and yet those young girls lingered there, silently and tearfully. And well might they twine their arms around each other; well might they cling to that dear old room, for,

"The morrow brings their parting,
And they may not meet again."

It was their last day at school. Hitherto they had been petted and cherished, and, though their school life had had its showers, it had also its brilliant rainbows and glowing sunshine. Now they were to go forth into the world, to think for themselves, to act for themselves, to be judged by themselves; and what wonder if they shrank from the dim future with timid hearts, and longed to be children again! Some there were, indeed, who had been building gorgeous castles, and picturing to themselves bright visions of womanhood; but even these forgot their gay dreams in the sad reality of the last day at school.

In the midst of the little group sat a lady in the meridian of life. Her sable dress and widow's cap betokened that she had seen sorrow; but there was such a sweet expression in her placid face, such a motherly look about her, that you would never in the world imagine her to be a schoolmistress. And in reality she was not a schoolmistress to the little group around her, not one among them ever thought of her as such. No, she was the dear "Aunt Susan," who soothed their troubles and shared their joys, their confidante in many a girlish freak, and their idolized teacher, not only from books, but in the wiser and better lore they gathered from the gay birds, the smiling flowers, and from their own young hearts.

On this evening, Aunt Susan had been talking to them even more earnestly and seriously than was her wont. She had been telling them of woman's high and holy duties, of her numerous and glorious rights, and she was urging them never to let the cares or the vanities of the world steal into their hearts, but to keep them forever bright and pure, and dedicate to their "Father in heaven." She told them of the "talents" which that Father had bestowed upon them all, and warned them not to suffer them to rust or tarnish.

"Oh! Aunt Susan," cried Fanny Wilmer, a merry hoyden of sixteen, "do tell each of us what our talents are; I am sure I don't know what has become of mine, if I ever had any. I guess I was forgotten in the general giving out."

"Your own hearts will tell you all, if you ponder a moment; but since some of you, like Fanny here, seem never to have thought of such things, I will remind you of them. I will begin with Fanny, as she is the youngest among you. Your talent, my Fanny, is your wit. Happily for you, as yet it has been exercised only in funny speeches and good-humored rallying with your schoolmates; but when you go out into the world—I tremble for you, my Fanny. Your sparkling sayings and brilliant repartees will doubtless make you admired and flattered in the gay circle among which you will move, and you will be able to give the tone to that conversation in which you are so capable of shining. I implore you, Fanny, to keep that bright talent of yours unsullied. Ridicule the follies of your friends, if you will, but their weaknesses or deformities never. Above all, never employ your wit in ridicule of sacred things; never turn the gift against the Giver. Though it may appear pleasant, as it is so easy to let fall the bitter sarcasm or the sharp retort, remember, that if you will toy with the bright, edged tools, you must not expect to escape unscathed. And now, Fanny, a word as to the improvement of your talent. You have a gift which will enable you to cast sunshine on many a dark and dreary path, and to brighten many a gloomy day. You can chase care from many a loved one's brow, and can strengthen many a fainting heart by your cheering, happy words. Yes, Fanny, it is in your power to become either a universal blessing, or that dreaded and hated being, a female satirist.

There was a pause. The gay, light-hearted girl, subdued into silence by Aunt Susan's solemn manner and still more solemn words, drew a deep breath, as if half frightened at the thought of the good and evil destinies which waited her decision.

"And what is my talent?" said a silvery voice; and a little head, half hidden by a shower of golden ringlets, was laid caressingly on Aunt Susan's shoulder. Very beautiful indeed was Lizzie Randolph, and very fascinating, too. Though all accused her of vanity, and not a few of downright conceit, yet when she looked into your face with her bewitching blue eyes, or pressed her rosy lips to yours, it was impossible to refuse anything she asked. There was a spice of vanity in the question, for all knew that in mental or moral endowments, poor Lizzie was sadly lacking.

"Your glass has told you, Lizzie," Aunt Susan calmly replied, "if your flatterers have not, that you have the gift of beauty—a dangerous gift, Lizzie. I see in you the future belle of the ballroom, courted, caressed, and almost idolized. You will doubtless have crowds of sighing lovers at your feet, before your first winter in society is over. But, Lizzie, beauty fades. Improve your talent, then, while it is yet in your power. The acknowledged queen of the festival, what an influence will be yours. A smile from you will work many a mighty spell; a word from your lips may accomplish that which hours of patient pleading and volumes of sober reasoning may have failed to do. The sparkling wine-cup, when proffered by your fair hand, could hardly be refused; and few causes but must triumph, if you be their leader. See, then, Lizzie, that the causes be righteous. Never suffer any one to come within the circle of your magic influence, without rendering him a nobler, wiser, and better man. Lizzie, you must answer at a solemn tribunal, whether your talent has been employed in rendering men holier and happier, or sinking them deeper in dissipation and crime; whether it has led them to heaven or plunged them into perdition."

Lizzie's tears were falling fast as Aunt Susan ended, for, that very morning, she had been telling of the conquests she would make and the hearts she would break when she made her début in the gay world; and here was a masterly sketch for her of the good or evil she was to work therein.

"I need hardly remind you, Helen," Aunt Susan continued, "of the nature of your talent."

Helen Ashley, a grave plain girl in the deepest mourning, bowed her head in reply. She was an orphan, without one friend in the wide world. Her guardian, who had the absolute control of her immense wealth, was a cold-hearted, selfish man, whose whole soul seemed to be absorbed in the pursuit of money. Helen Ashley had never known a mother's gentle influence, or a father's kindly kiss; and what wonder that she was cold and sad, and deemed all the kindly attentions of her schoolmates were paid to her wealth alone. Her early misfortunes had cast a gloom over her spirit; she shrank from society, and always looked on the darkest side of the picture; as Aunt Susan used to say, "Helen always saw things through a thick black veil." Generous she was to a fault, but too often when her hand was giving the gold, her heart was far away.

As Aunt Susan spoke, Helen drew her chair still farther from the little circle, and listened in haughty silence. A slight shade crossed Aunt Susan's brow at this determined frigidity, but she went on:—

"I fear, my dear Helen, you look upon your wealth rather as a burden than a talent; but such it is, and it depends upon yourself alone whether it be rendered a curse or a blessing to yourself and all around you. You are proud, Helen, sadly proud, and as the sole representative of the Ashleys, will soon deem it incumbent upon you to support that name with all due honors. You care not how your money goes, so that you are not troubled with it, nor brought into too close contact with your fellow-beings; and your cold heart will doubtless be better pleased with lavishing thousands on a jewel, than by giving one hour's attention to the wants or sufferings of a poor family. But, Helen, this is all wrong: You were not placed in this world, dowered with immense wealth and gifted with a warm heart to aid you in dispensing it, for no other purpose than to shut yourself up in a closet, to crush every glowing impulse of sympathy and affection, and to squander your gold in pomp and luxury. No, Helen, your heart is not your own, your wealth is not your own; the one should beat true to God and man, the other be recognised as God's gift, through you, to man. Think on it, Helen," Aunt Susan proceeded more gayly, "think what it is to be a 'Lady Bountiful,' to have the blessings of the widow and orphan resting upon your head; to bring sunshine and glee into the dwellings that poverty had darkened; to see the careworn countenance light up with smiles at your approach; these are boons a monarch might envy. Perchance this is not your ambition. Certainly your pride would be more gratified were you mistress of a superb mansion, your table groaning 'neath the Ashley plate, and your carriage scutcheoned with the Ashley arms, and you yourself much more at your ease in a magnificent library, revelling in ancient lore, with not a footfall to break the silence, not a voice to remind you that you are a dweller of the world—a world of sin and suffering, it is true, but still a world watched over and cared for by God, and peopled with his creatures—but look beyond, Helen, to a time when the Ashley arms will cease to give you pleasure, and the luxurious carriage cease; when your lordly library will be as a sealed book to your dimmed and aching eye; when you will be dependent upon your hated fellow-beings for the attentions that smooth your dying pillow. Then, Helen, if not till then, will you see the whole folly and misery of the life you lead. Then will the torturing thoughts of a lifetime wasted, a heart neglected, a world despised, and a Maker forgotten, crowd your brain. 'Tis a sad picture, Helen, and, I trust, not a true one. May your dying hour, when it does come, be sweetened with the memory of the good you have done; may friends, real friends, surround your pillow; and may your happy spirit take its flight to its Redeemer, and lay at his feet the talent intrusted to your care!"

All who heard Aunt Susan's solemn appeal were in tears—all save one, and that one was Helen Ashley. She sat erect, as cold and still as before; but the heaving of her bosom and the restless glances of her eyes betokened that she had not heard those fearful words unmoved. At length she rose and said, in a voice tremulous with emotion, "I wish, how I wish, I was poor!" As she hastily quitted the room, a light figure darted in through the window, just in time to hear the concluding words.

"Poor! Who is talking about poverty? I defy any one to show a purse as empty as mine," was the merry greeting of Carrie Carleton. "Here I've been racing up stairs and down, through wood and lawn, over creek and mud puddle, in search of you all, and I am fairly tired out."

As she threw herself upon the floor at Aunt Susan's feet, her cheek flushed and bosom panting with the exercise, a gentle hand was laid on her disordered ringlets, and a mild voice said—

"We were talking of our talents, Carrie, and I would have you be chary of yours, and not take such long walks or use such violent exercise."

"My talent!" said the almost breathless girl, looking with surprise at the sad faces of her schoolmates.

"Yes, dearie, the exuberant health which God has bestowed upon you. You are one of the favored ones, Carrie; you have never known an hour's sickness, and laugh in derision alike at the headache and the horrors. You are always in a good-humor, because you have never known the temptation to be cross, which an aching brow or a wearied frame presents. You live always in the sunshine, for you have never had the hand of disease or pain laid heavy upon you, to dull your spirits and embitter your temper. Guard your health, then, Carrie, as a precious jewel, for now it is in your own keeping. As a school-girl, our simple fare and early hours have preserved your talent in its purity; but you are a school-girl no longer. I warn you, Carrie, that, in the gay society you will soon enter, a year, a single year of dissipation, will deprive you of your jewel forever. Blooming cheeks and buoyant spirits are incompatible with midnight revels; bright eyes will grow dim when they open only to candle-light; and pure, fragrant breath will grow labored when drawn in a crowded, heated atmosphere. A single year may convert our joyous Carrie Carleton, with her bright face, light footstep, and merry laugh, into a haggard, worn, and almost old woman; her movements languid, her roses artificial, and her very laughter forced. A single year may find our Carrie a drooping invalid, her cheek wearing the hectic flush, her frame racked with a convulsive cough—and may leave her in her grave.

"But that is not the lot I anticipate for you, my Carrie," Aunt Susan went on, as she noticed the startling effect her words had caused; "no, it is a brighter and far different picture I love to look upon. You often talk, Carrie, of your invalid brother; of his weary nights and days of anguish; of his petulance and odd fancies. Now you are the nurse nature has designed for him; your healthy frame can endure nights of watching and days of patient care. You can move through his sick room like a ministering angel, supporting him with your strong arm, and cheering him by your happy words, until he will forget his suffering and his impatience and bless the Heaven that has given him such a sister. The sick room, Carrie, is woman's appropriate field of action; there she is perfectly at home. Her gentle attentions are necessary to the invalid, and if his sickness be 'unto death,' her whispered words of hope and faith will quickest reach his ear. You, Carrie, are eminently fitted for this most onerous and yet dearest of woman's duties. You have a constitution which smiles at fatigue, and a bright, cheerful spirit. You will be unwearied as a watcher, and a perfect magician when low spirits are concerned; they will flee at the glad sounds of your voice; and oh, Carrie, may that voice also be employed in leading the sufferers to their Saviour, in telling of God's bounteous gifts and wondrous mercies!

"Should poverty come nigh your dwelling and your loved ones, then again your 'talent' will be in requisition. With your strong arm you could drive the demon away, and cheer with your smiles your humble abode. And if it comes not to yourself, remember that thousands of your fellows are bowed down to the earth by its curse, and let yours be the hand to relieve them. You can trudge through snow and rain on an errand of mercy, and your words of cheer will work a mightier charm than your gold. Carrie, Carrie, keep your talent well."

A perfect contrast to the joyous face and blooming figure of Carrie Carleton, was the girl on whose lap she leaned her arm. Mary Lee was a dark, sallow little creature, without beauty, genius, or any of the gifts of her more brilliant companions. A disease of the spine had stunted her growth, though it had not deformed her figure; and her sufferings had made her gentle and mild as Aunt Susan herself. Her large brown eyes had something startling in their expression; you were fascinated while you gazed; and these eyes were now fixed upon Aunt Susan's face, as though to read her thoughts.

"They tell me, Mary," said Aunt Susan, smiling, "that you are the father confessor here, and therein they have pointed out to me your 'talent.' There is something very winning about you, I own, and you steal our secrets ere we are aware. You seem so gentle, so quiet, that we regard you as a second self, and talk to you accordingly. There are few among you, girls, but have confided in Mary Lee, when you would have suffered any penance, any privation, rather than intrust your secrets to another. Your talent, Mary, is your influence. All who ask your counsel, follow it implicitly, and a few words of your sweet, low voice will work a mightier spell than volumes of reproof, or weeks of punishment. Even when you speak not, your actions tell, and loudly too. Your sway in our hearts is so gentle, we dream not you are ruling us, and submit as though you were born our queen. And it will be ever thus, Mary, unless you learn to speak loud. Even then, you love so to get people into corners, that you always make them confidential.

"Yours is a glorious talent, for there will be secrets told you which had been whispered only to the stars; plans will be unfolded for your approbation, which had long lain hidden in the depths of the dreamer's soul; and the hopes and aspirations of dawning womanhood will be told to your ear alone, while the maiden blushes at revealing thoughts she heretofore deemed so delicate and sacred. Yours is a mighty influence; see that you use it well. To you they come for approbation and advice: let it be given wisely. The triumphant coquette may perchance seek your 'corner' to tell you how wretched she is, though crowds are sighing at her feet; how dissatisfied she is, though her glass reflects a perfect form and face, and her diary tells of countless lovers, ready to die at her behest. One word of yours may pierce the ice which long years of flattery and folly have bound round her heart, and send her on her way, an humbler and sadder being; one of your long talks might make her a devoted Christian.

"The skeptic, too, may be beguiled by your sweet tones, and take a seat at your side. He may unfold to you his doubts and fears, and you, mighty in the cause of truth, will have strength vouchsafed you to combat and overthrow them. You may soften his flinty heart, and lead him, a devout follower, to the feet of the meek and lowly Jesus. Even though you may not give him argument for argument, and meet his sophistry with words from the book of truth, your actions, even your silence, may go far to convince him.

"Twere small need, methinks, to caution you against tarnishing your talent, against evil influence; but I warn you, and indeed all of you, my children, to be upon your guard. A smile, a look, is all-sufficient. Our influence is a fearful talent, which all of our sex possess. May it ever be exerted to purify and exalt our fellows, and may we all act and speak so as to remind men of the great eternity whither we are tending, to be spent in bliss or misery; and may naught but good influence be laid to our charge at the great day!"

"And my talent, Aunt Susan," said a quiet voice in the corner; "I am not dowered with Helen's wealth, or Lizzie's beauty; I have neither Fanny's wit, nor Mary's influence; what can my talent be?"

The speaker was an orphan, a recipient of Aunt Susan's bounty. She was a plain quiet girl, very plodding, but not overly bright. Still, everybody loved Anne Allen, for she was one of the most obliging creatures that ever breathed. Nothing was too much trouble for her, if it could give pleasure to the smallest or feeblest of God's creatures; and all the little ones called her their "dear dood Anne."

"You have drawn rather a forlorn picture of yourself, Anne," Aunt Susan replied; "but your talent, though not quite as showy, is as useful and precious as the others. You are alone in the world, Anne, and your talent is your time. There have been no claims upon it as yet, save the trifling offices your schoolmates have required at your hands. Now it is at your own disposal, and it rests with you to spend the long life which I trust is before you, in the service of its Giver, or in violation of his express commands. There is many a noble deed to be wrought, many a glorious triumph to be won, before this world shall pass away, and with the thousand voices calling within and around you, can you sit down with folded hands? Is your time, your precious talent, to be frittered away in idleness or pleasure, when there is so much work to be done, and you so fit to do it? I would fain see you a missionary, Anne, for you have no tender ties to sever when you part from your native land. You long for sisters and friends: among the destitute heathen you may find them. Would that you would devote yourself, body, soul, and spirit, to those that sit in darkness! A lifetime could not be more gloriously dedicated, nor a talent better employed. Your patience and energy are grand qualifications for a missionary, and, Anne Allen, a missionary you should be. Imagine for one moment your earthly pilgrimage over, and your beatified spirit, surrounded by the souls it had rescued from destruction, at the awful bar of God. At that moment, if you could, which would you choose, a life of pleasure, gayety, or indolence, or one spent in toiling, suffering, though always in rejoicing, over the good you have wrought in the land and the hearts of the heathen."

There remained but one in that little band with her talent untold, but it needed not the telling. You could read upon her high, broad brow, and in the flash of her dark blue eye, that she had the gift of genius. Catharine Sunderland was a poetess, and that of no mean order. Her brilliant talents had long made her the idol of her teachers and the "headman" among her schoolmates; but these were distinctions she cared not for. She loved to roam the woods, portfolio in hand, and pen down the bright thoughts as they crowded into her brain; and she had acquired the sobriquet of "Corinne" from her talents as an improvisatrice. She smiled faintly and proudly as Aunt Susan's eye rested upon her.

"Well, 'Corinne,'" the good lady began, "you are the last, I see, and had I chosen your talent for a climax, I could not have found a happier one. You are public property, Kate—at least you will be in a year or two—and it were well to reflect a moment ere your character is established in the literary world. You are writing not for a month or a year, but for eternity. You are writing not for yourself or for a chosen few, but for the world. Pause, then, over each brilliant effusion, with the question, 'Will this piece of mine make any one happy or wretched? will it be arrayed on the side of virtue, or on that of vice? and more, does it give God the glory?'

"Yes, pause, Kate Sunderland; a magic rod is in your hand; will you wield it for weal or woe? Shall your talent be kept pure and holy in the service of its Giver, or shall it, like the notes of a siren, lure men to death with its singing?

"And now, my dearest children, my sermon is over. To-morrow we must part; and though we may never meet again on earth, when we come before the judgment-seat, may I hear the words addressed to each and all of you, 'Well done, thou good and faithful servant; thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things; enter thou into the joy of thy Lord.'"

HISTORY OF BOOTS AND SHOES. ✓

No. I.—ON THE MOST ANCIENT COVERING FOR THE FEET

If we investigate the monuments of the remotest nations of antiquity, we shall find that the earliest form of protection for the feet partook of the nature of sandals. The most ancient representations we possess of scenes in ordinary life are the sculptures and paintings of early Egypt, and these the investigations of travelled scholars from most modern civilized countries have, by their descriptions and delineations, made familiar to us, so that the habits and manners, as well as the costume of this ancient people, have been handed down to the present time, by the work of their own hands, with so vivid a truthfulness, that we feel as conversant with their domestic manners and customs as with those of any modern nation to which the book of the traveller would introduce us. Not only do their pictured relics remain to give us an insight into their mode of life, but a vast quantity of articles of all kinds, from the tools of the workmen to the elegant fabrics which once decorated the boudoir of the fair ladies of Memphis and Carnae three thousand years ago, are treasured up in the museums of various countries.

With these materials, it is in no wise difficult to carry our history of shoemaking back to the earliest times, and even to look upon the shoemaker at his work in the early days of Thotmes the Third, who ascended the throne of Egypt, according to Wilkinson, 1495 years before Christ, and during whose reign the Exodus of the Israelites occurred. The first of our engravings contain copies of this very curious painting as it existed upon the walls of Thebes, when the Italian scholar Rossellini copied it for his great work on Egypt. The shoemakers are both seated upon low stools—(real specimens of such articles may be seen in the British Museum, London)—and are both busily employed in the formation of the sandals then usually worn in Egypt; the first workman is piercing with his awl the leather thong, at the side of the sole, through which the straps were passed which secured the sandal to the foot; before him is a low sloping bench, one end of which rests upon the ground: his fellow-workman is equally busy sewing a shoe, and tightening the thong with his teeth, a primitive mode of working which is occasionally indulged in at the present day. The tools and manufactured sandals lie around, and are here represented: they bear, in some instances, a resemblance to those used in the present day; the central instrument having the precise shape of the shoemaker's awl still in use, so very unchanging are articles of utility. In the same manner, the semicircular knife used by the ancient Egyptians between three and four thousand years ago, is precisely similar to that of our modern curriers, and is thus represented in a painting at Thebes of that remote antiquity. The workman, it will be noticed, cuts the leather upon a sloping bench, exactly like that of the shoemaker already engraved.

The warmth and mildness of the East rendered a close, warm shoe unnecessary ; and, indeed, in the present day they partake there more of the character of slippers, and the foot, thus unconfined by tight shoes, and always free in its motion, retains its full power and pliability ; and the custom still retained in the East, of holding a strap of leather or other substance between the toes, is represented in the Theban paintings ; the foot thus becoming a useful second to the hand.

Many specimens of the shoes and sandals of the ancient Egyptians may also be seen in the British Museum. Wilkinson, in his work on the "Manners and Customs" of this people, says, "Ladies and men of rank paid great attention to the beauty of their sandals; but, on some occasions, those of the middle classes who were in the habit of wearing them preferred walking barefooted; and in religious ceremonies, the priests frequently took them off while performing their duties in the Temple."

• The sandals varied slightly in form; those worn by the upper classes, and by women, were usually pointed and turned up at the end, like our skates and the Eastern slippers of the present day. Some had a sharp, flat point; others were nearly round. They were made of a sort of woven or interlaced work, of palm-leaves and papyrus stalks, or other similar materials; sometimes of leather, and were frequently lined within with cloth, on which the figure of a captive was painted: that humiliating position being thought suitable to the enemies of their country, whom they hated and despised, an idea agreeing perfectly with the expression which so often occurs in the hieroglyphic legends accompanying a king's name, where his valor and virtues are recorded on the sculptures—"You have trodden the impure Gentiles under your powerful feet."

The example selected for Fig. 1 is in the British Museum, beneath the sandal of a mummy of Har-sontiotf; and the captive figure is evidently, from feature and costume, a Jew : it thus becomes a curious illustration of Scripture history. Figs. 2 and 3 delineate two fine examples of sandals formed, as above described, of the leaf of the palm; they were brought from Egypt by the late Mr. Salt, consul general, and formed part of the collection sold in London, after his death, and are now in the British Museum. They are very different from each other in their construction, and are of that kind worn by the poorer classes: flat slices of the palm-leaf, which lap over each other in the centre, form the sole of Fig. 4, and a double band of twisted leaves secures and strengthens the edge; a thong of the strong fibres of the same plant is affixed to each side of the instep, and was secured round the foot. The other, Fig. 2, is more elaborately platted, and has a softer look; it must, in fact, have been as a pad to the foot, exceedingly light and agreeable in the arid climate inhabited by the people for whom such sandals were constructed: the knot at each side to which the thong was affixed still remains.

Fig. 1.

Fig. 2.

Fig. 3.

Fig. 4.

The sandals with curved toes alluded to above, and which frequently appear upon Egyptian sculpture, and generally upon the feet of the superior classes, are exhibited in the woodcut here given: and in the Berlin Museum one is preserved of pre-ciely similar form, which has been engraved by Wilkinson, and is copied in Fig. 1. It is particularly curious, as showing how such sandals were held upon the feet, the thong which crosses the instep being connected with another passing over the top of the foot, and secured to the sole between the great toe and that next to it, so that the sole was held firmly, however the foot moved, and yet it allowed the sandal to be cast off at pleasure.

Wilkinson says that "shoes, or low boots, were also common in Egypt; but these are believed to have been of late date, and to have belonged to Greeks; for, since no persons are represented in the paintings wearing them, except foreigners, we may conclude they were not adopted by the Egyptians, at least in a Pharaonic age. They were of leather, generally of green color, laced in front by thongs, which passed through small loops on either side, and were principally used, as in Greece and Etruria, by women."

One of the close-laced shoes is given in Fig. 3, from a specimen in the British Museum; it embraces the foot closely, and has a thong or two over the instep for drawing it tightly over the foot, something like the half boot of the present day: the sole and upper leather are all in one piece, sewn up the back and down the front of the foot, a mode of construction practised in England as late as the fourteenth century.

The elegantly ornamented boot here given is copied from a Theban painting, and is worn by a gayly-dressed youth from one of the countries bordering on Egypt: it reaches very high, and is a remarkable specimen of the taste for decoration, which thus early began to be displayed upon this article of apparel.

In Sacred Writ are many early notices of shoes: when Moses exhorts the Jews to obedience (Deut. xxix.), he exclaims, "Your clothes are not waxen old upon you, and thy shoe is not waxen old upon thy foot." In the Book of Ruth (chap. iv.), we have a curious instance of the important part performed by the shoe in the ancient days of Israel, in sealing any important business: "Now this was the manner in former time in Israel, concerning redeeming, and concerning changing, for to confirm all things; a man plucked off his shoe, and gave it to his neighbor; and this was a testimony in Israel." Ruth, and all the property of three other persons, are given over to Boaz by the act of the next kinsman, who gives to him his shoe in the presence of witnesses.

The ancient law compelled the eldest brother, or nearest kinsman by her late husband's side, to marry a widow, if her husband died childless. The law of Moses provided an alternative, easy in itself, but attended with some degree of ignominy. The woman was, in public court, to take off his shoe, spit before his face, saying, "So shall it be done unto that man that will not build up his brother's house;" and probably the fact of this refusal was stated in the genealogical registers in connection with his name, which is probably what is meant by his "name shall be called in Israel, the house of him that hath his shoe loosed." (Deut. xxv.)

The editor of "Knight's Pictorial Bible," who notices these curious laws, also adds that the use of the shoe in the transactions with Boaz are perfectly intelligible; the taking off the shoe denoting the relinquishment of the right and the dissolution of the obligation in the one instance, and its transfer in the other. The shoe is regarded as constituting possession, nor is this idea unknown to ourselves, it being conveyed in the homely proverbial expression by which one man is said to "stand in the shoes of another;" and the vulgar idea "of throwing an old shoe after you for luck," is typical of a wish that temporal gifts or good fortune may follow you. The author last quoted says that, even at the present time, the use of the shoe, as a token of right or occupancy, may be traced very extensively in the East; and, however various and dissimilar the instances may seem at first view, the leading idea may be still detected in all. Thus among the Bedouins, when a man permits his cousin to marry another, or when a husband divorces his runaway wife, he usually says, "She was my slipper, I have cast her off." (Burckhardt's "Bedouins," p. 65.) Sir F. Henniker, in speaking of the difficulty he had in persuading the natives to descend into the crocodile mummy pits, in consequence of some men having lost their lives there, says, "Our guides, as if preparing for certain death, took leave of their children; the father took the turban from his own head, and put it upon that of his son; or put him in his place, by giving him his shoes, 'a dead man's shoes.'" In Western Asia, slippers left at the door of an apartment denote that the master or mistress is engaged, and no one ventures on intrusion, not even a husband, though the apartment be his wife's. Messrs. Tyerman and Bennet, speaking of the termagants of Benares, say, "If domestic or other business calls off one of the combatants before the affair is duly settled, she coolly thrusts her shoe beneath her basket, and leaves both upon the spot, to signify that she is not satisfied;" meaning to denote, by leaving her shoe, that she kept possession of the ground and the argument during her unavoidable absence.

From all these instances it would appear that this employment of the shoe may, in some respects, be considered analogous to that which prevailed in the Middle Ages, of giving a glove as a token of investiture when bestowing lands and dignities.

It should be observed that the same Hebrew word (naal) signifies both a sandal and a shoe, although always rendered shoe in our translation of the Old Testament. Although the shoe is mentioned in Genesis and other books of the Bible, little concerning its form or manufacture can be gleaned. That it was an article of common use among the ancient Israelites, we may infer from the passage in Genesis, chap. xiv. 23, the first mention we have of this article, where Abraham makes oath to the King of Sodom "that he will not take from a thread even to a shoe-latchet," thus assuming its common character.

The Gibeonites (Joshua ix. 5—13) "came with old shoes and clouted (mended) upon their feet," the better to practise their deceit, and therefore they said, "Our shoes are become old by reason of the very long journey."

Isaiah "walked three years naked and barefoot;" he went for this long period without shoes, contrary to the custom of the people, and as "a wonder unto Egypt and Ethiopia."

That it became an article of refinement and luxury is evident from the many other notices given, and the Jewish ladies seem to have been very particular about their sandals: thus, we are told in the Apocryphal book of Judith, although Holofernes was attracted by the general richness of her dress and personal ornaments, yet it was "her sandals ravished his eyes;" and the bride in Solomon's Song is met with the exclamation, "How beautiful are thy feet with sandals, O prince's daughter!"

The ancient bas-reliefs at Persepolis, and the neighborhood of Babylon, second only in their antiquity and interest to those of Egypt, furnish us with examples of the boots and shoes of the Persian kings, their nobles, and attendants; and they were executed, as appears from historical as well as internal evidence, in the days of Xerxes and Darius.

From these sources we here select three speci-who has charge of a chariot, upon a bas-relief now in the British Museum, brought from Persepolis by Sir R. Ker Porter, by whom it was first engraved and described in his interesting volumes of travels in that district. Fig. 2, also from Persepolis, and engraved in the work just quoted, delineates another kind of boot or high shoe, reaching only to the ankle, round which it is secured by a band, and tied in front in a knot, the two ends of the band hanging beneath it; this shoe is very common upon the feet of these figures, and is generally worn by soldiers or the upper classes; the attendants or councillors round the throne of these early sovereigns frequently wear such shoes. Fig. 3, seen upon the feet of personages in the same rank of life, is here copied from a Persepolitan bas-relief representing a soldier in full costume; it is a remarkably interesting example, as it very clearly shows the transition state of this article of dress, being something between a shoe and a sandal: in fact, a shoe may be considered as a covered sandal, and in the instance before us, the part we now term "upper leather" consists of little more than the lacings of the sandals rendered much broader than usual, and fastened by buttons along the top of the foot; the shoe is thus rendered peculiarly flexible, as the openings over the instep allow of the freest movement. Such were the forms of the earliest shoes.

Close boots reaching nearly to the knee, where they are met by a wide trowser, are not uncommon upon these sculptures, being precisely the same in shape and appearance as those worn by the modern Cossacks. Indeed, there is nothing in the way of boots that may not be found upon the existing monuments of early nations, precisely resembling the modern ones. The little figure here given might

Fig. 1.

Fig. 2.

Fig. 3.

mens: Fig. 1 is a half-boot, reaching considerably above the ankle, and it is worn by the attendant pass for a copy of boots worn by one of the soldiers of King William the Third's army, and would not be unworthy of Uncle Toby himself, yet it is carefully copied from a most ancient specimen of Etruscan sculpture in the possession of Inghirami, who has engraved it in his learned work, the "Monumenti Etruschi." the original represents an augur or priest, whose chief duty was to report and explain supernatural signs.

VOL. XLV.—7

SCENES IN THE LIFE OF A POET.

TRANSLATED FROM THE GERMAN.

PART I.

THERE is something in the character of Ehlenschlager and of his writings so simply and purely healthful, in a temperament so alive to the poetry of life, an organization so serene and happy, and a result so equable and uniform, that we are curious to know under what circumstances the true and honest nature of the poet was preserved through a long life, free from all bitter and unhealthful mixtures.
He seems to unite with the warmth, the sunny light, the spontaneous vivacity of the south, the steady sustained calmness and reserved ideality of the north. Like his own Antonio,

"Nature in him is kind;
The kindling fire not merely warms, but burns;
Yet passion never with the vulture's claw Seizes upon him."

Though born in poverty, the circumstances of his life were, for such a nature, most happy. His father, organist and steward of the royal castle of Fredericksburg, in a suburb of Copenhagen, seems to have possessed the same easy and serene disposition as his son; and to have been a most kind and indulgent parent, leaving the gentle boy to unfold his character without severe control, or a too childish indulgence. But it was from his mother, as he tells us, that his genius was inherited. She was a German, of refined nature, and delicately nurtured. He says, "I resembled her in character, and in person also. For the earnestness and melancholy in my character I have to thank her, and my father for my healthy organization and cheerful disposition. My mother possessed both sensibility and imagination;
the tragical that I have been able to embody I derived from her; but, alas! I brought no laurel wreath to divide with her; those I gathered were laid upon her grave.

"In my second year, I was sleeping, one night, by my father's side, when I was awakened by a great tumult in the house. My father opened the window, and I saw the old familiar stork soaring away over the trees. In the morning, I went into my mother's chamber, and found the little puppet the stork had left in the night lying in the bed by my mother's side." This was his only sister, Sophia Wilhelmina Bertha; according to the tradition of Danish children, brought as a choice blessing by that sacred domestic guardian, the stork.

The circumstances of Ehlenschlager's childhood were favorable to his poetical development. He was born in a small house, just at the entrance of the splendid avenue of beech-trees leading to the royal castle of which his father was the steward. This royal residence was filled with pictures, statues, and the choicest works of art. Opposite was Suderfield, which had been converted into a beautiful English park. "Our mode of life," he says, "differed in summer and in winter, as much as the seasons. In summer, the apartments were crowded with celebrated men, and beautiful, well-dressed women: the whole court was there. We children could look through the door and see the whole royal family sitting at the table, while the loveliest music was playing within. Every Sunday evening there was Turkish music in the gardens, and the people could walk therein. The English park, on the contrary, was sacred to the royal guests, and was always still, retired, and solitary. My father kept the key, and my sister and myself were allowed to wander within the shadow of its noble trees." Late in the autumn, the whole royal family removed to the city. There was no longer music and feasting, but carpenters, painters, and decorators, from whom the future poet and artist learned more, perhaps, than from the high-born and well-dressed guests. The actual northern winter came, and the castle was to the steward's family a complete hermitage, with two dogs and two sentinels, sheltered, like them, within its heavy walls. In storms, in rain and snow, the father sat in his blouse, with the smallest dog at his side, and read aloud to his family. They followed Albert Julius and Robinson Crusoe to their islands; roved in fairy-land with Aladdin and his lamp; or laughed at Don Quixote and Holberg's comedies.

In this desultory, independent manner of life,
Ehlen-
schlager reached his twelfth year, having, as he says, learnt nothing; but the reader feels that these years, passed in the midst of an extensive park, surrounded by works of art, accompanied by inspiring music, could never have been lost upon a poetical organization like his.

Ehlen-
schlager's passion for the stage began to display itself in his twelfth year. He began to write comedies, and with the aid of his sister and a young friend of his own age, performed them to their own and the satisfaction of their older friends.
His father intended to educate him for a merchant; but the gentleman in whose counting-house he was to have been placed, not being able just then to receive him, the plan was abandoned, and his father, with his usual good nature, consented that he should try his fortune upon the stage. After a sufficient time spent with the dancing, the fencing, and the posture-master, (his mental preparation had been going on almost from his birth, for almost his whole study had been the drama,) and he had submitted to the discipline of the barber, also to that of the delicate shoe and glove-maker, he made his first appearance upon a public stage. His father went secretly into the theatre; but his mother and sister remained at home as long as the tender mother's anxiety would permit: notwithstanding the winter evening was cold and dark, she could not preserve her self-possession, and remain coldly absent. At the moment the piece was to begin, she went to the lobby of the theatre, and wept and prayed for her son. The sentinel's wife, who misunderstood her emotion, said, "Ah! madam, do not weep; perhaps he may yet be converted." His mother lived to witness his conversion from that devotion to the life of an actor, which, no doubt, secretly made one of the petitions of that mother's heart, on this evening of her prayer.

His success as an actor was only moderate; he soon found out, also, that, to see the rainbow and the beautiful halo of the planets, one must not be in the mist or rain-drops of which they are formed, but observe them from a far different point of view.

In the two years that Ehlen-schlager spent on the boards, he gained much knowledge of life, and acquired many valuable acquaintances among amateurs and artists. He formed at this time a friendship with Rahbek, the Danish poet, whose wife was both spirituelle and accomplished; also a close intimacy with two brothers by the name of Ersted; students, the one of law, the other of medicine, both lovers of poetry. These brothers were, like twins, always together. They were peculiar also, and remind one, in some degree, of the brothers Cheeryble. They lived for each other's friendship; went about in winter in great overcoats, that also served for dressing-gowns, and leaned, like the Siamese twins, on each other. But these Dioscuri shone in genius like stars, and what was beneath their heavy overcoats could not long remain concealed. In their classes in the college, they took both honors and prizes. Under the auspices of these brothers, Ehlen-schlager was admitted to hear the lectures, then highly valuable, in the college of Copenhagen. He says, "When I entered the halls, it seemed as though the old books in parchment, and the new in modern bindings, looked reproachfully at me, and asked, 'Wherefore have you left us?' I thought to myself, what can this mean?" He was already tired of the drudgery of the stage, although his passion for the drama was not abated, and therefore he understood the silent reproach of the books. He felt, also, that there was danger of his falling into the dissipated levity of the life of an actor; at least, of those whose whole time is not absorbed by taking the first rank as histrionic artists.

Influenced by the advice of the Ersteds, Ehlenschlager left the stage, and entered upon a course of study to prepare himself for an examination, in order to enter the law classes of the university. He spoke with his father, who, as usual, left him to follow his inclination. "I was now again," he says, "in heaven." In the intervals of study, he could plan his tragedies, and write them out upon the days when there was no lecture. In the hours of study, also, the dry folios of the law were often neglected for the charms of Horace and Virgil.

His life had now become more earnest; he had a goal before him, that of becoming a lawyer, and of taking his place among his fellow-men as an advocate. By joining the law school, he was introduced to the literary clubs of young students, that seem, in Copenhagen, to be societies that really love letters and each other. The kindest and most honorable and elevated tone of feeling prevails. The young men call each other thou, and with a spirit of freedom and equality swear to each other brotherhood while belonging to the same club, although in the world they are separated by a wide difference in rank and in worldly circumstances.

These literary brotherhoods of young students admit them to a species of happiness which belongs to the male sex, and to the elect only among them, and in the period of youthful enthusiasm. Women have not yet formed such pure and devout attachment to literature and the arts as to form societies among themselves for their own culture and for devotion to the arts. Many reasons might be given for and some against such combinations, but this is not the place to discuss them.

Here Ehlen-schlager became acquainted (in their own language) with the works of those shining stars in the literature of Germany, Herder, Goethe, and Schiller, and corrected the false taste which had led him to prefer Kotzebue's tragedies, Schiller's "Robbers," and Goethe's first works, to the more manly literature of their later writings. "The Sorrows of Werter," he says, retained always the power over him that it first exerted upon his imagination. The preferences and tastes ripened by years must have slumbered in the bud of childhood; but many of the illusions and superstitions of youth remain, even after years have unfolded the power of art, and knowledge has chased away the shadows of ignorance. "Happy are those," he says, "who can eat of the tree of knowledge, without being hunted from the paradise of innocence and nature."

Before Ehlen-schlager had finished his law studies, he had the grief to lose his mother; that fond mother that he so much resembled in mind and person; the only friend to whom he had imparted his early efforts at poetry and literary composition, over which she rejoiced with the proud tenderness of a mother, but anticipated not his future success. He says, "I saw those eyes, so like my own, become dim with the approach of death; I felt those hands, that had ever been busied in the service of others, become cold and lifeless. Thus she slept. My father closed her eyes, and we followed to place the loved form in the Gods-field, where I also wish, hereafter, to rest." Sorrow could not remain long an inmate of a heart so light; it could not long intrude upon his buoyant spirits; he says his happy temperament soon drew him from the shadow to the sunshine of life.

After the death of this tender mother, the fireside of his home was less attractive, but the loss was soon alleviated through the influence of her who was to be his future wife, Christiana, the daughter of Counsellor Heger. The poet Rahbek had married a sister, and thus introduced him to the family. Although there is a very inconvenient absence of dates in this autobiography of the poet, he was at this time apparently about twenty years old. He had, as yet, published nothing; his prospects could not have been very flattering. His studies were not yet finished, and only in his profession of the law could he hope for success sufficient to allow him to marry. He thus describes the lady to whom he ventured to offer all he possessed—a true and honest heart:—

"She was a beautiful girl of seventeen, well formed, and full of energy. Her eyes were large and blue, her complexion snow-white, with a delicate rose in her cheeks. Nature had been so bountiful to her in hair that, when she suffered the beautiful blonde tresses to fall down, they formed a complete veil to her person. She, like all the Heger family, was accomplished and witty. The first time I saw her she was weaving a wreath of corn flowers, as blue as her own eyes. The crown is still mine; and although the leaves have fallen out, they still retain the deep blue of her eyes. It was after a lonely afternoon walk, that I entered the counsellor's house with Rahbek, the poet, son-in-law of the family. The beautiful girl sat industriously at her needle, and when she raised her head at my entrance, I thought I read a certain pleasure in her eyes. An animated conversation ensued, afterwards a good supper with good wine. Christiana was full of wit and humor."

For the want of a better word, I must translate Christiana's peculiar humor by the word quizzing. She was instantly alive to everything peculiar in the character or appearance of her friends, and with ready wit placed the peculiarity before them. Like all the Heger family, she possessed the talent of imitating the voice and manner of others, and gave to all her acquaintances pet names, indicating their peculiarities. For this species of wit, Ehlen Schlager gave her the name of the Anabaptist.

After the delightful evening mentioned above, encouraged, we presume, by the glance of her blue eyes, the poet says he followed Christiana wherever she went to walk by star or moonlight. In these heavenly but embarrassing walks, the Anabaptist lost her inclination to quiz her companion. He says,

"We went silently, arm in arm; I was one-syllabled, embarrassed, and very serious—Christiana also. At last love, that had so long robbed me of courage, gave it to me, and I came out stuttering with my timid declaration." Christiana, the joker, seems to have been well prepared for it. He says, "She understood my metaphors and aphorisms right well, and she did not leave me in despair." He was permitted to speak to her father.

This father was an extraordinary man; an easy man for the serious affairs of life. Before the bombardment of Copenhagen, he was possessed of a large property. His beautiful house and splendid gardens were destroyed by that event. Although a lawyer and counsellor, he possessed many other talents. Our poet says he was a very good smith, joiner, and turner; an excellent horticulturist and ornamental gardener. His strawberries excelled those of the royal gardens. He sketched beautifully. Thorwaldsen, when in Copenhagen, spent his evenings at his house, sketching with him for the instruction of his daughters. He was an accomplished musician, and when alone with the piano phantasied* so as to charm all who accidentally heard him. He ground glasses for telescopes, and wrote a treatise, in French, upon optics. He was familiar with the manufacture of the papier-maché, and made beautiful articles, particularly snuff-boxes, whereon he painted lovely landscapes. His works in this art, which he also taught his daughters, were celebrated and sought for in other countries. Being expert in making fireworks, he often amused his friends by such exhibitions; but a young servant having been accidentally injured by the fall of one of his rockets, he abandoned this art. He was a courtier, and had taken part in the Italian opera, upon the court theatre.

Ehlen Schlager approached this man of universal talents with great anxiety and timidity. He made a humble speech, setting forth his own small merits, which consisted, like Othello's, only in this, that he had loved and wooed his daughter; that he had nothing but his love, and the prospect and promise of his friend; that in two years' time he should finish his studies, and then he hoped to begin to earn his living. The father listened politely, rang the bell, called for his daughter, said a few words in her ear, placed her hand in that of her lover, and—changed the subject—whereby, says Ehlen Schlager, "he did me a great service." This transaction speaks well for the merit of Ehlen Schlager, or we must presume that, if the father treated every subject as summarily as that of his daughter's happiness, his various accomplishments are not so wonderful.

Ehlen Schlager now studied his profession with more determined industry, but he could not resist the invitations of the muses. He was continually making hasty excursions to Parnassus, and indeed loitering there. At this time he wrote for the aca- demic prize medal, upon the question, "Would our literature have been more beautiful if it had been illustrated by the northern rather than the Grecian mythology?" This was his hobby-horse, and he mounted it accordingly. He says, with great simplicity, "I should have won the prize, if my essay had been the only one presented; but there were two others, of which one was in favor of the Grecian mythology, and the old professor gave that the preference."

* Improvised.

It was of little consequence now whether it were Apollo and the muses that drew him from his studies; the war broke out with England, and Mars or Thor coming to the aid of Freia,* the old heroic thirst for glory awoke in him, as in the whole nation. He joined, with others of the young students, the volunteer corps to defend Copenhagen against the fleet of Lord Nelson. After a year of interruption, he turned again to the study of law. At this time his studies in Danish and natural law were finished, but of the Roman law he knew nothing.

Since the death of his mother, he had lived with the Ørstedes, under the care, as he says, of their nurse, a kind and indulgent matron, who held the place of a mother to these young men, who were merely boarders in her family. His manner of life was more satisfactory to himself than conducive to the study of the Roman law. It was his delight to assemble a multitude of students and young citizens around him, and, sitting on a low stool in the midst, to read, or rather to act, Holberg's Comedies, changing his voice and assuming each character in turn, to the universal delight and laughter of the company.

About this time, that is, in 1801 or '2, he was greatly surprised and delighted to hear of the betrothment of his dearest friend, Anders Ørsted, to his only sister, the little puppet formerly left by the stork, now grown to marriageable age. They had preserved their secret, he says, from him, to revenge his own cunning and abrupt betrothment to the counsellor's daughter. The marriage followed immediately, as his friend had been appointed assessor to the court, and city justice. This happy connection added greatly to the joy of their social and domestic life.

Some divisions had arisen in their club in consequence of the new school of German literature, the so-called romantic school. Øhlenschläger soon became a convert to the new school; but he withdrew somewhat from the club to a more domestic life. He gives a pleasant description of the circle in which he spent his evenings, consisting of the Ørstedes, and Rahbek, the poet, who had married the sister of his Christiana. He was the writer of the "Danish Observer," a periodical much esteemed at this time.

He says, "Our relation to Rahbek was peculiar. He had been the instructor of us all in taste and belles-lettres, and stood now at the head of the old classical school of literature; but he was as tolerant as he was obstinate. He would never dispute, but contrived to withdraw himself from our discussions by an anecdote or a witty conceit; if we persisted, he was silent, or looked at the prospect from his window; if we became warm and excited, he went to his study and his canary birds. When a glass of wine had restored our good humor, he would again join us, and relate some of his characteristic anecdotes of former times, of which he had treasured a wonderful store, recollecting not only names and dates, but baptismal names, and imitating all the humorous peculiarities of the persons. In literary attainments, he stood at the head of all his contemporaries, Baggesen only excepted, and he was the most fair and equitable of all.

"His wife, although many years younger, hung with full soul upon him, and, notwithstanding her own remarkable talents, had accustomed herself to implicit faith in his opinions. We young men found this so beautiful, that we did not seek to shake her faith in his infallibility. Fortunately her character was just adapted to her position. She rarely spoke of poetry. She possessed a noble heart, quick perceptions, extraordinary wit, and the greatest faculty in overcoming all mechanical difficulties. Wit and humor played always in her conversations; imagination alone was wanting. If she was serious, she was almost melancholy. She understood all the modern languages, together with Latin and Greek; but, as she read books principally on account of the languages, her mind was not enriched with their literature, and it was not very agreeable to hear her speak long in the respective tongues. Her appreciation of the beautiful was more apparent in her paintings and in the art of gardening. Her beautiful garden was formed by herself. She sat much in her summer-house, surrounded by her splendid fruits and flowers, while her wit and humor bloomed still more luxuriantly. She listened 'roguishly' to our disputes and controversies; but, if we left a weak point of our argument exposed, or there was a link broken in the chain of our reasoning, Murat never came down quicker with his cavalry, than she with her winged wit fell upon us with such slaughter that we could only come off with loud laughter and broken limbs.

"My sister was different, and yet in many things like the Rahbek. She was as lively, witty, and epirietuelle, but she had not the talent for languages, nor the mechanical skill, of her friend. She was very susceptible; the joy of grief was well known to her, and sometimes almost led to melancholy. She made all her own clothes, and dressed herself with great taste. She walked much and well, while her friend Rahbek, on the contrary, sat always at home, or made short journeys to Hamburg. Neither of them loved an extensive society, but they collected daily a small circle of accomplished friends. My sister kept but one servant, and arranged her rooms herself, although, from her soft, white hands, no one would have suspected it. I had my corner in their houses, and read, almost every evening, something aloud to them. The works that they enjoyed the most, and over which we afterwards laughed and disputed, were Voss's Homer, Tieck's Don Quixote, Schlegel's Spanish Theatre, Tieck's and Novali's writings, Goethe, Schiller, and Shakespeare!

* The goddess of love of the northern mythology.

"O beloved friends of my youth, with whom I lived so many precious years, you are now both in eternity, and my earthly eyes will behold you no more! Pardon, if with too faint colors I have endeavored to draw, from memory, the resemblance of your characters. I would that the world should know something of your virtues!"

Øhlenschläger continued to write and publish his poems, and "about this time," that is, about 1804, he published the "Oriental Drama," and poem of "Aladdin or the Wonderful Lamp." This was written con amore, having a close resemblance, he thinks, to his own life. In his poetical talent, he affirms, he had possession of a wonderful lamp, that opened to him all the treasures of the earth, while, in his vivid imagination, he possessed the power of the charmed ring. Like Aladdin also, (which seems to us less miraculous,) he was in love. This publication obtained so much success that he easily persuaded himself nature intended him for a poet, and for nothing else; that it was in vain to strive against an intention of nature, so distinctly pronounced. His bride was of the same opinion, and he resolved to leave the Roman law, and all other law, although both knew that, in turning off from the great highway and beaten path of life to cross flowery meadows and untracked swamps, he left the secure road to future sustenance. But he seems always to have trusted Providence, and gone on his own way rejoicing.

He resolved, at first, to rely wholly upon his favorite studies, the old Sagas, and applied to the Academy of Art to allow him to give lectures upon the northern mythology. The painter Abildgaard, the director of the Academy, and instructor of Thorwaldsen, made the old objections to all northern idolatry; but Øhlenschläger maintained his own views with so much eloquence, that the scornful smile of the old man was changed into one of serious admiration. "Ach Gott," he said, "I am not the man to oppose anything that is new and spiritual."

He changed his plan, however, having heard that the Countess Schimmelmann had read his last poems with great satisfaction, and wished to see the author. He hastened therefore to her beautiful country-house on the sea-shore. He says, "I waited long in the empty apartments, when at last a simply-dressed, friendly woman entered, and greeted me with diffidence, saying, 'my husband will immediately be here.'" It was the countess herself. She soon made herself known, and from this time to her death, she remained his liberal patroness. Through the influence of the count, her husband, he obtained from the crown prince a travelling pension, derived from the fund for the public service, and Count Schimmelmann became the trustee for the regular payment of the pension.

It seems to have been in Øhlenschläger's usual good fortune (and one would believe that an uncommonly benevolent and intelligent stork must have watched his birth), that if he could only succeed through a patron, he should find a modest, gentle, and unassuming woman to hold that place, who seems to have demanded nothing in return.

LE MÉLANGE.

CHAPTER II.

SINGING BIRDS.

"Heark, hearke, the excellent notes of singing birds! what variety of voices! how are they fitted to every passion! The little chirping birds (the wren and the robin) they sing a mean; the goldfinch, the nightingale, they join in the treble; the Blackbird, the thrush, they bear the tenor; while the four-footed beasts, with their bleating and bellowing, they sing a base. How other birds sing in their order, I refer you to the skillful musicians: some of them keep their due times; others have their continued notes, that all might please with variety; while the woods, the groves, and the rocks, with the hollowness of their sound like a musical instrument, send forth an echo, and seem to unite their song."—Woodman's Fall of Man, p. 78.

MUSIC IN SPEECH.

"Sitting in some company, and having been but a little before musical, I chanced to take notice that in ordinary discourse words were spoken in perfect notes; and that some of the company used eighths, some fifths, some thirds: and that those were most pleasing, whose words, as to their tone, consisted most of concords; and where of discords, of such as constituted harmony; and the same person was the most affable, pleasant, and the best-natured in the company. And this suggests a reason why many discourses which one hears with much pleasure, when they come to be read scarcely seem the same things.

"From this difference of music in speech, we may also conjecture that of tempers. We know the Doric mood sounds gravity and sobriety; the Lydian, freedom; the Æolic, sweet stillness and composure; the Phrygian, jollity and youthful levity; the Ionic soothes the storms and disturbances arising from passion. And why may we not reasonably suppose that those whose speech naturally runs into the notes peculiar to any of these moods, are likewise in disposition?

"So also from the clif: as he that speaks in gamat, to be manly; C Fa Ut may show one to be of an ordinary capacity, though good disposition; G Sol Re Ut, to be peevish and effeminate, and of a weak and timorous spirit; sharps, an effeminate sadness; flats, a manly or melancholic sadness. He who has a voice in some measure agreeing with all cliffs, seems to be of good parts and fit for variety of employments, yet somewhat of an inconstant nature. Likewise from the times: so semibreves may bespeak a temper dull and phlegmatic; minims, grave and serious; crotchets, a prompt wit; quavers, vehemency of passion, and used by scolds. Semibreve-rest may denote one either stupid, or fuller of thoughts than he can utter; minim-rest, one that deliberates; crotchet-rest, one in a passion. So that from the natural use of mood, note, and time, we may collect dispositions."—Philosophical Transactions, vol. ii., p. 441.

POWER OF MUSIC TO INSPIRE DEVOTION.

"THAT there is a tendency in music," says SIR JOHN HAWKINS, "to excite grave and even devout as well as lively and mirthful affections, no one can doubt who is not an absolute stranger to its efficacy; and though it may perhaps be said that the effects of music are mechanical, and that there can be nothing pleasing to God in that devotion which follows the involuntary operation of sound on the human mind; this is more than can be proved, and the Scripture seems to indicate the contrary."—History of Music, vol. iv., p. 42.

PHYSIC.

"From the physician, let us come to the apothecaries. When I see their shops so well stored and furnished with their painted boxes and pots, instead of commending the owner, or taking delight and pleasure in the shop, I begin to pity poor miserable and wretched man that should be subject to so many diseases, and should want so many helps to his cure. I could wish that his pots were only for ornament, or naked and empty; or that they did but only serve for his credit, for he is a happy man that can live without them. But here I can do no less than take some notice of their physic. Most commonly the medicines are more fearful than the disease itself; I call the sick patient to witness, who hath the trial and experience of both! As for example, long fastings and abstinence; a whole pint of bitter potion; pills that cannot be swallowed; noisome, distasteful, and unsavory vomits; the cutting of veins; the lancing of sores; the seering up of members; the pulling out of teeth; here are strange cures to teach a man cruelty! The surgeon shall never be of my jury."—GOODMAN'S Fall of Man, p. 98.

HAPPINESS OF THE POOR IN ESCAPING THE PHYSICIAN.

"HAPPY are poor men!

If sick with the excess of heat or cold,
Caused by necessitous labor, not loose surfeits,
They, when spare diet, or kind nature, fail
To perfect their recovery, soon arrive at
Their rest in death; but, on the contrary,
The great and noble are exposed as preys
To the rapine of physicians; and they
In lingering out what is remediless,
Aim at their profit, not the patient's health."

MASSINGER, Emperor of the East, vol. iii., p. 316.

PUBLIC EXERCISING GROUNDS NECESSARY TO THE HEALTH OF LARGE CITIES.

"IN all large and well-regulated cities, there ought to be play-grounds or places for public exercise, where laborers, and people who work at particular trades, might assemble at certain hours for recreation, and amuse themselves with walking or other healthful exercises, in order to prevent those diseases which may arise from the usual posture required in their business, if continued without remission, or any relaxation or change.

"The general decay of those manly and spirited exercises which formerly were practised in the metropolis and its vicinity, has not arisen from any want of inclination in the people, but from the want of places for that purpose. Such as in times past had been allotted to them, are now covered with buildings or shut up by enclosures: so that, if it were not for skittles, and the like pastimes, they would have no amusements connected with the exercise of the body; and such amusements are only to be met with in places belonging to common drinking-houses; for which reason their play is seldom productive of much benefit, but more frequently becomes the prelude to drunkenness and debauchery. Honest Stowe, in his Survey of London, laments the retrenchments of the grounds appropriated for martial pastimes, which had begun to take place even in his day."—SIR JOHN SINCLAIR'S Code of Health and Longevity, p. 292.

LEAVES FROM MY JOURNAL.

GENOA.

Few cities can go back into antiquity so far as Genoa, if, as an inscription in the ancient part of the cathedral states, it was founded by Janus, the grandson of Noah; it is certain, however, that it is one of the oldest cities in Europe, and was enjoying a high degree of prosperity and civilization at a time when England was but little removed from barbarism. When Richard Cœur de Lion was on his way to the Holy Land, he found Genoa far in advance of any part of his own kingdom, and was treated so hospitably, and received so much substantial assistance from the Genoese, that, as a partial return, he adopted their patron St. George, and took him to England, where he has since remained the patron saint. Few saints in the calendar had so strange a career while living, or were more doubtfully promoted. A native of Cappadocia by birth, of low descent, and vicious life, the course of events made him the rival and successor of the virtuous Athanasius, in the Bishopric of Alexandria in Egypt. There, by a long course of plunder, injustice, and oppression, he so disgusted his subjects that he and his assistants were first imprisoned and finally murdered by the mob; and his remains were thrown into the sea. A few centuries later, he is found in the calendar of saints, and now enjoys the honor of presiding over the kingdom of Great Britain, and the noble Order of the Garter.

The view of Genoa, as approached from the sea, is very grand and beautiful. An amphitheatre of hills covered with villas, and high in their rear crowned by forts, which have acquired undying names from Massena's glorious defence, serves as a background for the city, which, thickly built upon a succession of hills, presents a most picturesque appearance.

The port, which is altogether artificial, is very large and formed by two enormous moles which project into the sea. It is one of the best in the Mediterranean, and is generally filled with shipping from all parts of the world. The American flag is rarely seen in consequence of the reciprocity treaties, which have enabled Sardinian vessels to carry what our own vessels used to; and, as they can sail their ships much more cheaply than we can, they have now nearly monopolized the commerce between the two countries, to the serious injury of our shipping interests. Another cause is the rising greatness of Marseilles, which is overshadowing all the neighboring ports, and where our vessels stop with their cargoes.

The streets of Genoa, with few exceptions, are very narrow, and most of them resemble our narrowest alleys. They run up and down hill in the most extravagant manner. The use of wheeled carriages is of course very limited in Genoa, and the old sedan chair still flourishes here, though principally at night. The wide streets are the Balbi, Nuovissima, and Nuova; they are continuations of each other, and are literally streets of palaces, as scarcely any other description of building is to be found upon them. They are wide by comparison, and carriages can easily pass each other. There are no sidewalks, however, and the pedestrian is often annoyed and oftener muddled by the aristocratic equipages which show themselves in these, their only streets. Many of these palaces contain fine pictures, especially portraits by Vandyke. The Carlo-Alberto and Carlo-Felice streets are wider than the streets of Palaces, having been more recently opened, and they alone have sidewalks. They also communicate with each other and with the three first named, so that a very respectable drive, in a small way, may be had in the heart of the city; you are confined, however, to one drive, and for all purposes of business or sight seeing, you must go afoot. The Opera House is upon the Carlo-Felice, and is a beautiful building, both inside and out. A good company is generally to be found here.

There are several Doric palaces in Genoa; but the most interesting house, associated with the name of the great warrior and statesman, is in the Piazza San Matteo, which was presented to him by his fellow-citizens, and still bears this inscription:—

“S. C. ANDRÆ DE AURIA, PATRIÆ LIBERATORI, MUNUS PUBLICUM.”

The house has since fallen from its high estate, and is now used for shops and residences, of the poorer sort. In this same Piazza,* is the Church of San Matteo, where the great Andrea Doria is magnificently entombed.

The Ducal Palace, formerly the Palace of the Doges, has externally the appearance of an old fortress with high battlemented walls, and with a high square tower rising from the centre. This tower contains the great bell which was presented to the Republic by the Dutch, and which (they say) can be heard for twenty miles at sea. A large part of the interior of the building was destroyed by fire in 1777, and the finest rooms are modern. The Doge's chapel and the council chamber still remain, however, as relics of the olden times. The Doge was required to be fifty years of age, and was elected for two years, during which time he could never leave the palace, and was in fact a gilded prisoner of state. His only walk was upon a terrace, upon which opened the grated windows of the state prisoners, whose lamentations or curses he could enjoy as he took his daily walks. This palace is now the government house, and contains the several public offices. In one of them are preserved three letters of Columbus, of whom the Genoese are now very proud, and to whom they are erecting a monument on the Acqua Verde, which will be very grand and colossal when finished. It is generally conceded now that Columbus was not born in Genoa, but at Cogoleto, a small village some miles to the westward. All this par parenthèse. The letters are preserved in a marble monument with a brass door, which has but one keyhole, but requires three keys to open it. The letters are in Spanish and in good preservation; the signature is rather curious, and is as follows:—

* We have no word in English which corresponds with the Italian Piazza or the French Place. It is applied to any open space in the city, whether square or otherwise. The open space in front (east) of the Exchange (in Philadelphia), or that where the Battle Monument stands, in Baltimore, is precisely the Italian Piazza.

"El Almirante Mayor del Mar Oceano, y Vi. Rey y Gobernador General de las Islas, y de la Terra Firma de Asia, y de las Indias, del Rey, y de la Reina, mis Señores, y del suo Capitan General del Mar, y del su Consilio.

S.
S. A. S.
X. M. V.
X<sup>fo</sup> FERENS *

The exchange is a large hall built in 1570. It is supported by sixteen columns, and was formerly open at the sides. They are now, however, glazed, and the building has the appearance of an immense green-house.

The Duomo or Cathedral of St. Lawrence is a very singular-looking edifice, decidedly Saracenic in its style: it is faced with alternate layers of black and white marble, with a tall square tower at one angle. The pillars of the doorways are of various patterns; all of them twisted, some with rough knobs upon them, and all presenting a very barbaric effect. Over the centre door is a rude marble bas-relief, representing St. Lawrence on his gridiron, with two men blowing up the fire with bellows—a proof of the antiquity of that valuable article of domestic comfort. The nave of the church consists of a double row of (two storied) columns of granite and porphyry, which are said to be the remains of an ancient Teutonic temple. The other parts of the church are (comparatively) modern; having been built in the beginning of the fourteenth century.

The Chapel of St. John the Baptist is one of the richest portions of the cathedral. It is a small church in itself, richly decorated with numerous statues of considerable merit. Here are kept (on dit) the ashes of St. John, and a very curious old marble chest, in which they were first brought from the Holy Land by the Crusaders. No woman is allowed to enter this chapel, in consequence of its having been one of that sex which caused his beheading. In the cathedral is also preserved the Emerald (or green glass) dish which the Crusaders brought from Casarea. This dish is said to have been presented to Solomon by the Queen of Shoba; to have been the charger in which the Baptist's head was received; also, to have been the dish from which our Saviour ate the Last Supper; also, the dish in which Joseph of Arimathea received the blood of Christ; the Sangreal in search of which King Arthur and his knights made their famous quest. Every one is free to choose the character he prefers for the relic, and to honor it accordingly. One thing is, however, certain, that the Emerald is nothing but green glass; and the priests who acknowledge it say that it used to be Emerald, but that Napoleon changed it when it was in Paris.

Some of the other churches of Genoa are very rich, and deserving a visit. Among these the "Annunziata" stands pre-eminent. It is one of the oldest churches in the city, having been built early in the thirteenth century. It was enlarged in the sixteenth century to its present size; and was splendidly embellished at various times by the Lomellini family. Large subscriptions and bequests have contributed to keep it up, and at the present time a magnificent facade of white marble, with a row of beautiful marble pillars, which are just completed, shows what its splendor will be when the whole is similarly renovated. The frescoes and gilding in the interior are particularly rich.

The Church of St. Cyr is very ancient, its antiquity having been traced back to the year 250. It was the Cathedral of Genoa until 985, when that title was transferred to the Church of St. Lawrence, where it still remains. Many other churches are celebrated for their paintings, frescoes, and statuary. That of St. Maria di Carignano is one of the most conspicuous buildings in the place, standing upon a high hill at one extremity of the amphitheatre.

The Goldsmith's Street has a curiosity hanging against the wall of a house in a glass case. It is a very fine painting of St. Eloi, the patron of all smiths. It was painted by Pellegrino Piola, a young artist who was assassinated when only twenty-two years old. It is a very old picture, and is looked upon with a degree of reverence and attachment by the inhabitants which it is difficult for us to understand. It is said that Napoleon was induced to leave it in its place, for fear of exasperating the Genoese too highly by removing it to Paris, as he contemplated.

* EXPLANATION.—Supplex. Servus Altissimi Salvatoris, Christi, Marie, Josephi, Christo. Ferens.

The Bank of St. George, the oldest in Europe, (though that honor is also claimed by Venice,) is still here in a flourishing condition.

The walks and drives in the neighborhood of Genoa are surpassingly beautiful. Close to, and overlooking the city, are the Peschiere and Zerbino gardens, where the inhabitants are allowed to walk. At a distance of five or six miles, are the Pellavicini and Lomellini Villas, which merit a visit as much as anything in Genoa. In the former, art has almost superseded nature, which has left only the fine views which everywhere break out among the walks. Grottos, caves, castles, summer-houses, Chinese pagodas, obelisks, bridges, and lakes; all unite to make a most lovely spot, to which the memory reverts with very great pleasure.

The climate of Genoa is very good, and the only drawback in winter is the high wind which is generally prevailing. It is, however, a very healthy place, and one can enjoy much solid comfort. The hotels are of the best description, the restaurants are good; provisions are plenty and cheap; the society is better than in any other city of Italy, and foreigners, with proper credentials, find no difficulty in obtaining an entrance into it.

Above all, Sardinia is free! the press is as free as could be wished. The soldiery are intended for the enemy, not for the citizen; life, property, conscience, all are safe. Here only, in Italy, the priests have been elevated to the level of their fellow-citizens. The peculiar privileges under which they have so long battered have been removed, and they take their places with, instead of above their flocks.

Sardinia is now the cynosure of all true lovers of freedom for Italy. She is looked upon with little love by Austria, Naples, and the other despotisms of Europe; and the time is not far distant when she may have to defend her freedom with the sword. It is to be hoped that, when that day arrives, and the standard of freedom is erected in its last Italian home, the governments of France and England will be found ranging themselves by the side of Savoy.

FANCY GARDEN PLANS.

LAST WORDS.

BY HELEN HAMILTON

We treasure fondly in our hearts
A parent's cheering praise,
The orator's warm eloquence,
The poet's fervent lays;
The vows of love are woven close
With many a heart's warm chords;
Yet, oh! we treasure these far less
Than some loved lips' last words.

We stand beside the bed of death,
And closer bend the ear,
The last faint tones of tenderness
From those pale lips to hear;
And, oh! the wooing voice of love,
The minstrel's high accords,
Sink less in our hearts' inmost depths
Than those faint-breathed last words.

Last words! last words! The broken phrase
Formed by the parting breath,
Ere Life's dim twilight fades away
Into the night of Death,
The last notes drawn from out a harp,
Before its breaking chords,
Yield 'neath the sweep of Death's cold hand;
There treasure we—last words.

Last words! last words! The sobbed adieu
Of those who part forever,
The waters' moan ere Death's dark sea
Ingulfs Life's sparkling river;
A loved name murmured brokenly,
A faintly-breathed farewell—
These are thy jewels, Memory!
Guard thou the casket well.

THE SORROWS OF A "WEALTHY CITIZEN."

BY A SUFFERER.

Am me! Am I really a rich man, or am I not? That is the question. I am sure I don't feel rich; and yet, here I am written down among the "wealthy citizens" as being worth seventy thousand dollars! How the estimate was made, or who furnished the data, is all a mystery to me. I am sure I wasn't aware of the fact before. "Seventy thousand dollars!" That sounds comfortable, doesn't it? Seventy thousand dollars! But where is it? Ah! There's the rub! How true it is that people always know more about you than you do yourself.

Before this confounded book came out, ("The Wealthy Citizens of Philadelphia,") I was jogging on very quietly. Nobody seemed to be aware of the fact that I was a rich man, and I had no suspicion of the thing myself. But, strange to tell, I awoke one morning and found myself worth seventy thousand dollars! I shall never forget that day. Men who had passed me in the street with a quiet, familiar nod, now bowed with a low salaam, or lifted their hats deferentially, as I encountered them on the paré.

"What's the meaning of all this?" thought I. "I haven't stood up to be shot at, nor sinned against innocence and virtue. I haven't been to Paris. I don't wear moustaches. What has given me this importance?"

And, musing thus, I pursued my way in quest of money to help me out with some pretty heavy payments. After succeeding, though with some difficulty, in obtaining what I wanted, I returned to my store about twelve o'clock. I found a mercantile acquaintance awaiting me, who, without many preliminaries, thus stated his business:—

"I want," said he, with great coolness, "to get a loan of six or seven thousand dollars; and I don't know of any one to whom I can apply with more freedom and hope of success than yourself. I think I can satisfy you, fully, in regard to security."

"My dear sir," replied I, "if you only wanted six or seven hundred dollars instead of six or seven thousand, I could not accommodate you. I have just come in from a borrowing expedition myself."

I was struck with the sudden change in the man's countenance. He was not only disappointed, but offended. He did not believe my statement. In his eyes, I had meanly resorted to a subterfuge, or, rather, told a lie, because I did not wish to let him have my money. Bowing with cold formality, he turned away and left my place of business. His manner to me has been reserved ever since.

On the afternoon of that day, I was sitting in the back part of my store musing on some matter of business, when I saw a couple of ladies enter. They spoke to one of my clerks, and he directed them back to where I was taking things comfortably in an old arm-chair.

"Mr. G——, I believe?" said the elder of the two ladies, with a bland smile.

I had already arisen, and to this question, or rather affirmation, I bowed assent.

"Mr. G——," resumed the lady, producing a small book as she spoke, "we are a committee, appointed to make collections in this district for the purpose of getting up a fair in aid of the funds of the Esquimaux Missionary Society. It is the design of the ladies who have taken this matter in hand to have a very large collection of articles, as the funds of the society are entirely exhausted. To the gentlemen of our district, and especially to those who have been liberally blessed with this world's goods"—this was particularly emphasized—"we look for important aid. Upon you, sir, we have called first, in order that you may head the subscription, and thus set an example of liberality to others."

And the lady handed me the book in the most "of course" manner in the world, and with the evident expectation that I would put down at least fifty dollars.

Of course I was cornered, and must do something. I tried to be bland and polite; but am inclined to think that I failed in the effort. As for fairs, I never did approve of them. But that was nothing. The enemy had boarded me so suddenly and so completely, that nothing was left for me but to surrender at discretion, and I did so with as good a grace as possible. Opening my desk, I took out a five dollar bill and presented it to the elder of the two ladies, thinking that I was doing very well indeed. She took the money, but was evidently disappointed; and did not even ask me to head the list with my name.

"How money does harden the heart!" I overheard one of my fair visitors say to the other, in a low voice, but plainly intended for my edification, as they walked off with their five dollar bill.

"Confound your impudence!" I said to myself, thus taking my revenge out of them. "Do you think I've got nothing else to do with my money but scatter it to the four winds?"

And I stuck my thumbs firmly in the armholes of my waistcoat, and took a dozen turns up and down my store, in order to cool off.

"Confound your impudence!" I then repeated, and quietly sat down again in the old arm-chair.

On the next day, I had any number of calls from money hunters. Business men, who had never thought of asking me for loans, finding that I was worth seventy thousand dollars, crowded in upon me for temporary favors, and, when disappointed in their expectations, couldn't seem to understand it. When I spoke of being "hard up" myself, they looked as if they didn't clearly comprehend what I meant.

A few days after the story of my wealth had gone abroad, I was sitting, one evening, with my family, when I was informed that a lady was in the parlor, and wished to see me.

"A lady!" said I.

"Yes, sir," replied the servant.

"Is she alone?"

"Yes, sir."

"What does she want?"

"She did not say, sir."

"Very well. Tell her I'll be down in a few moments."

When I entered the parlor, I found a woman, dressed in mourning, with her veil closely drawn.

"Mr. G——?" she said, in a low, sad voice.

I bowed, and took a place upon the sofa where she was sitting, and from which she had not risen upon my entrance.

"Pardon the great liberty I have taken," she began, after a pause of embarrassment, and in an unsteady voice. "But, I believe I have not mistaken your character for sympathy and benevolence, nor erred in believing that your hand is ever ready to respond to the generous impulses of your heart."

I bowed again, and my visitor went on.

"My object in calling upon you I will briefly state. A year ago my husband died. Up to that time I had never known the want of anything that money could buy. He was a merchant of this city, and supposed to be in good circumstances. But he left an insolvent estate; and now, with five little ones to care for, educate, and support, I have parted with nearly my last dollar, and have not a single friend to whom I can look for aid."

There was a deep earnestness and moving pathos in the tones of the woman's voice, that went to my heart. She paused for a few moments, overcome with her feelings, and then resumed:—

"One in an extremity like mine, sir, will do many things from which, under other circumstances, she would shrink. This is my only excuse for troubling you at the present time. But I cannot see my little family in want without an effort to sustain them; and, with a little aid, I see my way clear to do so. I was well educated, and feel not only competent, but willing to undertake a school. There is one, the teacher of which being in bad health, wishes to give it up, and if I can get the means to buy out her establishment, will secure an ample and permanent income for my family. To aid me, sir, in doing this, I now make an appeal to you. I know you are able, and I believe you are willing to put forth your hand and save my children from want, and, it may be, separation."

The woman still remained closely veiled; I couldn't, therefore, see her face. But I could perceive that she was waiting with trembling suspense for my answer. Heaven knows my heart responded freely to her appeal.

"How much will it take to purchase this establishment?" I inquired.

"Only a thousand dollars," she replied.

I was silent. A thousand dollars!

"I do not wish it, sir, as a gift," she said; "only as a loan. In a year or two, I will be able to repay it."

"My dear madam," was my reply, "had I the ability, most gladly would I meet your wishes. But, I assure you, I have not. A thousand dollars taken from my business would destroy it."

A deep sigh, that was almost a groan, came up from the breast of the stranger, and her head drooped low upon her bosom. She seemed to have fully expected the relief for which she applied; and to be stricken to the earth by my words! We were both unhappy.

"May I presume to ask your name, madam?" said I, after a pause.

"It would do no good to mention it," she replied, mournfully. "It has cost me a painful effort to come to you; and now that my hope has proved, alas! in vain, I must beg the privilege of still remaining a stranger."

She arose, as she said this. Her figure was tall and dignified. Dropping me a slight courtesy, she was turning to go away, when I said—

"But, madam, even if I have not the ability to grant your request, I may still have it in my power to aid you in this matter. I am ready to do all I can; and, without doubt, among the friends of your husband will be found numbers to step forward and join in affording you the assistance so much desired, when they are made aware of your present extremity."

The lady made an impatient gesture, as if my words were felt as a mockery or an insult, and, turning from me, again walked from the room with a firm step. Before I could recover myself, she had passed into the street, and I was left standing alone. To this day I have remained in ignorance of her identity. Cheerfully would I have aided her to the extent of my ability to do so. Her story touched my feelings and awakened my liveliest sympathies, and if, on learning her name and making proper inquiries into her circumstances, I had found all to be as she had stated, I would have felt it a duty to interest myself in her behalf, and have contributed in aid of the desired end to the extent of my ability. But she came to me under the false idea that I had but to put my hand in my pocket, or write a check upon the bank, and lo! a thousand dollars were forthcoming. And because I did not do this, she believed me unfeeling, selfish, and turned from me mortified, disappointed, and despairing.

I felt sad for weeks after this painful interview. On the very next morning I received a letter from an artist, in which he spoke of the extremity of his circumstances, and begged me to purchase a couple of pictures. I called at his rooms, for I could not resist his appeal. The pictures did not strike me as possessing much artistic value.

"What do you ask for them?" I inquired.

"I refused a hundred dollars for the pair. But I am compelled to part with them now, and you shall have them for eighty."

I had many other uses for eighty dollars, and, therefore, shook my head. But, as he looked disappointed, I offered to take one of the pictures at forty dollars. To this he agreed. I paid the money, and the picture was sent home. Some days afterwards, I was showing it to a friend.

"What did you pay for it?" he asked.

"Forty dollars," I replied.

The friend smiled strangely.

"What's the matter?" said I.

"He offered it to me for twenty-five."

"That picture?"

"Yes."

"He asked me eighty for this and another, and said he had refused a hundred for the pair."

"Though he lied. He thought, as you were well off, that he must ask you a good stiff price, or you wouldn't buy."

"The scoundrel!"

"He got ahead of you, certainly."

"But it's the last time," said I, angrily.

And so things went on. Scarcely a day passed in which my fame as a wealthy citizen did not subject me to some kind of experiment from people in want of money. If I employed a porter for any service and asked what was to pay, after the work was done, ten chances to one that he didn't touch his hat and reply—

"Anything that you please, sir," in the hope that I, being a rich man, would be ashamed to offer him less than about four times his regular price. Poor people in abundance called upon me for aid; and all sorts of application to give or lend money met me at every turn. And when I, in self-defence, begged off as politely as possible, hints gentle or broad, according to the characters or feelings of those who came, touching the hardening and perverting influence of wealth were thrown out for my especial edification.

VOL. XLV.—3

And still the annoyance continues. Nobody but myself doubts the fact that I am worth from seventy to a hundred thousand dollars, and I am, therefore, considered allowable game for all who are too idle or prodigal to succeed in the world; or as Nature's almoner to all who are suffering from misfortunes.

Soon after the publication to which I have alluded was foisted upon our community as a veritable document, I found myself a secular dignitary in the church militant. Previously I had been only a pew-holder, and an unambitious attendant upon the Sabbath ministrations of the Rev. Mr. ——. But a new field suddenly opened before me. I was a man of weight and influence, and must be used for what I was worth. It is no joke, I can assure the reader, when I tell them that the way my pocket suffered was truly alarming. I don't know, but I have seriously thought, sometimes, that if I hadn't kicked loose from my dignity, I would have been gazetted as a bankrupt long before this time.

Soon after sending in my resignation as vestryman or deacon, I will not say which, I met the Rev. Mr. —, and the way he talked to me about the earth being the "Lord's and the fulness thereof;" about our having "the poor always with us;" about the duties of charity, and the laying up of treasure in heaven, made me ashamed to go to church for a month to come. I really began to fear that I was a doomed man, and that the reputation of being a "wealthy citizen" was going to sink me into everlasting perdition. But I am getting over that feeling now. My cash book, ledger, and bill book set me right again; and I can button up my coat and draw my purse-strings, when guided by the dictates of my own judgment, without a fear of the threatened final consequences before my eyes. Still, I am the subject of perpetual annoyance from all sorts of people, who will persist in believing that I am made of money; and many of these approach me in such a way as to put it almost entirely out of my power to say "no." They come with appeals for small amounts, as loans, donations to particular charities, or as the price of articles that I do not want, but which I cannot well refuse to take. I am sure that, since I have obtained my present unenviable reputation, it hasn't cost me a cent less than two thousand, in money given away, loaned never to be returned, and in the purchase of things that I never would have thought of buying.

And, with all this, I have made more enemies than I ever before had in my life, and estranged half of my friends and acquaintances.

Seriously, I have it in contemplation to "burst up" one of these days, in order to satisfy the world that I am not a rich man. I see no other effectual remedy for my present grievances.

POETRY.

I'VE BEEN FORTH INTO THE WORLD, MOTHER.

BY MARIE J. CLARE.

The first thing that youth loses is its faith in human truth. When the young heart discovers that friends may be false or interested; that man in general is selfish, not to say villainous, its first impulse is to leave the world;—it yearns to pass immediately by the gate of Death to a better—even if it be all unprepared; for this other—the angelic.

I've been forth into the world, mother—into the world alone,
And in all hopelessness of good come I back to thee, my own;

To thee, the only one whose voice I can in trust believe—
Who will not, with a gentle smile and winning tone, deceive.

I hate this world, I hate false friends, I hate all else but thee;

The very sight of things once loved is hateful unto me:
I laugh in reckless mockery at dreams of fancied bliss—
Ay! laugh in scorn and bitterness—the world hath taught me this.

Proud castles, built with hope, lie hurried in ruins sadly low;

The prism through which I viewed the world was broken long ago:

Now banished the dreams that gave delight, earth's care-lines mark my brow;

Each bright tint 's faded from my sight, and life's one color now.

'Tis strange and very sad, thou'lt say, that one who hath scarce seen

The joyous birth of leaf and flower in the summertime eighteen,

Should speak so solemnly of life, of its mournful gift of tears,

And the tones that Sorrow whispers thus unto unwilling ears.

But oh! I've trusted in such faith, finding that trust in vain,

That with the same free openness I ne'er can hope again;
My loftiest thoughts are scorned the most, deemed but the false untrue—

Cold eyes and colder hearts here judge of what they never knew.

The life-flame burns so fast, mother, I fancy 'tis death-fed,
And such a hot, hot hand, mother, is laid upon my head!
Sweet voices murmur in my ear from out an angel throng;
A blessed hymn—anon, anon comes a fierce, fiendish song.

I know that thou art weeping, mother! I feel upon my cheek

Each hurried tear that silently tells woe thou canst not speak:—

But ah! my fount of tears is dry—I never more may weep;
I can but lay me down and die—sing me to my death-sleep.

THE WAIL OF THE TYROL.

BY R. T. CONRAD.

"When I visited the Tyrol, I asked a peasant why the people were all in mourning. 'Look at our towns,' replied he; 'you see they are all in ashes—and can you ask why we are in mourning!'"

I weep not for my father, although his silver hair
Far off on the silent battle-field streams on the putrid air;
I mourn not for my bright-eyed boy, my beautiful and brave,

Nor the gentle one whose cold arms clasp her treasure in the grave.

I weep not for the trusty friends which war has swept away,
Though my gallant brothers all are dead—and my sisters, where are they?

And my home, my own loved cottage, the happiest in the vale,

Its ashes sweep—yet I heed it not—on every passing gale.

I weep—but, stranger, selfish tears no Tyrol cheek can lave:

Our hills were freedom's sunlit thrones—they now are freedom's grave;

My country's heart is gasping, her voice is a voice of wail;
Despair shrieks on each mountain-top, and death shrouds every vale.

But we'll weep no more! Why should we weep? Is the spirit of freedom dead?

We'll change the hue of sorrow soon from the dark to the bloody red;

And the shout of the free again shall ring from mountain-top to shore,

And the peasant shall joy on his chainless hill, and the Tyrol wail no more.

TO LIZZIE.

BY M. KERR.

Come, sit thee down beside me now,

My sister and my love,

And let me look into thine eyes,

Blue as the sky above:

A very heaven they are to me,

So gentle and so still;

Bright with pure thoughts, borne from thy soul,

Like blossoms on a rill,

My sister dear!

May never shed a sweeter smile

O'er the glad earth than thine!

June hath no roses in her lap

Thy blushes to outshine:

A darker pall than thy black hair

Night ne'er drew o'er the skies;

Whence thy white brow, like breaking morn,

Gleams with thy starry eyes,

My sister fair!

If any joys be mine through life,
 Oh, let them strew thy way!
 Thou art my sun—when thou art bright,
 I live but in thy ray;
 But if a shadow o'er thee fall,
 Life's sunbeams fade and part;
 Oh! pity my light is gone—
 'Tis midnight in my heart,
 My sister love

My very soul is wrapt in thine,
 In many a bright fold laid;
 Our hopes together bud and bloom—
 Part them, and mine will fade.
 Still near thee let me struggle on,
 Still near thee smile and weep;
 And e'er thy lamp of life be quenched,
 Still near thee let me sleep,
 Sweet sister mine!

A WINTER DAY'S MUSINGS.

DEAR, dense, and gray,
 Those massive clouds which now o'erspread the sky;
 Bleak are the winds that rush so rudely by—
 Sad is their lay!

Hushed is the song
 Of birds; the gentle murr'ings of the rill,
 And lulling sound of fountains, too, are still,
 The woods among.

Withered, dead,
 Are buds of spring, and summer's gayer flowers;
 They perished with the bright and sunny hours
 So soon that fled!

Hopes high and glad
 Have faded, too, with all that's fair and bright;
 And hearts that summer hours found gay and light
 Are drear and sad.

Spring will restore
 Beauty and verdure to the earth again;
 Each wildwood warbler will pour forth a strain
 Of joy once more.

But to the heart
 That's blighted in its youth, oh! what can bring
 Its freshness back? This desolated thing
 Can never part

With all its woe;
 The perfume of a flower—the zephyr's sigh—
 A plaintive tone of music breathing nigh—
 The sunset's glow—

The starry skies—
 The gleam of waters in the silver light
 That Luna sheds upon the brow of night
 When daylight dies—

Each glorious thing
 That once was loved in days forever past,
 Will cause but vain regrets—fresh anguish cast—
 New sorrows bring

No radiant beam
 Of summer sun can e'er recall the glow
 Which the seared heart hath lost; dark is the flow
 Of its chilled stream.

No joyous, gay,
 Wild song of glee; no words of minstrelsy,
 Nor strains of rare and richest melody,
 Can chase away

The low, sad tone
 Which lingers o'er the heart-strings like the sound
 That with the sea-shell or the wind-harp's sound—
 A plaintive moan!

But yet the heart,
 Still proud in its despair, will never show
 To other eyes its deep, consuming woe;
 With cunning art,

Will teach the eye,
 And lip, and brow, a seeming light to wear,
 To hide beneath a smile each sign of care
 And sorrow high!

And thus—though light,
 And love, and beauty from the heart be gone—
 It still endures, and "brokenly lives on"—
 A wreck, a blight!

Washington, D. C., Feb. 1852.

F. A. J.

THE FOREST STREAM.

BY J. R. BARRICK.

In a low and ceaseless murmur,
 Gently flows the forest stream—
 Day and night to nature chanting
 Music sweet as song and dream—
 In the mirrored sky revealing
 All the beauty of its gleam.

With a song of joy and gladness,
 Merrily the minstrel sings,
 And each passing breeze and sephyr
 Wafts its carol on its wings,
 Till the air around, above it,
 Swells with magic murmurings.

Bubbling upward like a fountain,
 Born of melody and song;
 Like a transient gleam of beauty,
 Flows the silver stream along,
 Hymning anthems unto nature,
 She to whom its hymns belong.

Hastening onward, onward ever,
 Like the life that flows in me—
 As a wave upon the river
 Hastening to the distant sea—
 As a hope the hidden future
 Searching for the things to be.

Summer storms may o'er it gather;
 Winds of autumn round it wall;
 Winter, too, its bosom ruffle
 With his icy sleet and hail;
 But with summer, autumn, winter,
 Doth its steady flow prevail.

Thus life's fountain to the river
 In a winding current flows—
 And the river to the ocean
 In a channel deeper grows,
 Till the fountain, river, ocean,
 In eternity repose.

THE FLOWERS OF SPRING.

BY HORACE W. SMITH.

We have seen them by the forest shade,
And by the sunlit streams;
In childhood's walks, in manhood's years,
They are mingled in our dreams:
And oft they win our memory back
To some forgotten thing,
To seek the joy our childhood found
Among the flowers of spring.

But ah! they win us back in vain;
No after spring renews
That gift of vanquished sunshine which
Our souls so early lose:
The sunlit stream may murmur on,
The birds may gayly sing,
But friends we loved have passed away
Among the flowers of spring.

Yet fair and fragrant to the day
Each bright-eyed flow'et opens;
They are not withered like our hearts,
Nor blighted like our hopes;
And then each golden dream of youth
Its long-lost light will bring—
And all is bright, and all is hope,
Among the flowers of spring.

Huntingdon, March, 1852.

THINK OF ME.

BY "JAMIE."

WHEN pleasure's cup is sparkling high,
When friends around thee throng;
When hearts are light with playful mirth,
And lighter wakes the song;
When, counting o'er thy many joys,
Recalled by memory,
If 'twill not dim thy pleasure then,
Oh! give one thought to me.

At dawn, when first Aurora's light
Reflects o'er hill and dale,
And glides the dew-washed lily's head
That slept within the vale;
When first the lark shall plume his wing,
And soar from bondage free,
To warble forth his merry notes—
Then give one thought to me.

And when the shades of evening are Fast fading into night—
An hour that well seems made for thought,
And quiet is delight;
At midnight's deep and solemn hour,
When on thy bended knee,
Thy hands upraised to Heaven in prayer,
Oh then, ~~then~~ think of me!

If I could claim the richest gem
That now lies in the sea,
I'd rather far, than have that pearl,
Have one kind thought from thee:
If all the joys of this bright world
Were now spread out to me,
And I were told to make a choice—
I'd ask one thought from thee.

I THINK ON THEE.

I THINK on thee when early morn is breaking,
For thou art as the day-star to mine eye;
Thou art my first sweet thought upon awaking
From dreams wherein thine image passeth by.

I think on thee whene'er the bright sun bringeth
Day's busy hours and toll's unceasing strife;
Then, like a bird, to thee my spirit wingeth—
For thou art as the sunshine to my life.

I think on thee when twilight dews are stealing,
When the dim stars scarce light the softened air;
Then, then my shadowy thoughts thy form revealing—
Like those dim stars, thou hadst been hidden there.

I think on thee when silent midnight seemeth
As if it moved not on time's noiseless way;
Till, worn with thought, my busy fancy dreameth
That thou art smiling at my uncouth lay.

I think on thee, for ever, ever praying
That but one glance of thine may beam on me;
My truant thoughts are ever to thee straying—
Dost thou not feel that I but live in thee?

THE OLD CHURCHYARD.

BY BEATA.

I've won thee, won thee, gentle bride;
I've loved thee long, hope of my life—
And now I place thee at my side,
My dearer self, my darling wife.
Most beautiful to me thou art,
And to all others passing fair;
Then press thee closely to my heart,
Dearest of all things treasured there.

Remember, love, where first we met;
The churchyard with bright flowers o'erspread;
The church itself in emerald set,
A watcher o'er its buried dead.
The firs around, the grass beneath,
Shed faint perfume, a heavenly balm;
I almost feared to draw my breath
Lest I should break the soul-felt calm.

And thou! oh thou, so lovely beamed,
A very pearl in purity,
The spirit of the place I deemed
And could almost have worshipped thee!
That gray old church of bygone times
We gazed upon together then—
In silence gazed; no holy chimes
Called us to meet our fellow-men.

We entered—and thy sweet young face
All glorious looked in chaste joy;
We knelt in thine accustomed place—
Thou didst alone my thoughts employ.
Thou wert beside me, and I heard
Thy soft voice murmuring clear and low,
Responsive to the Holy Word,
Or in the chant melodious flow.

And ever from that tranquil hour
When life's blest fulness first was mine,
Thine image, love, alone had power
To charm me in my manhood's prime.

We parted then—a fresh bud thou
Expanding in thine early spring;
And I a youth, with purposed vow,
Time to my home should Eva bring.

I won thee there—and when at last
We reach our lives' appointed bourn,
And have Death's silent confines past,
Our dust shall there to dust return.
And should I first the dark vale tread,
Thy faithful love shall me enfold;
Or I will pillow thy dear head
Where first we met—that churchyard old.
Eva, beloved! why weepest thou!
Yes, precious one, 'twere hard to part;
Rest on my bosom thy fair brow,
And press thee closely to my heart.

THE BATTLE OF LIFE.

BY SAMUEL D. PATTERSON.

THE battle is waging! Why, warrior, away!
Dost thou listlessly stand from the din of the fray,
With thy head drooping low, and thy hand on thy brow,
As though Life and its conflict were naught to thee now?

Why motionless thou, whilst the gathering throng,
In double-mailed armor, are rushing along,
And the clangor of battle around thee is heard,
And the trumpet's loud tone every spirit has stirred?

But lately, thy heart was absorbed in the fight,
But lately, its trophies were viewed with delight,
And the might of thy arm, and thy courage, could vie
With the strongest and bravest who now pass thee by.

Their serried ranks move; but the noise of their tread
Meets thy ear as it falls on the ear of the dead:
'Tis strange that a summons, once needless, should now
Wake no fire in thy eye, and no light on thy brow!

Can it be that, before half life's battle is done,
Ere the contest is past and the victory won,
Thy spirit has shrunk from the strife raging there,
And been blighted, consumed by the touch of Despair?

Can it be that the ardor which once led thee on,
In the van of great hosts, towards the prize to be won,
Has chilled and grown weak at the threats of the foe?
Has thy arm become nerveless ere striking a blow?

Awake from thy stupor! Arouse thee again!
Take thy part in the strife—be a man amongst men!
Let thy soul shame the impulse that prompted thy fear,
In the hour of trial, when danger was near.

Wouldst thou list to the foeman exultingly cry,
That his threats blanched thy cheek, his words forced thee to fly?

Wouldst thou see thy friends mourning, in sorrow and shame,

O'er the wreck of thy glory, the brand on thy name?

Thou canst not—thou dar'st not! Then up to the field!
Keep thy post in the ranks till the foeman shall yield!
Let no timid doubts shake thee, no terrors dismay—
Stand firm for the truth, and thy valor display!

Be strong in the right! 'Tis a panoply sure,
An agis to guard thee and keep thee secure:
Wear it ever; and then, 'mid the thickest of strife,
Do thy part, as thou shouldst, in the Battle of Life!

FANCIES DURING ILLNESS.

BY FIDELIA H. COOK

BEAUTIFUL visions, that before me swim,
In softest light, whene'er mine eyes I close,
Ye are too fair to be the phantoms dim
That haunt the couch of opium-bought repose!
The angel Morphia hath a shadowy train,
But no such forms as yours adorn her pale domain.

Are ye some mirage from th' Eternal shore?
A soft reflection on the dreamlike mist
That o'er the sea of Death floats evermore?
A she whose willowy marge my foot hath kissed:
As in the Moslem's faith the houri waits,
And beckons, with white hands, to the Celestial gates?

Ah no! your beauty is of earth; it takes
Such forms as float before the artist's eye,
When, 'neath his touch, the glowing canvas wakes
To that strange life that ne'er again shall die;
Or as the chiselled marble bears, when wrought
To image to mankind the sculptor's lofty thought.

Oh, how much fairer than the shapes we see,
Are those with which a glowing fancy teems!
Too perfect to be true! And such were ye;
For ye were beautiful, and ye are dreams!
And thus our nature still transcends our fate,
Like high-born foundlings left at some poor peasant's gate.

And ye have passed away, and left no trace,
As roses leave the velvet cheeks of youth;
And yet I fancy that each form of grace
But shadows forth some unrecorded worth;
And on the heart's red leaves, in traces dim,
Shall Poesy for you inscribe one grateful hymn.

ELLA LEE.

BY JOHN W. BEAZEL.

THERE'S music in the sunbeam,
There's music in the shower,
There's music in each rippling stream,
Each leaf, and tree, and flower.

There's music in the moonlit sea,
Where the proud bark cleaves the billow;
And o'er thy grave, sweet Ella Lee,
'Tis sighing through the willow.

There's music in the mountain height,
And 'neath the dark pine shade,
Where silver streams are flashing bright,
And wild flowers paint the glade.

There's music in the joyous spring,
Where young flow'rs gem the sod;
And through each bright and lovely thing
It whispers, "There's a God!"

There was music once whose gentlest thrill
Was dearer far to me
Than leaf, or flower, or flashing rill,
Or starlight on the sea.

Its lute-like tones how oft they come
With gentle thoughts of thee!
But ah! they're hushed within the tomb,
Where sleeps my Ella Lee.

Uniontown, Pa.

AN EMBROIDERED VEST AND CAPS.

EMBROIDERED VEST.

THE materials are blue satin and embroidery silk. The pattern should be drawn with a white crayon. Then proceed to do the outline of the design, the stems and the tendrils in chain stitch. The leaves and the flowers in the usual embroidery stitch. It is made up in the ordinary way, the front fastened by a row of gold buttons set with turquoise. The same pattern may be worked either on lace or muslin. If lace, work in tambour and chain stitch; give the collar and front a narrow thread edge, and line it with silk of some delicate hue. Studs may be substituted for buttons. Vests of cambric muslin, to be worn with lawns or light summer silks, will be very much the style the present and ensuing month. For description of embroidered muslin manilla, see "Chitchat."

No. 1.

No. 2.

CAPS.

WE give two styles of breakfast caps: No. 1 being composed of dotted India muslin, with three corresponding frills. It will be noticed that the muslin of the crown is shirred between corresponding bands of insertion. To be finished with bow and strings of muslin, or ribbon, to the taste of the wearer.

No. 2 is of net, lined with a delicate shade of Florence silk. The trimming is a row of silk and net, with three of fringe, formed by loops of extremely narrow ribbon. Broad ribbon strings of corresponding shade.

PATTERNS FOR SILK EMBROIDERY.

This pattern forms an elegant border for a merino or cloth cloak, by working the curved line with cord and the rose-buds with silk.

KNITTED BERRIES AND FRUIT.

APPLE AND ORANGE.

Cast on thirty-four stitches with white knitting cotton, No. 10.

Knit one plain row.

Second row.—Purled, till within two from the end, turn back.

Third row.—Knit plain till within two from the end, turn back.

Fourth row.—Purled, till within four from the end, turn back.

Fifth row.—Knit plain till within four from the end, turn back.

Sixth row.—Purled, till within six from the end, turn back.

Seventh row.—Knit plain till within six from the end, turn back.

Eighth row.—Purled, till within eight from the end, turn back.

Ninth row.—Knit plain till within eight from the end, turn back.

Tenth row.—Purled to the end.

Eleventh row.—Knit plain to the end, and begin again as at second row; but the tenth row is to be purled till within ten from the end; eleventh row knitted till within ten from the end; twelfth row purled to the end; thirteenth row knitted plain to the end. Then begin again as at second row. After fourteen stripes, ending alternately one at the eleventh, the other at the thirteenth row. Cast off all the stitches; sew the two edges together; gather the stitches of the smaller aperture, fasten them tight round the stalk of a common clove, and fill up with bran, as full as possible, this white shape of an apple; when it is nearly full, fold a bit of wire in ten or twelve; cover it with brownish floss or half twist silk to make the stalk of the apple; gather the stitches of the second aperture, fill up with bran, as much as you can, and fasten off tight to the stalk. Then knit another apple in wool or silk of the color of the apple which you have chosen for model, and exactly in the same manner as the white one, but beginning with thirty-eight or forty stitches, and making one stripe more, or two plain rows between each stripe. Cover neatly with this the white shape, allowing the clove to show its head only. Make a little depression round the stalk of the apple by passing through the fruit three or four times, with a long darning-needle, the silk with which you have fastened the last aperture, and draw it tight. A leaf may be added, but is not necessary.

The orange is worked in the same manner, except that there are no purled rows, no clove put in, and no stalk.

ANGLO-JAPANESE WORK.

THIS elegant and most useful work is very easy in its execution, while the means and appliances for its performance are within the reach of every one. The materials are simply yellow withered leaves, a little dissolved gum, black paint, and copal varnish; while the objects to be ornamented may be a box, cupboard, table, &c., in fact, any old furniture that has been rendered unsightly by age or long use. A plain deal box, costing about a shilling, may by this process, so far as the outside goes, be converted into a costly-looking dressing-case. An exquisite chess-board may be made, with very little skill, from a square piece of deal. Flower-pots, pole-screens, folding and hand-screens, may all be decorated in this manner, and, from untidy-looking lumber, may be converted into articles of use, elegance, and beauty; and this at a merely nominal expense, taste being the chief requisite in the production. The employment forms one of the most agreeable and pleasing amusements for summer days and winter evenings; in the summer giving a purpose and an aim to many a joyous ramble, for in these desultory walks a goodly collection may be made of Nature's ambered jewels.

All leaves that are small, of uneven shape, and serrated at the edges, are well adapted for this work. As they are collected, they should be placed between sheets of paper, but not close together, then pressed by placing a board on the top, with a weight upon it, to express any moisture that may be therein, and to render them quite flat. In the autumn, the sweet-scented geranium-leaves, the maple, thorn, chrysanthemum, wild parsley, fern, and a multitude of others may be found, including the smaller sycamore and small vine leaves; but they must all have turned of a golden hue, or reddish-tinted yellow. Prepare the article to be ornamented thus: First rub the surface smoothly down with sand-paper; then coat it over with black paint, which can be procured ready mixed at any oil-shop; when dry, rub it down smoothly with pumice-stone, and give two more coats. When these are dry, arrange the leaves on the surface in a careless manner, but not in groups, unless preferred. Butterflies, drawn and colored yellow with gamboge, or cut out of prints, and then colored, may be stuck at different spaces with advantage; but there should be no other color than the brown and different tints of yellow in the leaves. Gum the wrong side of the leaf, and press it on in its appointed place with a hard tuft of wadding, fastened tightly up in a piece of silk. Continue this with the whole of the leaves; and when they are all gummed on, dissolve some gelatine or isinglass in warm water, and while rather warm, brush it well over every portion of the work, using the brush entirely one way, not forward and back. When dry, give the work three coats of the best copal varnish, letting the article remain a day or two between each coat. This process, though elaborate in detail, is easily and even quickly done, and will well repay any trouble that may be taken, as, with a renewed coat of varnish every five or six years, it will remain, as long as the wood will hold together, as bright in appearance as when first finished.

CANDLE-LAMP MAT.

Materials.—Half ounce each of stone-color and shaded violet, 8-thread; half ounce of shaded amber, 4-thread Berlin wool; 4 yards of ordinary-sized blind or skirt-cord; 77 small curtain rings, the size measuring across five-eighths of an inch; Nos. 1 and 2 Penelope Hook; 2 bunches No. 6 steel beads.

With No. 1 hook, and drab wool, work 11 stitches de over the end of the cord; double in as small a circle as possible, unite, and work 2 stitches into every loop for three more rounds.

5th round.—1 stitch into every loop.

6th.—Increase 1 stitch in every 2d loop. There must be 72 stitches in this round.

7th.—Place a pin in every 9th loop, and in this same 9th loop work with 8-thread violet, 1 stitch; then 9 stitches drab in the next 8 loops, that is, increasing 1 stitch in about the 4th loop; repeat this all round.

8th.—Work 3 stitches violet into the 1 violet stitch; then 9 stitches drab, working only 8 stitches in the last compartment, to commence next row.

9th.—In the last drab stitch that was not worked into, work 1 violet stitch; then 4 more violet; then 7 drab, increasing 1 in 4th stitch; in the last compartment make only 2 drab after the increased stitch, in order to make 8 violet in next round.

10th.—8 violet, the 1st to come before the 5th violet of last row, and the last to come after the 5th violet, but increasing 1 violet on the 5th stitch; then 7 drab, increasing one in the 4th drab stitch.

11th.—All violet, increasing 1 in every 5th stitch.

12th.—All violet, but without increasing, unless required.

The diameter of the mat should now measure six inches across; but, should it be required larger, another row of cord, or even two, will give the increased size.

Now de under all the rings, about 30 to 32 stitches for each ring are necessary; unite and tie the knot very neatly, and sew six of these rings round a 7th, sewing them with cotton the color, and sewing them at the parts where each ring is joined, about 6 stitches in length; be careful that no stitches are seen on the right side; then sew steel beads round the centre ring, taking up five to six beads at a time on the needle; then place the needle between the joinings of the rings, take upon it about 35 beads, and draw the cotton across to the opposite point; repeat this twice more, the beads will then form as given in engraving; sew the circles of rings on to the mat by two of the rings, and sew the circles together by one ring. Any other color beside amber will do for the rings. If the table-cover is scarlet, green wool should be used; if blue, amber; or if green, scarlet or pink.

EDITORS' TABLE.

In the March number, we made an "Appeal to American Christians on behalf of the 'Ladies' Medical Missionary Society of Philadelphia.'"

We are highly gratified by the reception given to our Appeal. The public, generally, received it with favor, as almost daily letters evince. It has been noticed kindly, and republished, in part or wholly, in many public journals and newspapers.* A large number of clergymen, eminent in station, talents, and piety, have written to express their interest in the movement, and offer their co-operation. We shall, in a future number, give extracts from these interesting letters. Now we will introduce the opinions of two ladies, whose merits and influence are well known to our readers.

Letter from Mrs. L. H. Sigourney, dated Hartford, Conn., January 7, 1852:—

"The excellence of the design of the 'Ladies' Medical Missionary Society of Philadelphia,' as well as the institution of that nature (N. E. Fem. Med. Col.) established in Boston, approves itself to wise and thoughtful judges, as not only congenial to the capacity and sphere of woman, but as a measure of patriotism and philanthropy. I am, therefore, happy to comply with your request to become one of its patrons."

Letter of Mrs. Frances M. Hill.—The second letter is from that Christian lady so highly distinguished for her long and able services in the Mission School, established by the American Protestant Episcopal Church, at Athens, Greece. Her letter is dated March 26, 1852:—

"Your kind note of January last, together with the 'Appeal on behalf of the Ladies' Medical Missionary Society,' reached me some weeks since, but numerous engagements have prevented me from replying to it sooner. The 'Appeal' itself exhibits so fully the numerous reasons which make the acquisition of Medical Science for Women highly desirable, that it is quite unnecessary for me to add anything more on the subject. There can be little doubt but that such knowledge would greatly increase the sphere of usefulness to every female missionary. Perhaps a simple statement of my own experience may serve as an encouragement to those whose minds have been turned to the consideration of this subject.

"In the early stage of our missionary career,† a knowledge of medicine would have been a great benefit, both as

* The "Appeal" has also been republished, with many commendations, in "Sharpe's London Magazine" for March, and widely circulated in England. We have received most cheering sympathy, encouragement, and approval, reaching us from the intelligent and influential of the Old World as well as the New. It is, indeed, true, as the Committee of the Legislature of Massachusetts say, in their Report on Female Medical Education:—

"The public journals, having had occasion to allude to or discuss the subject, have with great unanimity given their influence in favor of the movement, many of them expressing their views in the strongest terms of approval."

† Rev. John Hill and his wife, Frances M. Hill, were sent to Greece in 1832, where they have ever since remained.

it respected ourselves and those around us. As it was, the little quackery which we must, more or less, become acquainted with, gave us a great reputation. A simple cathartic; a decoction of aniseed or liquorice for a cough; and, above all, a solution of sulphate of zinc for the eyes, have been attended with such beneficial effects, that my reputation in the healing art is fully established; and I find it difficult to evade the importunities to engage in higher practice. Even when physicians are, as now, numerous, and very good ones, too (all of whom pay great attention to the medical wants of the poor), I find, among a certain class, that 'the teacher's prescription' is held in higher estimation than that of the regular practitioner; and sometimes our own physician, who is somewhat facetious, threatens to arraign me for practising without a diploma, pretending to be jealous of the confidence I have gained over the ignorant and superstitious, which science has, as yet, failed to obtain.

"As it may be gratifying to you to learn how far your views respecting female midwives have been sanctioned by modern practice (the ancient practice was entirely in the hands of women, all writers allow), I must inform you that among the first institutions provided for by government, after the establishment of the kingdom of Greece, was one for midwifery. The native practitioners—all females—were compelled to attend. A well-instructed, and, in all respects, well-qualified woman, who had studied in Italy, was placed at the head of this institution.

"Young women who could read were sought for, and inducements offered to them to become midwives. Some of the older pupils from our school entered, have since completed their studies, and are among the regular practitioners in this branch. Male physicians are only called upon in cases of great emergency, and this is rather to give testimony that the case has been properly conducted than from any personal practice they may render.

"Some time since, the advantage of having Female Physicians for Protestant Missions was presented to me by reading the account of the Institution of Kaiserswerth* (on the Rhine), sent me by a young friend who had previously been spending some weeks with us. The Institution at Kaiserswerth, under the direction of the Rev. Pastor Fieldner, prepares pious young women for various departments of missionary operations. The study of medicine forms a part of this preparation. The graduates of this Institution are set apart for their work, and receive the title of Deaconesses. Some of these have been sent to our own country, and have an institution at Pittsburg. In the spring of last year, Mr. Hill met four of these Deaconesses on the steamer between Corfu and Syria; they were accompanied by the good Pastor Fieldner, and were on their way to Jerusalem, to take charge of a hospital which the King of Prussia has founded at an expense of $50,000.

"We have heard of them recently, and learn that the effort has been attended with great success, and promises to be a most important aid in facilitating the operations of the missionary on that most interesting spot. I hope these details may prove encouraging to all engaged in the execution of the plan; there can be no doubt that a well-qualified female physician must be a great advantage to all missionary stations."

* See Fredrika Bremer's article on this Institution, in the "Lady's Book" for June.

Mrs. Hill's letter needs no comment. It must carry the conviction to every unprejudiced mind, that medical science is a proper study for woman—is the science for which the sex is peculiarly fitted; and that as missionaries, women, when thus qualified, may render most essential service in the cause of humanity and the advancement of Christian morals in heathen lands. Men can never gain access to the homes and harems where the women and children of Eastern nations dwell. If these poor, ignorant ones are healed and taught, it must be done by pious Christian women. Therefore, we feel sure our readers will rejoice to learn that the two Colleges* alluded to in our March number are prospering greatly. The late Report (April 14, 1852) of the Massachusetts Legislature, in favor of granting $10,000 to aid the Institution in Boston, holds this language: "Considered in its various features of usefulness, the institution conducted and sustained by the Female Medical Education Society, it appears to us, must rank among the most important educational establishments in the State; and it certainly appears to be a suitable and desirable object for legislative encouragement."

It is greatly to be desired that Pennsylvania, either by legislative aid or private donations, should contribute to build up the Female Medical College in this city, as the New England people are encouraging their own institution of the like design.

The Boston "Medical and Surgical Journal," the organ of the profession in New England, suggests to physicians the expediency of co-operating in carrying out the clearly expressed wishes of the public.

Surely the physicians of Philadelphia will be as unanimous in lending their approval and encouragement.

We here subjoin two poems written for our "Book," the first by a Greek gentleman, for several years a resident in our republic; the other by a German, author of the work on "German Literature" noticed in our March number.

ALABAMA.—A SONNET.

BY ALEXANDER PANTOLEON.

FROM her Olympian and Castalian home,
My muse to Alabama's clime doth roam;
Where Helicon!—no—Chunneenuggee soars,
And, for Ilissus, Chizeenozee pours!

To Locheepoko turkey sportsmen go,
And where magnolias cheer Escambia's flow;
Where Coosa under giant pines bears trade,
And swoll'n Tombigby rolls in live-oak shade.

Towards Tennessee ride hunters of the fawn;
They leave Wedowee with the opening dawn:
Red men from Talladega there are gone.

How hushed, betwixt Tuscumbla and Mobile,
The savage warwhoop! while the Saxon's wheel
And Lybia's banjo ring their merry peal!

Lafayette, Ala., April 9, 1852.

* The New England Female Medical College in Boston, and the Pennsylvania Female Medical College in Philadelphia. The third session of this College commences September 13. Those young ladies who wish to attend may address their letters to David J. Johnson, M.D., 229 Arch Street, Philadelphia.

THE HEART.

BY FRANK A. MOSCHISKEER.

LOVELY! most lovely, is the human heart,
If from the God most holy it depart!
Each object then, however dear in life—
Wealth, friends, and children, even the lovely wife—
All that is prized by worldlings as their pleasure—
Is but a shadow of the heavenly treasure.

God is the heart's sure refuge when afflicted,
Though in the sight of men we stand convicted:
They may condemn us innocent, untried;
But, if the heart be true and sanctified,
Ne'er can our hope from happiness be riven,
For peace, the heavenly peace, to us is given.

But oh! how desolate and dark the heart,
If from this holy faith it should depart!
Nor can the Infidel be made to feel
Till God his loving mercies doth reveal.
If sin in thy dark heart hath made its bed,
Destroy it by the blood which Christ for thee hath shed.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—The following articles are accepted: "Woman in her Social Relations," "The Lady of Haddon Hall," "Stanzas," "Herbert Leslie," "To my little Edward," "Fun in Earnest," "The Soldier's Dream of Home," "Recollections," &c., "To Sabina," and "You cannot blind his wing."

The following pieces are not wanted: "Pains of Fancy," "Scenes in Paris," "Country Winds," "Night and Morning," "Sabbath Reflections," "Solitude," "Ernest Essenberg," "A Vision," "To-Morrow," "An Indian War Song," "Ah, why so sad?" "The Lone Heart," "Wanderings," and "Melancholy."

We have not had time to examine all the articles sent last month, but shall report them in August.

OUR TREASURY.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF GRAMMAR.

BY LADY MORGAN.

I ASKED the question, should I say "everybody is gone out only I," or "only me?" and was answered "only I," because "only I" means "I alone"—"remain," being understood.

Had I used the conjunction "but," instead of "only," the proper construction would have been the same, because "but" means "be out," or, in more modern phrase, "I being out of the question." The modern "but," said my informant, represents two distinct words, both imperatives. When it stands for "be out," it is the precise equivalent of "except," derived from the Latin. Sometimes it is used for the imperative of an obsolete verb, signifying to add, which is now retained only in the infinitive, "to boot." Let us look for an instance: here is one in Sir Charles Grandison, which lies open before me. Marriot Byron writes, after some preliminary reflections, "But, why should I torment myself? what must be, will." The interpretation of the passage is this: to what I have already said, boot (or, in modern English, add) this second thought, that what must be, will; and, therefore, why should I torment myself? These two are the only real meanings of that Proteus-like conjunction; and one or other will explain all Johnson's hundred instances, scarcely one of which he understood properly. Johnson's industry was unwearied, but his research trifling. Authority, and not analysis, was its object. Authority belonged to his day, inquiry to ours: so adieu to learning—and hey! for knowledge—à bas les savans! à vive le savoir!

Alas! it makes one's head ache to look over this grammatical jargon: I wrote my first twenty volumes without much troubling my head on the subject. But now "the schoolmaster is abroad;" that is, he is at home—with me—and my march of intellect goes on without ever budging from the fireside. "Mon voyage autour de ma cheminée," would not be the least intellectual book I ever wrote. And yet my dear Mr. Colburn would not give me £20 for all the grammar that I may write for the rest of my life; though I rivalled in etymological philosophy "The Diversions of Purley."

Before I drop grammar—what a droll pun is that of the grammarian presenting his book to the Académie, after the Duke de ——— had advanced his pretensions to be elected one of the quarante, on the score of his illustrious ancestors. "Je suis ici pour mon grand-père," said the duke. "Je suis ici pour ma GRAMMAIRE," said his ignoble philological competitor.

By the by, grammar is the last thing that should be placed in the hands of children, as containing the most abstract and metaphysical propositions, utterly beyond their powers of comprehension; putting them to unnecessary torture; giving them the habit of taking words for things, and exercising their memory at the expense of their judgment. But this is the original sin of education, in all its branches.

BEAUTY.

BY ELIZABETH BARRETT BROWNING.

THE essence of all Beauty I call Love.
The attribute, the evidence, the end,
The consummation, to the inward sense,
Of beauty apprehended from without,
I still call love. As form, when colorless,
Is nothing to the eye: that pine-tree there,
Without its black and green, being all a blank;
So, without Love, is Beauty undiscerned
In man or angel.

Literary Notices.

From HENRY CAREY BAIRD (successor to E. L. Carey), 8. E. Corner of Market and Fifth Streets, Philadelphia:—

THE PRACTICAL MODEL CALCULATOR, for the Engineer, Mechanic, Machinist, Manufacturer of Enginework, Naval Architect, Miner, and Millwright. By Oliver Byrne, Civil, Military, and Mechanical Engineer. Mr. Byrne is the author of a number of practical works relating to the duties of machinists, mechanics, and engineers, all of which have been highly appreciated and warmly commended by those best able to judge of their merits.

THE ASSAYER'S GUIDE; or, Practical Directions to Assayers, Miners, and Smelters, for the Tests and Assays, by Heat and by Wet Process, of the Ores of all the Principal Metals, and of Gold and Silver Coins and Alloys. By Oscar M. Lieber, late Geologist to the State of Mississippi. A very useful book in this metallic, mining, and smelting age.

From LEPPINCOTT, GRAMBO & Co. (successors to Grigg & Elliot), No. 14 North Fourth Street, Philadelphia:—

ROMANCE OF NATURAL HISTORY; or, Wild Scenes and Wild Hunters. By C. W. Webber, author of "Shot in the Eye," "Old Hicks, the Guide," etc. etc. This is an elegant volume of six hundred clearly-printed pages. The style of the author is vigorous, and well adapted to the exciting incidents and wild scenery he describes. The work is handsomely illustrated, and, in all respects, is creditable alike to the author and his publishers.

LIFE OF LORD JEFFREY. With a Selection from his Correspondence. By Lord Cockburn, one of the Judges of the Court of Sessions in Scotland. In two volumes. The life and correspondence of Francis Jeffrey will naturally excite the attention and curiosity of literary men in every quarter of the world. He who, when living, was esteemed as the greatest of British critics, when dead cannot be forgotten, having left behind him a record as imperishable as the history and the monuments of his country. The work appears to have been written with great care and equal candor, attributing to Lord Jeffrey nothing that was not true of him, and, at the same time, exposing some of the "clap-traps" through which indiscreet friends aimed to elevate his reputation. The biographer assures us that, out of many hundreds of letters that he had seen, "there was scarcely three lines that might not be read with propriety to any sensitive lady, or to any fastidious clergyman."

From CHARLES SCRIBNER, New York, through LEPPINCOTT, GRAMBO & Co., Philadelphia:—

PYNSHURST: his Wanderings and Ways of Things. The poetical language, the incidents, and the characters introduced by the author, Donald MacLeod, are all calculated to rivet the attention of the reader.

From LINDSAY & BLACKSTON, Philadelphia:—

HISTORY OF ENGLAND IN VERSE, from the Invasion of Julius Cæsar to the Present Time. With illustrative notes, chronological chart of the kings of England, tables of cotemporary sovereigns, and a table descriptive of the present condition of Great Britain. The authoress tells us that this work has been written in verse under the impression that the facts referred to will be more readily retained in the memory than had they been written in prose. We hope she will not be disappointed in her anticipations, her object being praiseworthy.

From M. W. DODD, New York, through LINDSAY & BLACKSTON, Philadelphia:—

REVOLUTIONARY MEMORIALS, embracing Poems by the Rev. Wheeler Case, published in 1773, and an Appendix, containing Burgoyne's Proclamation (in burlesque), dated June 23, 1777. A late Authentic Account of the Death of Miss Jane M'Crea. The American Hero, a Supplic Ode, by Nat. Niles, A. M., &c. Edited by the Rev. Stephen Dodd, of East Haven, Conn. As in certain quarters, and among a certain class of authors, there appears to be a disposition prevailing to smooth over the tyranny which preceded the American Revolution, and even to conceal many of the cruelties which followed that event, as instigated and practised by the enemies of freedom, we look upon this little memorial as worthy of more than ordinary consideration. The time for hatred and revenge has happily passed away; but that is no reason why we should cease to remember the causes which produced the separation from the mother country, and which eventually gave rise to our republican system of government.

From HARPER & BROTHERS, New York, through LINDSAY & BLACKSTON, Philadelphia:—

THE HOWADJI IN SYRIA. By George Curtis, author of "Nile Notes." A very interesting volume, abounding in graphic and spirited sketches of eastern scenery and eastern manners.

NOTES, EXPLANATORY AND PRACTICAL, ON THE BOOK OF REVELATIONS. By Albert Barnes. This volume, we believe, is the sixteenth and last of the author's

"Notes" on the New Testament, and on the books of Isaiah, Job, and Daniel, which were commenced by the learned and laborious commentator more than twenty years ago. It will be found highly useful to theological students, and to readers of the sacred Scriptures generally.

ROMANISM AT HOME. Letters to the Hon. Roger B. Taney, Chief Justice of the United States. By Kirwan. The author of this book is the Rev. Dr. Murray, a native of Ireland. In these letters, addressed to the Chief Justice of the United States, a native Roman Catholic, Dr. Murray, in his own peculiar style, describes what he saw in his own country and in Rome, of the effects, as he thinks, of that religion as well upon the State as upon the people.

From A. HART (late Carey & Hart), corner of Fourth and Chestnut Street, Philadelphia:—

THE YEAR-BOOK OF FACTS IN SCIENCE AND ART: exhibiting the most Important Discoveries and Improvements of the Year, in Mechanics and the Useful Arts; Natural Philosophy; Electricity; Chemistry; Zoology and Botany; Geology and Geography; Meteorology and Astronomy. By John Timbs, Editor of the "Arcana of Science and Art." The title of this book, with the great respectability of the London and Philadelphia publishers, will be a sufficient guarantee to the reader for the useful character of its contents.

From CHARLES SCRIBNER, New York, through A. HART, Philadelphia:—

HUNGARY IN 1851, WITH AN EXPERIENCE OF THE AUSTRIAN POLICE. By Charles Loring Brace. The facts embraced in this interesting volume were collected by the author during a journey through Hungary, pursuing which he had unusual advantages for observing thoroughly the conditions and feelings of the masses of the Hungarian people.

THE HOUSEHOLD OF SIR THOMAS MORE. There is a great deal in this little volume to attract the attention of Christian fathers, and to suggest noble sentiments to judges, statesmen, and to all in authority.

From JOHN S. TAYLOR, New York, through A. HART (late Carey & Hart), Philadelphia:—

FANCIES OF A WHIMSICAL MAN. By the author of "Musing of an Invalid." This is another sparkling volume from the pen of a keen observer of human nature in all its phases. It abounds in terse and rapidly-flowing sentences, embracing a greater amount of wisdom and sound morality, and evincing a deeper philosophical inquiry into the habits and follies of the creature man, than is generally attained by those who set themselves up for reformers and authors in these modern times, when all things are brought to early maturity through the wonderful agency of steam and gas-light.

From J. S. REDFIELD, Clinton Hall, New York, through W. B. ZIEBEN, Philadelphia:—

LEGENDS OF LOVE AND CHIVALRY. The Cavaliers of England; or, the Times of the Revolutions of 1664 and 1688. By Henry William Herbert, author of "The Roman Traitor," "Marmaduke Wyvil," "Cromwell," etc. This volume, besides much that is new, embraces several tales of peculiar interest, selected from the early productions of the author. The latter, however, have been carefully revised and retouched; and, having been thus subjected to a judgment now matured, and to a pen guided by experience, will doubtless be received by the public, and by the author's numerous admirers, as most acceptable memorials of his genius, and of the purity of his style.

VOL. XLV.—9

From GOULD & LINCOLN, Boston, through W. B. ZIEBEN, Philadelphia:—

CHAMBERS'S POCKET MISCELLANY. Vol. 1. Each volume complete in itself. This is an unbound volume of one hundred and eighty pages, and is the first of a series recently commenced by the Messrs. Chambers, of Edinburgh, with whom the American publishers have made arrangements for early reprints in this country. The work, as we are told, will consist of amusing articles from "Chambers's Journal," supposed to be out of print, and is intended, in these days of cheap and rapid travelling, cheaply and rapidly to help the traveller along by affording him light and entertaining reading. Price 20 cents.

From DERBY & MILLER, Auburn, New York:—

MEMOIR OF ADONIRAM JUDSON: being a Sketch of his Life and Missionary Labors. By J. Clement, author of "Noble Deeds of American Women." This work has been before the public for some time, but still retains its great interest, which must continue and increase, with the friends of foreign missions.

THE LIVES OF MRS. ANNE H. JUDSON AND MRS. SARAH B. JUDSON, with a Biographical Sketch of Mrs. Emily C. Judson, Missionaries to Burmah. In three volumes. By Abella W. Stewart. This is a most valuable companion for the volume to which we have just referred, affording evidences of Christian zeal on the part of three devoted women, which may, indeed, challenge comparison in modern times.

SUMMERFIELD; OR, LIFE ON A FARM. By Day Kellogg Lea. A most excellent book, in which fiction is made to subserve the interests of morality and religion. Indeed, we have not seen a book for a long time, in which the quiet and social virtues have been more impressively illustrated than they have been by the author of "Life on a Farm." We know enough of farm life ourselves to induce us to believe that it is not always free from those cares, and from that solicitude engendered by ambition, which are the great annoyances in other states of life. To correct and to regulate these has been the principal object of the author, and we think his success will be complete with all rational and considerate readers.

GOLDEN STEPS TO RESPECTABILITY, USEFULNESS, AND HAPPINESS. Being a Series of Lectures to Youth of both Sexes, on Character, Principles, Associates, Amusements, Religion, and Marriage. By John Mather Austin, author of "Voice of Youth," "Voice to Married," etc. Ten thousand copies of this valuable book have had a ready sale.

THE YOUNG LADY'S BOOK; or, Principles of Female Education. This is a very good book, calculated to establish in the mind of the inexperienced a sound and womanly discretion. It is very much to be regretted that the appearance of works of this description is so few and far between. At the same time, it must be confessed that authors are as much to blame, if not more than the public, with respect to the due encouragement of such practical works as the one before us. Public taste and public morals would, in our opinion, finally prove obedient to the careful moulding of such authors, were more of them to enter the field with the same amount of courage and good-will.

WHAT I SAW IN LONDON; or, Men and Things in the Great Metropolis. By D. W. Bartlett. This appears to be an unprejudiced review of men and incidents as they were presented to the author's judgment during two years' residence, at different periods, in the city of London. Without doing injustice or giving offence to any one, the author appears to have manfully sustained the character of his country.

THE LIFE OF THE EMPRESS JOSEPHINE, FIRST

WIFE OF NAPOLEON. By P. C. Headley, author of "Women of the Bible," etc. This work has passed through a number of editions.

MEMOIRS OF THE MOTHER AND WIFE OF WASHINGTON. By Margaret C. Conkling, author of Harper's translation of "Florian's History of the Moors of Spain." This popular work has also run through several editions. It should be read by every wife and mother in America who can appreciate female virtue and patriotism.

From JAMES MUNROE & Co., Boston and Cambridge:—

THE WORKS OF SHAKESPEARE: the text carefully restored according to the first editions, with Introductions, Notes, original and selected, and a Life of the Poet. By Rev. H. N. Hudson, A. M. In eleven volumes. We have now before us volumes three and four of this series, comprising eight plays, viz., "The Merchant of Venice," "As You Like It," "All's Well that Ends Well," "Taming of the Shrew," "A Winter's Tale," "Comedy of Errors," "Macbeth," and "King John." The merits of Shakespeare need no eulogy; two hundred years of glory are sufficient to stamp the value of his writings. But the manner in which this edition is prepared by the editor, and got up by the publishers, is deserving of great commendation. As a work for schools and families, this edition will be found better adapted than any other we have examined. The volumes are convenient in size, and the printing clear.

THE GREEK GIRL: a Tale in Two Cantos. By James Wright Simmons. The story is well described in the preface: "A Greek maiden, of gentle birth, but parentless, whom the casualties of Eastern warfare had reduced to the condition of a Mohammedan slave, and who, by a similar casualty, is restored to her original and far more appropriate character, that of a heroine," is the centre and attraction of this poem. There is no lack of stirring incidents, and the descriptions are striking, and often powerful. Some errors in sentiment might be pointed out; but then we have no room for extracts to show the many beauties. Ours is only a notice; the work deserves a review. For sale by A. Hart, Philadelphia.

FRESH FLOWERS FOR CHILDREN. By a Mother. With engravings. A very nice little book, which the young will love to read, and profit by the reading.

THE MEMORY OF WASHINGTON; with Biographical Sketches of his Mother and Wife. Relations of Lafayette to Washington; with Incidents and Anecdotes in the Lives of the two Patriots. The world will never tire of Washington, and if that were possible with the old, this charming volume will endear his memory more deeply in the hearts of the young. It is a book replete with interest, every page having its separate charm. It should be in every school library, and on the centre-table of every family-room in the land.

THE HOUSE ON THE ROCK. By the author of "A Trap to Catch a Sunbeam," "Old Jolliffe," etc. etc. The series of little books to which this belongs have had a wide popularity in England as well as in our Republic. The first published, "A Trap to Catch a Sunbeam," was a charming story. This last book has the like aim of doing good and teaching how to be happy, that stamps all the writings of the author. It will be popular.

COMPANIONS OF MY SOLITUDE. By the author of "Essays Written in the Intervals of Business," "Friends in Council," etc. The foregoing productions of this writer have been so excellent, that we took up this volume expecting to be pleased; and it has equalled—indeed, exceeded our hope. Full of deep and probing reflections on the present aspects of society, the work is yet more valuable for its suggestions which reach the future conditions of humanity. The style is pure as the thoughts it serves to make more beautiful; and, altogether, these "Companions" will cheer the solitary, or add zest to the social meetings of "friends in council." The author has that earnest purpose of doing good which never fails of its mark; and the publishers deserve the thanks of the community for bringing out, in their liberal style, these attractive and valuable books.

NOVELS, SERIALS, PAMPHLETS, &c.

From T. B. Peterson, Philadelphia: "Arrah Neill." A Novel. By G. P. R. James, author of "Richelieu," etc. Three volumes complete in one. Price 25 cents.—"Falkland." A Novel. By Sir E. L. Bulwer, author of "Lucretia," etc. Only cheap edition ever printed. Price 25 cents.—"The Mob Cap, and other Tales." By Mrs. Caroline Lee Hentz. This large volume contains nine of the most popular tales of the authoress, Mrs. Hentz, whose numerous works of fiction, blended as they have been with practical and useful lessons in manners and morals, have placed her name among the first female writers of our country. Price 50 cents.

From Stacy & Richardson, Boston: "Crayon Sketches and Off-hand Takings of Distinguished American Statesmen, Orators, Divines, Essayists, Editors, Poets, and Philanthropists." By George W. Bungay.

From Harper & Brothers, New York, through Lindsay & Blakiston, Philadelphia: "Pictorial Field Book of the Revolution." This ably conducted work has reached its twenty-second number.—"London Labor and London Poor." By Henry Mayhew. Part 18. Price 12½ cents.—"The Dalton; or, Three Roads in Life." By Charles Lever, author of "Maurice Finney," etc. This is a work of more than ordinary interest, though we may not be prepared to enter into all the author's views.

From Lippincott, Grambo & Co., Philadelphia: "The Milliner and the Millionaire." By Mrs. Dr. Hicks, of Virginia, authoress of the "Lady-Killer," etc.

From Bunie & Brother, New York, through T. B. Peterson: "Remorse, and other Tales." By G. P. R. James, Esq.

From A. Hart (late Carey & Hart): "Woodreave Manor; or, Six Months in Town." A Tale to suit the merits and the follies of the times. By Anna Hanson Dorsey, author of the "Student of Blenheim Forest," &c. Price 50 cents. This is a tale of more than usual interest to the American reader.—"Clifton; or, Modern Fashion," etc. A Novel. By Arthur Townley. Love, law, and politics are here thrown together, and mingled with the usual incidents connected with those interesting matters, and in the free and easy style which always finds admirers.

"The Lantern." Publication Office 149 Fulton Street, New York. This is a very amusing publication; witty and sarcastic, but retaining a position above vulgarity, and marked by no evidences of malice or scurrility. Its word-cuts have been justly compared to those of the London Punch.

From Long & Brothers, New York: "Wau-Nan-Gee; or, the Massacre of Chicago." Those who are fond of investigating the characters of the aboriginal inhabitants of this continent will find in the volume here presented an amount of information in respect to the peculiarities of that race which will greatly interest them.

Godey's Arm-Chair.

READER! you may not be aware of the fact, but this first day of July is, indeed, the birthday of "Godey's Lady's Book!" Twenty-two years ago this day, we commenced the publication of a magazine which had but few friends or admirers when first ushered into life, but which has lived and prospered, while many others, apparently of a more sturdy stock, have breathed awhile in sorrow, then early sickened, and finally died in utter neglect. We mention this fact, not because it ministers to our vanity, but because it inspires us with the most lively sentiments of gratitude.

To be able to say that, for twenty-two years, we have been the publisher of a literary magazine, dependent entirely upon the public taste and judgment for its existence from month to month, has not often fallen to the lot of any one man in this or in any other country.

It was said of Apollo, that they always made him with a young face, never growing older. We hope not to be accused of flattering the "Lady's Book" when we say that, although it has reached a respectable age as a magazine, it has fallen behind none of its youthful rivals, but that it is as fair, sprightly, and as clear of wrinkles as any of them. And as for progress, the best evidence our readers can require that we have never been behind the progress of the times in which we have lived, either in literature, in the arts, or in the fashion—will be found by examining our volumes, as they have accumulated from one to forty-four!

But enough of this, dear reader, lest we should be accused of excessive self-complaisance, when we only desire to remind you of the past years of our existence, and to assure you that whatever of the future may be left us, will be devoted with equal zeal, industry, and gratitude, to your amusement and edification.

We have attempted, besides our usual plates, to give a novelty in this number—printing in colors on a power-press. It shows the capabilities of our office, and the ingenuity of our workmen. The subjects are also part of our great design in publishing this work—to give articles of utility and beauty. It will be seen that the subjects are such as can be made by any carpenter, and from the woods of almost any person possessing a small country estate.

SOME OF OUR VARIOUS DUTIES.—We have lately had the following orders from our friends of the press: To get a situation for a young lady as firewoman in a millinery establishment; to get all the information necessary to put up a line of telegraph; to show how to cultivate sweet potatoes, and where to get seed; to hunt up a young man who had left his native village, without the consent of his parents, to see the sights in Philadelphia; to obtain a set of surgical instruments; to put in suit several bills against one of the advertising agencies; to buy a lot of type, nearly four hundred dollars' worth; to get a first-rate Adams's press; to have a calculation made what it will cost to print a law-book; do a periodical; to ascertain about the late invention of fastening on horse-shoes without the use of nails. We have had no request to find a wife for any young gent, because a good wife can as soon, perhaps a little sooner, be found in the country than in the city. However, if any one wishes us to try, we will do so.

No. II. of "Everyday Actualities," by Hinckley, appears in this number. We are pleased to find that this department gives such general satisfaction. There is no end to the store of them we have on hand.

We have recently published the following articles, which may be considered among the useful and instructive: Upon Needles; Gloves; Honiton Lace-Making; Watches; Steam; Fans; Bleaching Cotton; The Stars; Wild Flowers; The Conservatory; article upon School Teaching; on Letter Writing; History of Boots and Shoes; Calisthenics for Ladies; The Phantoscope, &c.

MR. BAILEY, the editor of the "Lancasterville, S. C., Ledger," who is a gentleman of talent and a most able editor, publishes the following, touching that most excellent family paper, "Arthur's Home Gazette":—

"A friend has kindly sent us the numbers of 'Arthur's Gazette,' containing the conclusion of 'Mr. Haven't-time,' and 'Mr. Don't-be-in-a-hurry,' which will enable us to finish the story next week. The subjoined letter was not sent for publication; but, to show in what estimation 'Arthur's Gazette' is held by our friend, and, at the same time, for the purpose of doing Mr. Arthur what service we can, we give it a place in our paper:—

"CAMDEN, S. C., April 9, 1852.

"R. S. BAILEY, Esq.—DEAR SIR: In your last paper, I see you want some numbers of "Arthur's Home Gazette." I take pleasure in supplying you with those you wish, and the two numbers received since. In this package you will receive numbers 28, 29, 30, and 31.

"I am glad you like that paper so much; it is, in my estimation, one of the very best family newspapers in the United States: so valuable do I consider it, that I take two copies, one to file, and one to give any friend who may desire it, or to whom I may recommend it, and wish to furnish them with a specimen. If my influence could have that effect, every housekeeper in America, who is able to pay for it, and can read it or have it read, would be a subscriber. Mr. Arthur's teachings have such a tendency to smooth down, soften, and purify the roughness and unevenness of our natures, that, if any honest man will tell me, after reading it carefully one year, that he is not wiser, better, and more virtuous, I will agree to refund the subscription money, and in sorrow set him down in my mind as a case most hopeless of improvement.

"I have taken the paper from its commencement, and have the file complete, which I prize highly. Its circulation now is over eighteen thousand copies.

"Hoping that your "Ledger" may prove a benefit to the people of my native district,

"I remain, yours respectfully, J. R."

We copy the following from an exchange. If we knew the author, we certainly should give him credit for it:—

"A SOLEMN WARNING.—I once called upon a sick person whom the doctor had given up as a gone case. I asked him if he had made his peace with everybody. He said he thought he had squared up. I asked him if he had forgiven all his enemies. He replied yes. I then asked him if he had made his peace with his printer. He hesitated a moment, and then said he owed him something like about two dollars and fifty cents, which he desired to have paid before he bid adieu to the world. His desires were immediately gratified; and from that moment he became convalescent. He is now living in the enjoyment of health and prosperity, at peace with his conscience and the whole world. Let him be an example for you, my friends."

The only alteration requisite in the above to suit this meridian is the amount.

RAPID PROMOTION.—For the first time in our life, we have been honored with a military title. Colonel Godey! Muskets and bomb-shells! Isn't it terrible! But our dear friend, the editor of the "Oquawka Spectator," must excuse us. His line of promotion has been too rapid; having first commissioned us as a major, and very soon after raised us to the rank of colonel, has quite overcome our sensibilities. But why or wherefore these military honors have been thus suddenly and unexpectedly showered on an individual so unmilitary in his profession and his habits as we are, we are greatly at a loss to conjecture. Were we a political leader, or an aspirant for office, or a regular fighting man in the editorial corps, we would probably know how to appreciate the value of such titles, whether deserved or not, in all sham-battles and bloodless combats for place, power, or fame. But, as we "Never forsook our peaceful dwelling, Or went about a colonelling;"

we really feel abashed at this coupling of our modest name with such dignified, gunpowder, and broadsword appellatives as major and colonel. Spare us your military commissions, dear sir, and we shall at all times be prepared to fulfil any commission you may confer upon us in relation to the "Lady's Book," or in the accomplishment of any other peaceful matter of business you may desire us to attend to in this city of brotherly love. Meantime, we tender you our thanks for your kind notices of our "Book." Your business reference that "Godey always keeps his promises," was more valuable and consoling to us than would have been the military title of field-marshal, or that of commander-in-chief of all the forces!

DRESSES OF THE QUEEN AND MRS. ABBOTT LAWRENCE AT THE LATE DRAWING-ROOM.—The queen wore a train of white poplin, embroidered with small wreaths of the rose, thistle, and shamrock in colors; the petticoat was of white satin. The head-dress was composed of feathers and a wreath of red roses. Mrs. Lawrence wore a train of green velvet, lined with pink glace, and trimmed with point de Venise; dress of pink châné moiré antique. The head-dress was composed of feathers, point de Venise lappets, and the ornaments were a profusion of diamonds and emeralds.

WOMAN IN HER VARIOUS RELATIONS. BY MRS. L. G. ADKILL, author of "Gems by the Wayside," etc. We have before noticed this delightful work; but we refer to it again, as there were several errors in our former notice. It is published by Wm. Holdridge, 140 Fulton Street, New York.

MR. SMITH AND HIS PEW-HOLDERS.—The rightful and legal owners of pews in our popular churches, especially on popular occasions, such as when a popular preacher is advertised to occupy the pulpit, are frequently perplexed and annoyed at finding themselves excluded from their seats by those who have had the good fortune to arrive a little in advance. In all such cases, either their piety must triumph over their politeness, their curiosity prove stronger than their courtesy, or they must stand up in the aisle, or countermarch to the door, and thence to their homes. But Mr. Smith, a venerable gentleman, and a veteran in Christianity, had a way of his own in conquering all such apparent difficulties. Walking up the aisle of his church, in his usually solemn and quiet manner, one Sabbath morning, when a brilliant discourse was expected from an eloquent preacher, on arriving at his pew-door, he found it so nearly filled by a party of strangers, that the person who had taken command of the door deemed it advisable to refuse him admittance. Without giving the least intimation of his authority, the courteous and good-natured Mr. Smith simply motioned to the door-keeper and his inside companions to close up, and thus make room for the unknown applicant for admission. But this truly modest request was resisted by looks and shrugs, which plainly said to Mr. Smith, "No room for outsiders here;" and, had he entertained the least doubts as to their determination to keep him out, they were at once removed when he attempted to open the pew-door, by the gentleman telling him, "Sir, there is no room, and you cannot come in here." "Ah," said Mr. Smith, in a gentle whisper, "that is very strange, considering that I pay seventy-five dollars a year for this pew; and myself and family, numbering in all one more than are now seated, occupied it last Sabbath in great comfort." "Ah," in turn, exclaimed the gentleman within, and was about making his exit in great confusion; but this the good old Christian prevented, by quietly insisting on his remaining in the pew, and judging for himself of its capacity to accommodate all within, and the supposed stranger who had been ordered to remain without. We think, if we have told this anecdote intelligibly, that it will be found to convey two lessons in Christian church-going morality. But we leave that to the moral discernment of the reader.

"A PROPER HINT."—The "Le Roy Gazette," N. Y., approves the hint we gave some time since to our exchanges, to place the State, as well as the name of the town in which they are published, at the heads of their papers. We are glad to receive the assistance of the "Gazette" in this matter of reform, because, if it is ever accomplished, it will give great relief to a venerable personage who sits near us, and whose special duty it is to examine our exchanges. The old gentleman's temperament is not so irritable now as it was formerly, or we fear we should be obliged to listen to some heavy imprecations against such of our editorial friends as imagine everybody to be acquainted with their location, merely on account of the fact being familiar to themselves. It often happens that our assistant is grievously perplexed, and has to examine through all the advertisements, and even then does not always succeed, but has to guess at the name of the State. When our friends shall take the trouble to examine the list of post-towns in the United States, and assure themselves of the vast number of towns in every State which bear the same name as does that in which they reside, they will see the necessity of making the required designation. We beg them to do it for our old friend's sake.

"A WORD IN PRIVATE."—Our friend of the "Sandy Hill Herald," after a very kind notice of the "Lady's Book" for May, puts this question to us very seriously, but "in private," "Did you tell the truth when you said you were happier now than when a boy?" We certainly did tell the truth, as we always do, and, as our friend knows, or ought to know, we always have done, when conversing or making promises to our readers. The fact is, Mr. Herald, we have some very disagreeable reminiscences of our school-boy days, and such do not leave the impression on our mind that the old school system was much to be preferred to the new. Under the old system, they whipped the boys out of all regard for their books, and out of all veneration for their teachers. That was the oppression of the past. The oppression practised at this time is in forcing the mind, at a too early age, to effect the comprehension of things above its capacity. This is attempted by exciting the emulation, or the ambition of the pupil, until it excites a degree of feverish anxiety that proves injurious to his bodily frame and destructive to the mental faculties. But, as we have touched on this subject in another article, we have only to assure our doubting inquirer that the present period of our life is much happier than any which we can remember to have passed in our boyhood or school days.

Though tending, like all created things, to the sear and yellow leaf, we have a cheerful, a grateful, and, of course, a happy heart. We have, indeed, our troubles of business, our little disappointments and vexations, like the rest of the business world; but we have, too, our quiet home, with none to disturb the equanimity of our temper, or to make us afraid, and where we enjoy all the endearments of childhood, and all that affectionate consideration which our years and our family position entitle us to—blessings which we hope our doubting and inquiring friend may enjoy now and hereafter, in at least as large a proportion as has fallen to our share!

HIGH DUTCH vs. LATIN.—Our good friend of the "Mountain Banner," Rutherford, N. C., lately gave us some trouble in translating one or two lines from Virgil, which he had quoted in a delicate compliment he was so kind as to pay to the "Lady's Book." In return, we conveyed to him an equally delicate compliment in original High Dutch. But, unfortunately, before our lines reached him, he had taken his departure from home, leaving his amiable "better half" to take charge of the columns of his paper—a charge which, we are happy to bear witness, has been fulfilled with great dignity and unquestionable talent. The lady editor, however, assures us that, if we were "not a little startled" at the Latin quotation, the absent editor will be worse than "startled" when he beholds our eight lines of High Dutch. To our great discomfort, we are also told that she is "confident the editor's brain will be haunted by day and by night with until he is relieved by the author."

'Heil dir! höflichen Schüler,' etc.,

We therefore hasten, with all the alacrity and anxiety of friendship, to rescue the editor from his perilous state of doubt and suspicion, and from all suffering on our account; and, to effect this, present him with a poetical translation of the High Dutch, which we hope will make our compliment better understood, if not more acceptable, than it was in its original form:—

"All hail, O courtly scholar!
Hail thou of bards the friend!
Thy tolls for wreaths of honor
May all success attend!
Thy name live on forever,
From every tarnish free;
And, as to-day 'tis honored,
Hereafter may it be!"

By the way, we perceive our friend absented himself for the patriotic purpose of attending a political convention, from the duties of which he expected to return home invigorated for the struggle before him. We hope that he has not only returned home invigorated, but with a nomination in his pocket for governor, or, at the least, for a seat in Congress!

"PREMATURE CRAMMING."—Punch, not long since, had a very good article in rebuke of the present method adopted for the education of young children, and of forcing on their minds the investigation of subjects belonging to the highest branches. He begins by saying that somebody has started what may be called, with reference to the alphabet, a capital idea, by proposing to teach children their letters through the medium of lozenges. Instead of appealing to the eye, the inventor appeals to the mouth, and thus the sweets of education are made, not simply a name, but a luscious reality. In these days, when premature cramming is so common, it is something to invent a plan for causing instruction to go down agreeably. A thirst for knowledge is an excellent thing; but the Alphabet Lozenges will encourage not only an absolute hunger, but a right-down greediness for learning. Some may doubt the propriety of blending instruction with the lollipop, and allowing the influence of the cane to be superseded by that of the sugar-stick. We think that a wholesome effect might be produced by conveying information in a medical form, and we throw out the hint for combining salubrity with science, by the invention of the multiplication pill, a geographical black dose, and an ointment to be rubbed in for the purpose of rubbing up a knowledge of history.

We have copied this sarcasm of Punch, because we think it quite as applicable to the "cramming" system of education enforced in this country as to that pursued in England. When we meet, as we often do, in our public squares, on a fine, fresh morning, a number of pale-faced, emaciated boys, with packs of books strung to their necks, heavy enough for a robust colporteur, or a vender of periodical literature, we involuntarily sigh over the memory of the past, and, at the same time, deeply commiserate the sufferings of those children who are following after us under the heavy afflictions of what Punch calls a premature cramming. The poor, woe-begone little fellows pass through those walks, where all is sunshine, greensward, and noble trees, in the branches of which the birds are warbling their sweetest notes, intent only upon lessons which, perhaps, are far beyond their capacities, with no thought, and apparently no care for the cheerfulness and the beauties of nature which surround them. They remind us more of the past race of anxious patriots and perplexed statesmen who resorted to the shades of the "State House yard" to consult and to meditate on the destinies of their country, and the fearful question of independence, than of the human buds and blossoms, and tender plants, which still require the cheerful voice and the careful hand of affection to sustain and conduct them to that state of life which it is necessary for them to reach before being oppressed with the weightier branches of education. But few of those children who are early pressed down under the trammels of the schools—who, for a time, are an admired and astonishing race of infant philosophers, linguists, and logicians—but few of them, we fear, ever arrive at a sound and vigorous maturity, either of mind or body.

CHEAP OCEAN POSTAGE.—We are indebted to the Hon. Mr. Sumner, of the Senate of the United States, for a copy of his resolution directing the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads to inquire into the expediency of reducing the postage on foreign correspondence. The remarks of Mr. Sumner were brief and cogent, and the probability is that "the great boon of cheap ocean postage" will not be long deferred. Meantime, however, we should like to know what has become of the proposition to reduce the postage on American periodicals, reviews, magazines, newspapers, etc. etc. As the matter stands at present, there is a great deal of correspondence carried on between Europe and this country, which greatly interferes with the prospects of publishers and literary men, and which, perhaps, it would be as well not to touch until we enlarge our own literary boundaries, and extend to those engaged within them some additional facilities and securities. From what we see, the balance of trade is already against us, and we are not so certain that, in a literary point of view, we can even hold our own, much less gain anything upon our rivals, until something is done for the protection of authors. Hitherto, we may have had our doubts in regard to the propriety and the general effects of an international law on the subject of literary property; and although we do not intend to argue the question now, we are, nevertheless, prepared to say we believe it should be first settled before we "throw our ports open" entirely to a competition which appears to be as unjust to parties in our own country as it is to similar professions in Europe.

THE "Evening Argus" says, "Among the proceedings of the United States Senate, we observe the presentation of a petition from the artists and other citizens of the city of Philadelphia, asking that P. F. Rothermel, of this city, may be selected to paint one of the National Pictures that are to adorn the walls of the Capitol. We take great pleasure in seconding the appeal, as we are confident that to no artist could the task be confided with more certainty of its being executed with credit to the national character than to Mr. Rothermel."

CONCERT ANECDOTE.—A lady attending a concert was greatly annoyed, during the performance of a favorite symphony of Beethoven, by some young persons who sat immediately behind her, and who, by their incessant chatter, gave equal displeasure to all around them. The party thus offending consisted of a young lady and two young gentlemen, who affected all that indifference for the delightful music, and for the presence of those who had come to enjoy it, which is too often assumed as an evidence of superior intellect, and of an elevated class. For, doubt of the fact as we may, there are many otherwise good-hearted people who think it vulgar to evince the least feeling or sentiment at a public concert or musical soirée. But to return. When all was over, the lady alluded to above leaned across one seat, and catching the eye of the girl, who was pretty and well dressed, said, in her blindest, gentlest voice, "May I speak with you one moment?" "Certainly," said the young lady, with a flattered, pleased look, bending forward. "I only wish to say," said the interrogator, "that I trust, in the whole course of your life, you will not suffer so great a degree of annoyance as you have inflicted on a large party of lovers of music this evening!"

METROPOLITAN HOTEL, BROADWAY, NEW YORK.—Passing along Fourth Street a short time since, while rather in a patriotic mood, we turned for a moment to contemplate the once famous Indian Queen Hotel, where, in the olden time, the defenders and founders of our country resorted for consultation and for earthly comforts, and in a retired room of which it is said Mr. Jefferson drew up the original draft of the immortal Declaration of Independence. We were preparing our mind to contrast its plain walls and windows, its breadth and its height, with the splendid and magnificent mansions in which our great men and our rich men of the present day do mostly congregate, and where taste and modern refinement, where art, luxury, ease, and elegance have combined all their powers to minister to the wants and comforts of the present generation. But, alas! the ancient front, which had long been shrinking and tottering with age, was coming down with a crash; and, at this day, not one brick clings to another of that modest structure—the once renowned Indian Queen Hotel!

A few days after this incident, if such it may be called, our business required our presence in New York—we say our business, because we wish it to be understood that we never travel except on actual business, unless it be over the fields, and "over the hills and far away," in company with our little namesakes and a few other young competitors in the walk and the race. But, arrived at New York, what was our astonishment, when conducted by a friend to the Metropolitan Hotel, at beholding its magnificent exterior, and its still more magnificent interior, with all its "modern fixtures" and gorgeous appliances, such as Thomas Jefferson, though a wonderfully progressive writer in his time, and especially progressive while laying out his plans of progress in the old Indian Queen, never could have dreamed of, although he might have been reading the "Arabian Nights Entertainments" just before he went to sleep! Entertainment! Ah, here is entertainment, indeed! but not "for man and horse," as there was in Mr. Jefferson's time, but for man and woman, or, to speak in more modern English, for "ladies and gentlemen of the highest degree." Here, too, is evidence of progressive independence; for, as we were told—we had not time to count—this establishment, which is six stories high, contains over five hundred rooms, one hundred of which are suites of rooms, each suite embracing parlor, bedroom, dressing-room, bath-room, etc., and all supplied with hot and cold water, so that individuals and families may live perfectly independent of each other and of the outside world. Leading to these rooms, and through the immense building, there is one mile of halls and passages elegantly painted, "and more than five miles of pipes to convey the gas, hot and cold water, and steam to warm the building, to every part." The furniture of this building, unique and rich, cost $150,000; silver-ware, $14,000; mirrors, $15,000, two of which, intended for the dining-hall, cover one hundred square feet each. The captions of the dining-hall windows are ornamented with the coat of arms of every principal nation on earth. In addition to these costly decorations, the purest designs, formed in the purest and most costly marble, have been brought into requisition under the best artists.

This new and splendid hotel, which it is presumed has not its equal in the world, is now under the management of the brothers Leland, who have learned the business of hotel-keeping pretty much in the way we have learned the business of magazine-publishing—by minding their own business, and attending strictly to fulfilling all their promises made to the public.

The Metropolitan Hotel is situate at the northeast corner of Broadway and Prince Street, on the site of Niblo's Garden, three hundred and sixty feet on Broadway, and two hundred and ten feet on Prince Street. The cost of the building has been estimated at near half a million of dollars. It will be a pleasure to the public to know that the management of such an immense and magnificent establishment could not have been placed in worthier hands.

The engraving in the front part of our "Book" for the present month, is an exact representation of the building we have attempted to describe.

THE KNICKERBOCKER.—The following announcement was made in the "Knickerböcker Magazine" for May. The editor of that able magazine has our best wishes for the success of his gossip, which, unlike that of most of the tribe of gossipers, has always been a source of pleasure, as well as of information, to those who have listened to its expressive and feeling tones and gentle admonitions. To doubt the success of such "knick-knacks" as will be distributed from the editorial table of the "Knickerbocker," would be about equal to doubting the success of the "Knickerbocker" itself, which, happily, is one of the fixed literary facts of American history. But read for yourself the pleasant announcement of the forthcoming pleasantries:—

"GOSSIP WITH READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.—Friends, old friends, let us impart a fond secret to you. We won't say that you 'mustn't let it go any further,' because you can 'pass it on' as fast and as far as you like. There is in the press of the Messrs. Appletons a volume, to be followed by another, entitled 'Knick-Knacks from an Editor's Table, by L. Gaylord Clark.' It has been prepared at the suggestion of many friends, the favorable judgment of several of whom would do honor to a far worthier literary project. During sixteen years, sitting alone or with company in the sanatorium, or circulating in society, we have seen and heard much to awaken mirth, and felt much that has awakened tears. Looking back now upon these records, almost forgotten, we find that they seem new even to us, and the old emotions with which they were originally jotted down come back again freshly upon us. Now, any one man who feels and enjoys, who can neither resist laughter nor forbid tears that will out and must have vent, such an one, it seems to us, is simply an epitome of the public.

"So thinking, and so hoping, we have gone back over the long, long period during which we have gossiped with our readers, and have segregated from our pages such passages as interested us most when we wrote them; and, as there will be at least no lack of variety, and abundant contrast, we trust to be able to make our humble 'venture' acceptable to readers generally. One thing we can at least promise, and that is that, however far short it may fall of excellence, it shall contain nothing that may offend; while in the character of its execution, its distinct divisions, largeness of type, quality of paper, etc., the publishers will leave nothing to be desired. Our brother editors who may approve of our little project will lay us under an obligation, which we shall be only too happy to reciprocate, if they will copy into their columns this brief programme of our design. Tell your readers, gentlemen, please, that we shall try to present for their acceptance a work that shall be a various and pleasant companion for the rail-car, the steamboat, and the fireside."

ACADEMY OF FINE ARTS.—It gives us great pleasure to state that the exhibition of this institution for the present year opened with a display of paintings and statuary more brilliant and interesting than on any preceding year since its foundation. This fact affords us most gratifying evidence that our citizens are becoming every year more and more sensible of the refining and elevating influences of the fine arts upon the general characteristics of our country. The present display embraces a collection from the works of the best European and American artists, among which are several masterly productions, the private property of the stockholders. This institution is, indeed, one of the crowning glories of Philadelphia, not merely affording at all times a quiet retreat for those who love to contemplate the wonderful efforts of genius in its imitations and in its emulations of the truthfulness of Nature, but also as a place to which Genius itself may retreat, in order to reanimate its drooping energies, and rekindle its flickering hopes of fame. For, aside from its magnificent collection of paintings, etc., the liberality extended by the Academy to artists and to scholars is of the greatest importance in securing to our country those trophies of native genius which, in time to come, will form a portion of her imperishable renown.

Receipts, &c.

TO PRESERVE FLOWERS IN WATER.—Mix a little carbonate of soda with the water, and it will preserve the flowers for a fortnight.

TO RESTORE COLOR TAKEN OUT BY ACIDS.—Sal volatile or hartshorn will suffice for this purpose. It may be dropped on silk without doing any injury.

HOARSENESS.—A piece of flannel, dipped in brandy, and applied to the chest, and covered with a dry flannel, is to be worn all night. Four or six small onions, boiled, and put on buttered toast, and eaten for supper, are likewise good for colds on the chest.

TO MAKE EAU-DE-COLOGNE.—Rectified spirits of wine, four pints; oil of bergamot, one ounce; oil of lemon, half an ounce; oil of rosemary, half a drachm; oil of Neroli, three-quarters of a drachm; oil of English lavender, one drachm; oil of oranges, one drachm. Mix well, and then filter. If these proportions are too large, smaller ones may be used.

A VERY PLEASANT PERFUME, AND ALSO PREVENTIVE AGAINST MOTHS.—Take of cloves, caraway seeds, nutmeg, mace, cinnamon, and Tonquin beans, of each one ounce; then add as much Florentine orris-root as will equal the other ingredients put together. Grind the whole well to powder, and then put it in little bags, among your clothes, &c.

LADIES, BEWARE.—The use of white paint as a cosmetic affects the eyes, which it renders painful and watery. It changes the texture of the skin, on which it produces pimples; attacks the teeth, destroys the enamel, and loosens them. It heats the mouth and throat, infecting and corrupting the saliva. Lastly, it penetrates the pores of the skin, acting by degrees on the spongy substance of the lungs, and inducing disease. Powdered magnesia, or violet powder, is no further injurious than by stopping the pores of the skin; but this is quite injury enough to preclude its use. The best cosmetics are early hours, exercise, and temperance.

AN EXCELLENT DISH.—Potatoes à la Maitre d'Hotel: Boil the potatoes, and let them become cold; then cut them into rather thick slices. Put a lump of fresh butter into a stewpan, and add a little flour—about a teaspoonful for a middling-sized dish. When the flour has boiled a little while in butter, add by degrees a cupful of broth or water; when this has boiled up, put in the potatoes, with chopped parsley, pepper, and salt. Let the potatoes stew a few minutes, then take them from the fire, and when quite off the boil add the yolk of an egg beat up with a little lemon juice and a tablespoonful of cold water. As soon as the sauce has set, the potatoes may be dished up and sent to table.

CREASES may be removed from velvet by passing the under side of the velvet over a warm smoothing iron. Let one person hold the velvet tight, and another pass the iron; then spread out the garment, and brush gently, yet briskly, with a velvet brush.

TO CLEAN LAQUER.—Make a paste of starch, one part; powdered rottenstone, twelve parts; sweet oil, two parts; oxalic acid, one part; water to mix.

Centre-Table Gossip.

LONGCHAMPS.

We have been frequently asked, What is the proper season for spring bonnets, and when should crape shawls be laid aside? The exact time for the blooming of a spring wardrobe is a debatable question among our city and country belles: the present season, for instance, when lace bonnets and tissue robes reposed so long in the wardrobes of the purchasers, who still went clad in furs and velvets.

Some, to be sure, did not look beyond the almanac, and shivered in their finery; and this is often done without a thought of the appropriateness of the dress for the day. So, through the season, crape bonnets are sported wet or dry, umbrellas drip over thulle, and light silks trail upon a mud-stained pavement. In the last instance, a glaring ignorance of propriety is noticeable—a vulgarity of display, we had almost said. This is admirably corrected in a line from a French journal des modes—"Another bonnet suitable for fine weather," etc. etc.: it especially prefates the description with a supposition that it will not be worn at any other time. A French woman does not confine herself to one expensive bonnet, to be worn on all occasions—the inconsistency is purely American. An English woman rarely ventures on a dress-bonnet in walking-costume. It is intended for the carriage alone; a close cottage shape of straw, with dark ribbons, answers her turn.

As to the time when this change is to be made, all Paris waits for its spring costumes until the Fête de Longchamps, which occurs in May. On that important day, the boulevards are thronged with four miles of beauty and fashion, up through the Champs Elysées to the Bois de Boulogne. Hear what the clever "American in Paris" says of it:—

"Formerly, the cause of going to Longchamps was to say mass; now it is the variation of a sleeve. The chief concern of the day is the exhibition of pretty women in open berouches, clad in the splendors and novelties of the season. The dresses of Longchamps, like Caesar's, go forth upon the whole earth, and it is the only tribunal that can claim upon earth this extensive jurisdiction."

So much for Longchamps in 1836, when the principal changes of fashion were mutton sleeves for the wide bishop, and the lengthening of dress skirts to conceal the ankle. But this Longchamps has also its homage to the season, for what says the "Moniteur" of the spring of 1852?—

"Longchamps is now close at hand. It is much talked of in the world of fashion. But is it really Longchamps that proclaims such and such a dress or mantle? I can hardly believe so, though I am by no means inclined to derogate from its past glory. Sometimes at Longchamps the weather is gloomy and wet; elegant ladies, frightened by the chilling blast, wrap their persons in Indian cashmeres, and do not venture to exhibit the wonders of fashion. The consequence is, therefore, that Longchamps is often less gay, less animated, less elegant, and less magnificent than the ordinary daily parade in the Bois de Boulogne and the Champs Elysées, when the sun shines bright and the blue sky speaks of spring. What! some one will exclaim, do you dare to attack Longchamps! do you rail against it? What will Fashion say? Fashion knows well enough that I am right, and will approve of what I say.

Not that I mean to say Longchamps should be dethroned, but that Longchamps depends altogether on the caprice of the ladies and the planets. If the sun refuses to smile on it, and assumes a dark frown instead, adieu to Longchamps! In that case, it will only be escorted by a few republican guards, fine brave fellows in their way, no doubt, but, in my opinion, not to be compared to all the fairy creations of fancy and caprice."

So much for the eloquence of a French modiste, on an all-important theme in the world of fashion; and so much for our argument against wet weather displays. The safest rule is to follow Nature, and bring out your spring ribbons and your gauzy tissues with her fluttering foliage, remembering always—

"One violet doesn't make a summer."

POETICAL ENIGMAS.

Miss Annie S. Ashton has our thanks for the following response to the Poetical Enigma in our last:—

When tolled the fearful tower bell
The dirge for Lady Gray—
When sorrow on her true friends fell,
And on her foes dismay,
Draped in its sombre cerecloth deep,
Ere fell the fearful shock,
How many pitying eyes did weep
To view the headman's block!

And now, with brave, unfaltering mien,
The gentle lady stands;
In murmured prayer her lips are seen,
Upraised her clasped hands;
Then softly, as an elder couch
For that sweet form were spread,
The lady kneels, and on the block
Is laid her fair young head.

And so the riddle was to me—
If thus its numbers move,
The whole is guessed; for, though I write,
No blockhead I shall prove.

WHAT'S TO BE DONE WITH THE CHILDREN?

That ever we, as a Lady's Book, should be compelled to hold up deprecating hands in a plea for the nursery! That we should find, upon our cheerful centre-table, so lamentable a cry as the one now claiming our response! "What's to be done with the children? indeed! poor, little weary dears, finding no rest for their feet!" What's to be done with the distracted parents? also becomes a serious consideration; but we give our correspondent's letter as it lies in our contribution-basket, sealed ominously with a Shakespearean motto-wafer—"Sorrow ends not when it seemeth done"—soliciting advice or suggestion for the unhappy writer from any quarter whatever:—

"PHILADELPHIA, June 10.

"Your kind heart will perhaps excuse the liberty taken by a stranger, in addressing the presiding genius of 'Godey's Centre-Table.' I apply to you, as a last resource, to suggest, if possible, some way of disposing my five precious innocents for the summer months. The baby is teething, poor dear! and the doctor especially recommends change of air: indeed, he says he cannot answer for the consequences, if we remain in the city another month. John and Jane—the twins—have never fairly recovered from the measles; Augusta looks delicate; and, now that Philip is out of school, he leaves me no peace of my life, tearing about the house, and making donkey-carts of the clothes-baskets and his brother and sisters. In the country, this playful exuberance would pass unnoticed. But in vain have we advertised—searched—scoured the country over. Of the fifty-seven applications we have made, fifty-four return answer that they have made up their minds not to take children this season; and the other three allow them no privileges of grounds or garden, poor loves!

"What does all this mean, my dear madam? Whence this coalition of boarding-house keepers against these unoffending innocents? Their country wardrobes are prepared; their father stands ready, purse in hand, to discharge any reasonable demand; and I await in tortured anxiety the daily blasting of hopes which the morning's 'Ledger' has excited. I read of 'desirable accommodations,' 'charming neighborhood,' 'unsurpassed conveniences,' but to be told that the ban of proscription is passed upon my interesting family. What is to be done with the children? Cannot you aid in dissipating this unfounded prejudice against such injured loveliness?

"P. S. I inclose a pen and ink drawing of my Philip, in the straw hat purchased in Second Street, to save his lovely complexion in the country he seems destined never to visit, that you may see, from his prepossessing countenance, how little my eldest born deserves such excommunication."

HOUSEKEEPER'S KEYS.—No. II.

According to our promise in the June number, we commence a series of household hints, under the above title; many of them are original, and all valuable, we believe.

DISINFECTANTS.—Do our lady readers understand the simple theory of disinfectants? Every housekeeper has had occasion to use chloride of lime: half a pound to five gallons of water, is the quantity recommended by a very able chemist! Aromatic vinegar poured upon a heated iron plate is perhaps the pleasantest of all, though not always to be had, or remarkably economical. The cheapest, and, at the same time, one of the most convenient and agreeable of all, is common coffee. Pound the well-dried raw bean in a mortar, and strew the powder on a moderately heated iron plate. Just traversing the house with a roaster containing freshly burned coffee will clear it from all offensive smells.

MOTHS.—When there has been a lack of precaution in putting away woollens, or moths have colonized in furniture, we know of no better remedy than to subject the infected articles to a smoke of powdered brimstone. Put glowing coals in a small tin or iron pan, and strew the powder upon them. The old-fashioned foot-stoves answer the purpose admirably, the smoke escaping through the punctures of the tin. This is said to be effectual in the cleansing of closets, safes, etc., infected with ants, and is, at least, worth a trial.

SWEETMEATS.—As the season for putting up sweetmeats approaches, all young housekeepers should be admonished to see to the jars themselves, and, if possible, not to trust any part of the process to a servant. It is much better to put them up in large, plain glass tumblers, one or two of which will be sufficient to fill a cut-glass dish, so that there will be none wasted. Besides, you can more easily watch them to prevent fermentation, china or earthen jars being, of course, opaque. There is no absolute necessity of laying a brandied paper over them, although many think so: if well done, with a full allowance of sugar, there will be little danger from fermentation.

THE BUSINESS OF BEING BEAUTIFUL.

We commend the following notes on the "business of being beautiful" to the attention of our younger ladies, who are just commencing a self-forming process of character. We know it is rather a new doctrine; that the world, as a general thing, will cry it down under the name of vanity; but we separate the consciousness of giving pleasure by grace or delicacy from the vulgar pride in physical advantages, to which, and their display, the name more properly belongs. It is not a selfish motive, that of giving pleasure to others, and every one knows that "a thing of beauty is a joy forever." The "Quarterly" is a good authority, moreover, and we quote from the "Quarterly;" so, ladies, it is your duty to be beautiful, whether you like it or no.

"Man's face is bound to be clean, and may be allowed to be picturesque; but it is a woman's business to be beautiful. Beauty of some kind is so much the attribute of the sex, that a woman can hardly be said to feel herself a woman who has not, at one time of her life, at all events, felt herself to be fair. Beauty confers an education of its own, and that always a feminine one. Most celebrated beauties have owed their highest charms to the refining education which their native ones have given them. It was the wisdom as well as the poetry of the age of chivalry that it supposed all women to be beautiful, and treated them as such.

"What can be more false or cruel than the common plan of forcing upon a young girl the withering conviction of her own plainness? If this be only a foolish sham to counteract the supposed demoralizing consciousness of beauty, the world will soon counteract that; but, if the victim have really but a scanty supply of charms, it will, in addition to incalculable anguish of mind, only diminish those further still. To such a system alone can we ascribe an unhappy anomalous style of young woman, occasionally met with, who seems to have taken on herself the vows of voluntary ugliness—who neither eats enough to keep her complexion clear, nor smiles enough to set her pleasing muscles in action—who prides herself on a skinny parody of attire which she calls neatness—thinks that alone respectable which is most unbecoming—is always thin, and seldom well, and passes through the society of the lovely, the graceful, and the happy, with the vanity that aces humility on her poor disappointed countenance, as if to say, 'Stand back, I am uncomelier than thou!'"

Fashions.

NOTICE TO LADY SUBSCRIBERS.

Having had frequent applications for the purchase of jewelry, millinery, etc., by ladies living at a distance, the Editress of the Fashion Department will hereafter execute commissions for any who may desire it, with the charge of a small percentage for the time and research required. Bridal wardrobes, spring and autumn bonnets, dresses, jewelry, bridal cards, cake boxes, envelopes, etc. etc., will be chosen with a view to economy, as well as taste; and boxes or packages forwarded by express to any part of the country. For the last, distinct directions must be given.

Orders, accompanied by checks for the proposed expenditure, to be addressed to the care of L. A. Godey, Esq., who will be responsible for the amount, and the early execution of commissions.

Instructions to be as minute as is possible, accompanied by a note of the height, complexion, and general style of the person, on which much depends in choice. Dress goods from Levy's or Stewart's, bonnets from Miss Wharton's, jewelry from Bailey's, Warden's, Philadelphia, or Tiffany's, New York, if requested.

DESCRIPTION OF STEEL FASHION PLATE

Fig. 1st.—Dinner-dress, composed of a vest to be worn with a skirt of plaid Organdy muslin, pink and white, the plaid rather large—made very full, but plain. The vest is of white embroidered cambric, lined with white Florence silk; it has a short basque, and the skirt is disposed en chemisette. The basque and sleeves, which are demi-long, are trimmed with a rich fall of lace. The chemisette itself is of full muslin folds, with a ruche about the throat. Hair dressed in a high twist on the back of the head, with full boucles at the side, rosettes and flowing ends of velvet. This costume is at once simple and elegant, and is especially suited to a young girl.

Fig. 2d.—Walking-dress of lavender silk, the skirt full, with three deep flounces; each flounce is edged, not headed, by a double puffing of silk. The corsage is terminated by a not very long or sharp point, and opens en Marquise, with an embroidered chemisette. Sleeves open, demi-long, and edged with a double ruffle of the silk; undersleeves in puffs. A white drawn bonnet, is composed of silk and blonde, and ornamented by a close bouquet of blush roses and foliage. In the street, the costume is finished by a black silk mantilla, trimmed with lace.

The child's dress is of embroidered cambric, the sleeves tied with bows of wide blue ribbon. It will be noticed that the sash is once more in favor, and broader than ever.

CHITCHAT ON PHILADELPHIA FASHIONS FOR JULY.

So many of our fair ladies have deserted the town for the country, that our shops are "halls deserted." This and the succeeding months have few decided changes. Almost every one has finished her summer wardrobe, and is not yet thinking of fall costumes; so there is little to be chronicled, save a few novelties in mantillas, lingerie, etc. etc.

Lace application is now applied to mantillas with great success. It is done by drawing a border on the silk, which is first cut after a scarf pattern, and lining the silk with common cotton net lace of the same shade. This pattern is followed by tacking a narrow silk braid on the outline, and cutting out the silk, leaving the centre of the pattern in lace. It has a very light and graceful effect, but is scarcely suited for anything but a scarf pattern. We have already described a still neater style of lace insertion. (See June number.)

The favorite colors for mantillas continue to be white, black, and lavender; some in muslin have been seen, and one in exquisite taste, which we must describe to our lady readers. The mantle itself is of the finest Swiss muslin, with a vine of fine embroidery encircling it. There is a small circular hood that can be brought into use, also richly embroidered, and fastened by a bow of pure white ribbon with flowing ends. The mantle and hood are lined with the softest white Florence silk, and altogether has an air of indescribable grace and lightness. For a watering-place, nothing could be in better taste, or more really useful, to be thrown on for short promenades, with a dinner or evening-dress, or after dancing. It may be lined with pink, violet, green, or any shade that suits the fancy.

Speaking of watering-places reminds us of a very neat style of travelling bonnets brought out by Miss Wharton, or rather a favorite style revived. It is a casing, or drawn hat of fine brown grass cloth, a close but not unbecoming shape, trimmed by a double ruché of blue ribbon on the outside, and noeuds and strings of the same inside the brim. Straw travelling bonnets have been worn so long, that this will be welcomed as a change. For barèges, Organdy muslins, or, indeed, thin tissues of any kind, Miss Wharton has adopted the "infant waist;" a belt slightly rounded behind and before, scarcely more than a slope, indeed; the slight fulness of the waist has perhaps three shirrs, drawn with fine cord; the lining is cut out at the throat. This gives a simple and graceful air, especially suited to young ladies. A collar, pointed in style, and of slight depth, is attached to the open corsages of older ladies. Small bishop sleeves, with cuffs, are used for morning-dresses, which saves the trouble of a cambric undersleeve, and are really very neat. The ordinary pagoda, or loose sleeve, is still in use for thin dresses. We have seen an Organdy muslin finished by ruffles of the same, they being headed by a fine edge of Valenciennes lace. Others are made cut up, or rounding up on the inside of the arm, instead of towards the elbow, as described in May.

Thick white silks, either of moiré d'antique or with a heavy cord, remain still in favor for bridal dresses, relieved by having the corsage and sleeves covered with light puffings of tulle or blonde. The dress of Lady Constance, youngest daughter of the Duke of Sutherland, recently married to the eldest son of the Marquis of Westminster, was of white satin, with gulpure flounces. The head-dress was of white roses, entwined with orange and myrtle, and a splendid gulpore veil falling almost to her feet. The corsage and sleeves were of lace, and the ornaments were a magnificent carbuncle set in brilliants, the gift of the queen, and a necklace of pearls, diamonds, and emeralds.

Rather an extravagant costume for a young lady, and quoted not for imitation, but as a matter of simple feminine interest.

FASHION.

THE NEW YORK
PUBLIC LIBRARY

ASTOR, LENOX AND TILDEN FOUNDATIONS

THE OPERA BOX.

THE NEW YORK
PUBLIC LIBRARY
ASTOR, LENOX AND
TILDEN FOUNDATION.

THE LOVE LETTER.

Engraved expressly for Godley's Lady's Book.

THE NEW YORK
PUBLIC LIBRARY

ASTOR, LENOX AND
TILDEN FOUNDATIONS.

FASHION PLATES

FOR DECORATING PARLOR WINDOWS

No. 1.

No. 2.

These Fashions for Window Curtains are furnished us by Mr. W. H. CARRYL. Mr. Carryl's exquisitely tasteful assortment of ready-made Curtains, and materials for Curtains, which never fail to satisfy even those who are most fastidious, amply warrants us in directing the attention of our lady readers to his store, No 169 Chestnut Street, corner of Fifth. (For description, see back part of the Book.)

THE MOON-BEAMS ARE SLEEPING,

a Serenade.

WORDS BY

EFFIE ELDON.

MUSIC COMPOSED EXPRESSLY FOR GODEY'S LADY'S BOOK, AND RESPECTFULLY INSCRIBED TO

Miss C. M. E * * * * of Oswego,

BY CHARLES C. CONVERSE.

GUITAR.

CON GRAZIA E GUSTO.

CANTABILE E DOLCE.

keeping Their watch, love, o'er thee; Wake, sweet la - dy!

light can see In plan - et or star, by gazed on thee.

CRIS. Ha. 12 Farr.

2

The flowers are breathing
 Their sweets o'er the scene,
 Like incense up-breathing
 From censers unseen:
 Wake, love! Their fragrance and beauty are thine;
 For these the flowers bloom, for these the stars shine.

3

My light bark is gliding
 Uncheck'd towards the sea,
 No hand its course guiding,—
 Fit emblem of thee!
 Oh, lady! wilt thou deign to guide
 Thy bark of my being o'er life's rushing tide?

COTTAGE FURNITURE.

Fig. 1.

Fig. 2.

Fig. 3.

Fig. 4.

Fig. 5.

Fig. 6.

Fig. 7.

Fig. 1 is a reclining chair for an invalid. The position of the back can be varied, and the projecting part in front elongated or adjusted to any slope. Raising the back and lowering the front alters it into a common easy-chair.

Fig. 2 is a round stool in the Gothic style.

Fig. 3 is an ottoman for the centre of the room, to accommodate several persons.

Figs. 4 and 5 are ottoman footstools covered with cloth, to correspond with the ottoman. These all may be made at a very trifling cost, as the wooden part is nearly all covered with cloth.

Figs. 6 and 7 are drawing-room writing-tables used by ladies. The top part, forming the desk, pulls forward for convenience in writing. A sliding flap draws out on each side, to hold papers or a candle. There are drawers at the side, a lid at the top, and a drawer which pulls out at the side and turns round, as in Fig. 7, to hold pens, ink, wafers, &c.

GODEY'S

LADY'S BOOK.

PHILADELPHIA, AUGUST, 1852.

EVERYDAY ACTUALITIES.—NO. III.

ILLUSTRATED WITH PEN AND GRAVER.

BY C. T. HINCKLEY.

CALICO-PRINTING (continued).

HAVING thus briefly described the chief mechanical processes of calico-printing, we come now to notice the chemical. The colors used in calico-printing are derived from all the three kingdoms of nature; but it seldom happens that solutions, infusions, or decoctions of these colors admit of being applied at once to the cloth without some previous preparation, either of the cloth itself or of the coloring material. It is often necessary to apply some substance to the cloth which will act as a bond of union between it and the coloring matter. This substance is usually a metallic salt, which has an affinity for the tissue of the cloth as well as for the coloring matter when in a state of solution, and forms with the latter an insoluble compound. Such a substance is called a mordant (from the Latin mordere, to bite), a term given by the French dyers under the idea that it exerted a corrosive action on the fibre, expanding the pores, and allowing the color to be absorbed. The usual mordants are common alum and several salts of alumina, peroxide of iron, peroxide of tin, protoxide of tin, and oxide of chrome. These have an affinity for coloring matters; but many of their salts have also a considerable attraction for the tissue of the cloth, which withdraws them to a certain extent from their solutions. Mordants are useful for all those vegetable and animal coloring matters which are soluble in water, but have not a strong affinity for tissues. The action of the mordant is to withdraw them from solution, and to form with them, upon the cloth itself, certain compounds which are insoluble in water.

In calico-printing, it is generally necessary to bring the mordant or the coloring matter into such a state of consistency as to prevent it from spreading beyond the proper limits of the design. This is done by the use of thickener, the most useful of which is wheat starch, and flour; but many others are used, such as gum Arabic, British gum, high-dried potato starch, gum Senegal, gum tragacanth,

WASHING AND DRYING.

jalap, pipe-clay, or China clay mixed with gum, dextrine, potato and rice starch, sulphate of lead mixed with gum, and many others. The choice of proper thickeners requires attention; for two similar solutions of the same mordant equally thickened, but with different thickeners, may give different shades of color when used with the same coloring material.

The colors, with the proper thickeners, &c., are prepared in vessels furnished with steam-jackets (as shown in the following engraving), for raising the contents to the required temperature.

PREPARATION OF COLORS, &c

Although the different methods of printing are numerous, and the combinations of colors and shades of color almost infinite, yet each color in a pattern must, in the present state of the art, be applied by one of six different styles of work. These are termed, 1, the Madder style; 2, Printing by steam; 3, the Padding style; 4, the Resist style; 5, the Discharge style; and 6, the China-Blue style. By the proper combination of two or more of these styles, any pattern, however complicated, is produced.

The madder style is so called from its being chiefly practised with madder; but it is applicable to most soluble vegetable and animal coloring matters. The first process in this style is to print the calico with a mordant; that is, instead of printing at once with color, the parts of the surface which are to have a madder color imparted to them are first impressed with a mordant. After the calico has passed through the hot flue, it is in many cases suspended free from folds for one or two days in what is called the ageing-room, where by exposure to air the mordant, or a portion thereof, undergoes a chemical alteration, whereby it becomes attached to the cloth in an insoluble state. Any portion of the mordant that remains in a soluble state must be completely removed, or the color in being subsequently applied would spread over the surface, instead of being confined within the limits of the pattern. The superfluous mordant is removed by passing the dried calico through a warm mixture of cow-dung and water. This is called dunging. The mixture is usually contained in two stone cisterns, placed end to end, each about 6 feet long, 3 feet wide, and 4 feet deep. The mixture in one cistern is formed with about 2 gallons of dung to the cistern full of water, heated to about 160° or 180°. The second cistern contains about half this quantity of dung. The calico, guided by rollers to keep it free from folds, is drawn quickly through the first trough, and then immediately through the second. It is then washed in clean water in what is called a wince-pit, and again in a dash-wheel. [See BLEACHING.] Dunging is further useful in removing the thickening paste by which the mordant is applied, and it also determines a more intimate union between the mordant and the fibre of the cloth. The process is necessary for alum, iron, and tin mordants, when applied to the cloth before the coloring matter.

The difficulty of procuring cow-dung in sufficient quantities has led to attempts to find substitutes in those chemical substances which an analysis of dung indicates as the essential ingredients. Thus a solution of phosphate of soda and phosphate of lime, with a little glue or some other form of gelatine, has been used under the name of dung-substitute, or simply substitute.

After washing in cold water, the mordanted cloth is winced in a weak solution of substitute and size. It is then ready for the color. This is not applying by the process of printing, but simply by drawing the cloth for two or three hours through a solution of the coloring material. The color attaches itself permanently to those portions of the cloth to which the mordant has been applied, and forms a true chemical compound therewith; but on the unmordanted portions the color is feebly attached, and is subsequently removed by washing in soap and water, or in bran and water, or in a dilute solution of chloride of lime. This last washing is called clearing.

Such is a very meagre outline of the most important processes concerned in printing and dyeing a piece of calico according to the madder style. The processes actually required for finishing a piece of cloth are numerous, as for example in producing a red stripe upon a white ground, the bleached cloth is submitted to nineteen operations, as follows: 1. Printing on mordant of red liquor (a preparation of alumina) thickened with flour, and dyeing; 2. Ageing for three days; 3. Dunging; 4. Wincing in cold water; 5. Washing at the dash-wheel; 6. Wincing in dung-substitute and size; 7. Wincing in cold water; 8. Dyeing in madder; 9. Wincing in cold water; 10. Washing at the dash-wheel; 11. Wincing in soap-water containing a salt of tin; 12. Washing at the dash-wheel; 13. Wincing in soap-water; 14. Wincing in a solution of bleaching-powder; 15. Washing at the dash-wheel; 16. Drying by the water extractor; 17. Folding; 18. Starching; 19. Drying by steam.

The operations of washing and drying are very important, and provision is made for them on a very complete scale. The pieces of cloth are brought down into water-tanks, passing under and over rollers, furnished with balance-weights to keep the calico stretched: these weights can be adjusted on their levers, so as to vary the tension to any degree required. In some cases, the bottom of the tank is supplied with water in jets, so that the calico is subjected to the dashing action of the water. In pers-

ing out of the washing-machine, the calico is received on a skeleton roller, where it is smoothed by an attendant, and passes from this to the drying cylinders, a section of which is shown in the following figure, where the arrow on the left shows the calico proceeding from the washing-machine, passing over a guide-roller R, and then over the drying cylinders, which are of metal, and heated by steam. It is then guided by a second roller R to the drum D, on which it is finally wound.

DRYING CYLINDERS.

In another form of washing-machine, the cloth is arranged in folds upon a shelf to the left of the machine, whence it is guided by rollers into the first vat or division of the machine: it then passes out between rollers which press out the water, and thus make it again absorbent, before passing into the second division: it proceeds in this way until it arrives at the seventh division, where the rollers are pressed together with weighted levers, and the calico leaves the machine with most of its moisture pressed out. The object of having the divisions of unequal height is to establish a current of water; for the tallest vat being first supplied, overflows into the next, and this into the third from the right, until the collected overflowings escape by the lowest vat. In this way a current is kept up, and the calico, moving in a contrary direction to that of the current, is completely washed.

The second style of calico-printing is by steam.

The colors which attach themselves firmly to the cloth by being printed on it with a mordant are not numerous, but by exposing the goods so printed to the action of steam, an intimate combination, takes place between the tissue, the coloring matter, and the mordant. The mechanical arrangements for steaming are various. In some works the cloth is suspended free from folds in a small chamber of masonry, into which steam is admitted. In other works the goods are placed in a large deal box, the lid of which is made nearly steam-tight by edges of felt, and the steam is admitted through a pipe perforated with a multitude of small holes, which traverses the box. But the common method is to coil the calico round a hollow copper cylinder, A, (see p. 120,) perforated with holes, the lower end of which is connected with a steam-pipe. The cylinder is prepared by mounting it in a horizontal position in a frame. A roll of blanket is first lapped round it, then a piece of white calico, and, lastly, three or four pieces of the printed and dried calico stitched end to end. The cylinder is then fixed upright in a small apartment furnished with a chimney to carry off the steam. The open end of the cylinder is screwed to a pipe connected with the spheres s s, which are supplied with steam from the main boiler of the works, the quantity being regulated by a stopcock c. The temperature is kept at  $211^{\circ}$  or  $212^{\circ}$  to prevent much condensation, which makes the colors run. A higher temperature is injurious, but a slight condensation is required to keep the goods moist. The steaming is carried on for from twenty to forty minutes, according to the nature of the color. When the steam is cut off, the cloth is unrolled immediately, to prevent condensation. On exposure to the air, the thickening material soon solidifies, and the goods become dry and stiff. The cloth is then aged for a day or two, and the thickener gently washed out with cold water.

The operation of steaming not only attaches the color firmly, but gives it brilliancy and delicacy of finish. It is not always adopted, for some colors become firmly attached to the cloth by mere exposure to air. A variety of cheap goods are printed in fugitive colors; these, not being fixed by steaming or by a mordant, are called spirit, fancy, or wash-off colors.

The third style, called the padding style, applies to mineral colors only. By this style a pattern may be produced on white or colored ground, and a ground may also be formed for the design in other colors. For the latter purpose the padding machine is used. A roller covered with blanket dips partly into the trough, and above and in contact with this is another roller, and the cloth to be padded passes between the two. When the cloth is uniformly imbued with the color, it is dried at a temperature of 212°. If the color is to be applied to the face of the cloth only, the common printing machine with a roughened roller is used instead of the padding machine. The ground is sometimes produced by the union of two colors in solution forming within the fibre of the cloth itself an insoluble colored precipitate. For this purpose the cloth is first passed through one colored solution, and then dried. It is next passed through the other colored solution; the two then react upon each other, and produce the desired effect. Or the cloth may be padded in one solution, and afterwards winced in the other. In order to produce a design on a white or colored ground, the cloth is printed with one of the solutions, and then padded or winced in the other.

STEAMING APPARATUS.

In the next style of printing, the resist style, the white cloth is printed with a resist paste, the object of which is to prevent those portions of the cloth to which it is applied in the form of a pattern, from taking up color when the cloth is passed through the dye-bath. A white design on a colored ground is a simple example of this style. There are two classes of resists—one to prevent a mordant from attaching itself to the portions of the cloth so protected, and the other to shield the cloth from coloring-matter. Some resists act mechanically; such are fat resists. Others act chemically as well as mechanically.

The object of the fifth or discharge style is to produce a white or colored figure upon a colored ground. For this purpose, the dyed or mordanted cloth is printed with a substance called the discharger, which acts either on the coloring matter or on the mordant before the cloth is exposed to the dye. The discharger acts by converting the coloring matter on the mordant into colorless or soluble products, which may thus be removed so as to allow the parts thus discharged to be dyed in another color. A vegetable or animal coloring matter is usually discharged by chlorine and chromic acid; and a mordant is dissolved by an acid solution.

By this style are produced the well-known imitations of Bandana handkerchiefs, in which white figures are formed on a ground of Turkey-red by means of an aqueous solution of chlorine. This is made to flow down through the red cloth in certain points, which are defined and circumscribed by the pressure of hollow lead types inserted into plates of lead contained in a hydraulic press. The press is furnished with a pair of pattern plates, one attached to the upper block of the press, and the other to the movable part or sill. From twelve to fourteen pieces of cloth previously dyed in Turkey-red are stretched over each other as evenly as possible, and then rolled round a drum. A portion of the fourteen layers equal to the area of the plates being drawn through between them, the press is worked, and the plates are brought together with a force of upwards of 300 tons. The solution of chlorine is then allowed to flow into the hollows of the upper lead plate, whence it descends on the cloth, and percolates through it, extracting the Turkey-red dye, the intense pressure preventing the bleaching liquor from spreading beyond the limits of the figures perforated in the plates. When a certain quantity of bleaching liquor has passed through, water is admitted in a similar manner to wash away the chlorine. The pressure is then removed, and another square of the fourteen layers is moved forward under the plates, and the process is repeated. When all the pieces have been discharged, they are winced in water, and further treated so as to improve the lustre both of the white and of the red.

The sixth and last style of printing is for China-blue, a peculiar style, practised with indigo only, two or three shades of color being commonly associated with white. The bleached calico is printed of the required pattern with a mixture of indigo, orpiment, sulphate of iron, gum and water. It is then aged for a day or two, and afterwards stretched in perpendicular folds on a rectangular frame of wood. This is immersed in a certain order in three liquids, contained in stone cisterns, the tops of which are on a level with the ground: 1, in milk of lime; 2, in a solution of sulphate of iron; 3, in a solution of caustic soda. The frames are dipped several times alternately into the first and second cisterns, with exposure to the air for a short time between each dip; they are not dipped so frequently into the third cistern, but the dipping into this follows immediately after that in No. 2. By these operations, the insoluble indigo, which had been applied to the surface becomes converted into soluble indigo, or indigotin, which is dissolved and transferred to the interior of the fibres, where it is precipitated in the original insoluble form.

INDIGO VAT.

Such is a general outline of the mechanical and chemical arrangements of a large print-work. In addition to these, every calico-printer must have the means of producing a constant succession of new patterns; for, were he to neglect to satisfy the craving after novelty in dress which seems to form a part of the mental constitution of all classes, his goods would be neglected, however fine in material, excellent in weaving, elegant in design, and tasteful in the choice, variety, and combination of color. The spring or the winter fashions of each year must be new; and although millions of patterns have preceded those of any particular year, yet the patterns each year must be stamped with the characteristic of novelty, or they will not sell. The production of this novelty requires months of previous preparation; and it is the business of a peculiar set of artists or pattern designers to furnish the printer with a large variety of designs, from which he selects those which he thinks likely to suit the taste of his customers.

A set of designers is usually attached to large print-works, consisting of two or three artists, and four or five apprentices. The designs furnished by them often amount to several thousands every year, from which the printer selects those which appear likely to succeed, either from novelty of design or the tasteful distribution of form and color. Some designers work on their own account, and sell their designs at prices varying from a few shillings to many dollars. In our next, we will give a description of the mode of calendering various cloths.

THE LOVE-LETTER.

BY KATE WILDFIRE.

(See Plate.)

ANDY CAVENDER was a sad trifler in his way. There was scarcely a maiden in the village to whom he had not made love at one time or another, and all as a pleasant piece of pastime; not seeming to understand that maidens' hearts were tender things, and liable to be hurt in the handling.

Many tears had he caused to flow from beautiful eyes, yet, if he knew of the fact, it did not appear to give him serious concern. There was always a smile on his lip and a light word on his tongue.

At last, however, Andy's heart received an impression. The image of a fair young girl rested upon it; not as of old, like the image in a speculum, to pass with the object, but like the sun-fixed image of the Daguerreotype. Strange fact! the fickle, light-hearted Andy Cavender was in love; really and truly in love.

There had come to Woodland, to pass a few months during the warm summer-time, a city maiden, whose charms were too potent for the village flirt. She came, he saw, and was conquered. It was soon plain to every one that it was all over with Andy Cavender. Kate—the lively, witty, darling Kate Archer had subdued him with her charms, though all unconscious herself of the conquest she had made.

But others saw what she perceived not, and looked on curious for the issue.

"What do you think of this, Jenny?" said Kate Archer, one day, to the young friend with whom she was spending her summer in the country, and she laughed as she spoke, at the same time holding up a letter.

"News from home?" remarked Jenny, smiling.

"Oh dear, no! It's a love-letter."

"What!"

"A real righty love-letter, and, as they say, nothing else. Oh dear! To think that I should have made a conquest already!"

"A love-letter, Kate? Well, here is an adventure, sure enough! Whose heart have you broken?"

"You shall see and hear for yourself," replied the laughing girl. Then, as she unfolded the letter, she put on a grave countenance, and, opening the pages to the eyes of her friend, read aloud—

"MY DEAR MISS ARCHER: Will you permit one who, from the moment he saw you, became an ardent admirer, to lay his heart at your feet? Until you appeared in our quiet village, no maiden had passed before me who had power to win my love. But, from the moment I saw you, I no longer had control over my affections. They flew to you like a bird to its mate. You cannot but have observed, in all our recent meetings, that I regarded you with more than a common interest, and I have permitted myself to believe that you read the language of my eyes, and understood its meaning. You did not turn from me; you did not look coldly on me. Have I erred in believing that your heart responded to the warm emotions of my own? I trust not. If it be so, then am I of all men most miserable. I will wait, with trembling and impatient hope, your answer to this.

"Tenderly and faithfully yours,
"ANDREW CAVENDER."

"Now, Jenny dear, what do you think of that?" said Kate, gayly, as she folded up her letter. "Havn't I made a real conquest?"

"Andy Cavender! Well, that beats everything!"

"None of your country maidens for him," laughed Kate. "He must have a city belle."

"Country maidens! He's made love to every good-looking girl within ten miles round."

"He?"

"Yes. There's no counting the hearts he has broken."

"Did he ever make love to you?"

"Oh, certainly," replied Jenny, gayly.

"In real earnest?"

"Ah! now you come to the point. Perhaps you've not heard that Andy is our village flirt?"

"A flirt, indeed! And so I am to be one of his victims. Oh dear!"

"I don't know as to that. I more than half suspect him to be in earnest now. In fact, I've heard, from more than one source, that he is desperately in love with you."

"Will he hang himself if I'm inexorable?"

"There's no telling. But what kind of an answer are you going to make to his avowal of love?"

"What shall I say?"

"Oh, that depends on your feelings."

"He's a regular flirt you say?"

"I could name you a dozen girls at least, to whom his attentions have been of a character to make them believe that his designs were serious. Two or three were made very unhappy when he turned from them, like a gay insect, to seek another flower."

"Then he must be punished," said Kate, resolutely; "and be mine the task to lay the smarting lash upon his shoulders. For the man who deliberately trifles with a woman's feelings I have no pity. He has been the cause of pain beyond what it is possible for himself to feel; and, if I can reach his sensibilities in any way, you may be sure that I will do it with a hearty good-will."

"I do not like the thought of giving pain," remarked Jenny, "even to a reptile."

"Pain is salutary in most cases; and will be particularly so in this, I hope. He will have some idea of how it feels, as the woman said, when she rapped her boy over the head with a stick for striking his sister."

It was as Jenny supposed, and as we intimated in the beginning; Andy Cavender was really and truly over head and ears in love with Kate Archer, and every line of his amatory epistle was from his heart. Two or three letters were written and destroyed before he produced one exactly to his mind, and this he finally dispatched in full confidence that, as it came from his heart, it must reach the heart of the lovely maiden.

Two days went by, and no answer was received by the enamored swain. He began to feel anxious. On the third day, a neat little perfumed envelop came into his hands, which, on opening, he found to contain a pink, perfumed, satin-edged sheet of note-paper, on which were a few lines most delicately written. They were as follows:—

"MY DEAR SIR: Your letter, containing a most flattering avowal of regard for one who is comparatively a stranger, has been received. Its effect I will not attempt to describe; nor will I, at this time, venture to put in written language what I feel. To-morrow evening I will spend at Mrs. T——'s. May I hope to see you there?

"Yours, &c., KATE."

Andy was in ecstasies at this answer to his epistle. Its meaning to him was as plain as if Kate had said, "Dear Andrew, my heart is yours."

On the next evening, he repaired to Mrs. T——'s, trembling with fond anticipation. On entering the parlor, he found but a single person therein, and that a young lady named Herbert, to whom he had formerly paid very marked attentions. Aware that she had been made unhappy by his fickleness, not to call it by a harsher name, the meeting rather threw a damper over his feelings. But Andy had his share of coolness and self-possession, and, although it cost him a considerable effort, he managed to introduce topics of conversation and to talk pretty freely, although the talking was nearly all on his own side, Miss Herbert maintaining a cold reserve, and answering entirely in monosyllables.

For about a quarter of an hour, Andy endured the ordeal, wondering why this particular young lady should happen to be alone in the parlor of Mrs. T—, and wondering still more why Miss Archer did not make her appearance. Just as he began to feel a little excited and uneasy, the door opened, and in walked another young maiden whom he had reason to remember—a Miss Mary Harper. She was also one of his old flames. She appeared surprised at seeing him, and greeted him with coldness. Andy tried to say some sprightly things to Miss Harper; but he was far from being in as good condition as at first. The effort to entertain Miss Herbert had somewhat exhausted his reservoir of spirits, and his attempts to draw farther thereon were not very successful. The two young ladies drew together on the sofa, and maintained a mutual reserve towards Andy that soon began to be painfully embarrassing.

"What does all this mean?" Andy had just asked himself, for he was beginning to feel puzzled, when the sound of light feet along the passage was again heard, and, the door opening, his eyes rested upon the form of Caroline Gray, to whom he had once paid his addresses. Very particular reasons had Andy Cavender for not wishing to meet Caroline on that particular occasion; for he had committed himself to her more directly than to any other young lady in Woodland, having, on one occasion, actually written and sent to her a love-letter. The precise contents of that epistle he did not remember; but often, when he thought of it, he had doubts as to the extent to which he had committed himself therein, that were not very comfortable.

Soon another and another entered, and, strange to say, each was an old flame, until there were present not less than six fair, rebuking spirits. Silent, Andy sat in the midst of these—silent, because the pressure on his feelings had become insufferably great—for nearly a quarter of an hour. It was a social party of a most novel character, and one that he has never forgotten.

About the time that Andy's feelings were in as uncomfortable a state as could well be imagined, and he was beginning to wish himself at the North Pole, Kate Archer and her friend Jenny entered the room slowly, the former with an open letter in her hand, upon which the eyes of both were resting.

In an instant, it flashed upon Andy Cavender that he was to be victimized by the city belle. No sooner had this thought crossed his mind than, rising abruptly, he bowed to his fair tormentors, saying—

"Excuse me, ladies." And beat a hasty retreat.

But, ere he had passed beyond the street door, there reached him a gush of merry laughter from the musical throat of Kate, in which other voices mingled.

On the next day, he received a letter directed in a delicate hand. It inclosed the one he had written to Kate, and accompanying it was a note in these words—

"There is, it is presumed, a mistake in the direction of this. It was probably meant for Caroline Gray, Mary Harper, Nancy Herbert, or Jenny Green. In order that it may receive its proper destination, it is returned to the writer."

The village flirt was a changed man after that. He had played with edged tools until he cut himself, and the wound, in healing, left an ugly scar. Poor Andy Cavender! All this happened years ago, and he is a bachelor still, notwithstanding several subsequent attempts to make a favorable impression on the hearts of certain pretty maidens. The story of his punishment at Mrs. T—'s flew over the village in a few hours, and, after that, no fair denizen of Woodland for a moment thought of regarding any attention from Andy Cavender as more than a piece of idle pastime; and, on the few occasions that he ventured to talk of love, the merry witches laughed him in the face.

THE GOOD ANGEL.

BY MRS. HALE.

(See Illustration.)

ANGELS, sent as witnesses,
Watch us everywhere;
Sheltered by their shining wings,
Seeming folds of air,
Gentle maiden, one is near,
Listening for thy prayer!

Offerings of the pure in heart
Upward, flame-like, tend;
With a sunbeam swiftnees then
Angel guards descend!
Human sigh and heavenly smile
Thus together blend.

Lovely as the lonely flower
In the desert blown,
Is the holy human thought
But to angel known:
On his book the thought is graved,
Where its light is thrown.

As the fragrance from the flower
Riseth morn and even,
Warm with light or wet with dew,
Joy and grief are given
From the human soul to draw
Incense forth for heaven—
Angels for this off'ring wait
Every morn and even.

SINGLE SOLITUDE AND SINGLE BLESSEDNESS.

BY MRS. L. G. ABELL.

"Heaven protect me from single solitude, but not from single blessedness."

SINGLE SOLITUDE.

ALONE she sits in the old homestead,
And dim her faded eye;
Her once brown hair is white with years—
Two score and a half have gone by.
In those hollow rooms no sound but the tick
Of the old house clock, that rings
A solemn knell to departed hours,
Borne off on the night's dark wings.

From the lightest step an echo falls
Like the earth-cloth in a grave—
On all things lies a sullen gloom,
Deep as a funeral wave.
Still there she sits, and muses long,
And thronging memories come
From the long waste of desert years,
To people that old home.

The father in his old arm-chair
The mother's voice again,
In the lone heart, is breathing low
As music's lingering strain:
The happiness of childish hours,
The light and joy it brings,
Come crowding back upon the heart,
Like the rush of waving wings.

And kindred spirits hover near,
As in the fairest youth,
But vanish soon; each lovely form
Is changed to cold, cold truth.
The buds and blossoms of the heart,
Affection's dewy flowers,
Will fade and sadly perish too,
For want of care of ours!

When gone forever, no fond eye
E'er glances to our own:
While desolate, we live unblest,
Unloved, and e'er alone!
Oh! to be thus when all has fled,
And love and joy are gone—
How poor were earth, if on it doomed
To live and die alone!

SINGLE BLESSEDNESS.

Ah! there she sits—but in her eye
Of dark expressive hue,
Is a soft light of kindness
Forever melting through:
Sweet thoughts have ripened in her heart
The golden clusters there;
The heavenly virtues, like rich fruit,
Exclude corroding care!

Her voice—with cheerful, happy tone,
Mellowed by softening ill—

Is like glad echoes in the heart,
The grateful heart it thrills:
Her early life was beautiful,
But not so fair as now;
Contentment smiles upon her way,
And lights her sunny brow.

Once fancy painted visions bright
Of sweet domestic bliss;
But doubtful oft as meteor-light
She trusted not to this.
A happy group are round her now,
And sweet young voices ring—
Caresses sparkle brightly out,
Like gushings of a spring.

In her kind home, how blest are all
Who feel its genial sway—
To a dear sister's widowed heart,
What sweet repose and stay—
And many a sad friend there is cheered,
As light-winged time goes by,
Scarce streaking yet the raven braids,
Or dimming yet the eye!

Oh! who may not be always blest,
Endured with life's flowers,
That plants affection's fruitful seeds
And kind acts on the hours.
Thus e'er in single blessedness
The heart may find its home:
Where loved ones fondly gather,
There happiness will come!

TO SIGNORA B****.

BY FANNY ST. AUBYN.

AN! say not thou'rt exiled long
From "sunny Italie!"
Bright wanderer from the Land of Song
Warm hearts have welcomed thee;
Not "exiled," for thy home shall be
The true hearts of the brave and free!

Thrice welcome to our own bright land,
Thou of the song and lute,
Whose chords are swept with thrilling hand—
Oh! let them not be mute,
But wake the soul's deep mystery
With burning song of Italie!

Oh! wake thy lute's soft notes again,
Whose silent chords are sleeping,
We listen for the thrilling strain
Its golden strings are keeping.
Oh! wake its gushing minstrelsy
To song of thine own Italie!

EMPLOYMENT OF WOMEN IN CITIES.

NO. I.—THE MINT COIN ADJUSTERS.

BY ALICE B. NEAL.

PUBLIC opinion would seem to have decided that but two classes of employment are legitimate to our sex—teaching and the needle.

"In the first place," says that excellent authority, "women are not intended to be occupied out of the domestic circle. The cares of the household are her proper sphere, while man bears abroad 'the burden and heat of the day.' Our mothers, our sisters, our wives, how much we owe to them! We love them all the more for their beautiful dependence. We pity those who have been deprived of their natural protectors, and are obliged to labor for themselves. How fortunate that to them two such avenues are open! Teaching is at once so respectable and proper; the needle, to those who are not qualified for the school-room, is a certain and never-failing support." And so public opinion turns to the discussion of some new theme, with folded hands and a satisfied conscience.

Visit our public schools, and you will see hundreds of bright childish faces, who will soon take the place of older sisters, now toiling in part, perhaps, for their support. Go through our crowded courts and swarming alleys, and you find as many more, who have never been gathered into the fold of this instruction. All these human souls are to have some aim in life, some provision for the natural wants of their existence. They must be clothed and fed; they crave their small share of comforts, and luxury even. It is rare that you find among them a strong, well-trained spirit, that is self-reliant and self-denying thus early in life. They must have occupation as the means to an end, as well as to prevent the rust of natural abilities. Life-long labor for a scanty fee is not in itself attractive, and therefore marriage is set before them as the end and object of their existence. Even when the higher nature has been developed by partial mental training, this one false motive is suffered to take root.

The woman of the world, surrounded by all of wealth and elegance, educates her beautiful daughters to the one end of marrying for an establishment. It is for this that every natural grace is heightened, every warm heart-impulse subdued, every accomplishment is sought. The simple strength of love, the union of reciprocal tastes and excellent qualities, the "divine self-abnegation" to the will and comfort of those around them, the training for the new position, and the thousand responsibilities of wife and mother, the mistress of a household, the leader of society, have no part nor lot in the matter. And, if this is undeniably so in the light of high intellectual cultivation, what wonder that the daughters of the poor man look upon marriage, from earliest girlhood, as the goal of all hopes and aims, the emancipation from the restraints of the pinched and meagre household arrangements, a cessation from the wearying routine of the needle, their sole dependence? Thus marriages of convenience are not confined alone to those homes where human hearts are sacrificed that their elegance need not be diminished. The apple of discord is sometimes other than golden fruit; and the home that should have been so bright, a haven of rest and contentment, is darkened with contention and angry reproach: whence come the sins of neglect, intemperance, and perhaps abandonment.

How different would all home influence be, if young girls were taught to reverence, rather than make a jest of this holiest emotion of the heart, and to wait, in quiet and serene contentment, until such a time as they should meet and recognise such qualities of mind and soul as would insure sympathy, strength, and forbearance in the nearest and dearest association of life?

The restless mind, so busy with idle and fanciful dreams, would be trained by active employment; the self-respect of independence would forbid any sacrifice of truth or honest feeling.

But others remain to be provided for. The daughters of those who have been affluent, but are suddenly reduced to the necessity of labor; the young widow, reared in comfort, who finds herself alone in the world, with her children to be reared and educated. This is no small class of community to be provided for, and one whose wants are most difficult to meet. "Work they cannot, to beg they are ashamed," and may live on, eating the bitter bread of dependence; for they had wasted the instructions of the school-room, save in those accomplishments that fitted them to shine in society, but are useless now, and their physical strength, as well as manual skill, will avail very little in the contest with daily want. All these must be cared for, or their sufferings, it may be said, rest upon the very public opinion which washes its righteous hands so innocently of the matter. And why? Because it has guarded so many avenues of employment; because it has shut out all choice and variety: "so far shalt thou come, and no farther," in the broad world of human effort and ingenuity, is the voice that has condemned every effort to a wider range of thought and action.

Not that we would enter into the contest of the present, and soil our lips with the war-cry for "female emancipation;" we claim for our sisters only liberty to use the proportion of strength, both of body and mind, with which Heaven has seen fit to endow them. Every woman who comes before the world as a public teacher or leader seems to us to lose a part of her birthright of purity and delicacy. The pen can send forth its gentle influence from the retirement of the home circle; but we ask no place in the lecture-room or the arena of political strife—nothing that could disturb

"That stillness which best becomes a woman—Calm and holy."

We are, in a measure, dealing with past traditions; very recently, the aspect of society in this respect is somewhat changed, perhaps in no city more successfully than our own; and we have thought a glance at some of these sources of industry and content might not be uninteresting to the readers of a publication devoted to the interests of our sex, while resulting perhaps in still further progress. And, first of all, we select, for its novelty, unparalleled success, and general interest, the weighing or adjusting of the United States Mint.

You are fond of crocheting, fair ladies; you like the grace of the silken purse, the shining glitter of its well-filled compartments. The golden dollars slip softly through your pretty hands; you admire the purity of the silver coin; nay, are not ashamed to confess to the early childish gratification of a bright new "copper," with the smiling head of Liberty, and the distinct "ONE CENT" on the reverse, one of the first spelling lessons to which you gave earnest heed. But have you any more idea of the manufacture of this ringing coin than you have of the weaving of the delicate lace or the rich silks for which it is given in exchange? Not unless you have visited our city and gone through with its lions, for prominent among them stands the pure marble edifice known as the Mint. But, if you have never accomplished the established routine of sight-seeing, allow us to be your chaperone for the morning, and we shall find what part our sex plays in the production of our country's coinage.

We need not be daunted by the card that confronts us at the portal, "No admittance after twelve o'clock;" we have a friend at court, whose name is a talisman to the porter, and we are ushered through the paved hall into his neat office, little differing from an ordinary counting-room; here we await the arrival of our guide, no other than the director of the department in which is situated the "Mint cage of Canaries," as some one has pleasantly entitled the apartment which is the principal object of our visit.

They are opening small packages of the raw material in the room opposite the sub-treasurer's office, as we leave it. These brown-paper parcels, so carefully tied, and sealed, and directed, arrived in yesterday's steamer from the Garden Gate. We saw it announced in huge capitals, included in that indefinite quantity, "$300,000 IN THE HANDS OF THE PASSENGERS!" They are so suggestive, these small leathern bags, scarcely larger than the longest finger of a gentleman's glove, filled with the fine shining dust and flakes, that are now lying upon the scale that will soon mark their actual value. It tells of "perils by flood and field," separation from home and friends, days of weary toil, and nights of restless anxiety. It may be a "widow's mite," all that has returned to her for the love and protection that were given up for the fatal search; it may be an orphan's only portion; or perhaps the welcome remittance, come in the hour of need, to avert threatened want or beggary.

However this may stand, it will soon be fused in the glowing mass that prepares the labor of the coiner.

We are too late for the melting; but that we have little to do with. We know that the assayed and refined gold is at length cast into bars, of perhaps half a yard in length—we will take the largest gold coin, the double eagle, at which they work to-day—and from this the bright circle, with its clear impressions, is to be formed.

Now we are in a room filled with swarthy men and clanking machinery. It is lighted by the red glow of the annealing furnace, and the hiss of steam mingles with the confused chorus of sounds. The iron chain, closed against all intruders, is thrown down at our appearance, and, as we enter the central door, we find near us one of those iron frames that minister to the discord. Beside it is a wooden table or tray, holding a bundle of long thin strips of gold; the bar has already been subjected to various processes, and has gained several inches in length for the lost thickness. See, in the press before us, as it passes through the process, which must still be repeated, the pressure bearing greater until the requisite thickness is attained. When thus drawn, the strip is passed beneath yonder die, striking with the utmost precision and regularity, as the grave-faced workman draws it outward with a slightly oscillating motion, the round counters of gold falling into a receptacle beneath; and the thin bar of metal, remaining penetrated at equal distances, is laid aside to be remelted and recast, for nothing is wasted here.

"As the trimmings of puff paste are kneaded again," says our guide, by way of illustration to our feminine ears, which suggests to us a comparison for the strips themselves: a thin layer of cake or biscuit dough, when the circular cutter has passed over it, etching out the cakes at regular intervals.

And this is all it is necessary for us to see just now; so we leave the jar and confusion, following our cicerone up an outer staircase, of the hollow-square or parallelogram, which the buildings form; and, entering a small passage, are ushered at once into the room appropriated to those who adjust the coin to its exact standard weight before it can be finished. What a change! The only sound is the chattering of merry voices, or bursts of girlish laughter, subdued a little, but by no means hushed, at the approach of visitors. The apartment is large and airy, long ranges of windows on each side, and a skylight in the centre, securing ample ventilation. Through its width extend three long tables, and on each side are placed the young girls, busy with this monotonous, but agreeable employment. Not all young girls; for here and there we meet a more careworn face, acting as a balance, perhaps, to the light spirits of those around. It reminded us at first of the large drawing-hall of the — Seminary: there were the same gayety and cheerfulness, and the scales before each workwoman filled the place of our easels. Walking about from group to group, with a sweet and serious mien, was a lady in deep mourning, not unlike our favorite teacher, as she would come, with some word of encouragement or advice, to watch the progress of the drawing; but her presence was no arbitrary restraint, and the work went on as rapidly, for all the jest and laughter. Some were standing, the height of the tables making it convenient for them to do so; others had made themselves comfortable with foot-stools, or were leaning over their work. Hands and arms were in constant motion; indeed, the whole upper part of the figure is exercised much more than in sewing, or even drawing, by the reaching and filing.

The neat scales are placed directly before them, at just a convenient distance apart; a file and a round brush, like that of a house painter, are their only implements. A pile of the unfinished coin is placed before each, which is to be balanced by the exact standard weight. The coin is placed in the opposite scale, and is required to be precisely the same; if it varies ever so little, the index in the centre is true to the fault. It moves like the hand of a clock, but with a pendulum motion, upon a tiny white dial-plate, and the practised eye can discover the instant, and to us almost imperceptible movement. If too heavy, the file separates a few tiny particles from the rough edge; or, if too light, the piece is rejected altogether. A round and square can of tin stands before each, for the different pieces. Those that are of just weight are now ready to be milled, the others are reweighed, and, if found to vary more than the eighth of a grain, are considered altogether too light, and are melted and cast again. All this is done with astonishing rapidity and precision. The eye is fixed upon the register, and the busy hands move almost mechanically from pile to file, and to the open-mouthed receptacle. The particles are suffered to fall upon the sheets of stiff brown paper that cover the tables; but think not their escape is permitted. It is for this reason that no current of air is admitted, the room being ventilated by lowering the upper sash.

But how are they gathered?

We shall see, as soon as this present weight of coin is finished; they are already near its completion. One by one they cease from the quick routine, and watch their less industrious neighbors, or chat among themselves; as school-girls anticipate an approaching recess. "But why are they not supplied with work at once?" we ask, to be told that each parcel is weighed in the office of the chief coiner before it is brought to the room, and must be weighed again by itself. Now the tin cans are beginning to gather on one of the smaller tables, where a workman from below is preparing their contents for removal.

This is an animated scene; every workwoman has risen, and is busily plying her brush. Her own dress, apron, and sleeves are dusted, then the table before her, the scales, and all the particles brushed down together. We essay to lift the can of filings thus gathered from the morning's employment; it is about half full of the dull yellow and brown particles; but, as if they concealed a magic weight, our wrists are so strained that we are fain to replace it upon the table of the lady directress. We are told, to our amazement, that the value of the very sweepings alone will average from twelve to fourteen hundred dollars!

But still more, the water in which their hands are now washed has also its precious deposit. More than two hundred dollars was saved in this way in ten months.

"Is it possible?" we say. "Then the very dust of the floor must be valuable?" And we are told, with a quiet smile, that no sweeping from the whole building is thrown away. It is first "purified by fire," and its yearly yield is almost equal to a California claim!

"That is the dressing-room," says our guide, pointing to a large screen, cutting off about one-sixth of the room. "The screen opposite shields the kitchen and dining-room."

"A kitchen in the Mint!" This was certainly an unexpected novelty; and we are told that the employees do not leave the building through the ten hours, which is their daily limit. Very different from the twelve and fourteen of the seamstress; for every one knows that the last two or four hours drag heavily enough, when the mind and body are exhausted. The girls themselves prefer the regulation, work commencing at six during the summer season, and seven in the winter, which gives them a long evening; time enough, after four, for sewing, walking, or study. They are certainly the gainers by the noon hour thus being saved; whence the necessity for the kitchen and dining-room. With kind permission, we venture to intrude behind the screen. We have startled a dinner-party of six or seven, who are taking advantage of the recess. Two more are employed with basin and towel in washing the delf from which they have just finished their meal.

They smile very good-naturedly at the interruption—we blushing a little, it may be, at our own curious inspection of the domestic arrangements of ladies every whit as well bred as ourselves—and point out the recess with its fitting of stove and culinary utensils, where one of their number is just now brewing a most inviting cup of tea. The dining-room has a goodly row of shelves, with canisters, china, etc. etc., like any other store-room; and, as each person or party play cook and waiter for themselves, all is neatness and order.

Ten minutes have passed, and the recess is not yet over. The pretty faces are gathered in groups around the room and dressing-room. Some in the window-seats are watching us curiously, as we linger by the raised table of the directress, which commands a view of the room; others are in knots of threes and fives, discussing the fashion of a sleeve or the bright spring dresses displayed in the shop-windows. A few, more studiously inclined, have drawn forth a fascinating volume, and are dispatching page after page; even an industrious needle or two have made their appearance, and a few busy stitches are set. How little there is here to mark discontent or suffering, overwork or overtaxed strength! The employment, though monotonous, requires constant thought and attention, so that the mind is not wearied by habitual reverie, and the cheerful hum of voices, or music of laughter, would satisfy the most exacting philanthropist. They are paid on an average, and not for the exact amount each person executes: active or indolent, they receive four dollars and a half per week; but, in justice, we must say that each seemed striving to do her best.

We are struck with the ease and propriety of the employment, the neat and cheerful aspect of the room; so much pleasanter than if the same number of men and boys had been at work; and are reminded to inquire whether this employment of women is unprecedented. Entirely so: the philanthropy and good taste of the suggestion are entirely due to the chief coiner, our attentive guide, Franklin Peale, Esq. It is nearly two years since the experiment was commenced, and is found to answer admirably. "Women are at once more easily taught, and quicker in movement; and," adds Mr. Peale, "we find them more conscientious," which truly noble compliment to our sex we could but acknowledge by a most respectful bow.

In making selections from the crowd of applicants, the most intelligent and well-educated have been chosen, and we doubt if fifty pleasanter-looking faces could be gathered together. The manners of many mark them as educated and refined, which must, of course, give a tone to the whole circle. We could but fancy the intimacies and agreeable acquaintances which are no doubt frequently formed among them.

A situation in the adjusting-room being, for these various reasons, so eligible, it is no wonder that constant applications are made; but we were not prepared to hear that the number of disappointed applicants could not fall far short of six hundred, a fact of the greatest weight in proving our proposition with regard to the necessity for female employment.

As we bid adieu to the cheerful room and its amiable directress, we will linger for a moment in a division of the apartment below, in which we saw the pieces prepared, where they are now undergoing the last process before the certain touch of the die stamps them the current coin of our country. It is not strictly german to the plan of our sketches; but our own curiosity was gratified in following the tempting pieces to their final embellishment, and we fancy, dear ladies, that this you share with us.

Here we are, then, in range with the glowing furnaces, in one of which we catch a glimpse of apparent short, thick bars of iron, red with the fervent heat. They are, in reality, iron boxes, containing a portion of the unfinished coin, which, after the adjusting, has been milled, or passed through a simple machine, where, by systematic pressure between two grooves of steel, the narrow rim or edge has been made to encircle it. Formerly, it also included the fine ridges, or border, which counterfeits have found so hard to imitate; but this is now accomplished by the one stroke of the die. In these iron boxes, then, the golden circles are placed, still with the red and green stains upon them, which you may have noticed, caused by the action of the external air in some former annealing process. This is now to be cleansed; therefore the lid of the box is luted fast with wet clay, and the whole subjected to heat, until it has attained what the workmen call "cherry red." Here it comes sliding down the iron bars, supported by the pincers of the workman on either side, to its bath, a weak infusion of sulphuric acid. A huge sieve is suspended by a crane above it, the cover is removed, and the glowing metal thus retained is plunged into the vat beneath. Now it appears once more changed in color, but the same in form. Another bath, more cooling, of clear Schuylkill; and still a third, warmer in temperature, for it must be dried in haste, lest it should tarnish. Once more the huge sieve swings round, and now its contents, bright and burnished as we see the beautiful coin before it is dimmed by the touch of traffic, is emptied into the long sawdust-filled trough that occupies the centre of the room; and here the drying process is completed by the quick manipulation of the workmen.

There is so much to see! There is a fascination in the noiseless, regular working of the steam-engine in the next apartment. It is an apt illustration of those quiet, forcible characters who accomplish so much without jar or tumult. But we must not linger; the opening door displays the rapid machinery for which it supplies the motive power; and here again we find piles of the burnished golden circles. They are receiving the final mark of their perfection: the quick, sure stroke of the die conveys the rapid impression, and fast as the workmen can feed the insatiate engine, the pieces, one by one, are passed beneath the powerful force, and fall, in all their glowing and finished beauty, into the receptacle beneath.

Did you ever wonder how all this coin is to be counted?—the dull, tiresome process of telling the half million adjusted in a day? For the larger gold pieces the original process is still retained, separating the pile by fives, and gathering them into rouleaux of ten each. Or there is the cutting, a wooden bar, at right angles, like a wide and thick carpenter's rule, notched at regular intervals; the piles are placed within the angle, as you sometimes gather the counters of a backgammon board, and, when thus evenly adjusted, they are much sooner told. But for those bright coppers, silver, and smaller gold pieces, there is a triumph of mechanical ingenuity, and yet so simple in its application you wonder it was not thought of long ago. The workman sits, with a wooden frame before him, lined with copper, however, to save the constant attrition that would soon wear away the wood. This frame is divided into compartments the width of the pieces, and is carelessly heaped with bright new coppers. A few slow movements backwards and forwards, and the coins have arranged themselves between the grooves. The practised eye scans the board to see that the layers are not double; a hinged section falling, precipitates all over the sum required into a trough below, and the board has measured its five hundred pieces in much less time than the description has been written.

Thus ends our morning's investigations, with grateful acknowledgments to our courteous guide.

A LEGEND OF THE SECOND CRUSADE IN THE HOLY LAND.

FROM HISTORY.

BY MRS. S. E. WADDELL.

"How to command, and how to obey, was the education of a Spartan."—PLUTARCH.

THE mingled waters of the Syrian and Phœnician seas beat high and angrily against the shores of the Holy Land, cooling with spray the low white buildings of Tripolis, which at a league's distance resembled those birds of the air and of the water, as they hover and dip, disappear and rise again in the ever-sounding waters of the main.

A boat of Oriental structure floated before the port; but so distant was it that it might have been easily mistaken for a dark cloud merging above the disk of the horizon, with an occasional mezzotint touch from the sun: its deck was ornamented by a small pavilion, beneath which sat a Saracen Assassin, and a Frank, or Western Christian.

"I will relate," said the former, "according to your request, some circumstances which may be of interest to you. Yes, friend of my soul, what would not Hâsan do either to benefit or amuse you!

"The founder of the sect of Assassins* was Hâsan Sâbâh. My father gave me his name in consequence of his admiration of him. It is said he obtained our hill fort of 'Allahmout,' or the 'Eagles' Nest,' by the same stratagem which Dido practised in gaining Carthage.

"As soon as I could understand, he took me by the hand and pointed all around, as far as I could see, saying: 'Your namesake gained this fort by bargaining for as much of the ground as an ox's hide would cover. Malek Shah, a prince to whom the country belonged, readily consented, thinking Hâsan Sâbâh very modest, or very poor. He even said: "I will give you as much again, and you can raise vines sufficiently to supply a part of the market at Kazveen;" but he shook his head, thanked him, and insisted that he wanted no more than what an ox's hide would surround. "Well," said the prince, "you are an odd fellow, or half witted."

"Hâsan bought the hide, and, sitting down, took such a dagger as this—pointing to the one at his side—and commenced shredding the hide into thongs and joining them until they multiplied sufficiently to cover as much of the ground as he desired.

"We guard the tenets of our religion with jealousy, and its mysticisms are carried by us to an extreme.

"Mohammed's religion was called Islâm—resignation, or religion of salvation—and those who adhered to it were by the Arabs denominated Moslems, and by the Persians Musulmans. The head of the empire, both temporally and theologically, is the khalif, or successor of the Prophet. The Fatimites or Ismaelites, from Ismael, a descendant of Fatima, daughter of Mohammed's successors, established a dynasty in the north of Africa, on the coast, making a conquest of Egypt and of Syria, while they reigned at Cairo. They were the enemies of the Khalif of Bagdad, each regarding the other as heretics. Moswiah, a descendant of the uncle of Mohammed, claimed the khalifate after the death of Ali, and reigned for ninety years at Damascus. From his family one called Abbas sprang from another of the uncles of the Prophet, wrested the khalifate, and reigned at Bagdad; while one of Moswiah's descendants, also claiming the khalifate, escaped to Spain and reigned at Cordova.

* So called from their peculiar dagger, and derived, it is said, from the Sanscrit or Persian language.

"The Ismacilites or Assassins were in the Abbaside dominions the disguised advocates of the Fatimite succession, but their religion will ever remain hidden and mysterious. Our chief's face is ever veiled; his power is unlimited; he has but to signify his wish, and it is obeyed. "Strike thyself to the heart; throw thyself from yonder tower;" and it is no sooner expressed than executed."

Héan was silent for a short time, when he again called the attention of his Christian friend to the pavilion above them. It was lined with azure silk, upon which was wrought in silver a crescent, with some of the planets and satellites. They were delineated as accurately as if traced upon a celestial globe, and so artfully contrived as to represent a semi-sphere.

"See," said he, "the type of the crescent; of an increasing glory and power which ends, you know, in a perfect circle, and that, we all know, is typical of eternity. This recalls to my remembrance an event connected with my history.

"Sultan Sanjar, of Persia, was the son of Malek Shah. He is most justly regarded as the best and greatest of the Seljookian monarchy. Seven years ago, he was importuned, by some whose names I need not now recur to, to undertake the overthrow of our race. We were soon apprised of the circumstance, and our chief called upon me to set forth with a warning for the Sultan and for Fakir Rasee, a doctor of laws, who was styled 'The Imaum of Rhe.' This grave fakir was suspected of leaning towards the Ismacilite sect, and, fearing that it would be noised abroad, he undertook to express his horror of our tenets in a severe homily while attending the services of the mosque.

"The Sultan reigned at Khorassan. His dominions extended from beyond the Indus in one direction to the Jaxartes in another. Disguising myself as a merchant, I repaired to a caravansary in Meshed, the capital of Khorassan, and offered in the bazaar a few silks from Ghilen. While bartering for a couple of Cashmere shawls of the finest goat hair, I heard a crier proclaiming that the 'worshipful Imaum of Rhe would at sunset pronounce again his homily in the mosque.' This was precisely what I desired most, and, setting forth quite early, I examined the mosque, and seated myself near a place called the 'Imaum's pulpit,' to await the homily, and in due time heard the muezzin; after which the people assembled, and with them Fakir Rasee. He was remarkably corpulent and very short, with a laughing eye, which was forever twinkling; so much so as to produce an incongruity when he undertook a grave subject.

"While he abused us, I was one of his most attentive auditors, and after he dismissed the crowd and returned to put on his slippers and lay aside his robe, I quietly followed him, and will never forget the ludicrous expression of his frightened countenance when I seized him by the beard, and, pointing to my dagger, asked him 'if he knew who I was?'

"Indeed I do not," said he, almost fainting with horror.

"You abused the Ismacilite sect," said I.

"I was wrong: I will never do so again: I repent from the bottom of my heart!" was his reply.

"Swear by the Holy Prophet to what you have just said."

"I swear," replied the Imaum, gasping for breath.

"Very well," said I, quitting my hold; 'I have orders not to slay you, or my poniard should before this have been crimsoned with the blood of your heart. The lord of the Assassins, Allah-u-deen, desires his respects to you, and inquires if you are well informed of the tenets of that sect which you have dared to abuse? He advises you to be careful of your future conduct; and as he has a respect for your character, he sends you this bag, which contains three hundred and sixty gold mohurs,* and here is an order for a similar sum, to be paid annually by one of his agents.'

"Fakir Rasee took the money, and continued for many years to receive his pension. He never mentioned to his pupils, or even in lectures, the Ismacilite sect. Whenever asked why he abstained from the expression of such opinions, he was wont to observe 'that he had some sharp and weighty arguments which induced him to waive all discussion on the subject.'

"I had now a more difficult task to achieve, in my warning to the Sultan. After remaining four days at Meshed without seeing him, except when surrounded by a strong guard, I bethought me of an expedient.

"In Persia, students need but a slight acquaintance with astronomy to be regarded as adepts in the mysteries of judicial astrology. To take an altitude with an astrolabe; to know the position of the planets, stars, and satellites, with a perfect knowledge of astrological almanacs—which are published annually—is sufficient, particularly when a few technical phrases are added.

"The chief physician of the Sultan was in the daily habit of taking an evening walk. I managed, as he entered the shade of some date-trees, to attract his attention by exclaiming—'Alas for Sultan Sanjar, should he take the antelope hunt on to-morrow, as I have heard he designed doing. Oh that a poor astrologer like myself could influence him: I read his horoscope, and now that his'—

* Equal to two dollars.

"Hold there!" said the physician, stepping to the spot where I was seated—"what is that, friend, that I heard thee lamenting?"

"I tore my beard and beat my breast, in silence, until he promised to send for me on the following morning while the Sultan was breakfasting, so as to enable me to explain in person my apprehensions for his safety. I now rose from my seat, standing erectly, and crossing my hands until he repeated—

"You shall be welcome; where shall I send for you?"

"I prostrated myself as I said, 'Most worshipful follower of Jalenous* and Boorat,† at the caravan-sary of Mohammed Ali Khan, if it pleases your worship.'

"As the religion of the Sultan exacted his rising early, and his popularity in his dominions depended upon his strict observance of the Koran, I had not long after sunrise to await the summons. The chief steward, or nawze of the Sultan, a man of remarkably ugly, and indeed almost deformed appearance, presented himself as my guide to the palace. As he stood before me but four feet high, and nearly as broad, his carroty hair hanging in strings beneath his lamb's-wool cap, a foot and a half high, his eyes large, and with the color and expression of a tiger's, I feared lest I should wound his feelings by the gaze of curiosity my face expressed: but whether he had become accustomed to such expressions of surprise or not, remains to be ascertained: certain it is, he did not notice me. We walked in silence for some time, until Illiz called to me, saying, 'Hark ye.' I turned as he pointed to a slave-merchant, who in an audible voice was saying to a richly-dressed Persian—

"Thirty-nine, only thirty-nine."

"What do you say?" replied the merchant.

"Only thirty-nine."

"That number," continued Illiz, 'is deeply wrought in the tapestry of my life.'

"How, brother?" said I.

"Why, but four years since, standing in that very place with thirty-nine Turks, carried with myself to market, all of which the vizier bought for his royal master excepting myself, and when about to depart with them, I called to the minister—"Oh! vizier, if you have purchased thirty-nine slaves for the Sultan's sake, buy me, for God's sake!" The minister was pleased, and I was included with the others. From my wretched inferior appearance, I was thought worthy only of a scullion's place in the king's kitchen. I am not too humble to say that there I made so many improvements and friends, that I was gradually promoted until I arrived at the place of steward, which I now hold.'

"We arrived at the palace, and found that the Sultan was awaiting his breakfast hour in one of his private halls. The nawze now left me at the vestibule, and summoned the physician, after which the door was opened; and as we entered two officers raised their gold-enamelled wands, and we twice made obeisance. The Sultan was seated upon a divan of blue satin ornamented heavily with fringe of gold thread strung with pearls, and festooned with cords and tassels of the same: four square pillars of porphyry supported the divan, and upon each rested a golden peacock set with precious stones, and bearing costly pearls in their beaks. He was a remarkably fine-looking man, with eyes more lustrous than the diamonds and other precious stones which looped his turban, notwithstanding, when there was the least inflexion of his body, they flashed and sparkled most refulgently: his beard was black, and in the form of a fan: his dress the catebee or robe, composed of cloth of gold and brocade, clasped with diamonds. There were on each side of him pages splendidly dressed, who refreshed him by burning perfumes in vases, and fanning him with the feathers of the ostrich and bird of paradise. But these are the mere externals of eastern habits. The Sultan possessed the three great traits which Xenophon enumerates as the national character of the ancient Persians: riding, shooting with the bow, and speaking the truth.

"I listened with pleasure at the history given by his lieutenant of the country of Egypt. The Sultan had never visited the Nile, and was curious to hear a description from an eye-witness of his own court, and had just seated the lieutenant a few feet below him and commanded him to proceed. When I entered, I had consequently to fold my arms across my breast and stand respectfully aside, while he detailed the following narrative:—

"Oh, commander of the faithful, Egypt is a country of black earth and green plants, between a pulverized mountain and red sand. The distance from Syene to the sea is a month's journey for a horseman. Along the valley descends a river, on which the blessing of the Most High reposes, both in the evening and the morning, and which rises and falls with the revolutions of the sun and moon. When the annual dispensations of Providence unlock the springs and fountains that nourish the earth, the Nile rolls his swelling and sounding waters through the realms of Egypt; the fields are overspread by the salutary flood, and the villages communicate with each other in their painted barks. The retreat of the inundation deposits a fertilizing mud, for the reception of the various seeds. The crowds of husbandmen who blacken the land may be compared to a swarm of ants, and their native indolence is quickened by taskmasters, who punish, or promise the flowers and fruits of a plentiful increase. Their hope is seldom deceived, but the riches which they extract from the wheat, the barley, and the rice, the legumens, the fruit-trees, and the cattle, are equally shared between those who labor and those who possess. According to the vicissitudes of the season, the face of the country is adorned with a silver wave, a verdant emerald, and the deep yellow of a golden harvest.'

* Galen.

† Hippocrates.

* Translated from an Arabian manuscript in the possession of Cardinal Masarin, in a volume published in the year 1666.

"It was my time next to speak, and I had commenced approaching the Sultan in the usual formula, by stepping towards him, then stopping, and hesitating as if dazzled by his appearance, then advancing again, when the nausse Illis announced the king's breakfast. It was borne upon a tray covered by a rich shawl, which was removed, and laid upon an elegantly embroidered cloth spread before the Sultan, who left the divan for a seat on a carpet, which I need only describe as from the looms of the Riats. The nausse then proceeded to break the seal and unlock the tray. It contained dishes of very fine China, with silver covers. They being also removed and the dishes of viands placed before the Sultan, the physician stepped forward and remained standing by him until he had breakfasted and for an hour afterwards. During the latter period, I was called upon for proofs of my skill in judicial astrology. I went through the usual forms and calculations, pointing out to him that the invisible but baneful constellation Sukes yeldos was exactly opposite the chief and only gateway leading towards the forest, and must consequently shed its dangerous influence in that direction. The Sultan was convinced that I had interposed between himself and some impending danger, and, drawing a ring from his finger, he placed it here—pointing to the third finger of his right hand—saying:—

"Should the black clouds of sorrow ever lower over you, and Sultan Sanjar be possessed of the power to dispel them, even in a slight degree, send this to him."

The Assassin paused for some time while he gazed on his monarch's gift, and, as he raised his jewelled hand to his turban in respectful remembrance of him who was now a captive, a tear dropped upon his silken vestments, and spangled into a thousand brilliant particles. Thus in a few moments the incidents of many years glided before him in a multitude of sorrowful yet brilliant reminiscences, and, to use the language of his own country, were "full of the waters of the eye."

"We managed that the Sultan should not be disappointed in his hunting expedition; and on the following morning, after returning from the mosque, he agreed to pass through the city in the opposite direction of the constellation, and continue a route for ten or eleven leagues towards Killaat. I was to accompany the party for the purpose of reminding the Sultan to keep his head in a proper direction, so as to avoid the constellation. When the cavalcade drew up in front of the palace, it resembled much more a caravan fitted out with merchandise for Bagdad, than a party of pleasure. There were ten camels laden with tents, furniture, and provisions; forty horses, and sixteen mules: two of the former bore rich saddles, plated with gold, and set with rubies and turquoise or ferousak, one of which was led for, and the other ridden by the Sultan. The remainder of the horses were variously caparisoned, some with silver-mounted saddles, others with embroidered velvet and gilding. Spears were fastened to the saddles, and each man carried in his hand a bow, and in his sarh a quiver full of arrows. The Sultan and visier bore each a hawk upon his glove, and there were ten or fifteen dogs led in leashes.

"We vaulted into our saddles and filed off through the city, uniting again in the suburbs. I rode by the Sultan, and the visier on the opposite side. There were twenty-four archers as a body-guard, twelve in the van and twelve in the rear: then followed many of the nobles, the gentry, and menials. We had travelled five or six leagues, when an outrider, who occupied the place of scout, returned for the purpose of informing the Sultan that he had discovered the tracks of a stag. The monarch was an excellent horseman as well as marksman, and, spurring his horse, he dashed forward, forgetting Sukes yeldos. When within a hundred yards of the animal, he dismounted and advanced fifty steps, fitting at the same time an arrow to his bow; but the picturesque appearance of the scene before him arrested its flight. In a deep valley through which a stream bubbled and glided over pebbles as white as snow, lay sleeping one of the noblest stags I ever saw. So perfect was his rest, and so harmonious to repose the surrounding scenery, that it appeared a violation of nature to disturb him. An arrow flew from the monarch's bow, and a shower of dewy flowers fell from the shrubbery above, and carpeted the spot so lately occupied by the now bounding and almost invisible stag. I had followed the Sultan closely, and now for the first time addressed him.

"Sword of Persia, commander of the faithful, and noble Sultan, have you forgotten the baneful constellation?"

"He quietly surrendered his head into my keeping, and we journeyed on, until the hawks were flown. Away they went, rising higher and higher, now wheeling, now poising upon outstretched wings, and now darting until lost in the vapory clouds which sailed in fragments below the summits of the mountains. A sudden descent of the hawks, with a cry from the scout, informed us that the stag had been discovered, and that his rapid flight was now impeded by their attacking his head. Presently four dogs were unleashed, now four more, and so on, until the animal was almost fainting with fatigue, when he was suddenly surrounded by horsemen and easily captured. How little better is man than a cat! Each amuses himself by tormenting his prey ere he destroys it. Nevertheless, some philosophers have thought it a very pleasing entertainment to the poor animal to flee with danger as a pursuer. Suppose we refer to the animal man for an analogy in this natural trait? Let us take him, not as a progressive and improving being, but as a savage, and he is equalled by all inferior animals; for, if we except the connecting link with the vegetable world, they possess the same number of senses; and even with reason in the one, we find analogically instinct with the other: they have the same passions, and all of the moral virtues of uncivilized man. May it not, then, be their unaccessible language which creates the great difference? If so, language may be the basis of civilization. In Eden there was no carnivorous animal. 'Every herb bearing seed, and every tree in the which is the fruit of a tree yielding seed, to you it shall be meat.' 'Dominion' alone was given over animals, and there also the serpent spake to Eve. But we will leave this subject to superior minds, to return to our story.

"After this our tents were pitched, and a carpet spread for the Sultan's couch. I was by him when he fell upon his face to perform his evening's devotion, and did not leave him until he was deeply sleeping. I now requested the loan for a few minutes of the vizier's kullumdan or ink-horn. They are worn by viziers as a mark of their office, and are constructed so as to hold ink, a reed, and pen-knife: they are ten or twelve inches in length, and three or four in circumference, beautifully enamelled, and suspended from the girdle. The vizier promptly handed it, supposing—the heavens being as bright as day—that I designed making astronomical calculations. Stepping out of the tent, I traced for the Sultan, as his astrologer, a few lines of advice, with this admonition:—

"Sultan Sanjar, beware! had not thy character been admired, the hand that struck this dagger into the hard ground could with more ease have plunged it into thy soft bosom."

"This I wrapped around the handle of one of the daggers which was concealed about my person. I returned the ink-horn to the vizier, who replaced it in his girdle, and, stationing a guard about the monarch's tent, spread his carpet and folded himself in his robe for the night. As the vizier was not an astrologer in his habits, he was very soon dreaming of the Mussulman's paradise. I heard him mutter in his sleep:—

"Hand me, gazelle-eyed, that crystal cup of nectar."

"Being somewhat acquainted with the philosophy of dreams, I fully expected that the grave vizier would confuse the empire and the horns of the stag together, and in his tangle of ideas awake. So, as softly as possible, I sank the dirk to the handle at the head of the Sultan, and so very near that his turban shaded it; then passing the guard, who knew me, as if going to my tent, I was soon as free as the mountain breeze, or the waking ringdove in the wilds of Diarbek."

* * * * *

The ship was anchored, and the Templar saw the little boat rock upon the billows as it awaited his departure. The Assassin sat upon the deck, and as his Frankish friend turned towards him for the purpose of bidding him farewell, his manly bearing and muscular proportions might have induced any one to suppose, had they lived in the age of Pericles, that he was the original of the Olympian Jupiter of Phidias.

Rising, Hâsan approached him, and, kissing repeatedly his left cheek, the noble pagan wept. The Templar's hand was wet with tears as he pointed to the red-cross upon his left shoulder, and, drawing the Assassin by his side, he fell upon his knees and prayed fervently that God would guide him, whose mind was as the desert of his native land, to that "well of living water which quenches thirst forever." The Assassin, like Felix, trembled as he said:—

"Almost thou persuadest me to be a Christian, for thy example for many long years has proved to me that the spirit of Allah is with thee."

The Assassin returned to his tribe immediately after separating from his Christian friend, and having two or three months of furlough at home, he amused himself not in travelling in disguise over new scenes in foreign countries, as was customary with them when released from duty, but in compiling a manuscript of the adventures of his life, designing to forward it to the Templar as an evidence not only of his regard, but of his recollection of him. During this period he would each day wander alone upon the crags surrounding the Eagles' Nest, and there, in the solitude of nature, he would recall his past existence; and often the Syrian sun would sink, and the curtains of night gather around him ere he would awake to the realities of his present life. So deeply was he wrapped in thought, that we might say a tide of Lethe swept over him, rendering him not oblivious to the past, but of present time. He was two months engaged in tracing with his reed on vellum the history of his life; and when his task was finished, he dropped his pen and ink-horn in the chasm beneath him as he said:—

"My life is now finished, and oh! that the scissors of the Greek Fury would sever its thread as that pen its chronicle."

He rolled up the manuscript, rose from the rock, and looked around him. All was silent and motionless, save the clouds, which sailed in broken fragments above him. He again exclaimed:—

"Such is Hâsan Sâbâh: the light and shadow which yon cloud reflects as it passes over him, are but the type of his tempest-tost life; and his house hold, where are they? Vanished and gone forever!

And he now stands, the only animated remnant of his race."

He turned to his home, placed the manuscript in a satin purse, and the purse in a casket of gold: then, calling an Egyptian Saracen of the order, he deposited it in his hand, saying:—

"Haradden, thou art now bound for Greece. Go to the island of Egina: inquire for the Templar Guy de Balben, and, after saluting him by the recollection he bears to Hásan Sábáh, bless him in the name of Allah, and say, 'May the dust of thy feet be fortunate!' then hand him this, and disappear."

(To be continued.)

ILLUSTRIOUS WOMEN OF OUR TIME.

"We look to the biography and writings of a woman, to show us the interior of a nation as well as of a family: to furnish those secondary evidences and causes of a people's character, which men cannot so much be said to overlook as actually not to see."—Quarterly Review.

MRS. S. C. HALL.

THE fair subject of our present article may deservedly be considered to rank high among those talented women on whom, according to our quotation, rests the responsibility of influencing the opinions of their readers, and turning them into the right channel, on subjects of no little importance. A better proof of this cannot be given than in her joint work with Mr. Hall, "Ireland; its Scenery, Character, &c." Here is displayed a peculiar fitness for so arduous a task; and any one who has perused these popular volumes must be led to agree in the remark that they contain "instruction for the tourist, amusement for the novel-reader, information for the student, and novelties for the curious."

Her intimate acquaintance with that class of Irish life which affords the animated portion of her descriptions enables her to paint the nationalities of the peasantry and working-classes with a fidelity, to which are added touches of a more general nature, which greatly heighten the interest and effect of particular scenes and characters. The scene of an embarkation of Irish emigrants for the New World is a peculiar instance of this happy combination of truth and pathos, and abounds with traits of Irish feeling and thought which are eminently characteristic, fully proving that it is never difficult to open an Irish heart; a few kind words, almost a kind look, will insure success. Her remarks on the temperance movement in Ireland are written with a judgment and good sense which have met with the warm approval of all the friends of this matter of popular interest; while the whole work, with its collection of characteristic anecdotes and picturesque facts, abounds with proofs that no common industry and research have accompanied the talent employed in its preparation.

Mrs. Hall has equally high claims on our approbation in her amusing and instructive "Stories of the Irish Peasantry," which are written with a faithfulness, purity, and right thinking, which will, we doubt not, cause them to go down to posterity as standard works on the subject. These Irish tales are directed at the prominent failings of her poor country, with the amiable view and hope of correcting them, and she has chosen for her appropriate motto the Christian precept of the apostle, "Mind not high things, but condescend to men of low estate." Though dwelling on the foibles of poor Pat, she makes him rather an object of sympathy than of ridicule, and her characters are calculated to interest our feelings, and not merely to excite our laughter, while in all her writings we may observe a total absence of all appearance of that party prejudice which may too often be traced in writers on the subject of Ireland.

Her "Tales of Woman's Trials" have been collected and published in one volume; and here is well displayed that fertility in inventing incidents for which Mrs. Hall is so remarkable; that excellent quality which, as the Athenæum remarks, "is to a teller of stories something like the voice to a singer." It is, in fact, one of the attractions which have rendered the writings of the fair authoress, especially those of a legendary class, so deservedly and universally popular.

The following pathetic love tale—an extract from a contribution to "The Amulet" of 1833, and must have been one of Mrs. Hall's earliest productions—is a very fair specimen of the happy powers of invention to which we have alluded:—

"Milly Boyle, ma'am, a blue-eyed, fair-haired girl, with rosy cheeks, and a smile ever ready to convert them into dimples. Ah! she was the pride of the whole village. And her poor mother (and she a widdy) doated on her as never mother doated on child before or since, to my thinking. Then her voice was as clear as a bell, and as sweet as a linnets'; and though she had forty pounds to her fortune, besides furniture, a feather bed, and a cow, to say nothing of the pigs, and powers of fowls, and lashings of meal and cutlings, (sure, her uncle, big Larry Boyle, is a miller), though she had all them things, she was as humble as a wild violet, and, to the poor, was ever ready with a soft word and a

'God save you kindly,' and her hand in her pocket, and out with a fivepenny bit or a tester; or would think nothing of lapping her cloak round her, and away to any sick woman, or poor errand of a man, that 'ud be ailing, and give them the grain of tea, or the bit of tobacco, or taste of snuff, to comfort them; and the prayer of the country side was 'Good luck to Milly Boyle.' To be sure, if she hadn't the bachelors, no girl ever had. Shoals of 'em watching for her coming out of chapel, or from the station, or from the wake, as it might be, waylaying her, as a body may say: and though she was main civil to them all, and smiles were as plenty and as sweet with her as harvest berries, yet it was long before she laid her mind to any, until her fancy fixed on Michael Langton, one of the best boys in the barony; handsome and well to do in the world was Michael, and every one was rejoiced at her luck. Well, the day was fixed for the wedding, and even the poor mother rejoiced upon her knees; and, the evening before, Michael and Milly were walking down by the river at the bottom of the common, and Milly spied a bunch of wild roses hanging over the stream, and she took a fancy to the flowers; and to be sure, Mike made a spring at them, but his luck took the footing from under him, and the poor boy was drowned in the sight of her eyes. But the worst of the woe is to come; she got a brain fever out of the trouble, and the fever scorched up her brain, so that there was no sense left in it, though her heart was as warm as ever. And then she used to go rambling about the country, with her hands crossed on her breast, and her eyes evermore wandering; and, if she'd hear a cry or a moan, she'd run to see could she do anything to lighten the trouble, and yet she had no sense left to know how to set about it. And, oh! ma'am, dear, the mother of her! To see that poor woman fading away from off the face of the earth, and following her as if she was her shadow! And so, ma'am, dear, at last, Milly died. And it was square, too, she was found dead under a wild rose-tree. I often heard they were unlucky things. There she was, and I heard them that found her tell that it was a beautiful melancholy sight to see her—her cheek resting on her arm, as if she was asleep, and ever so many of the rose leaves scattered, by nature like, over her white face! And, oh! ma'am, her mother! They say old hearts are tough, but, if it's true, sorrow can tear them in pieces—the two were buried in the same grave!"

To the pen of Mrs. Hall the rising generation owes a deep debt of gratitude, for her books for young people are almost uniformly such a pleasing combination of fancy and instruction as to be peculiarly acceptable to the age which, while delighting in invention, is so susceptible of imbibing good impressions. Among her juvenile works, we must allude to "Stories and Studies from the Chronicles of England," a charming work, and one well calculated to seduce young people into historical reading, as every division or epoch is diversified with the story of some remarkable person or incident, in a manner to make a durable impression on the youthful mind, and is eminently successful in attaining the happy medium of being neither above nor below the capacities of those for whose understandings it is written. One of the latest works of Mrs. Hall, and the only one of her numerous store which we have now space to notice, "Pilgrimages to English Shrines," is spoken of as being "so attractively written and so charmingly illustrated, as to form a most delightful guide-book and companion to the scenes it portrays." And truly valuable will this book prove to the lover of all that is beautiful in external nature, in architecture, or in the manifestations of the human heart and intellect, for with it he may wander along the banks of the "lary Ouse," to the birthplace of that "pilgrim of eternity," John Bunyan, to the burial-place of Hampden, the tomb of Gray, and to other hallowed spots, rendered equally interesting or famous from their connection with

"Hands that penned,
And tongues that uttered wisdom."

But the rapidity of Mrs. Hall's genius has produced so many claims on our admiration, that we must not pretend even to enumerate them, or we shall have no space for some well-authenticated personal details of this talented lady, for which we are indebted to the "Portrait Gallery" of a clever contemporary, "The Dublin University Magazine."

Mrs. Hall is a native of Wexford, though, by her mother's side, she is of Swiss descent. Her maiden name was Fielding, by which, however, she was unknown in the literary world, as her first work was not published until after her marriage. She first quitted Ireland at the early age of fifteen, to reside with her mother in England, and it was some time before she revisited this country; but the scenes which were familiar to her as a child had made such a vivid impression on her mind, and all her sketches evince so much freshness and vigor, that her readers might easily imagine she had spent her life among the scenes she describes. During her residence in England, she became acquainted with, and subsequently married, Mr. S. C. Hall, a gentleman well known in the literary world as the able editor of several leading periodicals and other works. The pursuits of her husband were an additional inducement for her to make her début in the republic of letters, which she did in 1820, by the publication of some Irish sketches. She soon made such rapid advances in the favor of the public, as to venture on new ground, and, in 1832, published her first novel, "The Buccaneer," the scene of which is laid in England. In 1837, her versatile genius took another direction, and she produced a little piece for the stage, called "The French Refugee," which was brought out in London with the greatest success, and, with other of her minor dramas, evinces a considerable degree of dramatic talent. "The Groves of Blarney," the first tale in her "Lights and Shadows of Irish Life," was subsequently dramatized and acted, also with complete success, in the season of 1839.

These, with all Mrs. Hall's works, have great credit besides their literary merit, for throughout reigns a spirit of gentleness and delicacy that constitute, after all, the principal charm of a feminine style, and is a peculiarity that, as we have before remarked, distinguishes her from most others who have written on similar subjects. And, what is higher merit still, our sympathies are never enlisted on the side of vice or immorality, nor does she strive at producing an effect by dwelling upon exciting and irritating topics, the only tendency of which is to produce a most culpable discontent. Even those who do not entirely agree with her very English notions upon some subjects, must freely admit that her aims and object have always been most philanthropic and most admirable; to correct faults, to soften prejudices, to promote universal harmony and good-will, to please and instruct together, and ever to enlist the feelings of her readers in favor of what is honorable and good. In all that she has written, there is not one page, not one line, which is not devoted to the cause of that morality and virtue, of which she herself is, in domestic life, a brilliant example.

"What we admire we praise; and, when we praise,
Advance it into notice, that, its worth
Acknowledged, others may admire it too."—COWPER.

VEGETABLE PHYSIOLOGY.

BY HARLAND COULTAS.

It has been proved that the organization of plants is formed out of a vast collection of minute cells, united together, and developing the plants into certain forms, according to fixed natural laws. But if the substance of plants consists of cells, then differences in the size, form, and duration of plants are simply the result of different degrees of cell evolution. To show that this is really the case, it is only necessary to advert to the appearance presented by vegetable organization on the earth's surface.

As in the animal, so in the vegetable world, nature passes from complexity to simplicity in organic structure, not by an abrupt transition, but by a beautiful and regular series of gradations.

In forest-trees, the process of growth, or cell evolution, continues for centuries; in shrubs, for a much shorter space of time: hence the vast size to which the former attain, and the dwarfed growth of the latter. Forest-trees and shrubs are the highest forms of vegetable development on the face of the earth. Not only do they surpass the herbaceous plants, that grow beneath their shade, in size and in the duration of their life, but they are to a considerable extent more composite in their mode of growth. The forest-tree is not a simple individual, as is usually supposed, but a community of individuals. Properly speaking, the simple plant consists only of a stem, root, and the first pair of leaves. The succeeding evolution of leaves is only a continuation of the first process of growth, whilst each bud is an actual repetition of the plant, the only difference being that the bud or new plant has no free radical extremity, like the parent plant, developed on the soil, its root being intimately blended with and contributing to the formation of the wood of the stem on which it grows.

In herbaceous annuals and perennials, there is a similar development of buds or new plants on the stem, but not to the same extent; hence they do not attain the same elevation above the ground. In the lower forms of herbaceous vegetation, the buds or stem-plants become successively less and less evolved, until at length they disappear altogether from the stem, which itself is so contracted in its growth as to be hidden in the earth. This is the case with the hyacinth, lily, and other bulbous-rooted plants. The bulbs of these plants are considered by botanists to be subterranean buds or undeveloped stems, to which they are in every respect similar. The outer leaves of these buds retain their rudimentary scale-like appearance, and form a protective covering to the inner leaves, which grow in a tuft on the ground, the flower-stem rising from their centre.

In the beautiful and interesting tribe of plants called ferns, we have a still greater simplification of vegetable structure. Stem and leaf are now blended into what is designated as a frond, which appears to partake of the nature and office of both, whilst in place of the beautiful flower there is only a collection of mere dust-like spots or lines of reproductive matter, situated on the margin or under-surface of the frond.

But the structure of ferns is complexity itself when contrasted with the beautiful simplicity of the tribes of plants beneath them. When we come to examine the mosses—those miniature representations of the arborescent forms of nobler plants—we are struck with the extreme delicacy, simplicity, and exquisite beauty of their structure. There is a certain degree of solidity about the organization of forest-trees, flowering plants, and ferns, the result of different amounts of ligneous matter or woody fibre entering into their composition. These substances impart strength and stability to the vegetable fabrics, and plants so organized will grow to a considerable height. But mosses are wholly cellular in their organization, and, for this reason, never rise more than a few inches above the ground. They usually possess a sort of stem, around which their minute leaves are arranged with the greatest regularity. These minute leaves, when examined carefully with a microscope, are seen to have an entire and sometimes serrated margin, and to contain condensed cells in the form of ribs or nerves. Their fructification is contained in little capsules or urn-shaped bodies which are borne on the summit of their filiform fruit stalks or setæ. These capsules contain the minute spores or reproductive matter. The beautiful mechanism by which its dispersion is effected, will be described another time. Few common objects appear more interesting than the little mosses growing on the bark of trees or barren rocks, amidst the gloom and desolation of winter, which require neither skill nor the assistance of instruments for the detection of their beauties.

In the lichens, vegetation is reduced to its last degree of simplicity. Root, stem, and leaves, have now disappeared, and the whole plant is blended into a flat expansion or bed of vegetable matter, called a thallus. The thalli of the higher forms of lichens are foliaceous, consisting of several layers of cells radiating out on all sides; some of these cells are reproductive, and exhibit the spores in the shape of powdery heaps called soredia, or else they become organized into saucer-like bodies called shields, in which the spores are imbedded. In the lower forms, the thalli of these plants are crustaceous or even pulverulent, the whole plant assuming the appearance of mere powder. In this case the cells no longer remain together, but are free and unformed, any cell being capable of originating a new individual. The plant and cell are now identical.

Nature passes through the same transitions in the sea-weed tribe. Certain algae or sea-weed are of a frondose, others of a filamentous structure, whilst some appear as mere scum on the surface of the waves. In these instances, the plants consist of cells developing in length and breadth, of cells developing in length only, or of a single cell. The same remark applies to the fungi, where nature only finishes with plants of a single cell. Here then we have vegetation reduced to its simplest terms. The basis of the superstructure of the whole vegetable world is a single cell.

A review of the life of the cell and of very simple plants consisting of a few cells, must necessarily precede any successful attempt at the comprehension of higher and more complex vegetation. We have seen that the fabric of plants is wholly made up of cells, and that growth is simply the result of the evolution of new cells. Now the process of cell-growth, which is really the key to much that remains mysterious in the fabrication of plants, may be most successfully studied in these simple plants. This has been felt to be the truth, and hence this subject has recently taxed the powers of the ablest minds. Much remains involved in obscurity, but scientific and microscopical investigation of these humble plants has already revealed many deeply interesting discoveries in reference to cell-growth tending to throw light on the wonders and beauties of the vegetable creation.

In our subsequent communications to this volume, we shall endeavor to disclose some of these discoveries, and by the aid of suitable illustrations, convey some very interesting truths to the minds of our readers.

A YOUNG MOTHER'S REVERIE.

BY W. J. ANNABLE.

BADE of my bosom, rest thee—
Angel-dreamer thou!
No care hath yet oppressed thee—
No cloud is on thy brow.

What fancies bright, sweet sleeper,
Thy spirits thus beguile?
Oh, that thy lips would whisper
The thoughts that make thee smile!

P perchance some seraph warbles
To thee its song of joy—
Entrancing thee with music,
My beautiful, bright boy!

For I know, in dreams of heaven
We hear, or seem to hear,
Soft voices and the beat of wings,
And feel that they are near.

Do cherubs lure thee, blossom,
Back to thy native sky?
For thy arms move on thy bosom
As if thou fain wouldst fly.

Thus may they ever woo thee
With messages divine—
And the beauty of their holiness
Be thine, forever thine.

Yet thy mother's heart doth tremble,
To think what future years
May in thine own assemble,
To form the fount of tears.

O Thou of gifts the Giver,
Smile on this precious one—
And like a peaceful river
May his life's current run!

Spread Thou Thy mantle o'er him—
Nor leave alone with me
The task to guide; restore him
To angels, heaven, and Thee!

LANDSCAPE GARDENING.

THE PRACTICE OF FLORICULTURE

Floriculture comprehends whatever relates to the culture and arrangement of plants, whether ligneous or herbaceous, grown chiefly on account of their flowers, or as objects of taste or curiosity. The culture of flowers was long carried on with that of culinary vegetables, in the borders of the kitchen-garden, or in parterres or groups of beds, which commonly connected the culinary compartments with the house. In places of moderate extent, this mixed style is still continued; but in residences which aim at any degree of distinction, the space within the kitchen-garden is confined to the production of objects of domestic utility, while the culture of plants of ornament is displayed in the flower-garden, the lawn, and the shrubbery. These, under the general term of pleasure-ground, encircle the house in small residences, and, in those on a larger scale, embrace it on one or more sides, the remaining part being under the character of park scenery. Many of the most interesting plants belonging to this branch of culture are natives of warm climates, and require the protection of glass, and artificial heat. On a limited scale, such plants are grown in the culinary forcing-houses, or in greenhouses, or botanic stoves, connected with the others in the kitchen-garden; and many of them are preserved in these houses, or in frames or pits, during winter, and planted out on the lawn, or in borders, during summer. In complete residences, the culture of exotics forms a distinct department of ornamental horticulture, and the hothouses requisite for this purpose are placed in the flower-garden, or variously arranged within the precincts of the pleasure-ground. In both departments, separation is attended with the usual advantages resulting from a division of skill, labor, and effect. Floriculture is obviously of limited interest and utility compared to horticulture; much less has accordingly been written on it, and our view of modern practice will, therefore, be proportionably brief. The order adopted is, the formation, planting, and general culture of the flower-garden; the formation, planting, and general culture of the lawn and shrubbery; the design and general culture of the floricultural hothouses; the catalogue of plants and trees used in ornamental horticulture; and, lastly, the monthly table of floricultural productions.

CHAPTER I.

OF THE FORMATION OF THE FLOWER-GARDEN.

The situation of the flower-garden, as of every scene devoted to flowers, should be near the house, for ready access at all times, and especially during winter and spring, when the beauties of these scenes are felt with peculiar force. "The flower-garden," Neill observes, "should form an ornamental appendage to the mansion, and be easily accessible in all kinds of weather. There is no objection to its being seen from the windows of the house: on the contrary, this is sometimes considered as desirable." Nicol, a celebrated landscape gardener, approves of having the various gardens of a place combined, and of placing them at no great distance from the house, and Repton, equally celebrated, strongly recommends this practice.

Fig. 1.

Abercrombie says, "While the kitchen garden is concealed by buildings or plantations, the flower-garden and pleasure-ground should stand conspicuously attached to the family residence. When the horticultural establishment includes a conservatory, it is proper to have it in sight, and connected with the ornamented grounds; because the style of such a building, the plants within, and the scene without, under a tasteful arrangement, harmonize in character and effect." The botanic garden, the range of stoves, and all the departments, a visit to which renders a walk about the grounds pleasing and interesting, should be at hand.

The author of "The Florist's Manual" confines her observations to the "construction of that humble flower-garden," which she calls "the common or mingled flower-garden." "This," she says, "should be situated so as to form an ornamental appendage to the house, and, where the plan of the ground will admit, placed before windows exposed to a southern or southeast aspect; and although to this position there may appear the objection of the flowers turning their petals to the sun, and consequently from the windows, this predilection in the tribe of Flora for the rays of that bright luminary will produce the same effect in whatever place our flowers may be situated, when in the vicinity of a building, as they invariably expose the front of their corols to the lights, from which both the petals of flowers and the leaves of plants are believed to derive materials essential to their existence." She adds, "When apart from the house, the mingled flower-garden may be introduced with great advantage, if situated so as to form a portion of the pleasure-ground: in this case it should not be distant from the house, but so contrived as to terminate one of the walks of the home shrubberies."

Fig. 2.

In exposure and aspect, the flower-garden should be laid out not only on account of the advantages to be derived from the full influence of the sun during winter on the hothouse department, but also for the better enjoyment of the open-air scenes, in weather favorable for walking out of doors. It should not be naturally low in surface, nor of a wet-retentive soil, nor rendered damp and gloomy by surrounding high trees, or lofty walls or buildings. If it happen that a house be nearly surrounded by a flower-garden, the variety of aspect thence afforded will be favorable to the continuance of the bloom of our flowers, far beyond what can be obtained if confined to a southern exposure. South, southeast, and east are the aspects most advantageous to the growth of flowers; and, possessing these varieties of exposure, the bloom of a garden may be protracted some weeks beyond the time it could be preserved under a single aspect.

The extent of the flower-garden depends jointly on the general scale of the residence, and the particular taste of the owner. There is no impropriety in having a large flower-garden to a small kitchen-garden or mansion, where the taste of the owner leads to such a deviation from common rules. As moderation, however, is generally found best in the end, the author of the "Florist's Manual" states that "the compass of ground appropriated to flowers must vary according to the size of the place of which that ground forms a part, and should in no case be of great extent. If the form of ground where a parterre is to be situated is sloping, the size should be larger than when a flat surface, and the borders of various shapes, and on a bolder scale, and intermingled with grass; but such a flower-garden partakes more of the nature of pleasure-ground than of the common parterre, and will admit of a judicious introduction of flowering shrubs."

Shelter is equally requisite for the flower as for the kitchen-garden, and, where naturally wanting, is to be produced by the same means, viz., planting. The plantation on the side next the garden should begin with the lowest shrubs, and rise in gradation to the trees, which, unless on the north, or very exposed points, should not be of the tallest kinds. A few elegant shrubs, and one or two trees, may be scattered through the scene, either in the dug compartments or in the turf glades, for the purposes of shelter and shade as well as ornament; but in general, much of either of the two former qualities is highly injurious both to the culture of flowers and the thick closeness of turf, besides rendering the garden unfit to be resorted to in the winter and spring seasons. Sometimes an evergreen hedge will produce all the shelter requisite, as in small gardens composed of earth and gravel only; but where the scene is large, and composed of dug compartments placed on a lawn, the whole may be surrounded by an irregular border of flowers, shrubbery, and trees.

Soil. Most of the hardy herbaceous flowers, and the deciduous and evergreen ornamental shrubs, will succeed in a soil of common good qualities, moderately light and mellow. Negatively, the ground should not be excessively strong and clayey; and mere gravel is very intractable.

Nicol observes that flowers in general "will thrive very well in common garden-earth of a middling texture, if broken fine to the depth of one foot. Some no doubt do better in light than in heavy soils; and the contrary: and others do best in rich humid earth. Bulbous flowers, in general, do best in light sandy earth; though some require a stronger and a richer soil. In general, the soil for these should be formed at least eighteen inches deep, and should be made very fine by the spade, or be put through a coarse screen." In parterres where the finer flowers are cultivated, a variety of soils will be required according to the nature of the plants, as rich sandy loam for bulbs, loamy earth for the primula tribe, heath soil for ericas, bog-earth for American plants; and hence it follows that, provided the subsoil be dry, the nature of the surface stratum is of the less consequence.

Surface. Where the extent is small, and the plants to be grown are chiefly florists' flowers, or other select kinds, in beds separated by gravelled paths, a level or gentle and uniform slope will be found most suitable; but where the limits are more extensive, and turf and shrubs are introduced, a wavy surface, either naturally or rendered so by art, will have much the best effect. In reclusive scenes immediately under the eye, art may create a sort of miniature of beautiful ground. Man is but a puny object compared to those of inanimate nature. He may overlook a distant hill, separated by low ground; but a mound of less than three yards in height, placed near the eye, confines the view, and all other objects being shut out, acquires, if apparently a work of nature, a degree of importance in his imagination: winding walks, four feet below the original surface, will supply earth for accompanying them by wavy hills or swells eight feet high. If these hills and swells are formed and contrived so as to produce a varied and natural-like whole, with every change of position, a very suitable basis will be raised for a picturesque shrubbery or flower-garden.

Grassy surfaces may be formed by cutting in small pieces about two inches square, and distributing them at regular distances, say at about six inches apart every way, over a well-prepared surface.

To repair and improve lawns in towns or cities, or under the shade of trees, without the aid of sod, dig the soil to the depth of three or four inches, the last week in March or the first week in April, and afterwards sow it thickly and regularly with the following seeds: Agróstis vulgaris var. tenuifolia, Festuca duriúscula, F. ovina, Cynosurus cristatus, Poa pratensis, Avena flavescens, and Trifolium minus. These seeds must be mixed together in equal portions, and sown at the rate of from four to six bushels per acre. If the seeds are regularly and thickly sown, the ground will soon become green, and will remain as close and thick as any sod whatever during the whole summer; dying, however, in the succeeding winter, and requiring therefore to be revived every spring.

Water. This material, in some form or other, is as essential to the flower as to the kitchen-garden. Besides the use of the element in common culture, a pond or basin affords an opportunity of growing some of the more showy aquatics, while jets, drooping fountains, and other forms of displaying water, serve to decorate and give interest to the scene. Besides choice aquatics, the ponds or basins of flower-gardens may be stocked with the gold-fish.

The form of a small garden (Figs. 1 and 2) will be found most pleasing when some regular figure is adopted, as a circle, an oval, an octagon, a crescent, &c.; but where the extent is so great as not readily to be caught by a single glance of the eye, an irregular shape is generally more convenient, and it may be thrown into agreeable figures, or component scenes, by the introduction of shrubs so as to subdivide the space. "Either a square or an oblong ground-plan," Abercrombie observes, "is eligible; and although the shape must be often adapted to local circumstances, yet, when a garden is so circumscribed that the eye at once embraces the whole, it is desirable that it should be of some regular figure."

Neill says, "A variety of forms may be indulged in, without incurring censure; provided the figures be graceful, and not in any one place too complicated. An oval is a figure that generally pleases, on account of the continuity of its outlines; next, if extensive, a circle. Next, perhaps, a segment in form of a half-moon, or the larger segment of an oval. But hearts, diamonds, triangles, or squares, if small, seldom please. A simple parallelogram, divided into beds running lengthwise, or the larger segment of an oval, with beds running parallel to its outer margin, will always please." Neill concurs in this opinion.

The author of "Hints on the Formation of Gardens," &c., says, "A symmetrical form is best adapted to such parterres as are small and may be comprehended in one view; and an irregular shape to such as are of considerable size, and contain trees, shrubs, statues, vases, seats, and buildings."

Boundary, fence, or screen. Parterres on a small scale may be enclosed by an evergreen hedge of holly, box, laurel, privet, juniper, laurestinus, or Irish whin (Ulex hibernica); but irregular figures, especially if of some extent, can only be surrounded by shrubbery, such as we have already hinted as forming a proper shelter for flower-gardens.

Abercrombie says, "For the inclosure, a wall or close paling is, on two accounts, to be preferred on the north side; both to serve as a screen, and to afford a warm internal face for training rare trees. When one of those is not adopted, recourse may be had to a fence of whitethorn and holly," &c.

Rustic fences formed of shoots of the oak, hazel, or larch, may often be introduced with good effect both as interior and surrounding barriers, as represented above.

THE PLAGUE OF ZURICH.

BY HELEN MAITLAND.

"Where sleep they, Earth! By no proud stone Their narrow couch of rest is known."

"On the pleasant site of the old Helvetian Thuriicum stood the town of Zurich, long renowned for industry, intelligence, wealth not too unequally distributed, and the genuine civic spirit of its burghers. A general and unwearied love of the laws had for ages been the chief support of the government, and the cordial and familiar usages handed down by their forefathers remained in all their simplicity."

Nor were science and art strangers in Zurich. The renowned songsters of those days, the Mennsingers, found hospitable welcome with the principal burghers. And nowhere was greater effect produced than at Zurich, by the doctrines of Arnold, of Brescia, a scholar of Abelard's, and one of the most acute and inquiring spirits of his age.

But alas for that fair town! alas for that brave and, for the age, enlightened people! The scourge of Asia, the fearful plague, soon saddened the triumphs of Swiss valor, and affixed a stain upon Swiss humanity, which it is difficult to believe could have been so widely spread, even by the superstition of those days.

Our story opens in the midst of the bitter persecution of the Jews, which commenced at the breaking out of the plague; and, unlike most violent popular commotions, continued from year to year, and spread from canton to canton, until that cruelly treated people were almost exterminated throughout Switzerland.

The frightful mortality occasioned by an unknown and mysterious disease was, by their ignorance and fear, ascribed to Divine vengeance, for permitting the outcasts of Israel an abiding-place and many privileges within the walls of their city. This belief prevailed among many of the pious and influential burghers, and was openly encouraged by their fanatical priests. The rabble were not slow in ascribing the awful visitation to a more direct agency, and accused the Jews of poisoning the wells. When we add to the strong impelling motives, religious enthusiasm and fear, the avarice of a few, who coveted the contents of the coffers of the wealthy Jew, however much they might despise the race, we may see how little mercy one of that nation might hope to receive at the hands of his judges and accusers.

But let us return to the city. An unusual crowd might be seen, and a tumult heard, drowning the monotonous rattle of the death-carts rolling through the principal streets. All tended to one point, the Franciscan Convent, within whose open court, or rather the open square in front of the building, a pitiless tragedy was soon to be enacted.

Four stakes were firmly driven into the ground, and to each a hapless Jew was chained. Two of them were men bowed down with age and infirmity; and, as their long, white hair floated in the breeze, and their dim and sunken eyes looked in vain upon that sea of scowling faces for some sign of human sympathy, some faint ray of pity, the bitterness of death might be read in the groan which escaped from their trembling lips. The third was a youth; and, in the erect form, eagle eye, glancing ever and anon with an expression of bitter, burning hate upon his ruthless foes, one might see the high-souled victim of oppression. The chains which bound him to a cruel death had eaten into his soul like a canker. Had he lived in his nation's palmy days, before the curse of the God of his fathers had passed upon the people, he would doubtless have been one of their chosen warriors. The fourth—shame upon the sight!—was one of Israel's loveliest daughters, charged with the double crime of witchcraft and poisoning.

Fagot upon fagot was piled around the victims, and more than one willing hand was ready to apply the torch. The piles around the old men were kindling, and the eager crowd pressed more closely, until at length the barrier was broken down, and the outer stake, to which the Jewess was fastened, completely surrounded. A curious observer might see that the men who pressed so earnestly forward were all in the prime of life, and, by their strength and size, fitted to make their way through the dense mass without finding many hardy enough to oppose them. Each wore a heron feather in his cap, the badge of the Earlach family.

More closely they crowded around the stake; one sprang forward, and, with a blow of his battle-axe, severed the chain which bound the unfortunate girl; another threw a large cloak over her, and she found herself rapidly carried along between two powerful men, while a third walked in front, very unceremoniously making way for those following, by the free use of an arm that might have felled an ox without any great apparent exertion on the part of the gigantic frame to which it belonged.

"How now, Hans?" exclaimed a man in the crowd, who, by a dexterous dive, escaped no gentle blow in the ribs from the elbow of the person he addressed. "Whither so fast, man? You have set your face the wrong way."

"Or mayhap," exclaimed another, "the yells of the accursed Jews have been too much for his nerves."

"Nerves, in sooth!" repeated Hans, with a snort at the implied sneer, which boded no good to the questioners. "If you do not take yourself out of my way, Sir Apothecary, and let the Lady Anne pass, who has been well nigh squeezed to death in the crowd, I'll soon see what your nerves are made of!"

And, suiting the action to the word, the little man found himself seized and tossed up into the air with as much ease as if he had been an infant, where we shall leave him to alight in the best manner his specific gravity may determine.

They succeeded in getting clear of the crowd before the astonished officials were aware of the escape, or the rumor of so daring a deed had spread among the multitude.

The rescue was no sooner effected than those more immediately connected with the enterprise took care to be elbowed out in their turn, and were soon so mingled with the crowd, it was impossible to say who had been the actors. The badge of the Earlach family, so conspicuously worn, was enough to preserve them from suspicion: the old hero of Laupen being the principal accuser of the young Jewess. His complaint was that his only son had been bewitched, and nearly carried to perdition, by her unholy arts. This son, young Rudolph, of Earlach, was confined to his bed by illness, the effect of this alleged witchcraft.

Our story bids us take a retrospect, and inform the reader how Zillah became placed in such deadly peril.

Prior to the breaking out of the plague, the Jews were suffered to carry on their traffic in Zurich, not only in great security, but were encouraged to do so by the grant of many privileges, which they did not enjoy in the neighboring cantons. The father of Zillah was one of the richest and most influential rabbins of his tribe, and had lately returned with rich merchandise from the East, accompanied by his only child, young and surpassingly beautiful.

She had been tenderly, nay, even luxuriously brought up, in the secret chambers of her father's house; and, like most of the educated women of her race, in mental and personal accomplishments was far superior to the young females among the more favored Christians. Knowing from childhood there could be no community of feeling between her despised people and the outer world, she was thrown back upon her own heart and mind for whatever might interest or occupy her genius or affection. She had been carefully instructed by her mother in the contents of their Holy Books, as well as in the traditions of their elders; and to this learning was added the mental wealth of precious manuscripts, coveted by the wise of many nations, but too rare to be obtained save at immense expense. The old Jew, seeing his daughter's thirst for knowledge, sought, in all his wanderings, to return with something that might please and interest her.

And well did Zillah repay his care; she grew up like the stately palm-tree, not more beautiful and graceful to behold than rich in all the deep and kindly feelings of woman's heart.

The degradation of her nation, her own isolated situation—her mother had died before they left their Eastern home—all pressed painfully upon her heart, and gave to her countenance a touchingly subdued expression. None ever looked into those deep, dark, thoughtful eyes without a longing desire to gaze again; and, when to their spell was added the witchery of her low, flute-like voice, and the ever-varying expression of her lovely face, which, like a mirror, reflected the feelings of her heart—the difference of faith, even in those days, might well be forgotten.

And thus it was with brave old Earlach's son. Soon after Zillah arrived in Zurich, she accompanied her father in an excursion from the city to some neighboring towns; and, whilst ascending a rugged pass among the mountains, her mule fell and she was thrown. The young Earlach was ascending the same path, and, acting upon the impulses of a warm and generous nature, rendered her such assistance as the case required. Struck with her exceeding beauty, the grateful expression of those soft eyes haunted him; and excuses were not wanting, from time to time, to enable him to look again and again upon that face, which was soon to work such woe to one or both.

The absence of old Ben Haasen, her father, favored the meeting of the young people; and though on one side, at first, the feeling was entirely that of humble gratitude, mingled with surprise that a Nazarene could feel aught of interest in a Jewess, this feeling gradually gave way to one of a tenderer nature. Though lips spake not, the young Rudolph, of Earlach, or, as we shall call him, young Earlach, was not slow to read in the downcast eyes and changing cheek, whenever he appeared before her, that his devotion had not been unheeded or unfelt.

Occasionally, a pang of reproach would wring his heart, and he determined to see Zillah no more; but, sleeping or waking, her image was ever before him, and after one or two ineffectual struggles, the future was lost sight of in the enjoyment of the present. Not unfrequently, he indulged the hope of making her his bride, and fleeing to some distant land with her until the wrath of his father had passed over, or, as he whispered to himself, with all the sophistry of a lover, until she had been won by him to his purer faith. It was whilst pondering these things he found himself at the door of the Franciscan Chapel, which was thronged with sup-pliants eagerly listening to one of their most popular and fanatical priests. A thrill of horror pervaded his frame, as these words of Father Ambrose rang through the building :—

"Up, up, men of Zurich, and smite the unbelieving race, whose dwelling within the walls of our fair city has caused the wrath of God to fall so heavily upon us! Will you still linger and cry for mercy, while the plague spot is upon your wives and children, and even the ministers of Heaven's appointment are falling by hundreds around you? Away, men of Zurich, cast out the accursed Jews, even as Jonah was cast out, to still the raging of the sea! While they remain in our land, woe, woe to our people!"

This address was received by the kneeling crowd as a command direct from Heaven; they arose in one mass, and rushed from the church, with whatever weapon they chanced to have, or could pick up, towards the Jews' quarter of the city; and, with fierce cries of "Death to the unbelievers!" moved sullenly on, the multitude augmented at every step by the eager, the curious, and fanatical.

Earlach was carried on by the living tide. He struggled, as only man may struggle who has the life and death of one beloved object resting upon his efforts, to get without the crowd, that, by a nearer route, he might first reach the Jews' quarter and snatch Zillah, the daystar of his heart, from impending destruction.

At length, finding himself free, he darted up an obscure and narrow alley, and unexpectedly encountered his father. The old hero of Laupen, seizing him by the arm, asked the meaning of his haste, as well as the approaching roar of the crowd. The cause was soon told, and, with every limb writhing with impatience, the young man sought to be released. He was at last permitted to proceed, and his father walked on, sternly revolving in his own mind the possible reason why his son should be so anxious for the escape of the old Jew. Of the daughter he had never heard. He followed the multitude towards the devoted dwellings, not so much to take a part in the bloody scene to be enacted, as to watch the proceedings of his son, and perhaps rescue him from danger.

The door of Ben Hassen's house was gained; with breathless haste, young Earlach tried to burst it open, but in vain. He then shouted to the inmates to open quickly; but no answer came. At last, a window slowly opened from above, and an old domestic, peeping out cautiously, asked what he wanted.

"Open the door quickly, good Levi," cried Earlach; "life and death depend upon your haste!"

The old man, with trembling hands, unbarred the door; Earlach rushed in, bidding Levi bar the door securely after him, and, springing on before the astonished domestic, made his way to the apartments usually occupied by Zillah.

What a contrast did that peaceful chamber present to the fearful scene of tumult without!

Zillah's apartments had been fitted up by her doating father with every luxury and adornment that affection could devise and wealth procure, and was totally unlike the simple Swiss habitations of that day. The ceiling was painted in arabesque, with flowers falling out of gilded baskets, seemingly threatening a rosy shower upon the lovely occupant of the room. The walls were covered with rich hangings of velvet, and the apartment contained two of those highly polished plates of steel, which then supplied the place of the mirrors of the present day. The largest sized were a luxury too expensive for the use of any but the nobles of the land. Delicate stands of carved ivory were placed about the room, on which were crystal bottles filled with the most delicious perfumes, and costly vases, with flowers from distant climes, shed their fragrance from various parts of the room, their culture being the greatest delight of the fair Zillah. They were like the faces of familiar friends: she had breathed their perfume when a child in Eastern climes, and with their beauty and fragrance was associated in her mind the image of her mother, upon whose grave many were now blooming in that bright distant land. Persian carpets covered the floor, and, on a pile of magnificently embroidered cushions, half reclined the beautiful girl, seemingly lost in thought, her head resting upon her small dimpled hand.

Zillah retained her Eastern costume, as well as tastes, and the caftan of gold brocade, flowered with silver, well-fitted to her shape, showed to admiration the beautiful proportions of her waist and bust. Her drawers were of pale pink; her waistcoat green and silver; her slippers white satin, finely embroidered. Her lovely arms were adorned with bracelets of diamonds, and her broad girdle set round with the same precious gems. On her head she wore a rich Turkish handkerchief, of pink and silver, her own fine, black hair hanging in long tresses; and on one side of her head were some bodkins of jewels, presenting to the eye as radiant a picture of loveliness as could be imagined.

Into this chamber her lover wildly rushed, beseeching her to fly. The startled girl sprang from her couch terrified, she knew not at what.

"I come to snatch you from destruction, Zillah! Your people, all, all!" cried he, shudderingly, as he thought of her possible fate, "are devoted to a bloody death; and we must fly! Even now I hear their cries, and the work of destruction is going on!"

"My father! where is he?" exclaimed the horror-stricken girl.

"I would save him, too, but know not where he is, and time is precious. We must not linger. Do you not hear their savage cries approaching nearer and nearer?" And, seizing her in his arms, would have borne her from the room, when he found his arm gently grasped by the old rabbin, who had entered unperceived.

"Whither would you fly, young man, with a daughter of my hated race? We are hemmed around by your cruel people; and as well might you ask mercy for the lamb from the hungry wolf, as hope to escape through their ranks with the despised Jewess. Either leave us or follow me at once; there is still one chance of escape."

As he spoke, he led the way into a small, dark chamber in the rear of the house, which overlooked the Limmat, upon whose bank the edifice was built. A few hundred yards lower down, the river entered the lake from which the town took its name. It was always covered with a number of small craft employed as lighters to the ships anchored in the lake, many of which, being owned by the Jews, offered a better chance of escape than Earlach anticipated.

Ben Hassen looked anxiously through a narrow slit in the wall out upon the boats lying lazily upon the water, and then striking a portion of the wall with his hand, pressed a spring, and a small door opened, showing a narrow flight of steps. He motioned to Earlach and Zillah to descend, and quickly closing the aperture, they groped their way in silence and darkness to the bottom of the flight. He then bade them remain quietly in the same spot until his return; and, as he turned an abrupt angle of the wall, they could hear his footsteps again descending a much longer flight, habit having made him perfectly familiar with the secret passage.

In a few moments he returned with a lantern, and they were conducted by him through a short gallery to another flight of steps, which they descended, and found themselves in a large cave, evidently much improved in size by the hand of man. Piles of merchandise were placed around its sides, of the most varied description: fine shawls from India, bales of spices and furs worth a prince's ransom. Never before had so much of luxury met the eyes of the young Swiss. The sullen plashing of the waters of the lake was distinctly heard; and a small iron door at the extreme end of the cave opened upon it, the rock jutting out into the lake, the roof of the cave forming a foundation to the house, and extending beyond it.

The enraged multitude, meanwhile, becoming every moment more furious, had carried desolation before it, destroying the houses of the Jews, and putting to death, without regard to age or sex, as many as fell into their hands.

Old Earlach followed moodily, but took no part in the massacre or spoliation, until the house of the rabbin was reached. Bars and axes, wielded by willing hands, soon battered down the doors and windows, and the rabble rushed in. Then it was the old hero, with a shout, dashed aside those before him, and led the search; from room to room he went, calling upon his son, but none answered. The father's anguish suggested the fear that Rudolph had been murdered or carried off by the old Jew and his comrades, in revenge for the popular assault.

Filled with these dreadful thoughts, the old chief hastily called together some of his friends in the crowd, and making known to them his fears and determination not to leave a stone of the building standing until he sought in every possible hiding-place for his lost son, he ordered his followers to drive off the plunderers of the crowd. These, sooth to say, had well nigh helped themselves to all that was worth carrying off in the house.

Hans, the foster-brother of Rudolph, was chasing like a wild boar, the apprehensions of old Earlach having reached his ears. He doubted not that Rudolph had been slain by the Jews; and, collecting a band of his own associates, wild, daring young men, warmly devoted to himself and Rudolph, they formed a cordon around the house, that none might escape from it unseen.

The work of destruction went on, and the crash of the beams and falling masonry was distinctly heard by the fugitives in the cave. Ben Hassen opened the iron door, and made signals to some of the small boats near, but they were not answered; the boatmen not being willing to quit their place of safety for the dangerous vicinity of the shore. The old man looked around for some small boat, in which, unassisted, he might make his escape, and found one attached to the iron ring used for that purpose, and driven into the rock at the entrance of the cave. Hastening back, he threw a large cloak over his daughter, and hurried her on to this their only hope of safety, followed by Rudolph. Putting his daughter in, he pushed off; the young man stepped in also, and, taking up an oar, began to ply it dexterously before a word was spoken.

As they shot out into the open stream, from what seemed to be the foundation of the house, some of the sentinels stationed by Hans on the stone platform just above their heads, gave the alarm, and they were assailed by various missiles, but with no effect. After a brisk row of half an hour, they found themselves at the side of a dark, battered-looking vessel, which had been for several days anchored far out in the lake, waiting for a fair wind to proceed to its destination at the mouth of the Aar, where it was stationed as a sort of receiving-ship for the merchandise brought down that lordly river by smaller boats. The captain was a Jew, well known to Ben Hassen, and often employed by him in the transportation of his merchandise. They clambered up the sides of the vessel, and the old man, in a few words, told the captain of their strait, and the necessity for immediate flight; but not a ripple disturbed the calm waters of the lake, the sails flapped idly against the mast, and, with a countenance of despair, the Jew turned to Rudolph.

"Young man," said he, "I thank you for the kindness you have manifested towards me and mine; but your presence here can do us no farther service, and may work us, if possible, more deadly peril. Take the boat, and return to those who doubtless await you at their banquet of blood!"

"Not so," replied the young man; "I leave you not until Zillah is in a place of safety. Nor then, if she permits me to remain."

"Can the dove mate with the wolf?" asked the old man, bitterly. "As well imagine that as expect to wed my daughter. Evil was the day on which her feet touched these shores; and, if we escape, never more shall she behold them!"

They were too much absorbed in their own feelings to observe two or three boats put off from the town, and steering most suspiciously for the vessel in which they had taken refuge. The captain pointed this out; and, as the dead calm prevented the ship's getting under way, they awaited whatever might befall them with the calmness of utter defencelessness.

The boats came nearer and nearer, filled with strong and active foes. Twenty sprang upon deck, Hans at their head, who no sooner saw Rudolph than he shouted, "Heaven be praised, we have found you alive!" and seized his friend by the hand.

The Jew and his daughter were captured, but not murdered, as they expected. Rudolph loudly commanded his partisans and friends to return and leave the Jews to make their escape. Hans, to the surprise of those he had just led to the assault, vehemently supported him, and insisted on their departure. The sturdy foster-brother was too much accustomed to yield to Rudolph's judgment, and follow his lead unquestioning, to think of disputing his will. Though, had he paused to consider, he might have wondered what magic influence had awakened so deep an interest for this Jewish family in the young man's breast.

Ben Hassen and his daughter were released, and the men were about returning to the boats, when another and most unwelcome actor appeared upon the scene.

"Seize the Jew and his daughter, and place them in the boats!" cried the stern voice of old Earlach, who had been an unobserved spectator of the scene, some minutes before he spoke, from one of the last boats, whose approach was unnoticed until then. "And you, young sir—to his son—" follow me!"

"Strike at once, Nazarene!" said the old Jew, with dignity, confronting Earlach. "Spare you innocent girl, if not myself, the fury of the crowd on yonder blood-stained shore. Strike, and we will deem it mercy!"

"I am not your executioner, old man. You and your daughter shall be brought before a higher tribunal—that of Mother Church—to answer for the crimes laid to your charge."

"Then, indeed, may we expect the most cruel fate. For myself I care not; these old sinews may be racked and tortured; I can endure the worst; but my innocent, darling child, doom her not to anything so fearful!—or," cried the old man, changing his tone and attitude of supplication to one of fierce menace, "the bitterest curses of a father shall cleave to your house to the latest generation!"

"Place them in the boat, Hans, and see they escape not," said old Earlach, sternly. And taking his son by the arm, drew him into the boat, and seated himself by his side while they proceeded to the city.

Rudolph in vain entreated his father to forego his determination of placing Ben Hassen and his daughter in the custody of the Abbot of the Franciscans. He confessed the deep interest he took in the safety of Zillah, thereby unconsciously increasing her peril. Not that his father was cruel by nature, but the mental darkness of the age had obscured his otherwise clear understanding; and the idea of his son being in love with a Jewess, even were she a second Queen of Sheba, was something so utterly startling and abhorrent to him, that he could ascribe it to no agency save that of magic. The Jews were said to be addicted to the black art, and Earlach believed the accusation just.

Immured in one of the cells of the Franciscan Convent sat Zillah, despoiled of her rich robes and glittering jewels, and habited in a coarse serge garment, leaving only the exquisite hands and throat exposed to view. Her face was deadly pale, and she looked, in her attitude of dejection, more like some finished piece of sculpture than a breathing being. After being separated from her father, she had fallen into such a deathlike swoon, that her captors at one time thought she had escaped from their hands, and at once ended her sorrows and her life. But sorrow and life were still strong in that young heart; the magnitude of the affliction enabled her to endure it; for, after the first keen pang, in the agony of which the very semblance of life passed away, returning consciousness brought with it a dull, leaden weight of sorrow, by which the acuteness of the first feeling was blunted. The past, the present, and the future were alike misty and indistinct to her; a troubled expression would at times agitate her deathlike countenance, and once or twice she pressed her hands upon her brow, as if attempting to collect her scattered thoughts, and to remove the sense of oppression which weighed so heavily there.

The grating of the door upon its rusty hinges, as it was unlocked and opened, caused a slight shiver to run through the frame of the unhappy girl; but she did not raise her eyes or change her posture.

"Daughter of an accursed race," said the monk who entered, "confess the dark arts you have used to inhale the spirit of young Rudolph, of Earlach, who now lies bereft of reason, calling upon you in his madness, unable to shake off the fierce fever and spell by which you have enchanted him. Confess, and avow your penitence, and peradventure the Holy Church may be merciful."

"Alas, dread sir, I have naught to confess. I know no art save that of loving too well, too rashly; and woe is me that my father has thereby fallen into the hands of his enemies!"

Here, for the first time, bitter tears covered her face, and trickled through the slender fingers that were pressed in agony before her eyes.

The monk was touched, and, for one moment, the eloquence of nature was stronger than prejudice and fanaticism; but, walking hastily to and fro the little cell, he dispelled the uneasy feeling, and, with all his previous sternness, bade her prepare to appear before the heads of the church, who had assembled to try her, or rather to condemn her to such punishment as they chose to award.

"My father! May I not see once more my poor father?" said Zillah, beseechingly.

"Yes, yes," said the monk, hurriedly. "And let me warn you once again, your only chance of escape from the fiery death awaiting you is by confessing freely, and throwing yourself upon the mercy of the church—by becoming a convert to her doctrines. In two hours, a lay brother will conduct you into the presence of the holy tribunal." So saying, without casting another look upon Zillah, the monk strode from the cell, locking the door after him.

When his footsteps could be no longer heard, Zillah prostrated herself upon the floor, in earnest supplication for strength in this her hour of need, and sought it not in vain.

Where was Rudolph? Stretched on a bed of pain and raging fever, the effect of anxiety and agitation of mind. At the moment his efforts were most needed, he was disabled from doing anything towards the liberation of Zillah.

Anne, his youngest and only unmarried sister, and the faithful Hans, watched over him night and day; and, as he raved incessantly of the young Jewess, they grieved bitterly over him, and sympathized with his sufferings. But youth and a strong constitution triumphed over disease; and, on the tenth day after the captivity of poor Zillah, he woke from a long, deep sleep perfectly collected, and the throbbing of his pulse quieted to almost infantile weakness.

"Sister Anne," said he, tenderly, taking the hand of the fair girl who was bending anxiously over him, "what is all this? I have been ill. What has happened?"

"Hush," whispered his sister. "You have, indeed, been fearfully ill; but, the Holy Virgin be praised, our prayers in your behalf have been heard, and you are spared to us. But you must be quiet, and sleep again, dear brother, before I can hear or answer any questions." And, going to a table near the couch, she brought him some light nourishment.

He partook, and sank down exhausted into another profound sleep, which lasted for several hours.

Hans walked softly into the room, and, to his anxious look of inquiry, Anne smiled and whispered, "Better, much better; but we must be quiet, and keep him so as long as possible."

"I have just heard that," thought Hans, "which will send the blood boiling through his veins in another fever flood. Well, she may be a Jewess, and have dealings with the devil; but to my mind she has an innocent look, and is too pretty to be burnt like an old witch. I am heartily sorry I ever had anything to do with her capture."

Anne bade Hans watch by Rudolph until she took some needful rest, being well nigh worn out with fatigue. He prepared to obey by taking his seat in an old oaken chair, from its weight a fixture at the side of the bed; and the more he thought of the fate of Zillah the more he pitied her, and dreaded its effects upon Rudolph.

"I have ever lacked thought," muttered he, "or I might devise some plan for her rescue. Were he only better, and knew all, something might be done. There are still three days. I must tell him, and whatever he commands, I will perform."

Brightening up under the influence of these kind and hopeful thoughts, Hans continued to muse until Rudolph's heavy breathing became so infectious that he, perforce, yielded to the influence of sleep. How long he remained in this state he knew not, but a touch and the laughing remonstrance of Rudolph roused him.

"Hans, my good fellow, you must be blowing a trumpet accompaniment to the advance of an imaginary army, from the loudness of your breathing."

The good youth excused himself by saying he had walked far over the mountains for some herbs, said to be sovereign in the cure of distempers caused by witchcraft, if gathered before sunrise, and was somewhat wearied.

"Witchcraft! What folly, Hans! Do you believe, like the rest, that I am bewitched? I tell you, I love Zillah better than life; her danger alone, and the mad excitement of the few days preceding her capture, have produced my illness. Both Zillah and her father escaped from the boats, did they not?" asked he, looking eagerly at Hans.

"Alas, no!" replied Hans. "They have been divided among the birds of prey. The Dominicans have the old man, and will drain his coffers well, be they ever so full, before they let him off; and the girl was locked up by the Franciscans."

"Gold can do much," said Rudolph; "but where can I procure the gold? Yet Zillah must be liberated!"

"It must be soon, then," said Hans, abruptly; "for she has been tried and condemned."

"Condemned to what, and for what?" exclaimed

Rudolph, fiercely, springing up in the bed and seizing the arm of Hans, as if to prevent his escape before answering the question.

"I pray you," cried Hans, "do not go mad again! Be quiet, and I will tell you all I know; and, moreover, will peril life and limb to do whatever you may command."

This last sentence, uttered with an expression of deep devotion to Rudolph, soothed him, and he sank back upon his pillows, while Hans proceeded with his narrative.

Zillah, according to his account, had been brought before the ecclesiastical council, accused by old Earlach of having bewitched his son, whose life was then in peril from her spells. In the state of popular feeling against the Jews, to be accused was but to be condemned; and, as Zillah either could not or would not confess herself guilty of the charge, she was sentenced to be burnt at the stake, with some others, as a terror to evil-doers. In three days, the sentence was to be carried into execution before the Franciscan Convent.

"I will die or save her!" said Rudolph, sternly. "I will rescue her from the very flames. Hans, how many of our tried companions can we rely upon to aid us in an enterprise, I know not how wild and desperate, but one I swear to attempt, though followed by certain death?"

"Do you but point out the way," replied Hans, "and leave the rest to me. I know a score of burly fellows who would follow you to the pit itself without asking a question."

"Search them out, then, at once, Hans; as you love me, lose no time; and beware that no one suspects any movement of the kind upon our part. My illness must answer one good turn, by putting my father off his guard; and we must make the most, too, of his absence from the city."

Anne's entrance stopp'd further parley on the one absorbing topic, and she did not fail to notice the excited state of her brother, who was impatiently tossing upon his bed. She glanced reproachfully at Hans.

"You have been talking imprudently, I fear," said she. "Reach me that cup with the potion the leech left."

Hans, much embarrassed, obeyed; and, taking it from him, she presented it to her brother, and insisted upon his drinking it. The drug was narcotic, and under its influence the patient sank gradually into profound sleep; while Hans left the house with a quick step, but thoughtful brow. The enterprise to which he had pledged himself was not without great risk to all engaged, even supposing he could find a sufficient number as devoted and willing to undertake it as himself, in the face of the anathemas of the church, more feared than deadly weapons.

"Ho, there, Hans!" cried a youth of stout frame and smiling face; "how fares young Earlach? Is it true the young Jewess has bewitched him—that he is nigh unto death?"

"Fools say so, Ernst; but there is only one sort of witchcraft about it, Rudolph swears; and that, I trow, the pretty Gretchen, Dame Margaret's granddaughter, in the hamlet below, has dealt out freely to you! Nay, you well know my meaning! And I begin to think the helping hand we lent the old man in capturing the Jewess was the worst day's work we ever undertook, let Mother Church say what she will."

"How!" demanded Ernst. "Rudolph wed with a Jewess?"

"Were Gretchen come of Jew or Turk, think you you could stand tamely by and see her burn, even though it might be for the good of your soul? Rudolph means not, I trust, to wed her; his only wish before, as you know, was to send her and her father in safety out of the country. We helped to prevent their escape; and I have promised to lend a helping hand to undo my own work. I must see how many of our comrades will join me in doing his bidding, whatever it may be. You, Ernst, must along with us."

"Provided Rudolph only desires to get the Jews out of the country, I will join you. The maiden, too, is a pretty one, like my own Gretchen. Go, Hans, and see as many of our comrades as you can, nor will I be idle; to-morrow we can meet without the walls, and determine what is to be done."

They separated, taking different routes; the one deeper into the thoroughfares of the city, and the other without the walls, to the farm-houses and hamlets below.

Ernst walked rapidly on, with the light, elastic tread which the bracing air and hardy life of a brave mountaineer could alone give. His way lay through vineyards and cornfields, sometimes on the sloping banks of the lake, sometimes on a small footpath formed upon terraces on a level with the water, during great part of the way shaded by large beech and oak-trees. The walnut and other fruit-trees that overhung the pathway like weeping willows, many of them being planted horizontally, stretched from the sides of the hill, or from the edge of the water, their boughs dipping into the lake beneath. The scattered cottages, the numerous villages, the picturesque villas on the banks of the lake, with here and there a neat church, pointing with its taper spire to the calm, blue heavens above, added to the beauty of the scene; and, by their silent appeal, touched with softness the rugged, though not unfeeling breast of the mountaineer, who had been revolving in his mind the communication of Hans; nor was the termination of his walk, just in sight, likely to weaken these pleadings of compassion.

A peasant's cottage, with a cluster of fine beech-trees in front, its small terraced garden on one side, and a few cherry-trees laden with fruit on the other, bespoke peace and contented industry, from the perfect air of neatness in and around it. Immediately in front of the door sat an old woman, with snowy cap and kerchief, spinning; and, at a little distance, the pretty Gretchen was preparing to set off with her pail to milk the cows, which were pastured upon some green spot higher up the mountain. A few light bounds, and Ernst was by the side of the maiden; and, taking the pail from her, they slowly ascended the mountain, thinking of their own love, and talking of that of Rudolph's for the beautiful Jewess.

Hans found about twenty of his associates, and engaged them to follow Rudolph and himself, in whatever they might undertake to further the escape of Zillah. Then, though wearied and hungry, he determined, before returning to Rudolph, to discover the prison of the Jewess, and see if there was any chance of procuring her escape before she should be brought out to execution.

He soon reached the neighborhood of the convent where she was confined; and it was not long before he saw the porter of the convent and several officials coming out to give orders from the superior to the workmen employed in the court below, evidently making arrangements for the approaching auto da fé. Hans joined the group, and, that he might linger without suspicion to listen to their conversation, offered his services in planting the stakes firmly in the ground. While occupied in this way, he did not cease to ply the porter with questions about the place of Zillah's confinement, and the probability, as old Ben Hassen was rich, of her being at last ransomed.

"Impossible, my son!" said the monk. "The dog of a Jew has not one penny more than will save his own life; and the sorceress, his daughter, must burn, as she deserves."

"What if the dispersed members of her tribe should offer to ransom her? For I hear old Ben Hassen and his daughter are of high rank among their own people."

"They ought to have looked to that before now," replied the monk. "The Jewess burns the day after to-morrow, that the people may see how Holy Mother Church punishes the crime of devil's witchcraft. She is to be chained to this stake, in front of the others, that the crowd may have a better view; and it will be the last pile kindled."

Hans expressed great satisfaction at the wise arrangement of the holy father; and, his self-imposed task being finished, bade the monk good evening, and turned his footsteps towards Earlach's dwelling. To the anxious lover he related his success.

"The walls of her prison," said he, "cannot be even approached, and the monks are too sure of the gold of the father to listen to aught of ransom for the daughter. Nor do they intend carrying the condemned in procession through the city, on account of the plague. She will be carried not a hundred yards from the convent to the stake."

"She shall be snatched, then, from the stake itself!" cried Rudolph. "But, alas, my arm has not strength to effect it! You, Hans, are my only hope. Let our followers be the first around the stake to which she is chained; watch for the most favorable opportunity of carrying her off, when the officials are engaged with the others, or by creating some confusion in the rabble around; then speed for your life with her beyond the walls of the city."

"I have it all now," said Hans, after a pause; "and will arrange with Ernst to-morrow where she is to be carried until we can send her to some other land."

"I must see her first," murmured Rudolph.

"What! bring her here, in the very teeth of danger?"

"Cannot I be borne first to her place of refuge, and await her there, wherever it may be?" asked Rudolph, calmly.

"Nay," answered Hans; "your absence will cause suspicion to alight upon you and your friends. I care not for myself. And your father, if he should return, will move heaven and earth until both are found."

The sick man waved his hand impatiently.

"Have you seen old Michael with his boat from Wedenschweil lately? I once saved the life of his son, and he swore eternal gratitude. Go tell him the time has come; and, if he is willing to remember his vow of service, to have his boat in readiness at the anchorage below the hamlet, where the old woman's cottage stands. I mean the one Ernst visits so much. On pretences of change of air, I will be carried there to-morrow, and there await your coming with Zillah."

"Does the Lady Anne know aught of your plans? And think you she will counsel so mad a project as your removal, feeble as you are?"

"Anne is tender-hearted, and loves me much; then no fear of opposition in that quarter. My father, too, has not returned from Winterthur, where he has gone on business before the great council, which is not likely to be settled soon. He sent word to that effect to Anne to-day."

Anne was then called to hear her brother's determination to be removed from the city the next day, and, though disposed to oppose his doing so until better able to bear the move, upon Rudolph's opening his heart to her, she gave way at once, and promised to aid him as far as it might be in her power.

They then separated for the night, Hans throwing himself down upon a pallet at the foot of Rudolph's bed, where he soon found that oblivion the other sought in vain.

The first gray light of morning had scarcely dawned before Hans was up, and making his toilet somewhat in the fashion of a faithful mastiff, with a hearty shake and diverse stretchings of the limbs, proceeded at once without the walls to meet Ernst, that all might be prepared for the eventful morrow.

The inmates of Gretchen's cottage were to be apprised of Rudolph's wish, and their consent obtained, and who so fitting an ambassador as Ernst, the declared bachelor of the pretty Gretchen?

The place of rendezvous gained, Hans found not only Ernst, but most of their comrades, who listened attentively to Rudolph's plan for carrying Zillah off from the stake, promising their best efforts for its success. They then agreed to meet at the little inn just without the gate, that night, to be in readiness to take their appointed places early in the morning.

Hans and Ernst proceeded onwards to the little cottage, Ernst promising the hearty co-operation of Gretchen and her grandmother. It was a walk of three miles, and, as Rudolph would follow soon, they walked briskly on, and soon found themselves at the cottage door. Their errand told, the good dame and maiden set to work at once to prepare the best chamber for the sick man; while Gretchen placed fresh flowers and a snowy coverlid of her own spinning upon the bed in her own little chamber for the Lady Anne.

Meanwhile, Hans proceeded to cross the lake lower down to Wedenschweil, on the west side of the lake, to bring the old boatman over before nightfall, if possible.

Gretchen, aided by Ernst, had just succeeded to her satisfaction in arranging the cottage for the reception of their expected guests, when the litter upon which Rudolph was borne appeared in sight, slowly descending the hill. Anne followed upon a beautiful Spanish jennet, attended by several serving-men on foot, who, from time to time, relieved the bearers of the litter.

After a few hours' rest in the cottage, Rudolph rose, and seating himself by Dame Margaret, who was industriously plying her spinning-wheel, soon ingratiated himself so completely in her favor, that she began to tell him an interminable story of which she was the heroine some forty years back. She always afterwards declared Rudolph not only the handsomest and bravest youth in Zurich, but the most sensible and best mannered.

Owing to the plague, the communication between Zurich and the neighboring hamlets was slight, though not entirely suspended; and the old woman knew nothing of the approaching auto da fé, or the deep interest Rudolph took in one of the victims. Anne undertook to prepare her for the arrival of another guest in the person of Zillah, who would remain but a few hours under her roof, if Hans returned successful in his search after the fisherman and his son.

As evening advanced, Rudolph seated himself at the window looking out upon the lake in the direction of Wedenschweil, agitated by a thousand fears of failure. At length a boat, with its one sail set, steered directly for the anchorage below the cottage, and soon afterwards Hans, with Michael and his son, entered the cottage, the latter exchanging greetings with Rudolph, and putting themselves and boat at his command. Hans remained a few moments longer in earnest conversation with Rudolph, who gave him every direction he could conceive necessary in case aught untoward should happen to derange, in any measure, their first plan of action. He then departed for the place of rendezvous, there to await his comrades and the coming morning.

So far everything had favored their design; but Rudolph felt the hardest task now awaited him—the many hours of inaction before the crowning-point of their enterprise was effected; the doubts, the fears, the thick-coming fancies which crowded upon his brain, lest all might be lost from some oversight or want of conduct in those to whom he was perforce obliged to leave the rescue of Zillah, placed, as it was, upon a single cast of the die. As he thought of his own helplessness to aid her, he groaned and covered his face with his hands, to press back the drops wrung from his heart, and ready to overflow his eyes. Then, turning to his sister, who was sitting by him, he sought relief by unfolding to her his plans in the event of success.

They remained in earnest conversation until the lateness of the hour warned Anne that it was time to retire, and obtain needful rest before the agitating events of the morrow. She smoothed her brother's pillow, and besought him, for the sake of all who loved him, to dismiss harassing thought and yield himself to the blessed oblivion of sleep, the true Lethe for many sad remembrances.

The eventful morning came; the sun rose bright and cloudless, as though it were not to gild with its beams a scene of cruelty; the birds sang joyously, as if death was not revelling around them in the hearts and homes of thousands—all nature was bright and beautiful; and yet the deadliest evil sent upon man, the unsparing plague, was at that moment filling the chambers of death with the multitude of its victims.

The convent cells were opened, and, as we have shown in the first part of this veritable history, Zillah and her unfortunate companions were carried out and bound to the stake; they to suffer, and she to be rescued by Hans and Ernst, who lost no time in conveying her to the cottage in the same litter which had conveyed Rudolph the day before.

So admirably had they succeeded in their undertaking, that suspicion did not once alight upon them until long after all trouble to be apprehended from the discovery was over; the monks preferring to have it believed that Zillah had been carried off bodily by the Evil One she served, rather than by mortal agency.

The litter on which Zillah was placed, as soon as they were without the city, was carried to the cottage at a rapid pace. They soon reached it; and, upon opening the curtains of the litter, the poor girl was found composed, but helpless as an infant. The conflict of mind she had gone through, her unexpected deliverance when all hope seemed past, had reduced her, by the reaction, to a state of infantile weakness. Hans took her in his arms and bore her into the cottage. At the door of Anne's apartment he was met by Rudolph, who, taking the fair girl from him, tottered with her to the couch, upon which he seated himself, still holding her to his heart, as if afraid his recovered treasure might yet escape him.

"Earlach!" was all the faint voice of Zillah uttered as she clung to him, hiding her face upon his bosom; and then she wept as though life itself were pouring out with her tears.

Rudolph placed her gently upon the couch, and, by his caresses and soothing words, restored her to some degree of calmness; and Anne, touched by their love and grief, stood by in silent sympathy.

A summons from Hans drew Anne from the chamber; and, when she returned, it was to find Zillah sleeping, her hand clasped in Rudolph's, who, sitting by her side, watched as only those can whose "love, nor age can chill, nor rival steal, nor falsehood disavow."

"I grieve to disturb you, brother," said Anne, softly; "but Hans thinks it dangerous to remain in this neighborhood, and the old fisherman urges you to send Zillah over the lake at once. The wind is fair, and they await her in the boat. Michael says, too, he will receive her into his own family at Wedenschweil, which, being an independent lordship, is not likely to be molested by the authorities of Zurich, should they search for Zillah. While there, you can devise other plans for her future welfare. Hans tells me, too," said she, lowering her voice still more, "that her father, though liberated by the prior upon the payment of his ransom, grew desperate at being unable to procure the release of Zillah, and, refusing to conceal himself, was killed by a band of rioters in the market-place."

"Has Zillah heard it?" asked Rudolph.

"No," replied Anne. "Either you or I must impart it to her; but not yet. She looks so like a crushed flower, I dread to add weight to her already heavy burden of grief. But, dear brother, the boat waits."

"I must not go with her," said Rudolph to himself, as if combatting a strong desire to do what he knew he ought not to do; "but I must speak with Hans." And, softly disengaging his hand from that of the sleeper, he quitted the room.

As he did so, Zillah opened her eyes, and, seeing Anne looking thoughtfully and compassionately at her, a slight blush suffused her pale cheeks.

"I fear, lady," she said, "you think me over free; but, alas! misery has well nigh changed my being." She clasped her hands despairingly. "Of my poor father I can learn nothing!"

"Nay," said Anne, kindly, "if you love my brother, for his sake be calm, and listen to the plan we have formed for your safety. A boat is waiting to take you to Wedenschweil, where you will be cared for by humble, but kind friends, until such time as other arrangements can be made. Were you, indeed, other than—than"—she hesitated, fearing to give pain.

"The daughter of a Jew," meekly added Zillah.

"Yes, a Jewess," faltered Anne—"there would be but little difficulty in finding you a suitable asylum. As it is, with every wish to aid you, we may find it hard to do so; but Heaven will protect the innocent."

"Lady," said Zillah, "I, too, believe in Jesus of Nazareth; but not—oh, not as your cruel church interprets his holy words!"

"How became you a believer?" asked Anne, eagerly.

"From some precious Greek manuscripts brought from Rome by my father: idle stories, he called them, but curious. In the solitude of my chamber, I studied them closely; and, comparing what was there set down with our own holy books, I became convinced that our nation were blinded, and the appointed Messiah had come in the person of the crucified Jesus."

"Believe, then, Zillah," cried Anne, tenderly embracing her, "in the wise guidance of Mother Church, and all will be well. Her discipline may at times be stern; but, when the canker would deface and destroy her fair proportions, the knife must be used to preserve what remains in health and beauty. We will send you far hence, to the Abbess of Seckingen, in Suabia. There you will see our holy faith exercised in all its love and purity. The abbess is a sister of my sainted mother, and to her I am indebted for all a mother's love that I have ever known. But," checking herself, "I must away with the joyful tidings to Rudolph!" And again kissing Zillah, she glided out of the room.

We shall not record the expressions of delight which escaped from the lips of Rudolph, upon being told of Zillah's faith in the Christian religion, as well as their parting with the assurance on his side, that many weeks should not elapse before he joined her, bringing tidings of her father. To all his entreaties for an immediate union, the mournful reply was—

"I cannot forsake my father, in this his day of adversity and bitter trial. Wherever he wanders, there shall I be at his side, as long as life is spared us both. You must forget me, Earlach—forget that one so unhappy as myself has ever crossed your path; and I," said she, faintly smiling, "will pray for you, and find happiness in believing that you are happy."

"Do not believe that possible, Zillah," said Rudolph; "and, above all things, decide upon no future step until I see you."

That she promised him; and they separated.

Zillah, under the escort of Hans, was conveyed by the fisherman in safety over the lake to his cottage at Wedenschweil.

Rudolph and Anne remained at the cottage in preference to returning to the town, and it was not very long before they received a summons from their father to join him at Winterthur, whither they determined to proceed at once, giving Hans a commission to find out the Abbess of Seckingen, and to procure an asylum with her for Zillah.

The voyage to Winterthur was soon accomplished, and old Earlach greeted his children kindly, looking anxiously at the emaciated figure of his son, when he could do so unobserved. Nor was it long before, taking Anne aside, he questioned her closely as to his malady, and the best cure for it. Anne suggested that, as the plague was devastating their unfortunate country, if her father would send Rudolph to foreign lands, he would, in a year or two, be himself again.

Old Earlach bent his brows, and at last signified his approval of the measure. Rudolph was duly apprised, and commanded to make his preparations for a speedy departure. Anne wrote a few lines to her aunt, the abbess, and charged Rudolph to deliver them, well knowing he would soon seek her.

Hans had not yet returned, and Rudolph, all impatience to know the success of his mission, charged Anne to send him to Wedenschweil, whither he determined to go at once, and to remain until his foster-brother arrived. This first step in his travels, however, was not made known to his father, who was too much occupied with state affairs to make minute inquiries as to his route at setting forth. He contented himself with giving Rudolph letters of credit to some old friends and comrades in France and Germany. He also supplied him with what, in our days, would be deemed a very moderate allowance for travelling expenses, though quite enough for Switzerland and the simple habits of its people.

Upon reaching Wedenschweil, Rudolph found Zillah much improved in health and strength; and, in as tender a manner as love could devise, informed her of the death of her father. Her grief at first was excessive; but the feeling that there was one ready to peril life, and all that makes life dear, to shield her from harm and win her love, gradually brought calmness and resignation to her heart. When, in a few days, Hans returned with the pleasing intelligence that the Abbess of Seckingen was then at Glarus, where she had founded a convent, the whole canton being subject to her, though enjoying many privileges and a democratical form of government, the preparation necessary before leaving with Rudolph for that city, farther diverted her thoughts, and in some measure restored her cheerfulness.

Rudolph determined to lose no time in placing Zillah under the care of his aunt, trusting that a few months in the quiet seclusion of the convent would restore her to tranquillity. It was a safe asylum during his absence. He expected to return in a year, and then Zillah had promised to link her fate with his for life.

And now, gentle reader, I might tell you of strange things that befell our young Swiss in Germany, but I will not detain you; so, dropping some twelve months, I will just say Rudolph returned to his native city, and obtained his father's consent to marry a foreign lady, who had been for some months under the charge of his aunt, the abbess, who praised her devotion and loveliness.

In the chapel of the convent at Glarus, the hands of Zillah and Rudolph were joined, without a suspicion on the part of old Earlach that his fair daughter-in-law was the despised Jewess he had persecuted nigh unto death.

Rudolph removed to Winterthur, where he lived happily with Zillah to a good old age.

Ernst and Gretchen married some months before Rudolph returned from his travels, and their descendants occupied the little cottage for many generations.

Hans continued the faithful friend and follower of Rudolph through life.

Anne, after the tragical death of her father, took the veil, and, in time, became abbess of the convent founded by her aunt at Glarus. She was long remembered throughout the canton for the holiness of her life and numerous acts of charity.

AN APPEAL TO TIME.

BY G. N. BARBOUR.

O TIME! give back my childhood days,
So fraught with joyous glee;
With all my boyish pranks and ways—
Oh! give them back to me.

Place me again by father's knee,
Or mother's side, to pray;
Then make my sisters young with me,
My brothers, too—to play.

Let mother smile upon me now,
To see my childish joy;
Let father kiss my little brow,
And call me "darling boy."

Within the school-room let me sit,
With classmates, as of yore;
My teacher kind, I want him yet
To mete to us his lore.

Then place me with my playmates all,
Upon the green, so gay—
With joyous laugh, with bat and ball,
To pass the hours at play.

O Time! give back my childhood days,
Those halcyon days of truth,
And I'll give up my manhood ways,
And be once more a youth.

New Madrid, Mo.

SCENES IN THE LIFE OF A POET.

TRANSLATED FROM THE GERMAN.

PART II.

WITH a hundred dollars in his pocket, given him by his father, our poet shipped, in the beginning of August, 1805, upon the packet-boat to Halle, intending to wait there for the first instalment of his pension, and then to proceed onwards as far as said pension would permit, even to the holy city of artists, the foster-mother of the soul—Rome herself. Ehlen Schlager was now twenty-six years old. We give an anecdote from the very commencement of his journey, to show how the poet of twenty-six travelled: "Towards Quedlinburg, I travelled with a whole family—father, mother, and a number of lovely children. The father had been appointed postmaster in Quedlinburg, and they were approaching it for the first time, having left the home where the children were born. But as soon as a happy family are within four walls, they are again at home. It was a beautiful evening. 'See,' said the little boy to his father, 'there are the towers of Quedlinburg!' To me, who have such a tender feeling of domestic joys, and who, like the solitary bird, had left my own nest to roost upon strange branches, it was indeed agreeable to meet these calm, idyllic joys, upon the poet-wagon, and the reader will not think it strange that I was so occupied with this little family, that I forgot my portmanteau, containing all I possessed, and the loss of which I did not discover till the next day, in Halle."

He spent the winter in Halle, under the hospitable roof of a friend and countryman, and heard the lectures at the University, by Steffens in natural philosophy, by Wolff upon archeology, and by Schleiermacher in ethics; with the latter, he formed a close intimacy. Schleiermacher understood no Danish, and our poet translated for him his poems into German; this first excited his ambition to write in the sister language, and to become a German poet. Schleiermacher, in return, translated for him the Ædipus in Colonna, word for word; he read it also in Greek, that Ehlen Schlager might become familiar with the sound of the beautiful language.

The spring approached—the first quarter of his pension arrived, and he went as far as Berlin; where, the first evening, he met the noble and beautiful queen, Louisa, at the Redout, arrayed like Psyche, with wings attached to her shoulders. "Ah! it signified," he says, "that she would soon leave this earth for her own celestial abode." In Berlin, he became acquainted with Fichte, who thought him worthy to read and understand his philosophy.

After three weeks spent in Berlin, he hastened to Weimar, at that time the goal of all literary aspirants, and to Goethe the great autocrat. "He received me," says Ehlen Schlager, "paternally, and I often dined with him. He made me read to him my Aladdin and Hakon Jarl, extemporising them into German verse. Then he would say, when I used a Danish word, 'that is pretty.' 'But is that German?' I asked. 'No, not German, but the languages may well make each other sisterly presents of good words.'" Goethe must have been amused by the enthusiastic poet, as an anecdote will prove.

"One day at the table, he spoke so warmly and with so much power for the honor and rights of the citizens in opposition to an affected courtier, who pretended to make a joke of the bravery or honor of a citizen, that when the courtier was gone I could not help falling upon his neck and kissing him." At this embrace, the stately Geheimerath cried out, "Ja, Ja, dear Dane, you no doubt think well and justly too!"

To enjoy Goethe's society a few days longer, he followed him to Jena, where the former rested on his journey to Carlsbad. "It was a sultry day, and, heated with walking, I quenched my thirst at an ice-cold fountain: I was instantly seized with intense pain in the breast, so that I could not enjoy the society of Goethe. I asked myself, Have I, then, drunk my death in that cold fountain? But as I looked out of the window, I saw a splendid rainbow, in which the green stripe, the color of hope, was peculiarly brilliant. At this sight my fears vanished, and in a couple of days I was quite well again. The incident of this day occurred to me when afterwards I wrote the fifth act of Correggio."

The 12th of June, our poet journeyed on to Dresden, eating larks at Leipzig on the way. In Dresden, he lived much in the accomplished Körner family, Theodore, afterwards the hero-poet, being then a pretty boy of fourteen years old. Körner's sister, Emma, was a lovely artist, and a young inmate of the family, an accomplished musician. In their company he visited the Dresden Gallery. I would gladly translate his views of art, but this notice would be thus too far extended.

He had joined a couple of his countrymen on their tour to Italy, and the day was fixed for their departure, but he would first indulge himself by running back to Weimar to take one more look at Goethe. "At this time," he says, "I read no newspapers. I knew, indeed, that Prussia and France were at war, and that Napoleon had advanced his army between the Ulster and the Saale, but, as my friends, who were industrious newspaper readers, were not afraid, we ventured on to Weimar. I met Goethe the first evening at the theatre. 'Since you are here,' he said, 'where you certainly ought not to be, but since you are here—welcome!' It was not prudent to attempt to return, we resolved therefore to remain and wait the issue in Weimar.

"The Prussian head-quarters were at Weimar with the king and queen. The camp was just without the city. I went with Goethe through this wonderful movable city, full of little huts, where the bravest soldier must at least be peaceful through the darkness of night. The market-women appeared to me wonderfully acute; the wildest soldiers were indebted to them for care and solace: the market-men were nothing to them.

"Now came the 14th of October.* We had long heard the cannonading; at length there flew through the city officers and men by dozens, with reins hanging loose and horses flaked with foam and blood. 'Which is the way to the mountains?' they cried; 'where can we fly from the French?' and without waiting answer they flew onward. A young Silesian officer, sorely wounded by a cannon ball, took refuge in our inn; the French had robbed him of all his money. My fellow-traveller lent him a sum, and helped to take care of him. He died in two days, and my friend thought no more of it; but the next year he received, unexpectedly, the whole sum lent, with many thanks from the family of the young officer in Silesia.

"During the battle, I endeavored to read some chapters in Peregrine Pickle; they ennuied and disgusted me; I thought, how can one be so trivial in fiction and imagination, when reality is so serious and elevated?" Ehlenchlagel seemed to have forgotten that life is not a continual battle of Jena.

"The French now began to cannonade the city, and to draw nearer with their artillery. We placed ourselves for safety in the cellar, and looked out only from the steps, that we might not be wounded. The Prussian army had taken refuge in the city; we foresaw that it would meet with the fate of Lubeck. The money that was to serve us a half-year in Paris we had received in good Louis-d'ors. We divided and concealed it in our neckcloths, where, indeed, the French could easily have found it, had not chance peculiarly favored us.

"Suddenly it was as silent in Weimar as the grave. The shops and windows were closed, and the streets empty. The October sun shone through the lurid smoke of the cannon, like a pale wintry moon. The French entered in companies, at first in perfect order, and quartered themselves in the houses. Our host lost his head entirely, took his little son in his arms, and cried like a child. We advised him to throw all open, and then go out, with courage, to meet the advancing troops. Eight genteel people, burnt by the sun, and covered with dust and sweat, halted in the doorway: 'Bourgeois,' they cried, 'du vin! de l'eau de vie! du kirswasser!' The host came with bottles; they put the necks to their lips and emptied them; they then alighted, and entered the apartment. They were all sub-officers. We showed them our passports, and relied upon our Danish neutrality: they assured us we had nothing to fear. 'The Prussians,' they said, 'fight well, but they do not understand war.' For the first hour, although the city was crowded with foreign troops, perfect stillness prevailed; the weary soldiers were refreshing themselves and resting from the battle; but in the evening, when the plunder began, the true horror of war commenced. These brave French officers defended our quarters from plunder.

"In the upper story, my companions and myself had secured a little chamber; I threw myself, wearied, upon the sofa, while they took possession of a small bed. In the night I was awakened; the apartment was as light as day. I stepped to the window; the city was on fire, and the shrieks were the despairing cries of women and children. Now began the horrors of war. The city was completely plundered. The next day, Generals Berthier and Angereau took possession of our whole house, from garret to cellar; we had to content ourselves with a rind of bread and a glass of wine, while the French officers wasted and consumed at their pleasure; but we had the consolation of enjoying their protection, so that we escaped the common plunder.

When Napoleon entered the city, the ravages ceased. A severe prohibition was issued against all plunder or robbery. Eight or ten times a day the sudden echo of a volley of musketry in the Park announced the execution of one of his army taken in the act of plundering the inhabitants." The Danish travellers saved their Louis-d'ors.

"Goethe was married during the battle, in order, if any misfortune happened to himself, to secure his inheritance to his only son." "We dined with him," Ehlenchlagel adds, "and then hastened to quit a city which, from a seat of the muses, had become a lazaretto of wounded soldiers."

Our poet hastened with his friends to Paris. He seems not to have entered very fully into the amusements of the capital. He found in the great libraries there, books, rare books, relating to his favorite study, the northern mythology, and wrote his tragedy of Palnakote. Otherwise he spent his time in almost domestic privacy, having found a Norwegian family, with which he lived in the northern simplicity of his own country, making the acquaintance, however, of many literary men, and diligently studying the language of the capital. After spending eighteen months in this manner, his funds, that is, his pension, was at an end. His hostess, Madame Gautier from Geneva, possessed a liberality of spirit seldom found in the landladies of hired lodgings. "Monsieur Œsling," she said, for she could not pronounce my name, "if you remained with me two years, and I received no penny from you, I would not allow you to go, for I perceive that I may trust you. You will not deceive me. Take, then, my upper chamber, and your expenses will be less by a quarter; you will fare as well, and you shall pay me when you can."

* The day of the battle of Jena.

"I removed accordingly to the seventh story, where I could overlook the Tuileries and the iron horses that had galloped from Greece, Venice, Berlin, and paused now in Paris."

His resources at length being wholly exhausted, he packed his manuscripts together, and with a small borrowed sum journeyed back to Germany, to offer them to Cotta, the generous publisher. He obtained a passport, but forgot to have the name of Fouché, the French police inspector, upon it; he was, therefore, detained eight days at Strasburg; but here he also met with good fortune, besides having an opportunity to study the glorious cathedral. When he reached Stuttgart and paid his fare, he had not a single sou left. He called on Cotta, and found he would be absent for three weeks, at one of the Brunnens of Germany. "My courage, however," he says, "did not fail. I told the host of the hotel where I stopped, that I had business with Dr. Cotta, and would remain at his house till he returned from Baden; he thanked me many times, and I felt perfectly at ease." Here, also, while he waited for Cotta, Œhlenschläger met with some agreeable circumstances, and with his usual good fortune.

Cotta returned, took his poems and paid him for the copyright, and with this sum he departed for Switzerland and Italy.

Œhlenschläger had been introduced to Madame de Staël, at her villa, near Paris, but as he then spoke scarcely a word of French, and she no German, their acquaintance proceeded not far. At Geneva, as he had received a friendly invitation from her, he determined to visit her at Coppet. "I entered," he says, "a dark inn, and ordered some bundles of fagots to be kindled in the chimney, to change the air of the damp autumn evening, and sat before the blaze thinking of my vanished joys. I had written a note to M. Schlegel, and waited for an answer. I did not wait long; a servant entered with a friendly written invitation from Madame de Staël, took my portmanteau, and led the way to the chateau. Here all was elegant and cheerful. The lady came in the most friendly manner, smiling to meet me, and invited me to spend some weeks at the chateau. She joked me that I spake no better French. But we had now little embarrassment, for the lady had learned to speak German, and her son, Auguste, and her accomplished daughter, Madame de Broglie, then a young girl, understood and spoke the German and French." Here he met Benjamin Constant, Schlegel, Sismondi, the Baron Boight,

Count Sabran, Chamisso, all, apparently, living at the table, if not in the house, of the celebrated hostess. If any proof were wanting of the good nature, the goodness of heart, of Madame de Staël, it would be the kindness with which she entertained, and the friendliness with which she advanced the interests of these smoking, travelling young men of all nations. Œhlenschläger had been a few weeks there; the winter came on with some severity; Madame de Staël represented to him the folly and danger of crossing the Alps at that season; advised him to take an Italian master, and prepare himself with a knowledge of the language, pass the winter at her chateau, and cross the Alps in the spring. Œhlenschläger says, "I found this very reasonable and friendly, thanked her, and remained."

"After a few days, Werner entered, bowing into the saloon, with an immense snuff-box in his waistcoat pocket, and his nostrils bearing marks of its frequent use. His bad French amused Madame de S., but in his own peculiar patois he held lectures every day after dinner, upon his mystical æsthetics. Their hostess listened with great attention, and hardly escaped becoming a proselyte to Werner's mysticism. She scolded the others that they did not listen with more devout humility to the outpourings of the inspired philosopher!

"How animated, spirituelle, witty, and amiable was our hostess, is well known to the world. Pretty she was not; her large, brilliant, brown eyes possessed much attraction, and she displayed eminently the feminine talent of winning the other sex, and through penetrating finesse, uniting differing characters peaceably under her empire. Her genius, her face, and her voice were masculine, but her soul was eminently feminine.

"At this time, she was writing her book upon German literature, and read it to us every evening. It has been said that she had never read the books upon which she passed judgment, but was indebted for her opinions to Schlegel. This was not true. She read German with great ease, and her judgments were her own. Schlegel, indeed, had great influence with her, but she thought for herself, and often differed from him. She has written much that is good and beautiful upon German literature, but she wanted the deep, quiet, and earnest mind, to penetrate the peculiar genius of German poetry and philosophy.

"The peculiar talent of Madame de Staël consisted in saying always something piquant and striking. This made her a very agreeable companion. Whenever she appeared, spite of the young and the beautiful, she drew all men of head or heart into her circle. When it is recollected that she was very hospitable, and gave excellent dinners, it is no wonder that, like a queen or fairy in her enchanted castle, she drew all men to submit to her rule, while for her sceptre, sitting at her table, she held in her fingers a small twig of green leaves. This was as necessary to her conversation as her knife and fork to her food. The servant laid a fresh twig daily near her cover.

"When the spring approached, and the birds again fluttered, I spread my wings, also, to cross the Alps. Madame de Staël wrote in my album:—

"J'introduis pour la première fois le français dans ce livre; mais bien que Goethe l'eut appelé une langue perfide, j'espère, mon cher Ehlenschläger, que vous croirez à mon amitié pour vous, et à ma vive estime pour l'auteur d'Axel et Valburg."

At length, the 9th of March, 1809, Ehlenschläger journeyed in the diligence, in order to cross the Alps to Italy. In Parma, he visited the church of St. Joseph and St. John, and saw the frescoes of Correggio. The church was filled with kneeling figures. He says, "it would have been affected in me to have knelt," but he placed himself in a corner, and prayed this prayer: "Dear God, make my heart open and pure, so that I may see the greatness, goodness, and beauty in nature, and in the works of man. Preserve my country, my king, my beloved, and my friends! Let me not die in a strange land, but return happily to my home. Give me cheerfulness and courage to wander upon thy beautiful earth, without bitterness or hatred to my neighbors, without servile and cowardly subjection to the judgments of others. Dear God! permit me to be a good poet. Thou hast formed my soul for art. It is the dearest and truest medium through which I can come to thee. Grant that my works, like those of this good Correggio, may live after I am no more! that, when I am dust, many youthful hearts may be excited and warmed by my thoughts." "Here," he says, "standing under this cupola, I first formed the resolution—I had thought of it in Paris—to write a drama upon the life of Correggio. It was confirmed by the little picture over the fireplace of the ducal palace, in Modena, painted when the artist was only seventeen years old. In this exquisite picture, the holy child sits upon its mother's lap, while an angel offers him cherries upon a plate. The beauty, loveliness, and innocence in Maria's and the angel's faces, cannot be exceeded. Joseph and another figure are near. Joseph holds in his hand a child's plaything. Two little rabbits play at the feet of the angel. Young myrtles bloom in the background. Had Correggio left nothing else in art, it would be sufficient to establish the tender relation to his wife and child, that I have preserved in the tragedy, as an historical truth."

In Rome, he lived much with his own countrymen, especially with Thorwaldsen. Thorwaldsen belongs to all nations; but he afterwards deprecated the practice of natives of the same country hanging, like one family, together. His northern constitution suffered much from the heat of Rome, where, in the surrounding fields, the grasshoppers lay like snow upon the ground; he withdrew, therefore, with one of his countrymen, to Grotto Ferrata, where, in a dilapidated house, that had once been a Roman villa, they were in want of everything, except cool and fresh air. They could get neither milk nor butter, and what seemed to the young men more important, although the hostess was much amazed at the luxury, these young Danes desired, but could not get, their shirt-frills plaited. Here, in this retirement, he wrote the most admired and celebrated of his works, the Drama of Correggio.

"In the execution of his plan, Ehlenschläger adopted Vasaria's account of Correggio's death, as the groundwork of the piece. The delineation of the artist's character is singularly beautiful. The mild and sensitive painter is brought into striking contrast with the daring and sublime genius of Michael Angelo. The picture of domestic life and love, graced by congenial tastes for art, and enthusiasm in its pursuit, was never drawn with more simplicity, truth, beauty, and felicity, than in this exquisite drama."

Although Ehlenschläger adopted Vasaria's account of the death of Correggio as authentic, he does not intend his representation for an exact portrait of Correggio, but has taken such poetical license as poets permit themselves, such as Goethe has taken with Tasso and Iphigenia. It cannot be supposed that, after Correggio had painted such celebrated pictures as his Night, his Magdalene, and his Madonna, he could have remained as ignorant of the great and splendid pictures of the great masters, as he is represented in the beautiful soliloquy, in the picture gallery of Octavio. But this does not interfere with the design of the drama, which was, as he says, "to represent the amiable, natural genius of the artist, in contrast with the severe strength and gigantic power of one accomplished by study, as in Michael Angelo; and also to represent the sensitive and retired artist in contention with the actual world, its rough realities and selfish pursuits. The refined artist meets in Baptista with the envious and jealous enmity of a vulgar soul, and in Octavio with the ignorant and conceited patron, whose selfish and ignoble views the pure and generous Antonio can with difficulty comprehend. On the other hand, the soul-elevating genius of the artist, in his lovely picture of the Magdalene, produces a softening and humanizing result upon the most hardened and vicious class of men, changing the ferocious passions of robbers and murderers into reverence and gratitude, and causing blessing to be returned for cursing, by rescuing the life of the son of his mortal enemy. Although the bold and confident spirit of an assured and world-famed artist suddenly overpowers the sensitive painter, and plunges him into a momentary despair, the beautiful episode of Celestina and the laurel wreath are an assurance that he is consecrated to immortality even here; and the spirit that could not contend with the heavy burthen of mortality, departs, supported by the arms of perfect love, attended by reverence and gratitude, while religion, in the person of the hermit, assures him of an immortal heaven for the soul."

Ehlenschlager had now been more than two years absent from his country and his betrothed. The natives of northern climates, the Norwegians and Danes, especially the cultivated among the latter, seem always to languish and thirst for the bright skies and sunny fruits of the "land where the orange and citron-trees bloom." Yet they soon feel that yearning heimweh, that drives them, like their own familiar stork and domestic swallow, back to the north, faithful to the snow-covered nest under the eaves, and the old chimney of the smoky roof, consecrated to their simple, domestic joys.

Ehlenschlager's usual good fortune attended him upon his home journey. He met an agreeable Danish traveller, who was glad of his society as compagnon du voyage, and paid the expenses of the journey. As they reached the boundary of Italy, he sprang joyfully over. He says his northern heart longed for the north, for in the sultry air of the south he had felt like a mouse under the exhausted air-pump. He paused in Germany but long enough to see Goethe, and read to him his Correggio. "Unfortunately, I could stay but two days in Weimar, and with Goethe, one must wait for good humor, as the sailor on the strand waits for a good wind. Goethe received me politely, but coldly, and almost like a stranger. Had, then, so many intervening experiences erased the memory of those precious hours I had spent with him, eternally remembered by me, or did it only slumber, and would it again awake? I sought to suppress the pain, and hoped, after he had heard my Correggio, the old relation between us would ensue." The poet asked leave, through Reimer, to read his tragedy, but Goethe desired the manuscript to be sent to him; unfortunately the writing was illegible to any but the author. Goethe, however, invited him to dinner, and, he says, "as Goethe would not permit me to be childlike and heartlike, I was bold and satirical. I recited a couple of epigrams, that I have never suffered to be printed. Goethe said, very good-humoredly, 'He who can make good wine should make no vinegar.' 'Have you, then, Herr Geheimerath, made no vinegar?' 'The devil,' said Goethe; 'because I have made it, is it then right?' 'No, but when wine is made, many grapes fall to the ground that are good for nothing but for the vinegar of wine.'

"If I had only had time, and could have read my piece, the old relation would have returned. But I must forth, and so we took a cold leave. I opposed it in my deepest soul, for there was no man I loved and valued more than Goethe, and now, perhaps, I should never see him again. The post horses were ordered at five in the morning, and it was now half past eleven. I sat troubled in my room, tears in my eyes; an irresistible longing seized me to press him once more to my heart; at the same time the proud feeling struggled in my breast, that I would not humble myself before him. I ran to Goethe's house, there were yet lights burning, and I went to Reimer's chamber. 'Dear friend! can I not speak with Goethe? I would willingly say to him, farewell.' As he saw my emotion, he understood all. 'I will see whether he is yet in bed.' He came back, and told me to enter. 'The author of Goetz, and of Herman and Dorothea, stood in his night-gown, and wound up his watch before stepping into bed. When he saw me, he said in a friendly tone, 'My dear, you come like Nicodemus, in the night.' 'Permit me,' said I, 'to say to the poet Goethe an eternal farewell.' 'Fare you well, my child,' he answered, kindly, and I left the chamber. I never saw him again, nor wrote to him, but I named my eldest son for him, and know that he has always spoken in the most friendly manner of me."

Ehlenschlager was warmly welcomed on his return to Copenhagen. His bride had been faithful to him. He soon had the honor of reading his Correggio to the king and royal family, in the royal cabinet, and shortly after he was appointed professor extraordinary of æsthetics, in the University of Copenhagen.

The Baron Schimmelman lent him a pretty house in Christiansholm, half a mile from the city, upon the margin of the little sea. In a beautiful spring morning, he went alone with his betrothed into the church of a little village, on the seaside, called Gjentoft, where, by appointment, the preacher was waiting for them. He joined their hands, and asked God's blessing on their union. They returned, as man and wife, to their home in Christiansholm.

Ehlenschlager was now thirty years old, and here his minute autobiography ceases. His serious life began where that of romances end, with his marriage. His life was uniform and happy. Every year, from 1810 to 1829, with the exception of 1817, he gave a course of lectures to the students of the University, and sometimes repeated them to the bona monde of Copenhagen. They included his favorite studies, the northern mythology, old Danish lyrics, Roman literature, and dramatic authors, from Sophocles to Tieck. In 1829, in an excursion to Sweden, he had the honor of having the laurel-crown placed upon his brows, by the celebrated poet, Bishop Tegner, in the ancient cathedral of Lunds, in the presence of the assembled people

COSTUMES OF ALL NATIONS.—THIRD SERIES.

CHAPTER IX.

THE TOILET IN PERSIA AND CIRCASSIA.

THE Persian women are strictly confined to the seraglio, and pass the whole day at their toilet, which, with these beautiful prisoners, is almost their only amusement. The Persian ladies take great pains to heighten their beauty, and call to their aid washes and paints, not only of a red, white, and black color, but also of a yellow hue. Ornamental patching, once so much the fashion in Europe, is still employed by them, and few female faces are to be seen without one or more khale, as they call these artificial moles, which are so often mentioned with admiration by the poets of their country. In the earliest accounts that we possess of Persia, we find this fashion mentioned, as well as that of padding the petticoats to improve the shape of the figure, of concealing the ruthless attacks of time by the use of false hair, and of adorning the head with feathered ornaments.

In an Eastern manuscript, adorned with drawings of the heroes and heroines of the tales, are represented several Persian female figures, whose dresses bear in many respects a strong resemblance to the fashions of Europe. Some of them are drawn without any ornament on the head, the hair falling in ringlets over the neck and shoulders; others have round their heads a kind of diadem set with precious stones, from which rise one or more tufts of feathers, the quills being set in sockets of gold or gems. Some of the figures are adorned with the nose-jewel, that singular ornament to which the Asiatic ladies were formerly so partial, and the antiquity of which is indisputably proved, by its being mentioned among the Jewish trinkets in the Old Testament. They have also ear-rings attached to the upper as well as the lower part of the ear, and necklaces consisting of many rows of jewels of different kinds.

The dress of most of these heroines consists of a robe, the upper part of which fits tight to the shape, while the petticoat, being long and wide, falls in graceful folds; a girdle of great width covered with embroidery and precious stones; trowsers; and a head-dress like that now generally worn, consisting of a low-crowned cap, terminating in a point, round which are wreathed several folds of silk or fine linen: to this is fastened, with a gold bodkin, a large veil, which shrouds the whole figure.

In Mr. Morier's "Travels in Persia," the costume of the Persian queen is thus described: "Her dress was rendered so cumbersome by the quantity of jewels embroidered upon it, that she could scarcely move under its weight. Her trowsers, in particular, were so ongrrafted with pearls, that they looked more like a piece of mosaic than wearing apparel. Padded with cotton inside, stiffened by cloth of gold without, they were so fashioned as to exclude the possibility of discovering the shape of the leg, and kept it cased up, as it were, in the shape of a column."

He also mentions that the queen's daughter, who was celebrated throughout the country for her beauty, was greatly disfigured in the eyes of a European by the immense quantity of red and white paint with which her face was daubed, and that her eyebrows, which were arched, were connected over the nose by a great stripe of black paint, and her eyelids and lashes strongly tinged with antimony.

The ordinary dress of a Persian female consists, when in-doors, of a large black silk handkerchief round the head, a gown which descends to the knees, a pair of loose trowsers, and green light-heeled slippers.

The interview of the English ambassadress with the Queen of Persia is mentioned in these words by an Eastern traveller: "The ambassadress was introduced into a large open room, at one corner of which was seated the queen, dressed out in truly Persian splendor. Large gilded knots appeared on her head-dress, which was of great size, and the other parts of her attire, like that of Zobeide, the Caliph's favorite in the 'Arabian Nights,' were so loaded with jewels, that she could scarcely walk. In a corner of the room stood some of the king's children, so stiffened out with brocade, velvet, furs, and jewelry, that they almost looked like fixtures. Great numbers of women were ranged in rows without the room, all ornamented with jewelry."

The bestowing of dresses is a mark of honor constantly practised in Persia, and is one of the most ancient customs of Eastern nations; it is mentioned both in sacred and profane history. We learn how great was the distinction of giving a coat that had been worn, by what is recorded of Jonathan's love for David. "And Jonathan stripped himself of the robe that was upon him, and gave it to David; and his garments, even to his sword, and to his bow, and to his girdle." (1 Samuel, xviii. 4.) And in Esther also (ch. vi. 7, 8), we read, "And Haman answered the king, For the man whom the king delighteth to honor, let the royal apparel be brought which the king useth to wear."

The maidens of Yezd, a town situated near the Ghebers' "holy mountain," wear a head-dress composed of a light gold chain-work set with small pearls, with a thin gold plate hanging from the side, about the size of a crown-piece, on which is inscribed an Arabian prayer, thus described by Moore :—

"A light golden chain-work round her hair,
Such as the maids of Yezd and Shiraz wear,
From which, on either side, gracefully hung
A golden amulet, in the Arab tongue
Engraven o'er, with some immortal line
From Holy Writ, or bard scarce less divine."

The females of Khorassan wear ear-rings of very large dimensions, with great quantities of turquoises suspended from them, for these stones are of but little value

"In that delightful province of the Sun,
The first of Persian lands he shines upon,
Where all the loveliest children of his beam,
Flow'rets and fruits, blush over every stream;
And, fairest of all streams, the Murga roves
Among Miron's bright palaces and groves."

We must not take leave of the fair sex of Persia without mentioning the Squadanus, or Bebees, the female descendants of Mohammed, who go about veiled, or rather with a long white robe thrown over the whole body, having netted orifices before the eyes and mouth.

* * * * *

"When Lalla Rookh rose in the morning, and her ladies came round her to assist in the adjustment of the bridal ornaments, they thought they had never seen her look half so beautiful. What she had lost of the bloom and radiance of her charms was more than made up by that intellectual expression, that soul in the eye, which is worth all the rest of loveliness. When they had tinged her fingers with the henna leaf, and placed upon her brow a small coronet of jewels of the shape worn by the ancient queens of Bucharra, they flung over her head the rose-colored bridal veil, and she proceeded to the barge that was to convey her across the lake."

The ladies of Circassia sometimes appear abroad on horseback, riding like men, or on foot, but always veiled, not only with a muslin screen, through which at times a transient glimpse of a pretty face may be caught, but often with an impenetrable veil of black hair-cloth. They wear the same pelisses as the men, only that the sleeves, instead of being used as such, are tucked together and tied behind. They also wear, even in the house, huge Hessian boots made of velvet, and highly ornamented. They braid their hair, and let it hang in tresses down their shoulders; on the head they wear a large white turban, but a veil covers the face. The exhibition of beauty, in which so much of a woman's time is spent in more favored countries, is here unknown. A bride wears a rose-colored veil on her marriage-day.

Deep blue is the distinctive mark of mourning in this country.

"In that deep blue, melancholy dress
Bokhara's maidens wear in mindfulness
Of friends or kindred, dead or far away."

The Turkomans are a warlike and handsome race. They wear the talpak, a square or conical black skull-cap of sheep-skin, which is about a foot in height, and much more becoming for a warrior than a turban. They are very partial to bright colors, and generally choose light red, green, or yellow for their flowing champhans, or pelisses. Long brown boots are universally worn.

To the ladies of this tribe belonged the beautiful and delicate Roxana, the bewitching queen of Alexander, that Peri of the East whose beauty, like the perfume of the rose, is remembered with pleasure long after the casket which enshrined it is mouldered in the dust. They wear a head-dress consisting of a lofty white turban, shaped like a military shako, but still higher, over which they throw a red or white scarf that falls in folds down to the waist. As these ladies are generally rather on a large scale, this head-dress becomes them.

They attach a variety of ornaments to their hair, which hangs in tresses over their shoulders. Unlike most other Eastern women, they do not consider a veil a necessary appendage to their dress. The rest of their costume consists of a long gown of a bright color, that reaches to the ankle, and conceals both it and the waist, those standard points of beauty with most nations.

And now we must say a few words of "The maids, whom kings are proud to cull

From fair Circassia's vales;"

they whose charms the historian from the earliest times has immortalized, and the poet sung. The costume of these hours is simple, and not remarkable for beauty. It consists in a long loose gown of divers colors, tied about the waist with a sash. The hair is worn in tresses, which hang on each side of the face, surmounted by a black coif, over which is placed a white cloth, which passes under the chin, where it is tied in a bow.

The unrivalled excellence of the manufactures of Cashmere is attributed to certain properties in the water of that country, for, though great pains have been taken to manufacture similar shawls at Patna, Agra, and Lahore, they never have the delicate texture and softness of those of Cashmere. Sir A. Burnes, in the description of his journey through the vale of Cashmere, says, "Our approach to the Mohammedan countries became evident daily, and showed itself in nothing more than the costume of the women, many of whom we now met veiled. One girl whom we saw on the road had a canopy of red cloth erected over her on horseback, which had a ludicrous appearance. It seemed to be a framework of wood; but, as the cloth concealed everything as well as the countenance of the fair lady, I did not discover the contrivance. The costume of the unveiled portion of the sex had likewise undergone a change. They wore wide blue trowsers, tied tightly at the ankle, and which taper down and have a graceful appearance. A narrow web of cloth, sixty yards long, is sometimes used in a single pair, for one fold falls upon the other."

Over the hair, which is worn in a single braid, they place a cap generally of a crimson color, to the back of which is attached a triangular curtain of the same stuff, which falls upon the shoulders and conceals much of the hair; round the lower edge of the cap is folded a shawl or piece of cotton or woollen cloth, which gives it much the appearance of a turban.

PATRIOTIC STANZAS.

BY J. J. BAKER.

WHEN, grieved, we see the nation's mind
Heaving, tumultuous, unconfined,
By angry passions driven—
'Tis sweet to think of God's great might,
When he dispelled chaotic night,
And spread the vault of heaven.

Or as the seaman, terrified,
Beholds the raging, foaming tide,
His sails by tempests riven—
Yet trusts, submitting to His will,
Whose power the elements can still,
And lay the ocean even.

Thus, when the sea of civil life
Rages with storms and windy strife,
And dark the heavens frown—
Then God walks forth upon the sea,
As once of old on Galilee,
And treads the billows down.

He who gave the seas their bound,
And measured all their depths profound,
Hath said: "Thus far, proud wave;
No farther shall thy rage proceed;
Back to thy parent depths recede,
And other countries lave."

He speaks—submissive to his word
The waves respond in sweet accord,
And murmur a retreat;
Glancing in light, their amber tides
Obedient flow where'er he guides,
Or glass beneath his feet.

The prayers of patriots shall prevail,
And for their country's good avail
Beyond the common fate:
Their country's woes their themes of prayer,
What burdens to the throne they bear!
And how importunate!

"God of our fathers," oft they cry,
"If other good thou dost deny,
Yet this one blessing give:
Disunion from our land dispel:
Her brood of foul disturbers quell,
And let our country live!"

The Sage whose patriotic fire
Can only with his life expire,
Doth thus devoutly pray;
And shall not the pure incense rise,
And pierce the portals of the skies,
From the pure heart of CLAY?

HISTORY OF BOOTS AND SHOES.

NO. II.—ON THE MOST ANCIENT COVERING FOR THE FEET.

WITH the ancient Greeks and Romans the coverings for the feet assumed their most elegant forms, yet in no instance does the comfort of the wearer appear to have been sacrificed, or the natural play of the foot interfered with—that appears to have been especially reserved for “march of intellect” days. Vegetable sandals, termed Baxa, or Baxeæ, were worn by the lower classes, and, as a symbol of their humility, by the philosophers and priests. Apuleius describes a young priest as wearing sandals of palm; they were, no doubt, similar in construction to the Egyptian ones of which we have already given specimens, and which were part of the required and characteristic dress of the Egyptian priesthood. Such vegetable sandals were, however, occasionally decorated with ornaments to a considerable extent, and they then became expensive. The making of them in all their variety was the business of a class of men called Baxearii; and these, with the Solearii—or makers of the simplest kind of sandal worn, consisting of a sole with little more to fasten it to the foot than a strap across the instep—constituted a corporation or college of Rome.

The solea were generally worn by the higher classes only, for lightness and convenience, in the house; the shoes (calceus) being worn out of doors. The Soccus was the intermediate covering for the foot, being something between the solea and the calceus; it was, in fact, precisely like the modern slipper, and could be cast off at pleasure, as it did not fit closely, and was secured by no tie. This, like the solea and crepida, was worn by the lower classes and country people; and hence, the comedians wore such cheap and common coverings for the feet, to contrast with the Cothurnus or buskin of the tragedians, which they assumed, as it was adapted to be part of a grand and stately attire. Hence the term applied to theatrical performers, “Brethren of the sock and buskin;” and, as this distinction is both ancient and curious, specimens of both are here given from antique authorities. The side and front view of the sock below is copied from a painting of a buffoon, who is dancing in loose yellow slippers, one of the commonest colors in which the leather used for their construction was dyed. Such slippers were made to fit both feet indifferently, but the more finished boots and shoes were made for one foot only from the earliest period. The Cothurnus, the centre figure, was a boot of the highest kind, reaching above the calf of the leg, and sometimes as far as the knee. It was laced as the boots of the ancients always were, down the front, the object of such an arrangement being to make them fit the leg as closely as possible, and the skin of which they were made was dyed purple, and other gay colors; the head and paws of the wild animal were sometimes allowed to hang around the leg from the upper part of the Cothurnus, to which it formed a graceful addition.

The sole of the Cothurnus was of the ordinary thickness in general; but it was occasionally made much thicker by the insertion of slices of cork, when the wearer wished to add to his height, and thus the Athenian tragedians, who assumed this boot as the most dignified of coverings for the feet, had the soles made unusually thick, in order that it might add to the magnitude and dignity of their whole appearance.

The shoe or sandal worn by the rustics of ancient Rome was formed of a skin turned over the foot, and secured by thongs passing through the sides, and over the toe, crossing each other over the instep, and secured firmly round the ankle. Any person familiar with the prints of Pinelli, pictures of the modern brigands of the Abruzzi, or the models of the latter worthies in terra-cotta to be met with in most curiosity shops, will at once recognize those they wear as being of the same form. The traveller who has visited modern Rome will also remember to have seen them on the feet of the peasantry who traverse the Pontine marshes; and the older Irish, and the comparatively modern Highlander, both wore similar ones; they were formed of the skin of the cow or deer, with the hair on them, and were held on the feet by leather thongs. They were the simplest and warmest kind of foot-covering to be obtained when every man was his own shoemaker.

There was a form of shoe worn at this early time in which the toes were entirely uncovered. This shoe appears to be made of a pliable leather, which fits closely to the foot; for it was considered as a mark of rusticity to wear shoes larger than the foot, or which fitted in a loose and slovenly manner. The toes in this instance are left perfectly free; the upper leather is secured round the ankle by a tie, while a thong, ornamented by a stud in its centre, passing over the instep, and between the great and second toe, is secured to the sole in the manner of a sandal. In order that the ankle-bone should not be pressed on or incommoded in walking, the leather is sloped away, and rises around it to a point at the back of the leg.

None but such as had served the office of Edile were allowed to wear shoes of a red color, which we may therefore infer to have been as favorite a color for shoes as it appears to have been among the Hebrews, and as it is still in Western Asia. The Roman Senators wore shoes or buskins of a black color, with a crescent of gold or silver on the top of the foot. The Emperor Aurelian forbade men to wear red, yellow, white, or green shoes, permitting them to be worn by women only, and Heliogabalus forbade women to wear gold or precious stones in their shoes, a fact which will aid us in understanding the sort of decoration indulged in by the earliest Hebrew women, of whose example Judith may be quoted as an instance, to which we have already referred.

The Roman soldiers generally wore a simple form of sandal, which was a solen fastened by thongs, yet they, in the progress of riches and luxury, went with the times and merged into foppery, so that Philopœmon, in recommending soldiers to give more attention to their warlike accoutrements than to their common dress, advises them to be less nice about their shoes and sandals, and more careful in observing that their greaves were kept bright and fitted well to their legs. When about to attack a hill-fort or go on rugged marches, they wore a sandal shod with spikes, and at other times they had soles covered with large clumsy nails. The Greeks and Romans used shoes of this kind as frequently as the early Persians, and wore a combination of sandal and shoe, the upper leather being cut into a series of thongs, through which passed a broad band of leather, which turned not inelegantly round the upper part of the foot, and was secured by passing many times round the ankle and above it, where it was buckled or tied.

The Roman shoes then had various names, and were distinct badges of the position in society held by the wearer. The Solea, Crepida, Pero, and Soccus belonged to the lower classes, the laborers and rustics; the Caliga was principally worn by soldiers; and the Cothurnus by tragedians, hunters, and horsemen, as well as by the nobles of the country.

The latter kind of boot in form and color, as we have already hinted, was indicative of rank or office. Those worn by senators we have noticed, and it was a joke in ancient Rome against men who owed respect solely to the accident of birth or fortune that his nobility was in his heels. The boots of the em-perors were frequently richly decorated, and the patterns still existing upon marble statues show that they were ornamented in the most elaborate manner. A specimen from the noble statue of Hadrian is in the British Museum, and it is impossible to conceive anything of the kind more elegant and tasteful in its decorations. Real gems and gold were employed by some of the Roman emperors to decorate their boots, and Heliogabalus wore exquisite cameos on his boots and shoes.

The Grecian ladies, according to Hope, wore shoes or half boots laced before and lined with the fur of animals of the cat tribe, whose muzzles or claws hung down from the top.

The barbarous nations with whom the Romans held war are, upon the bas-reliefs of their conquerors, represented in close shoes or half-boots. The Gauls wear the shoe given below, of the same form as that worn by native Britons when Julius Cæsar made his descent upon the British Islands.

Before the arrival of the Saxons, who have transmitted many valuable manuscripts abounding in various delineations of their dress and manners, we shall not find much to engage the attention where it is our present object to direct it, the history of the coverings for the feet. There is, however, little doubt that the rude skin shoes worn by the native Irish and the country people of Rome was the simple protection adopted in this country in the earliest times. Shoes of this material are found in all nations half civilized, and the ease with which they are formed by merely covering the sole with the hide of an animal, and securing it by a thong, must have had the effect of insuring its general use. Naked feet would, however, be preferred in fine weather, and when shoes were worn, they were generally of a close, warm kind, adapted to the climate; the most antique representations of the Gaulish native chiefs, as given on Roman sculpture, and which may be taken as general representations of British chiefs, may be received as good authorities, their resemblance to each other being so striking as to draw from Cæsar a remark to that effect.

The Saxon figures as given in the drawings by their own hands, to be seen in manuscripts in most of English public libraries, display the costume of this people from the ninth century downwards; and the minute way in which every portion of the dress is given affords us clear examples of their boots and shoes. According to Strutt, high shoes reaching nearly to the middle of the legs, and fastened by lacing in the front, and which may also be properly considered as a species of half boots, were in use in this country as early as the tenth century; and the only apparent difference between the high shoes of the ancients and the moderns seems to have been that the former laced close down to the toes, and the latter to the instep only. They appear in general to have been made of leather, and were usually fastened beneath the ankles with a thong, which passed through a fold upon the upper part of the leather, encompassing the heel, and which was tied upon the instep. This method of securing the shoe upon the foot was certainly well contrived both for ease and convenience. Three specimens of shoes are here given from Saxon drawings:—

The first is the most ancient and curious; it is copied from "the Durham book," or book of St. Cuthbert, now preserved among the Cottonian manuscripts in the British Museum, and is believed to have been executed as early as the seventh century by the hands of Eadfrid, afterwards Bishop of Lindisfarne, who died in 721. It partakes of the nature of shoe and sandal, and, with the exception of the buttons down the front, is precisely like the Persepolitan sandal, already engraved and described, as well as like the Roman ones constructed on the same model, and it is curious to see how all are formed after this one fashion.

The second is copied from Strutt's complete view of the dress and habits of the people of England, plate 29, fig. 16, and which he obtained from the Harleian MS., No. 603. It very clearly shows the form of the Saxon shoe, and the long strings by which it was tied. The third figure delineates the most ordinary kind of shoe worn, with the opening to the toes already alluded to, for lacing it. But little variety is observable in the form of this article of dress among the Saxons; it is usually delineated as a solid black mass, just as the last figure has been here engraved, with a white line down the centre to show the opening, but quite as generally without it, and these two forms of shoe, or half boot, are by far the most commonly met with, and are depicted upon the feet of noble and royal personages as well as upon those of the lower class.

Strutt remarks that wooden shoes are mentioned in the records of this era, but considers it probable that they were so called because the soles were formed of wood, while the upper parts were formed of some more pliant material: shoes with wooden soles were at this time worn by persons of the most exalted rank; thus, the shoes of Bernard, King of Italy, the grandson of Charlemagne, are thus described by an Italian writer, as they were found in his tomb:—

"The shoes," says he, "which covered his feet are remaining to this day, the soles of wood and the upper parts of red leather, laced together with thongs: they were so closely fitted to the feet that the order of the toes, terminating in a point at the great toe, might easily be discovered; so that the shoe belonging to the right foot could not be put upon the left, nor that of the left upon the right." It was not uncommon to gild and otherwise ornament the shoes of the nobility. Eginhart describes the shoes worn by Charlemagne on great occasions as set with jewels.

The Normans wore boots and shoes of equal simplicity, rustics are frequently represented with a half boot plain in form, fitting close to the foot, but wide at the ankle, like the first of the group here given, only that in this instance an ornament, consisting of a studded band, surrounds the upper part.

Such boots were much used by the Normans, and are frequently mentioned by the ancient historians; they do not appear to have been confined to any particular classes of the people, but were worn by persons of all ranks and conditions, as well of the clergy as of the laity, especially when they rode on horseback. The boots delineated in their drawings are very short, rarely reaching higher than the middle of the legs; they were sometimes slightly ornamented; but the boots and shoes of all personages represented in the famous tapestry of Bayeux are of the same simple form of construction; and this celebrated early piece of needlework was believed to have been worked by the wife of the Conqueror, to commemorate his invasion of England and the battle of Hastings. Another form of Norman shoe may be seen in the second figure, which is more enriched than the last; and it is curious that the ornament adopted is in the form of the straps of a sandal, studded with dots throughout. In the original, the shoe is colored with a thin tint of black, these bands being a solid black, with white or gilded lines and dots. Another example of a decorated shoe, as seen in the right-hand figure of the above group, is given from a MS. of the eleventh century, in the British Museum, and shows the kind which became fashionable when the Normans, firmly settled in England, began to indulge in luxurious clothing. These shoes were most probably embroidered.

"We are assured by the early Norman historians," says Strutt, "that the cognomen curta correa, or short boots, was given to Robert, the Conqueror's eldest son; but they are entirely silent respecting the reason for such an appellation being particularly applied to him. It could not have arisen from his having introduced the custom of wearing short boots into England, for they were certainly in use among the Saxons long before his birth. He was the first among the Normans who wore short boots, and doubtless derived the cognomen by way of contempt, from his own countrymen, for having so far complied with the manners of the Anglo-Saxons. It was not long, however, supposing this to be the case, before his example was generally followed." The short boots of the Normans appear at times to fit quite close to the legs; in other instances, they are represented more loose and open; and, though the materials of which they were composed are not particularised by the ancient writers, we may reasonably suppose them to have been made of leather; at least it is certain that about this time a sort of leathern boots, called Bazans, were in fashion; but they appear to have been chiefly confined to the clergy.

THE OPERA-BOX.

BY JOSEPH A. NUNES.

See Plate.)

CHAPTER I.

"I AM glad he has gone," said Florence Ellmore to her friend, Lucy Somers, as she heard the street door close upon a handsome young man, attired in military undress, who had a moment before left the parlor; "he is insufferably conceited."

"Really, Florence," remarked Miss Somers, smiling at her friend's commentary, "that is rather a cavalier observation for you to make in reference to a gentleman who is one of your avowed admirers."

"He is one of my avowed admirers," replied Florence; "and, like the rest of the category, the admiration, or its avowal, is entirely on his part. I do not reciprocate either."

"But you allow him to suppose that he is not utterly indifferent to you," said Miss Somers; "and, making that fact the basis of a theory, he has sufficient self-esteem to erect thereon a very pretty superstructure of mutual and devoted affection; with connubial felicity in perspective, while Florence Ellmore and Captain Brightly occupy the foreground of the fabric."

"Fabric, foundation, and all are false," replied Florence, carelessly; "and it is a slander for you to say that I allow him to suppose he is not indifferent to me. What proof have you to sustain such an assertion?"

"Do you not frequently accept his invitations?" asked Miss Somers. "Have you not promised to accompany him to the opera to-night? and is he not now on his way to secure a box for our especial accommodation?"

"And is that all?" asked Florence, laughing. "Because one allows one's self to be persecuted into accepting an invitation, therefore the individual tendering the invitation is encouraged to believe that his addresses also are accepted! Truly, Lucy, your ideas are worthy of the last century."

"You know I am a country girl," Miss Somers observed; "and you must not be surprised to discover that I am somewhat behind the inhabitants of this great metropolis in the march of improvement."

"Why, child," said Florence, "if I had not accepted Captain Brightly's invitation, I should have been compelled to accept the invitation of some one else. I have but a choice of evils, and he is agreeable by comparison."

Lucy Somers looked at her friend for a moment, and laughed.

"Florence," she said, "you are, indeed, a riddle."

"And wherefore?" asked Florence.

"Why," replied Lucy, "the whole town calls you a belle, half the town calls you a coquette, all your male acquaintances are enamored of you, most of your female friends are jealous of you, and yet I have never heard you utter a word indicating a liking for one man more than another."

"I am the whole town's humble servant for its report of me," Florence remarked, with mock humility; "half the town is impertinent, and misapplies terms; all my male acquaintances, admitting the truth of your assertion, have displayed taste in one instance, and most of my female friends are exceedingly silly to be jealous at it. But, Lucy, I'll let you into a secret, and give it to you in Shakspeare's own language—'Man delights not me.'"

"That is the very enigma I spoke of," said Lucy. "You accept of man's admiration, and then wrap yourself up in Hamlet's philosophy, and theatrically exclaim, 'Man delights not me!' Wherefore not, thou grave feminine Digines?"

"Because I have not the aptitude to discover his worthiness. The majority of men—at least as they display themselves in society—appear to me to be animated by the souls of defunct butterflies. As to accepting their admiration, education persuades us that it is our natural food; besides, it is our chief amusement, and it procures for us most of the pleasures which we weak women are allowed to participate in."

"If" said Miss Somers, "you entertain such a poor opinion of the male portion of fashionable society, and condemn the limited sphere of female action, I wonder you do not devote your time to profound studies, and draw around you a coterie of learned men."

"Have myself called a blue-stocking," Florence observed, as if continuing her friend's remarks; "be shunned by my own sex, feared by every man under forty years of age, and tolerated or despised, according to the caprice of every musty philosopher! No, no, Lucy; a learned woman is too great a bugbear to sensitive man for me to desire the reputation. I'll cherish power instead of knowledge; and, though man delights me not, yet I will make his admiration my sceptre, and persuade myself that I am a queen."

"You were not always so cynical, Florence," said Lucy; "for I remember when you were, in very truth, a coquette. You recollect two years ago, when Davenant Churchill was so attentive to you? By the way, Florence, what has become of him? I have not seen him, nor have you spoken of him, for an age."

Florence certainly did look slightly confused, and she also blushed, at the mention of that name; but, by affecting to arrange the rich curtains of the window, she avoided the scrutiny of her friend.

"I understand that he is in Europe," Florence replied. "He has not been in the United States for nearly two years."

"Do you know, Florence, I thought that he and you would have made a match?" said Lucy. "For I really believed that you liked him, and I felt certain that he was sincerely attached to you."

Florence smiled, though there was more sadness than mirth in her smile. She checked the reply that started to her lips, and forced her spirits into apparent gaiety.

"Davenant Churchill," she said, "is, like myself and the rest of the world, a firm believer in the power of absence over affection."

The carriage, at that moment, drove up to the door, and the ladies both started up to prepare themselves for morning calls.

"Now for the routine of woman's life, Lucy!" said Florence, as she tripped lightly out of the room: "love, dress, scandal, and sight-seeing! Vive la bagatelle!"

CHAPTER II.

FLORENCE ELLSMORE was one of Fortune's spoiled children, and, like most children who have been spoiled, she was ready to chide the kindness which had made her capricious. Endowed with the natural advantages of person and intellect to a more than ordinary degree, and blessed with those adventitious aids, education, elegance of manners, and profuse wealth, she appeared to possess every element of happiness: yet she was not happy.

Petted and caressed from her infancy upwards, by doting parents and partial friends, she looked upon adulation as her right, and it was one which was not called in question. Her entrance into the gayest and most fashionable society of New York formed an era in the path even of her own rose-strewn existence. Lovers and flatterers swarmed around her, and she breathed but the incense of admiration.

It is not surprising, therefore, that she became somewhat intoxicated with the pleasing draughts, and shunned the avowal of particular admiration, lest the empire of general praise might thereby be destroyed. Among those who sought to win her favor, there was one who entertained a sincere and devoted attachment for her, and towards whom she was more attracted than towards any of her other suitors. Indeed, she loved him; but the spirit of coquetry was strong upon her, and she scarcely admitted the fact to herself.

Davenant Churchill—the gentleman concerning whom Lucy Somers inquired—was a person who might have been loved, even by a woman as capricious as Florence Ellsmore; for his manners, person, education, family, and fortune, all combined to render him attractive. We have said that he loved Florence. He did, passionately and devotedly—absorbingly, as man seldom loves; but he was too proud to pamper to every idle whim, and had too much self-respect to allow himself to be classed with a bevy of expectants. He thought he was not distasteful to her, and he offered her his heart and hand. He writhed under an equivocal rejection, which seemed to expect further wooing; but he offered no remonstrance. Burying his feelings in the recesses of his own heart, he left her presence, and shortly afterwards left his home, to endeavor to find forgetfulness by exploring the wonders of foreign lands.

It was not until the certainty of his loss was manifest that Florence Ellsmore became conscious of the real state of her own feelings, and convinced that her happiness depended as much upon him as she was satisfied that his did upon her; yet it was too late to recall what had been done; and she had, besides, the bitter reflection that she was herself the architect of her own misery. Her secret, however, she looked in her own breast, and breathed it not to a soul. She continued to be as brilliant in society as ever; but it was for the double purpose of obtaining oblivion for herself, and averting the inquisitive glances of a prying world. Even her old schoolmate and intimate friend, Lucy Somers, did not more than guess at the existence of an incipient attachment; and when, during her visits to Florence, she alluded to Davenant Churchill, she uttered mere random observations, without conceiving remotely how far Florence's feelings were committed.

CHAPTER III.

THE boxes of the opera presented a rich array of beauty; but Florence Ellsmore, with her exquisitely chiselled Grecian features, her graceful form, and her glossy, raven hair, in heavy ringlets, adorned but by a simple flower, outshone all others, and left no room for rivalry.

A happy man was Captain Brightly that night, with two such fair creatures in charge, the one Florence, and the other Lucy, a pretty blonde, with luxuriant golden curls. Nor was he allowed alone to monopolize the smiles of the damsels he had escorted. Other young men, proud of their acquaintance, and glad of the opportunity, crowded into their box, and filled up the intervals between the music with pleasant conversation and witty anecdote. No one, to have looked upon Florence as she sat, with her ermine-lined cloak carelessly thrown back, the "observed of all observers" and the centre of attraction, would have supposed that she had ever experienced the heartache, or that she was not, as she appeared to be, the gayest of the gay.

The curtain had just fallen on the second act of the opera, and Florence was laughing at some extravagant compliment that had been paid her, when Miss Somers, who had been reconnoitering the house through her opera-glass, directed her attention to a tall, fine-looking man in a box immediately opposite theirs.

"Is not that Davenant Churchill, Florence?" she asked. "He is staring at us as if he certainly thinks he has the right of acquaintanceship."

Florence started at the mention of that name, and turned in the direction indicated. A moment's glance was sufficient, for the gentleman's gaze met hers, and the inclination of studied coldness was given by none other than the individual in question. Florence instantly recognized the features of Davenant Churchill, and she thought his countenance gave "more in sorrow than in anger." She blushed deeply as she returned his salutation, and murmured a reply to Lucy Somers.

"It is Mr. Churchill," she said; "though this is the first intimation I have had of his return."

"He only arrived yesterday in the steamer," Captain Brightly remarked; "and I am somewhat surprised to see him here; for it is said of him that he is particularly staid, and mixes not in the amusements of meaner mortals."

Florence made some indifferent observation, and then became suddenly and obstinately thoughtful. The gentlemen in vain attempted to revive her mirth; and, failing in that, they left her with Captain Brightly only for an attendant.

The third act had scarcely commenced, when Florence mentioned to Lucy that she felt slightly indisposed, and requested Captain Brightly to see if the carriage was in waiting.

"Why, Florence," said Miss Somers, as she rose to attire herself for the street, "what has caused your sudden indisposition? Is it because Mr. Haughton has not made his appearance to-night?"

Florence smiled.

"His absence is a disappointment," she said; "but it is an agreeable one. I cannot endure that walking epitome of pride!"

"Or has it," asked Lucy, holding up her fan, archly, "been caused by the sudden and unexpected appearance of Davenant Churchill?"

"Mr. Churchill is nothing to me," Florence replied, with constrained indifference; "and I am even less than that to him."

"Florence, your words and your countenance are strangely at variance," Lucy kindly remarked; "and there is a mystery in their keeping. You must make me your confidante, or"—

"I will," Florence replied, hastily; "but not now; Captain Brightly has returned."

The captain entered, and announced that the carriage was ready; and, after the delay of a few moments, the ladies were driven home.

CHAPTER IV.

BEFORE she retired that night, Florence unburthened her heart to Lucy; and, spite of herself, scalding tears accompanied the confession of wrecked happiness, and of her own folly and caprice accomplishing that wreck.

The task of consolation was a difficult one to Lucy; for Florence was too proud to admit the possibility of Mr. Churchill and herself occupying again the same relative positions they once did; and, having now thrown off the mask she had so long worn, she readily admitted that none other could ever supplant him in her affections. Lucy, however, did the best she could, and suggested that time would insure forgetfulness, if it should not restore hope.

"Time may do something, Lucy," replied Florence, smiling sadly; "for, if the stream of oblivion is to be found anywhere, it should be discovered flowing beside the grave of Hope."

A few evenings subsequent to her visit to the opera, Florence suffered herself to be present at a party, to which she had previously accepted an invitation. She went reluctantly; and, though she endeavored to rise above the spirit of listlessness that oppressed her, her efforts were so unsuccessful as to make her the subject of observation to those who had been in the habit of witnessing her usual vivacity.

"What is it that makes Florence Ellsmore so grave to-night?" asked the hostess of the mansion, as she separated her from a small group which surrounded her, and walked with her to a part of the room less occupied. "The gentlemen are all melancholy, because they say you have not been seen to smile since your arrival."

Florence smiled at the observation, and declared that she was not more grave than usual.

"But you are though," remarked her hostess; "and I cannot consent that the belle of the room shall wear upon her countenance the weeds of woe. I will give you in charge to Mr. Churchill, who has just returned from Europe, with especial instructions that he will enliven you with an amusing account of his travels."

"Not for worlds!" exclaimed Florence, as she turned and saw Davenant Churchill only a few yards distant from her.

But her exclamation was uttered too late, for he had already been appealed to, and, as a matter of course, instantly joined them. After starting a topic of conversation, and participating in it for a moment or two, the lady of the house left them together, while she distributed her attention among her other guests.

Both Florence Ellsmore and Davenant Churchill held themselves, as it were, aloof from each other, and spoke and acted under visible constraint; but the memory of old times insensibly came back to them, and they grew gradually more familiar.

"I suppose," said Florence, timidly, after they had spoken for some time upon general subjects, "that your sojourn in other climes, and on other continents, has been prolific equally of information and amusement?"

The expression of Churchill's countenance underwent a change as he heard the question, and the tone of his voice became altered as he replied to it.

"It has furnished me, I hope," he said, "with much information; though I failed to obtain what I most desired, and the acquisition of which is necessary before I can become susceptible of being amused."

"What was that?" Florence asked.

"Peace!" he replied, as he gazed steadfastly at her, while her glance shrank from meeting his. "And you," he asked, after Florence had continued silent for some time—"you have been happy since we last met?"

Florence sighed.

"That sigh," he remarked, "seems to answer my question negatively; and yet you should be happy; for I learn that you are still the soul of society, and I observe you the animating spirit of all around you. Gravity flies from your path, and laughter-loving mirth entwines you perpetually with chaplets."

"A smiling lip is not always the sign of a happy heart," Florence replied, in a low voice.

"But to be ever with the gay," Churchill said, "indicates a joyousness of spirit far removed from care."

"I have heard," said Florence, "that all inebriates are not so from the love of wine. Some are said to seek the intoxicating bowl to drown recollection, or to banish unpleasant reflections. Is it so?"

Davenant Churchill gazed upon his companion for some time in deep thought; and when he commenced speaking his voice was tremulous with excitement.

"Florence," he said, "I have sometimes had a thought to flash across my mind, which has been almost too intangible to be retained, but which, at this moment, presents itself palpably before me. Will you answer me one question?"

"What is it?" Florence asked, in a voice that was scarcely audible.

"You know," he said, "why I have been unhappy, and why I have failed to obtain peace of mind. Have you ever regretted what transpired at our last meeting, and what made me a wanderer in other countries?"

We might, if we pleased, give Florence's reply, and a lengthy conversation that followed it; and also we might describe how Florence and Davenant Churchill promenaded the rooms that night, and how changed was the expression of their countenances; but we will do nothing of the kind. Having great faith in the imaginations of our fair readers, we will allow them to conceive much more than there is any necessity for saying. We will only remark that, before retiring that night, Lucy Somers slyly asked her friend if she had yet discovered the "stream of Oblivion," or "the grave of Hope."

SONNET.—THE SEA.

BY WM. ALEXANDER.

God of the Sea! how splendid is the scene
 Displayed within thy palace bright and fair,
 Where mermaids, pearl-decked, comb their flowing hair,
 Or sport in garments of the gayest green!
 About thy throne magnificent are piled,
 Vast crystal walls—bold, beautiful, and high—
 While coral pillars in rich colors vie
 With sea-flowers blooming in thy gardens wild.
 Far other scenes and sights now do we view,
 As in thy depths we further downward wend:
 Lo! there poor mortals' bones together blend;
 There wrecks of vessels, with their daring crew;
 Slumber they shall in death-sleep deep, profound,
 Till sea yield up his dead, and the last trumpet sound.

ILLUSTRIOUS CHARACTERS.

BY THOMAS WYATT, A. M.

(See Plate.)

THE writer is able to present to the readers of the "Lady's Book" authentic memoirs of several illustrious women, three of whom lived during the exciting struggles of '76. The others, though living in times more peaceful, have exhibited characters not less brilliant in the spheres they were destined to fill. He hereby acknowledges his obligations to the families of the above, who have kindly furnished him with materials never before published.

We commence these interesting memoirs with a sketch of Mrs. John Quincy Adams, recently deceased at Washington City, aged seventy-seven years.

LOUISA CATHERINE ADAMS.

Mrs. Louisa Catherine Adams, the wife of the late John Quincy Adams, was the daughter of Joshua Johnson, of Calvert County, in the State of Maryland. Mr. Johnson was one of eleven children, five of whom served in the Revolutionary War. One of his brothers, Thomas Johnson, was the first Governor of Maryland, Judge of the Supreme Court, Commissioner of Public Buildings in Washington, and the personal friend of General Washington. Previous to the Revolution, he had been established in London as a merchant, where Mrs. Adams was born on the 12th of February, 1775. When war was declared, he, being a staunch republican and a citizen of the State of Maryland, could no longer remain in England with safety; he therefore removed his family to Nantz, in France, where he was presented by Dr. Franklin to the king and queen, in the capacity of commercial agent, being appointed by the Congress of the old Confederation of 1778 and 1779. He remained at Nantz until the year 1783, performing the duties of consul and agent for the ports of Nantz, Brest, and Morlaix.

In 1783, when the times began to wear a more settled aspect, he was transferred to London as consul-general, but with a salary totally inadequate to support his family. When General Washington became President, he still continued Mr. Johnson in the same office; but substituted fees of office instead of salary, with additional labor and drudgery, which was ruinous to his health and fortune. The fees of office were small, and not well paid. At this time impressment of sailors was at its height, and the steps leading to the door of his house and the hall would be almost impassable from the number of poor sailors who would hang around there for safety, on account of the consular privilege. But the moment their feet touched the pavement, a press-gang, stationed near the house, would seize the poor fellows, and, if they resisted, the cutlass was used without mercy, and they were carried off to a tender, and shipped, ere the consul could go through the forms and ceremonies attendant upon their release. Sailors are not often remarkable for their thrift, and their heedless liberality often leads them into trouble and want. This was the case daily, and the consul was incessantly called upon to relieve their necessities, their dangers, their sickness, and to furnish clothes, physicians, and often funeral expenses, while the established fees were quite insufficient to meet such heavy and constant demands. The house of the American Consul in London very naturally became the resort for the respectable citizens of this country, who frequented the metropolis either on business or pleasure.

Mr. John Quincy Adams, a young lawyer from Boston, who had been commissioned by President Washington to exchange the ratifications of the treaty of 19th November, 1794, and to agree upon arrangements for carrying the same into effect, arrived in London, bringing letters of introduction to the consul. At the house of her father, Miss Johnson first met him whose exalted and varied stations she was to share.

An engagement followed, and they were married at All Hallows Church, on the 26th day of July, 1797.

A short time previous to the marriage of Mr. Adams, he was appointed Minister Plenipotentiary to Lisbon, and was on the eve of his departure with his young and lovely bride, when the news of the accession of his father, John Adams, to the presidency arrived. This was productive of a transfer from Lisbon, in Portugal, to the same capacity at Berlin, in Prussia.

Mr. Adams, being the first acknowledged minister at that court, was accordingly received with great honor and respect; and his young wife, being educated in the manners of both England and France, was competent to occupy a high position in the polished circles of social and political life. It need scarcely be added that she proved everything which was required of a lady in so exalted a station, and that, during a residence of four years, she gained the esteem and good-will of all around her.

She has often remarked, even at this distant period, that the recollection of those times will always be among the most agreeable associations of her varied life.

In 1801, Mrs. Adams accompanied her husband to the United States. It was his intention to resume the practice of law in Boston, but he was very soon elected Senator to Congress. Mrs. Adams, always accompanying her husband, passed her summers in Boston and winters in Washington. In 1809, President Madison appointed Mr. Adams the first accredited minister to the Russian court. Mrs. Adams, having three children at this time, was induced to leave the two oldest with their grandparents, and taking the youngest, then an infant about two years old, with her, accompanied her husband to Russia, the first American lady presented at that court. Here also Mrs. Adams succeeded in making a very favorable impression. She was soon so much admired and esteemed as almost to become a subject of envy among the other ladies who formed a part of that distinguished circle.

But her residence at St. Petersburg was far less agreeable than it had been at Berlin. The great distance from America, the rigor of the climate, and the exclusion for so many months of anything like communication with home, caused this high mission to be felt little less than an honorable exile. Although the residence in Russia of Mr. and Mrs. Adams was so disagreeable from the extraordinary events that were daily occurring, their stay was prolonged to nearly six years: not one of the subsequent incumbents has remained half that period. Upon the eve of the departure of Mr. and Mrs. Adams to their long wished for home, orders were received directing Mr. Adams to repair to Ghent, as one of the commissioners appointed to attempt a reconciliation between the United States and Great Britain, the Emperor Alexander having offered himself as a mediator between the two countries.

This took place in April, 1814. The state of Europe being so unsettled, it was considered most prudent to allow Mrs. Adams to remain in Russia. Separation from her husband, and from all other relatives or friends, with the exception of a few faithful domestics she had brought with her, was a trial of no inconsiderable moment.

In the spring of 1815, Mrs. Adams received the joyful news of the conclusion of the treaty, and of peace between her beloved country and Great Britain. Upon the receipt of such cheerful tidings, she concluded to proceed at once by an overland journey to Paris to join her husband. Few females have undergone more extraordinary fatigue than this excellent woman, and very few would have had courage sufficient to take their departure in a carriage alone, at a season much too early for travelling, with a son eight years of age to take care of, and a few servants whose alarm rendered them useless as protectors. But Mrs. Adams proved that calmness and presence of mind render many things practicable which at first appear insuperable difficulties. She had the happiness of joining her husband in Paris on the 21st of March, 1815; the memorable arrival of Napoleon and the flight of the Bourbons having taken place only a few days previous.

The opportunity of seeing the French metropolis at such an exciting period was ever considered by Mrs. Adams amongst the most fortunate events of her life. Mrs. Adams, however, did not remain long in France; she had ties in England which caused her to leave France without regret. Mr. Adams being appointed minister to England, their children were sent out from America to meet them on their arrival in London; the joy of such a meeting amply compensated for the absence of any scenes however brilliant.

After a residence of two years at a beautiful village in the vicinity of London, Mr. Adams was appointed Secretary of State by Mr. Monroe, who had just been elected president. This, of course, required his immediate return to America; and, in August, 1817, he, with his family, arrived in New York, after an absence of eight years from his native country.

Mrs. Adams now took her leave of Europe, where she had spent the greater portion of her life, and at a period perhaps the most remarkable and exciting that ever occurred in the memory of man. But her mind was too elevated to be contaminated by the habits of a court, and too refined to be awed by either civil or military monarchy. She returned, as she left, the daughter of our simple republic.

The duties of Mr. Adams as Secretary of State necessarily required his residence at Washington, where his house became an agreeable resort to the numerous strangers visiting the capital. After performing the duties of the above exalted station, Mr. Adams was elected President of the United States, and his estimable lady was again, and for the last time, called to preside over the distinguished society that surrounded her. This was accomplished with a grace and refinement of manners still cherished by those who were the happy recipients of her hospitality.

At the close of the presidential term, Mr. Adams retired with his family to the old mansion at Quincy, Massachusetts; but he was not suffered to remain there long before his useful services were again required. He was chosen a representative in Congress from his native State, which necessarily brought his family to Washington at each session, and where his lady, the subject of this sketch, resided until her death.

A relative of Mrs. Adams thus remarks: "To the world, Mrs. Adams presents a fine example of the possibility of retiring from the circles of fashion and the external fascinations of life, in time still to retain a taste for the more quiet, though less showy attractions of the domestic fireside. In the society of a few beloved friends and near relatives, and in the cultivation of the religious affections, without display, she now draws all the consolation that can in this world be afforded for her privations." Having a strong taste for literature, she has stored her mind with gems from the richest mines, which have often shone forth in composition both in prose and verse. We submit a few original lines, one of the resources of her leisure moments.

TO CAROLINE.

Thou wert lovely in youth,
Thou art lovely in age,
As faultless as virtue can be:
With the annals of truth
I could fill the pure page,
And yet do not justice to thee.

When I fondly retrace
The bright years of the past,
I mourn that that time is no more;
But no time can efface,
While existence shall last,
The friendship that lives to threescore.

HOME EXERCISES.

WE refer again to the "home exercises" introduced in our last number, in the hope that sufficient interest has already been excited in the minds of parents and youthful readers to induce them to accompany us a step or two further in the investigation. A professional gentleman of considerable eminence, writing on this subject, gives it as his opinion, founded upon experience and practice, that by exercises alone can deformities connected with the spine, such as curvatures, high and narrow shoulders, hollow, contracted, or pigeon-shaped chests, malformations, etc., be effectually removed. Weak and delicate youths, and others who are allowed to indulge in sedentary and enervating habits; ladies early inured to the fashionable practice of wearing stays tightly laced, all grow up more or less weak and semi-developed in body; and in some who are prone to disease, the muscles shrivel and the bones soften; deformity, as a natural consequence, gradually takes place, first of the spine—the keel of the framework—then of the chest; and, if not arrested in time by judicious EXERCISE and disuse of all impediments to the growth and development of the body, such as stiff or tightly-laced stays, disease will inevitably follow, which will as certainly end in a miserable and premature death.

The most precarious period of life is said to vary from the ages of ten to twenty-one years, when the frame is most prone to deformity; but particularly from ten to fifteen, the pubescent stage, when the body is in its most active state of growth. The most frequent cause of deformity at this most dangerous period, is the over-exercise of the mind, to the neglect of the body, augmented in the female sex by the baneful use of stays. Many are the children, says the physician referred to, who have been born healthy and robust, the pride and hope of fond parents, having the rosy hue of health upon the cheek, the sparkling eye and laughing mouth; happiness and enjoyment, the certain attendants upon robust health, plainly marked upon their countenances; the voice—yes, the active romping motion of the body—confirm it; but wait a little while, until the approach of the insidious age, the period when the body is at its highest progress of upward growth, the muscular fibres being still lax, the bones comparatively soft, when the powers of the system are so severely tried, nature requiring to be supported by the most careful watching and utmost aid of science, in supplying and regulating the quality and quantity of air, food, and exercise, so requisite at this period: whereas, instead of such judicious attention, we often find that the too fond parent, ever and wholly absorbed with the mental education of his offspring, to the entire neglect, and even sacrifice of his bodily frame, at this most dangerous stage of his life, often fancies that it is the best age for mental training and activity; consequently, taxes both the mind and body of the youth to the utmost, by forcing him to employ all the hours of the day, by attending class upon class, almost without remission, to which is added a corresponding number of tasks to be learnt at night; and, as a matter of course, that no time should be lost, a tutor comes in the evening, whose avocation is to urge on the languid brain that has already been worn out and exhausted; whilst the foolish parent flatters himself that he is doing all in his power in order to cause his child to acquire the greatest amount of mental education within the shortest time, and presumes upon the fact that, as he has always enjoyed good health since his infancy, therefore no danger can accrue from a few years' over-exertion. The result of all this oppression the author proceeds to describe, change after change, as they gradually creep over the laughing child, until he has grown into a peevish, morose youth; until the bright, sporting eye has become dull and sombre; the full, ruddy cheek hollow and colorless; the laughing mouth, the rosy lip pale, heavy, and expressionless; his previously ravenous appetite now requiring to be tempted and excited by numberless condiments; and his former robust health exchanged for headaches, dyspepsia, etc., until, finally, death closes his prolonged suffering.

LE MÉLANGE.

CHAPTER III.

AFTERNOON ON THE GLACIERS.

At one o'clock in the afternoon, we got back to our old bivouac on the Grands Mulets. We had intended to have remained here some little time, but the heat on the rock was so stifling, that we could scarcely support it; and Tairraz announced that the glacier was becoming so dangerous to traverse, from the melting of the snow, that even now it would be a matter of some risk to cross it. So we hastily finished our scraps of refreshment, and drank our last bottle of wine—out of a stew-pan, by the way, for we had lost our leathern cups in our evolutions on the ice—and then, making up our packs, bade good by to the Grands Mulets, most probably for ever. In five minutes, we found that, after all, the greatest danger of the undertaking was to come. The whole surface of the Glacier des Bossons had melted into perfect sludge; the ice-cliffs were dripping in the sun, like the well at Knarsborough; every minute the bridges over the crevice were falling in; and we sank almost to our waists in the thawing snow at every step we took. I could see that the guides were uneasy. All the ropes came out again, and we were tied together in parties of three, about ten feet distant from one another. And now all the work of yesterday had to be gone over again, with much more danger attached to it. From the state of the snow, the guides avowed that it was impossible to tell whether we should find firm standing on any arch we arrived at, or go through it at once into some frightful chasm. They sounded every bridge we came to with their poles, and a shake of the head was always the signal for a detour. One or two of the tracks by which we had marched up yesterday had now disappeared altogether, and fresh ones had to be cautiously selected. We had one tolerably narrow escape. Tairraz, who preceded me, had jumped over a crevice, and upon the other side alighted on a mere bracket of snow, which directly gave way beneath him. With the squirrel-like, rapid activity of the Chamouni guides, he whirled his baton round so as to cross the crevice, which was not very broad, but of unknown depth, transversely. This saved him, but the shock pulled me off my legs. Had he fallen, I must have followed him—since we were tied together—and the guide would have been dragged after me. I was more startled by this little accident than by any other occurrence during the journey.—Albert Smith's Ascent of "MONT BLANC."—Blackwood's Magazine.

FLEURS DE LYS.

NEXT to the origin of heraldry itself, perhaps nothing connected with it has given rise to such controversy as the origin of this celebrated charge. It has been gravely asserted that it was brought down from heaven by an angel, and presented to Clovis, King of the Franks. Upton calls it "foe gladioli;" and his translator, Dame Juliana Barnes, tells us that the arms of the King of France "were certainly sende by an Aungell from Heaven, that is to say, iij. flouris in manner of swordis in a field of asure, the which certain armys were given to the aforesaid Kyng of Fraunce in sygne of euerlasting trowbull, and that he, and his successors always with battle and swords should be punished." It has been also called a toad, and the head of a spear, and Dal-laway and Lower incline to the latter belief. I am not going to record all the arguments which have been from time to time brought forward in support of this or that theory. My province is to state facts, and leave you to draw your own deductions. As an ornament, the Fleur de Lys is seen on Roman monuments, and as the top of a sceptre or sword-hilt from the earliest periods of the French monarchy. As a badge or cognisance, it first appears on the seals of Louis VII. of France, called Le Jeune, and also surnamed Fleury, from the Abbey of that name, the favorite retreat of the French kings, and where Philip I. was buried. By Philip II., surnamed Augustus, the contemporary of our Richard I. and John, it was borne both singly and repeated "sans nombre;" and analogy supports the conclusion which one of the most intelligent of French writers on this subject came to long ago—that the Fleur de Lys, or Flower de Luce, was merely a rebus, signifying Fleur de Louis or Flower of Lewis.—J. Planche.

NEW MEDICAL TREATMENT.

A LADY who had formerly been a patient of Dr. C., but whom, in consequence of her removal from Paris, he had not seen for some time, came to him lately to say that her daughter was afflicted with violent rheumatic pains. As she still resided in the country, however, Dr. C. could not do more than give her some general counsel, deferring the actual treatment till she should bring her daughter to Paris. In a few days she returned, telling him that her sufferings were completely removed, in the following singular manner: One night, being seized with an attack, the violence of which was intolerable, the mother, in despair, sent to the only medical practitioner of which the village boasted—a man who, by the help of a little self-taught lore, and a certain knowledge of simples and old-woman's remedies, treated the peasants satisfactorily enough. No sooner did our Galen arrive, than he directed that all the empty bottles that could be collected should be placed on the floor, the mattresses laid over them, and the sufferer extended thereon. The effect was magical; in a few minutes the patient experienced the greatest relief, and finally a complete cessation of suffering; and though the attacks had afterwards returned, they never failed to yield to this singular remedy. The solution of the mystery (of which the village doctor was quite ignorant) Dr. C. found at once. Electricity, it appears, is the great aggravator of all such maladies; and of this force, glass is a non-conductor. If, then, the electric current is cut off from contact with the patient, immediate relief is the consequence. Profiting by the hint, Dr. C. has since, in all such cases, caused thick glass cylinders to be put under the feet of the malades' bed, and with success the most complete. Another case was a cure where consumption had actually commenced, and had made some progress, by passing five or six hours a day in a butcher's shop. A third, where what was considered a fatal affection of the spinal marrow in a young girl, completely yielded to a process of sun burning, the patient being stripped to the waist, and placed facing a south wall during the hottest part of the day.—Letters from Paris.

WORSTED WORK.

HAVE you seen yet a new material which has just been invented here for tapestry work? It is sure to have an immense success, as it saves all the tedious process of grounding. It is a woollen stuff, made in all colors, with the grain sufficiently marked to enable you to work upon it, and count the stitches as easily as in canvass: and the effect of the pattern, when worked, is even better, as the comparative thickness and closeness of the stuff make it look much richer and more raised. The time and trouble it saves are of course prodigious, and there is no doubt that it will quite supersede the common canvass for most purposes; though whether it will wear as well for chair seats, and such articles of furniture as are exposed to hard usage, yet remains to be proved; it will at least outlast the freshness of the work.—Ibid.

WOMAN'S SPHERE IN MODERN LIFE.

A WOMAN's true sphere is in her family, in her home duties, which furnish the best and most appropriate training for her faculties, pointed out by nature itself.

And for those duties, some of the very highest and noblest that are entrusted to human agency, the fine machinery that is to perform them should be wrought to its last point of perfectness. The wealth of a woman's mind, instead of lying in the rough, should be richly brought out and fashioned for its various ends, while yet those ends are in the future, or it will never meet the demand. And for her own happiness, all the more because her sphere is at home, her home stores should be exhaustless, the stores she cannot go abroad to seek. I would add to strength beauty, and to beauty grace in the intellectual proportions, so far as possible. It were ungenerous in man to condemn the best half of human intellect to insignificance merely because it is not his own.

The man knows little of his own interest, who would leave that ground waste, or would cultivate it only in the narrow spirit of a utilitarian. He needs an influence in his family not more refreshing than rectifying; and no man will seek that in one greatly his inferior. He is to be pitied who cannot fall back upon his home with the assurance that he has there something better than himself.—Queechy, vol. ii.

PHYSIOPATHY.

MADE in conversation, but cannot recollect sufficiently to write, a vivid and happy display of what may be called physiopathy, a faculty of pervading all Nature with one's own being, so as to have a perception, a life, and an agency in all things. A person of such a mind stands and gazes at a tree, for instance, till the object becomes all wonderful, and is transfigured into something visionary and ideal. He is amazed what a tree is, how it could, from a little stem which a worm might crop, rise up into that majestic size, and how it could ramify into such multitudinous extent of boughs, twigs, and leaves. Fancy climbs up from its root like ivy, and twines round and round it, and extends to its remotest shoots and trembling foliage. But this is not all; the tree soon becomes to your imagination a conscious being, and looks at you, and communes with you; ideas cluster on each branch, meanings emanate from every twig. Its tallness and size look conscious majesty; roaring in the wind, its movements express tremendous emotion. In sunshine or soft showers it carries a gay, a tender, or a pensive character; it frowns in winter on a gloomy day. If you observe a man of this order, though his body be a small thing, invested completely with a little cloth, he expands his being in a grand circle all around him. He feels as if he grew in the grass, and flowers, and groves; as if he stood on yonder distant mountain top, conversing with clouds, or sublimely sporting among their imaged precipices, caverns, and ruins. He flows in that river, chafes in its cascades, smiles in the aqueous flowers, frisks in the fishes. He is sympathetic with every bird, and seems to feel the sentiment that prompts the song of each. (This, in one sense, is "inheriting all things.")—Life and Letters of John Foster, vol. i. p. 141.

CHILDREN'S BALL.

CHILDREN'S BALL, a detectable vanity. Mamma solicited busily for several weeks previously, with all the assistance too of milliners and tasteful friends, with lengthened dissertations, for the sole purpose of equipping two or three children to appear in one of these miserable exhibitions. The whole business seems a contrivance, expressly intended to concentrate to a focus of preternatural heat and stimulus every vanity and frivolity of the time, in order to blast for ever the simplicity of the little souls, and kindle their vain propensities into a thousand times the force that mere nature could ever have supplied.—Ibid., p. 123.

MODEL COTTAGE.

A Dwelling for a small Family.

Accommodation.—This hermitage-looking dwelling contains a porch, a; a work-room or parlor, b; a bedroom communicating with it, c; a kitchen, d; an outer kitchen or wash-house, with an oven, e, communicating with a pantry, f. The wash-house has a back door, near which, in the lean-to, is a water-closet, g; a cow-house, h; and a place for wood, i. In the section, the floors are shown as laid over a bed of stone, and a gravelled terrace surrounds the whole building on a level six inches lower than the floors of the rooms. In the bed of stones may be a flue connected with an oven placed in the angle of the back-kitchen, e, as before described.

General Estimate.—Cubic contents, 11,700 feet: at 10 cents, $1,170; at 5 cents, $585.

THE LYN N BRIDE.

A TALE OF REAL LIFE.

BY MRS. MADELINE LESLIE.

CHAPTER I.

It was the hour of twilight; cold, wintry clouds were skulking about the lower part of the horizon, rapidly shutting out the light of day, leaving the air chilly and cold. Though early in the autumn, yet there had been frequent gusts of wind, making free with the foliage which remained upon the trees, while heavy clouds had hung about the sky with an occasional gleam of sunshine, rendering the succeeding gloom only the more drear.

And now one could hardly distinguish the leafless trees, surrounding the low building which is the scene of my sketch; yet the pale mourner, sitting by the window, stirred not. Under ordinary circumstances, she would have drawn the curtain and joined the circle in an adjoining apartment, who were sitting around a cheerful fire; but now the darkness and gloom which reigned without had sunk into her heart. She was alone in the world; she felt that she was alone; while silent tears, all unheeded by her, followed each other in quick succession down her cheek. On the following day, she was to consign the mortal remains of her husband to the silent tomb. He had gone from her forever.

For a while, she sat dead to every feeling, save a crushing sense of desolation. She had, it is true, a brother and sister; but they were entirely engrossed in the cares which the support of their rising families were bringing upon them. Months of sickness had more than exhausted all her resources, and had left her feeble and languid, dependent upon the charity of friends. Dependent! Oh, how tightly she clasped her hands as she repeated that word! She could think no more; but, leaning her head upon her arm, she wept bitterly. Tears, even bitter tears, will bring relief. Gradually, the sobs grew less heavy and frequent, the tears ceased to flow, and memory was carrying her back far into the past, even to the time when she, with her brother and sister, used to play before the old cottage door, when the orchard resounded with their shouts of delight, and their merry peals of laughter. How distinct in her ear was the voice of her good mother calling them to supper, and the happiness she felt at the praise of her father when she had completed her allotted task!

Now she advances to her girlhood; the sickness and death of her father, and, a few years subsequent, that of her mother, pass in solemn review before her. Insensibly, the same outstretched arm which was then her support, seems now underneath her. The Father of the fatherless, whose promise she had so oft pleaded in prayer, will not forsake her. She remembers the comfort which filled her soul, as she cast all her burden upon Him, and resolves to trust him still. He, who had been her refuge through many fierce storms of adversity, will not turn a deaf ear to the cries of her poor widowed heart.

True, the friend whom she mourned was more suited in age for her grandparent than her husband; true, that his querulousness and childishness had often been more than she could well bear; but all this she forgets, or only remembers with joy, that her strength has been equal to her day, and that she has been graciously assisted to bear patiently and uncomplainingly the trials visited upon her. She recalls with pleasure his early acts of charity, when thrown upon him for protection, and the many kindly deeds which had won the gratitude, if not the love of her young heart; and she mourns truly that she shall see his face no more.

A few weeks later, we find Mary comfortably situated in the family of a Friend; and never was appellation more deservedly bestowed upon a Quaker; for the name of Amy Low sent a warm gush of feeling through many a heart. Her frequent and unobtrusive acts of kindness to the afflicted and sorrowful gave a lustre to her eye and a glow to her cheek, such as naught else could give, and made her the well beloved even among her own sect, where all hearts are kept warm by a constant exercise of love and charity.

Mary had received a cordial invitation to make her home with Amy for the winter, which was earnestly seconded by John and all the family; and Mary Eames was comparatively happy. She felt the influence of the frank, sincere happiness around her, and, as she sat busily plying her needle—for she was never idle—she looked back upon the fiery billows over which she had passed, and said to herself, truly “blessed is he who maketh the Lord his trust.”

She had already begun to make her plans for the future. It was her intention to take a small room, and support herself with her needle. This gave her an object, and her kind friends assisted her in obtaining work, that she might lay by something for that purpose. Amy often came into her room with a cheering word.

"Thee has had a hard time, Mary; but bright days are before thee. Thee art young, and deserve a young husband next time."

At which Mary would shake her head, and say, in a low, sad voice, at the remembrance of the past—"I shall never marry again."

Mrs. Eames's dutiful conduct to her parents, her devoted care of an aged husband, much more than twice her age, and her simple, unostentatious piety, had gained her many friends. She was invited to join a benevolent circle, and soon had the satisfaction of feeling that she still could do something in the way of charity. This sewing circle, unlike many others, met for a specific object; and the only strife among them was, which should do the most to promote the cause in which they were engaged. They had, with one consent, banished from among them all scandal and unkind words, and were, of course, warmly attached to each other.

After her admission to the circle, few were more constant at the meetings, or more diligent when present, than Mary Eames, who thus won the confidence and affection of all those with whom she was associated.

The sun of prosperity began now to shine upon her path, and to open the buds of hope around her. Her days were passing quietly away, cheered by the sympathy and benevolence of her friends, in whose kind care we will leave her for a season.

CHAPTER II.

ABOUT forty miles distant from the opening scene of our story lay the village of Edgeworth. Nearly a week after the events there narrated, Mr. Harrington, a middle-aged man, returned from the post-office, which was more than a mile from his house, and, after attending to the comfort of his domestic animals, and seen that all was safe for the night, drew the curtains, set out the light stand, and drawing up his arm-chair before the fire, began to put the embers together and make a blaze, preparatory to reading his weekly paper.

He commenced, as was his custom, with the first article, and read each succeeding one in order, omitting nothing. The evening was quite advanced when he came, in due course, to "Marriages" and "Deaths."

"Married, October 10th, by the Rev. T. H. Symmes, Mr. Rufus Howe to Miss Caroline Tainter, both of Bosworth.

"On the 12th inst., by Rev. J. A. Spence, Mr. John Morrill to Mrs. Susan Averill, relict of the late Colonel Averill, of Freetown, Mass." &c. &c.

These he read through with scrupulous exactness, though not without a sigh at his own lonely condition.

Patience, good man! thy turn may come sooner than thou listeth.

Then, snuffing the candle, he proceeded to the deaths.

"Oct. 2d, died at his residence, in Crawford, Mr. Lewis Howarth, aged 53.

"In Melville, on the 5th inst., Mr. Samuel Eames, a Revolutionary veteran, at the advanced age of 90 years."

Here a sudden exclamation of "What!" and a quick repetition of the last announcement, proved that his mind was not so intent upon the matter as his serious manner seemed to indicate. This time his reading, however, showed his whole soul to be absorbed in the fact that, on the 5th inst., Mr. Samuel Eames, aged 90, had departed this life.

But why this emotion? Why is the paper, just now so earnestly desired, hastily thrown aside? Was he thy kinsman? Art thou expecting aught of his worldly estate? No, neither. These would hardly cause the emotion which agitated him for the next hour, as he sat leaning on the arm of his chair, looking steadily into the fire. At length, he breathed more freely, and, with the exclamation, "Then she is free, and may be mine, to bless my solitary heart!" arose and began to walk steadily across the room.

While he is walking thus, we will go back a little in his history, and endeavor to assign some reason for the intensity of feeling here excited.

Levi Harrington was born and brought up in the small village of Edgeworth. When about twenty-eight years of age, he married the daughter of a neighboring farmer, with whom he lived happily for many years, when she died, and left him three children, the youngest ten years of age. Upon the marriage of his daughter, he was solicited by his friends to seek another wife; but, among all his acquaintance in the village, he knew of none whom he wished to recognize in that relation. He had never been twenty miles from home in his life; and he determined not to be in haste, but to wait until Providence should direct his course.

A lady, who had been a particular friend of his wife, called one afternoon to see him, and, after expressing her strong interest in him as the husband of her best friend, remarked that she knew of one person who, if not married, would just suit him.

He inquired, with a smile—

"Is there, then, no prospect of my success?"

"Why, yes," said she, returning his smile, "if you choose to wait. She is about the age of Sarah"—naming his deceased wife—"but is married to a man old enough to be her grandfather. I heard, a short time since, that he was very low. He was so old that his friends thought he could not hold out much longer, and he may have died before now."

"What is the name of this lady who would just suit me?"

"Mary Eames."

"Mary Eames! What, she that was a Conan?"

"Yes."

"Well, I've heard a right good name of her," continued Mr. Harrington, now becoming quite interested in the conversation. "And you say they think he won't live long?"

"Why, yes; neighbor Woodly saw him a week or two since, and he said the old man's mind and memory were almost gone; and he thought, most of the time, Mary was his daughter that died. He has outlived his usefulness, and I rather think poor Mary has a trying time of it."

"Well, how does she get along with him?"

"Why, Mr. Woodly says she is the patientest soul that he ever saw, and that it made his heart ache to hear him talk to her, and find so much fault with what she did. Yet he would let no one else do anything for him. If she was out of his sight a moment, he'd call 'Betsy'—his deceased daughter's name—'how dare you stay there, when I want you this minute!'"

After his visitor's departure, the sad tale of Mary Eames's trials constantly recurred to him; and, at the end of the following week, when on the way to see the lady who had first mentioned her, he was astonished at himself for the interest he took in a person whom he had never seen. He went purposely to ask if anything had been heard from the old gentleman; but did not propose the question until he was about to depart. Mrs. Williams had heard nothing more, but would inquire.

"Oh," he stammered, "it is of no—no—consequence; only your account of them quite interested me."

After this, Mrs. Williams, with true womanly tact, kept him informed of the condition of Mr. Eames, without waiting for him to ask, seldom mentioning the name of Mary, except to answer the inquiries occasionally ventured by Mr. Harrington.

About two years subsequent to the marriage of his daughter, his eldest son followed her example, and left home, leaving him with his young son to take care of the farm and small dairy.

I will not attempt to describe his feelings of loneliness and sorrow, mingled with hope deferred, as year after year passed away; nor the several stages through which his mind passed, until he had fully resolved to "bide his time," and "wait for Mary's love." He resisted the oft-urged entreaties of his children, that he would provide a suitable person to keep his house and attend to the concerns of his family. He was determined to guard against everything which might possibly influence the object of his choice, and prevent her from becoming his wife. Indeed, he had so often made and settled his course whenever she should be free, had spent so many hours in thinking of her, and planning what he would do to make her forget the long, long years of trial through which she had passed, that he felt sure she would consent to be his.

He never realized that all this time poor Mary was ignorant that there was such a person as him self in existence; that she was growing prematurely old by means of her daily and hourly toils. The thought entered not his mind that, worn out by her unceasing watch and care, she might be called away from the trials of earth. No, all his thoughts and feelings centred in this—he would make her happy.

And how did he feel all this time towards the aged veteran, who stood between him and his hopes? Strange as it may seem, he had no desire to deprive the helpless old man of one moment of his allotted life, who had long ago passed his three score years and ten, and who, he thought, in all human probability, could not live much longer. He was willing to wait; he would wait patiently, as Jacob waited for Rachel, provided he was not constrained to take some Leah.

He now seldom left home, except to visit his children, and the kind friend, Mrs. Williams, to whom alone he confided his intentions and his hopes.

She entered warmly into his feelings; encouraged him under the circumstances to live alone, and thus avoid the occasion for idle talk; and did, what it has often been said woman cannot do, keep his secret. Never, by look or tone, intimating that he was more interested than common humanity would dictate, in the trials of Mary Eames, when she and her afflictions were the subject of conversation.

Mr. Harrington often heard, apparently unmoved, high encomiums passed upon her patience and submission under the dispensations of Providence. This he treasured up as a subject of thought during his many hours of loneliness and grief.

At length came the unwelcome intelligence that, exhausted by her ceaseless watching and care, Mary lay upon a bed of sickness, and was so much reduced that her friends feared she never would recover. This was what he had not anticipated, and it almost overwhelmed him. For a while, the poor man was bewildered, and could think of nothing.

For years, he had so connected her in his thoughts with everything he did, and everything he intended to do, that now he seemed thrown into the midst of a wild sea, without anchor or compass. Yes, this was true; and all his sorrow on account of one whom he had never seen. Surely, no one will doubt the romance of real life.

Mrs. Williams often called to see him, and to sympathize with him; and, though for months she could bear no favorable intelligence, she softened the tidings as much as lay in her power.

At last, she informed him that a decided improvement had taken place, and that strong hopes were entertained of Mary's recovery. From this time the accounts were very cheering. The old gentleman, who now recognized no one, had been removed to a hospital, and his wife, free from the care which had preyed upon her mind, was fast recovering.

We now come to the time when we first introduced Mr. Harrington to the reader, and are prepared to explain the sudden outburst of feeling caused by those few lines in his weekly journal. During the time we have occupied in this sketch of his life, he has made and overturned twenty plans. He finds it harder to act, now that the opportunity is presented, than he had anticipated. He now realizes, and wonders he did not before, that all these would be new to her, and that she could not be expected to enter into them at once at that point to which his mind had arrived. This is a sad trial to his patience. How long must he wait before he can, with propriety, propose to her once more to change her condition? Alas, his confident hope of success has vanished!

After building many castles, and upsetting them—for even men of sixty build airy castles—he resolved to see Mrs. Williams and take her advice.

This he did on the following morning, and, with a sigh, acquiesced in her opinion, that he could not with propriety bring the subject before Mrs. Eames for several months.

“Courage, courage, my friend,” she said to him, at parting; “you have waited patiently seven years; cannot you now wait half that number of months?”

CHAPTER III.

It was a clear, cold day in December; Mary Eames was to pass the afternoon with a friend.

“Hiram shall go for thee, Mary,” said Amy. “It is not best for thee to come alone.”

With many thanks for her friendly care, Mary started, expecting to be absent through the evening; but the clock had just struck three, when Hiram came with a summons for Mary to return.

“A friend has called upon thee,” said he, in answer to her anxious inquiry; for she feared some accident had happened at home.

Telling him he need not wait, she returned to the parlor, took leave of her friends, and directed her steps homeward. She supposed it must be a relation or friend from a distance, otherwise she should hardly have been interrupted in her visit.

Upon her arrival, she was introduced to Mr. Holt, from Edgeworth, an entire stranger, who soon told her he had come some forty miles to see her, and, as he must go a part of the way home that night, requested an interview with her at once.

Amy, to whom his errand was already known, immediately arose, and, having assisted Mary in taking off her cloak, left the room.

Judge, then, of the surprise of the widow, when told that Mr. Harrington, a person whose name even she had never heard, had requested him to see her in regard to her feelings connected with a second marriage; or whether she would be willing to enter again into that relation.

After a brief pause, she told him she was so taken by surprise she knew not what to say. Whenever she had thought of the subject at all, she had thought she should never marry again. She was now pleasantly situated, and certainly could give no encouragement to one whom she had never seen. She, however, listened to all that he said in behalf of his friend. His kindness to his wife, his upright conduct, his many excellencies of character, and, above all, his strong attachment to her, formed by what he had for years heard of her through reciprocal friends, were duly commented upon; and I should fail to tell the whole truth, did I not say that, before the commissioner departed, she found to her own astonishment that there might be circumstances which would render it her duty to change her resolution. Mr. Holt stated also that his friend was in very easy circumstances as regarded his pecuniary matters, and was both able and desirous of making her comfortable and happy.

She replied that money would make no difference to her in the choice of a companion, provided she should ever change her condition, compared with having a man of principle, and one who would be kind to her. This would be all-important in her case.

He then told her Mr. Harrington would probably visit her during the ensuing week.

Though the subject, so unexpectedly brought before her, was seldom absent from her thoughts by day or her dreams by night, yet she mentioned it to no one. She was not aware that Mr. Holt had imparted his errand to Amy, who, delighted with the favorable prospect before her friend, had recommended her in the highest terms. She was so modest in her opinion of herself that she could hardly realize that she had excited such interest in a stranger.

When two or three weeks passed, and she heard nothing more from Edgeworth, she determined to dismiss the matter at once from her thoughts.

But this was not so easy as she imagined. Mr. Harrington, sympathizing in her trials, interested in her on account of them, would have a place, and a prominent place, in her mind. She became restless and unsettled, and at last really sick.

Amy recommended a little change of air, and that she should visit her brother and sister for a few days.

“It is fine sleighing,” she said; “and Hiram will take thee there in an hour, where I can easily send for thee, in case anything happens,” she added, with rather a significant look.

With a reluctance to which she determined not to yield, she prepared to go; and, the next day being pleasant, she accepted Hiram’s offer, and went with him to her sister's, after receiving a promise to return for her in two or three days.

Towards the close of the next afternoon, as she sat sewing by the window, she saw Hiram drive into the yard accompanied by Amy. Her breath came quick and short, but she tried to look unconcerned as she went out to welcome them.

"Put on thy bonnet, my dear," were Amy's first words as she saw her. "We left company at home, and cannot tarry."

Poor Mary sat down, and, with her hands before her face, for a moment gave way to her feelings. Then, suddenly rising, found that her good friend had already informed her sister that Mary must go home, and nothing remained but for her to collect her work and prepare for the ride.

This was soon done, and they were on their way. She longed to ask some questions, yet dared not. But Amy waited not for questions. Turning to her companion, she said, abruptly—

"Thy friend looks feeble; he has not been out for a fortnight. He will need thy care and nursing to make him well."

Mary could not reply. She felt as if she should weep, not for sorrow, not for joy, but for—she knew not what.

Who shall attempt to describe the workings of a woman's heart?

Soon they were at their own door. She seemed in a dream. Hiram and Amy were upon the steps, and assisting her, before she hardly knew what she was about. She was intending to run for a few moments to her own room, when the parlor door opened, and John came into the entry, accompanied by a tall gentleman, whom he introduced as Levi Harrington, from Edgeworth. She made a low courtesy, and hastily retired.

Amy insisted she should go into her warm room to take off her outer garments, "For," said she, "thy hands are like ice."

At tea, Mary grew more calm, and was able to answer the questions addressed to her; and when afterwards Mr. Harrington requested an interview, she was much more composed than she had expected to be.

What was said upon that occasion can be more easily imagined than described. Though doubtless very interesting to the parties concerned, we are not at all sure it would be equally so to our readers, and will therefore only relate so much of it as was communicated by her, on the following morning, to her particular friend, the clergyman's wife, to whom she very properly went for advice.

After conversing with Mrs. Romaine for an hour, on topics of common interest, she suddenly covered her face and said, "I have something strange to tell you." She then related the circumstances with which we are acquainted.

"He has been waiting for me seven years, and now he has brought his certificate with him, and wishes to be married on Saturday."

"And this is Wednesday," exclaimed her friend, in surprise. "Can you tell whether you shall love him so quick?"

"Why, you know that I have been thinking of him for three weeks," replied Mary, with naïveté.

Then followed many questions as to his moral and religious character, his domestic habits, &c. &c., all of which were very favorably answered by Mary; and her friend saw, with surprise, that her mind was made up, though perhaps she did not acknowledge it to herself.

Still, she could not conscientiously advise her to accept his proposal without further consideration. She urged her to take a little trip to Edgeworth, visit her friends, and make inquiries concerning him; but there were strong objections on her part to adopting this course. He had come prepared to take her back with him; he could not wait; and she hated to disappoint him.

"But," suggested Mrs. Romaine, "if you should find, on your arrival, that he was not altogether such as you imagine, you might regret all your life that you had been so hasty."

"He thinks I shall not regret it," replied her companion.—(Oh, the trust of woman!)—"He thinks," continued she, "that it will be a good home for me; and my friends, where I am staying, like him very much."

After some more conversation, it was at length proposed by Mrs. Romaine that she should write to her friends, and request an immediate answer.

This advice was eagerly accepted, and Mary besought the aid of her friend in accomplishing it.

"You know what is proper; write just as you think best."

Mrs. Romaine complied; and, stating to Mrs. Eames's friend in Edgeworth what had occurred, asked her to send in reply whatever she knew of Mr. Harrington. The answer was to be directed to Mrs. Romaine, and was expected the next morning. She then invited Mary to call in the afternoon, and introduce Mr. Harrington to them. This was done, and the visit proved one of satisfaction to all parties.

True to her appointment, Mary called the next morning to see if there was an answer to the letter. None had been received, and the subject had occasioned Mrs. Romaine no small anxiety; but no advice was now necessary. The widow Eames was fully decided not to disappoint so faithful a suitor, and only wished her friends to approve her choice.

Busying herself about Mrs. Romaine's dress to hide her face, Mary asked—

"Now wouldn't you, if you were in my place, be married Saturday, as he wishes?"

Mrs. Romaine could not resist the pleading look, as she turned to reply, and said—

"I don't know but I should."

This was enough, the matter was settled; Mr. Harrington need not be longer harassed with doubt. Before she left her friend, all the arrangements for the wedding were made, and Mary returned to give her consent, and to pack her trunk.

Preparations now went briskly on. Friendly visits were made; presents received; trunks packed with great speed. The marriage was to be celebrated at a quarter before two, that they might be in season for the cars to take them to Edgeworth.

At the appointed time, Mr. Harrington and Mary, with her personal relatives and friends, made their appearance. She had just begun to realize the importance of the step she was about to take; but there is no time for regret now. The bridegroom and the bride take their places; the blessing is invoked; their hands are joined; the man of God pronounces the words which unite them for life; a prayer is offered; the benediction pronounced; and—they are gone.

* * * * *

In closing this sketch, I will only add that Mary found in Edgeworth, the home of her youth, calm and quiet happiness; and Mr. Harrington fully realized the bliss which he had so many years anticipated. Months rolled away, and their honeymoon continued to shine on them with increasing brightness. May it shine forever!

---

THE ITALIAN SISTERS.

BY HELEN HAMILTON.

PART I.

IN a small room in one of the poorer class of lodging-houses of Rome, sat a young and beautiful girl. The glowing loveliness of Italy was hers—the warm yet brilliant complexion, the dark expressive eyes, the wealth of raven hair—all were combined to render her an exquisite specimen of Roman beauty. She was clad in a rich bridal costume, and her dress of snowy satin and costly lace, ornamented with flowers and pearls, contrasted strangely with the aspect of the room she occupied. It was small, poorly furnished, and its only ornaments were a few colored drawings of Italian scenery hanging here and there upon the walls, and a large crucifix of ebony and alabaster which stood on a small table draped with colored stuff. An old guitar, with a portfolio of music, lay at the feet of the fair girl, as if she had been trying to while away the time by playing upon the instrument.

She was evidently waiting for some one. From time to time, as the roll of a coming carriage caught her ear, she sprang up and hastened to the window, but, always disappointed, turned away with a look of weariness to resume her seat. At last, after an hour's weary watch, a carriage stopped at the door, footsteps were heard ascending the stairs, the door was pushed open, and a young man entered the room followed by a priest. Uttering an exclamation of joy, the fair girl flew to meet the first, who greeted her with a smile and the words, "Well, dear Nina, have I made you wait long?" pronounced in Italian with a slight English accent.

"Oh, very long, Enrico! I was so tired; but now you are come, I am satisfied," she replied, smiling.

"Does your dress please you?" he asked, attentively surveying her. "I feared it was not handsome enough."

"It is beautiful," she answered, "only too beautiful for me."

"Nothing can be too beautiful for the future Lady Lyndon," he whispered, while a rosy blush overspread the fair features of his companion. "But where is Teresa?" he added, glancing around; "is she gone?"

"Yes, and all is secure," was the reply.

"Then come, I am impatient to call you my wife, carissima." She placed her hand in his, and he led her to the priest.

And now while the ceremony is proceeding, let us cast a look at the bridegroom.

He was tall and finely formed, with delicately cut features, large deep blue eyes, and a profusion of dark brown hair which wreathed itself in close curls around his head. He was handsomely dressed, and bore in his manners the trace of his rank, (Lord Lyndon was heir presumptive to an earldom,) yet an expression rested upon his handsome mouth which, though difficult to describe, caused an involuntary feeling of dislike in those who beheld him for the first time.

The ceremony was nearly ended, when the door was suddenly thrown open, and a young girl rushed in, her features, though wan and wasted with recent illness, glowing with excitement, and her whole frame trembling with emotion. "The Holy Virgin be praised!" she exclaimed; "I am not too late to save you, Nina!"

"To save me!" exclaimed Nina, a flush crimsoning her cheek; "from what? I am Lord Lyndon's wife."

"His wife? Oh! foolish girl, did you believe him?" asked the other. "This is an infernal snare, Nina. Look at that man," she continued, pointing to the priest, who, pale and trembling, leaned against the wall. "He is one of the lord's servants dressed up to trick you to your destruction. That is the reason why he insisted on a secret marriage; but his valet, more honest than his master, revealed to me the whole plot scarce an hour ago, and I hastened to save you."

"Nina, 'tis false!" exclaimed Lord Lyndon, angrily.

"I am his wife, Teresa; you have been deceived," said Nina, and throwing back her veil, she gazed with a look of confiding fondness into her lover's eyes.

"Read, deluded girl," replied Teresa, placing an open letter in her hand. She glanced over a few lines, an ashy paleness overspread her features, and with a moan of unutterable anguish, she sank fainting into the arms of her sister. "My lord, your evil purpose is foiled," said Teresa, calmly. "Will it please you, leave me?" and she pointed with a gesture of command to the door. Uttering an exclamation of rage and scorn, he rushed from the room, followed by the pretended priest, and the sisters were left alone.

PART II.

FIVE years have passed away since the events described in the first part of this tale, and our scene is no longer laid in the little room at Rome, but in the elegant boudoir of a titled lady in London.

The room was richly yet tastefully furnished. The delicate tints of the carpet and the satin-covered furniture harmonized well with the silvery hue of the paper that covered the walls. A few beautiful paintings, one an exquisite Madonna, the rest glowing Italian landscapes, were hung with an artist's care in the best lights, and in a recess stood one perfect statue, a graceful Hebe, from the magical chisel of Canova. Above the mantel-piece of Sienna marble hung one other painting; it was concealed by a curtain of black velvet, on which the words "La Mia Sorella" were embroidered in silver thread.

Seated at a marble table, which was drawn near the centre of the room, was a young and beautiful woman. Her large, black, brilliant eyes, and heavy braids of silken hair of that rich bluish black never seen except on a native of Italy, contrasted the dazzling whiteness of her broad and noble brow, and the soft yet rich tint of her cheek. Her dress of violet satin was cut so as to display the perfect contour of her ivory shoulders, which were farther set off by a berthe of black lace fastened with a diamond star. She was employed in looking over the contents of a small portfolio, covered with crimson velvet, with clasps and corners of gold studded with pearls, and filled with small pieces of paper, all in the same handwriting, and bearing the same signature. A smile curved her beautiful lips, a strange smile for a mouth so lovely; it was cold and bitter, more painful to look upon than a frown. Such was the Marchesa d'Agliano, the most beautiful woman in London. A servant announced "Lord Lyndon," and, closing the portfolio, she rose to receive him, the smile on her lip giving place to one of welcome. Five years had made but little change in the appearance of Lord Lyndon, except that he was still handsomer than when he won poor Nina's heart, and his manners had acquired additional grace. Claspings the offered hand of the Marchesa, he pressed it to his lips before he spoke; then drawing a chair close to hers, he said, "Well, Beatrice, to-day the year of my probation is ended. It is now exactly one year since the day I first told you I loved you; will you not give me a definite answer now?"

The Marchesa listened with the same cold and caustic smile playing upon her lips, and when he paused for a reply, without heeding his words, she said, "Lord Lyndon, I will tell you a little story." The lover looked surprised, but without heeding his astonished looks, she pressed the black heavy braids from his brow, and, after a moment's thought, began. Hitherto the conversation had been carried on in English, but now she spoke in Italian with a rapidity of enunciation that effectually precluded every attempt at interruption.

"Some years ago, my lord, there lived in Rome two orphan sisters. They were of noble birth, but poor, and they depended upon their talents for subsistence; the elder taught drawing, and the younger music. She was very beautiful, and very guileless, and the elder watched over her with all a mother's care, for she was the last being who claimed her love. She always accompanied her when she went to give her lessons, and guarded her with the watchfulness necessary in a land where beauty is almost a curse, but at last she fell sick, and her sister went forth alone to her daily tasks. She met, at the house of one of her pupils, a young foreigner; he was captivated by her beauty, and made her proposals, which she spurned with indignation; he then offered her his hand on condition that the marriage should be kept secret; she loved him, and she consented. But the valet of the young man sought out the elder, told her that her sister was about to become the victim of a pretended marriage performed by a false priest, and, as a proof of his assertions, showed her a letter which his master had given him to burn, a congratulation from some one as base as himself, on securing so easily the lovely prize. He indicated to her the house where the ceremony was to be performed; she hastened thither, and arrived in time to save her sister; but her heart was broken. Wealth and rank became theirs by the death of a distant relative, but all too late. My lord, look here." And rising from her seat, the lady drew aside the black velvet curtain, and Lord Lyndon looked once more upon the face of Nina. But how changed! The same brilliant eyes and glowing cheeks were there, but the lips that had ever greeted his coming with smiles wore an expression of deep yet patient sadness, and the very beauty of that fair face seemed like flowers strewed upon a corpse to hide by its loveliness the ravages of death. Lord Lyndon seemed violently agitated, and seizing the arm of the Marchesa, he exclaimed, "In pity, tell me, Beatrice, is she dead?"

She burst into a sardonic laugh. "Listen to this man!" she exclaimed; "he breaks the heart of a girl who truly loved him, and then asks, 'Is she dead?' She died in my arms scarce a year from the time you so cruelly deceived her. I am her sister; but as you never beheld my face but once, I can pardon you for not recognising in the Marchesa Beatrice Teresa d'Agliano the sister of your victim."

He did not seem to hear her, but stood gazing on the portrait, his lip quivering with painful emotion. "Beatrice," he at length said in a deep troubled tone, "I scarcely can hope you will believe my words, yet if ever remorse visited human heart, mine has felt its bitterest pangs. Were Nina living, my hand and heart should be hers; but, alas! I can give you no proofs of the sincerity of what I say. I dare no longer hope you will listen to my suit; I can no longer offer you my hand; I may only plead that you will pardon the bitter wrong I have inflicted on you, and that you will believe in the truth of my repentance."

"You can then feel remorse, contrition!" she exclaimed; "you, the cold-hearted libertine; you, the murderer of my sister! No, I cannot realize such a change."

"Then I must go unpardoned," he said, in a low tone.

Beatrice buried her face in her hand for a few moments; when she again raised her head, the scornful expression of her features had given place to one of sadness. "My lord," she said, "I believe you, and in that belief I renounce a project of vengeance treasured ever since my sister's death. The Italian count who nightly tempted you to the gaming table, and to whom you lost such immense sums, was my tool, for I sought to avenge my sister by taking from you what I believed every Englishman held dearer than life, money. Here," she continued, laying her hand upon the little velvet-covered portfolio, "lies all your wealth, and thus do I restore it to you."

She opened the portfolio, and, taking out the papers it contained, tore them into atoms; then, turning to Lord Lyndon, she said, "My lord, we part now forever. Farewell."

"Forever! Oh, not forever, Beatrice!" he exclaimed. "Your generous forbearance gave me hope; do not crush it at once."

"My lord, farewell," she repeated, extending her hand. He raised it to his lips, and then, with a look of passionate adoration, repeated her last words, "Farewell," and retired. As his last footstep died away, she turned towards the portrait. "Is not this the vengeance that would have gladdened thy heart, my sister?" she murmured.

It may have been the waving of the curtains, the flickering of the dying sunlight, but something like a smile flitted over the sad sweet face of Nina's portrait.

---

W O M A N .

BY W. L. TIFFANY.

ALL men in the society of women are romantic. Nature holds this quality to be the fittest garb for the occasion, and the onlookers stare that its plastic folds enwrap the uncouth as well as the graceful. Each, gentle or clownish, selects his Eve for the nonce, and devotedly clothes himself with an air. He feels that grace is becoming to the presence of beauty, and courtesy an excellence not to be left unperformed.

Among men, we are bored, angered, or pleased, as the case may be, but we never idealize. We find no man who absorbs our whole nature, in our admiration for his own. No male can fill our soul with a vision of beauty completed, or a dream of delight unalloyed; because, like us, he is male which suffices to keep us distant and forlorn. Resembling us, and we him, knowing our own vulgarity, we dread him. Competing with us continually through life, he wounds us often and sorely. We may not always call him brother, and he is not lovely in our eyes. However much we envy his superior energy, or action, we find sympathy or joy with but few of his kind: throughout the pages of history even, here and there one only.

The difference in sex is a ravishing riddle, to solve which our attempts at least never fail. The Sphinx, Nature, hides her secret, yet gives us woman, of whom we are born, by whom nurtured, and under whose tender care when saying "Thy will be done," we call Death somewhat robbed of his sting. It is certain that the admiration with which woman fills all mankind is somewhat a cunning and sleight of Nature, with a design to propagate our race: yet the spiritual-minded man finds it somewhat difficult to reconcile Nature's main object with his own paramount desire, which is to define and enjoy woman as unity and completion. At the best, the circle of his insight is circumscribed, and none of us may question the Infinite.

To see a beautiful woman appropriately costumed leaves the eye nothing to seek. It has found its ideal and panacea. Mountains, waterfalls, pictures, statues, Rome, and Vienna are all insignificant in comparison to her, and sicken us with their death and inanity. Radiant in her blessed beauty, perhaps inhabiting our dwelling, sitting near us at our meals, passing us in our walks, what satisfying pleasure possesses the soul! We would tempt any fate to find favor in her eyes. If forced to reflect, she is beyond our attainment, or exists for another, the tender and lingering melancholy felt in the heart is sweeter far than many a joy. Language overruns the heavens and earth for images that shall faithfully reflect her eyes and hair, the mould of her throat, the color of her lips, and the correctness of her shape. Finally, recognizing the soul as being the secret spring of beauty thus streaming through her, we are doubly and virtuously inspired and delighted. At this season, an heroic action is the most natural one; a sacrifice, if noble, most easy to undergo. We bid meanness and cowardice at once begone. We neither are shamefaced, nor do we lack anything. The conquering Carolus Magnus is then our equal only. The song and wisdom of a Shakspeare we have attained at once. Her beauty awakes our own. The miraculous light of her eyes transforms us to heroes and emperors.

Wherever a graceful, genial woman dwells, her home and vicinage are at once poetical. Her palace or cottage is an enchanting realm to us. The flowers and trees around partake of her loveliness, and reflect it variously and anew. The bare hills no longer seem dreary and irksome; a glad stateliness of her enwraps them and commands us. We penetrate the leafy valley and lonely glen, peopling the solitudes with the coy nymph, and doubting the poet's fairy brood no longer. Each spring and river is bereft of life denial, and the Undine is our warm and fleshly familiar.

It is because of this transforming spirit that Art so revels in the beauty surrounding woman, and everywhere seeks its immortal embodiment and fixidity in her form. All lovers are artists and poets, with passion and genius variously measured and striving. The dream of ecstasy completely possessing one, he shall travail with lifelong sweat and agony, that the wondrous beauty of his Beatrice may be revealed to us in words, colors, or stone, that all men may adore with him. The Medicean Venus, Raphael's Madonna, and the "Loves of the Poets," in thus enchaining our adoration, are symbols of our true religion. To have lived without loving, is to have lived negatively and slavishly. To have loved once and completely, is to have conquered the universe and bound it in chains. No fortune can be adverse while our condition simply is priceless and divine. Grief and terrors may threaten, yet we exult that our all-conquering passion will prevail. Though comfortless, landless, and desolate, have we not an imperial realm in the empyrean, where we walk in golden companionship with joys whose fullness suffices the soul to its uttermost desire? To banish a Dante from Florence with scorn and insult, is not the heavy misfortune to him it seems to others, for he shall build cities throughout all space fairer than any Florence, and Beatrice with her rewarding beauty shall beckon to him from each.

The soul as naturally craves love, as the invalid longs for his native air. Its solace and health it finds likewise therein; for the soul was born of love eternal, and the highest triumph of philosophy and religion is to teach its perfect reunion with its eternal type. Yet man so misjudges and demeans himself, that to acknowledge to an earnest love, or enrapturing desire, never so pure, is to own to a comical and witless thing, bringing naught save jeers and ridicule in its train. Hence when the fire of the soul burns purest and brightest within us, we seek a darkness or solitude, hoping there for the force, or fortune, to create or meet our shrine, that we may adore and enjoy unobserved.

---

SONG.

BY WM. M. BRIGGS.

I've been wand'ring—I've been wand'ring
Where the flowers are blooming fair,
With their petals turned to the summer light,
In the breath of the perfumed air;
Where the wild bird's lay through the sunny day
Rang out from the myrtle bowers;
Yet slowly the dim hours passed away
To my heart in that land of flowers.

I've been wand'ring—I've been wand'ring
By the side of quiet streams,
Whose murmurs brought to my soul the spell
That woke in my earliest dreams;
And the noisy brawl of the waterfall
Called me once more a boy:
Oh! the heart grows faint to idly paint
The glow of a vanished joy!

I've been wand'ring—I've been wand'ring
In the land of citron flowers;
In the southern clime where the moonlight falls
With a charm unknown to ours;
Where the dreamy spells of their haunted dells
Are broke by the bulbul's cry,
And the holy sign of the southern cross
Gleams out on the midnight sky.

Yet I come with a wakening heart once more,
Bold land of the northern blast!
For my spirit pines in the gorgeous glow,
And yearns for the dear old Past;
For the dear old Past and the dear old eyes
That glanced from the window pane;
For the wild delight of the winter's night,
And my native land again!

POETRY.

RECOLLECTION

OF AN ODD CHAPTER FROM A GERMAN NOVEL, READ MANY YEARS AGO.

A MAIDEN and her father,
A stranger, and their guide,
Wandered upon a mountain
That made the heaven its bride:
The morning hours were past and gone,
It was the high noontide.

Rare was the maiden's beauty—
Her father, noble, proud;
In silence rode they onward
Toward clime of snow and cloud—
While guide and stranger walked beside,
In meditation bowed.

Far spreads the right-hand valley,
And mountains meet the skies;
Their forms will clearly ever
At Mem'ry's call arise;
Overhanging cliffs and jutting rocks
Awaken soul-surprise.

The noontide hour was passing,
Nor was the summit passed;
The guide was all impatient—
For oft the mountain blast,
With awful power, upon those heights
White drifts in sudden cast.

It is, it is upon them!
They strive to brave its power—
But no; the beasts are wearied,
And from its fierceness cower;
The travellers cannot long withstand
The rigor of the hour!

Wild as the mountain torrent
Adown its rocky path—
The wildest, fiercest animal
No fiercer moments hath—
The mountain tempest o'er them roared,
Around them spent its wrath.

The lady, faint and weary,
Walked languidly and slow;
She walked beside her father,
Who scarce could stand or go—
While guide and stranger passed before
Amid the knee-deep snow.

And then the father slowly
Dropped, wearily and faint—
He cannot travel farther;
The maiden's sigh a plaint
Of more than weariness disclosed,
Yet uttered no complaint.

The guide took up, in kindness,
And bore the father on;
The traveller took the maiden,
Though he was weak and wan—

And on towards the shelter pressed,
Though hope seemed nearly gone.

Her form lay on his bosom,
Borne tenderly, I wis—
When he, with lip all fevered,
And flushed in weariness,
Upon her cold and pallid cheek
Pressed but one burning kiss.

And she, that high-born maiden,
Returned the stranger's kiss;
Amid the mountain tempest,
Like dream of summer bliss,
It cheered his weary soul to bear
On through the dreariness.

And when they reach the shelter,
Safe from the fearful storm,
The dark eyes of the maiden
Upon the stranger's form
With gratitude and friendship rest—
His heart beats fast and warm.

And then they part forever—
The bond that binds them breaks;
Yet on their spirit's vision
The mem'ry oft awakes
Of one who shared that peril-hour,
Near Switzer's mountain lakes.

Richland, N. Y., 1852.

M. B. W. H.

M A D E L I N E.

BY P. A. JORDAN.

In the still night, when the stars
Twinkle quaintly through the hours;
When the moon beams, dreaming, lay
O'er the daylight's threaded way,
Comes a vision to my heart
Of a sweet time long ago
Thou, O love! its empress art!
Thou dost all its joys bestow

In the shaded lane of yore,
With the green leaves bending o'er;
Near a crystal spring, o'ergrown
By deep velvet moss, a stone
Still marks the sacred spot,
Still reveals the chosen place
Where I found so much of joy,
'Neath the droopings of thy face.

There the song-bird sings to-day,
As of yore, his cheerful lay;
There the cricket sings fore'er
Through the summer hours: how dear
Was its plaintive song to thee,
Madeline! forever gone!
"Tis a mystic minstrelsy,
"Tis a sweet and holy song."

Thus, when silence wraps us round,
Tread I consecrated ground:
Tarry, as in days of yore,
On my childhood's flowery shore:
Happy in my soul to find,
'Mid the wreck of after years,
One summer spot to bind
My heart, and dry its tears.

Madeline! forever blest,
Nevermore to be distressed
By the feverish ills of life,
By its cares and heavy strife,
As, 'mid deserts far away,
Maidens worship one lone star—
So from earth I turn away
To thy dwelling-place afar.

Oh, sweet Madeline! once more
Meet my spirit on this shore;
Tarry by my side again;
Sing once more love's melting strain;
Drive this sadness from my heart
By one angel kiss of thine:
Lead my spirit where thou art,
Lest forever here I pine.

SUNSET MUSINGS.

BY JOHN M. EVANS.

THE purest hour of bliss that nature knows,
Is at the day's decline, when o'er the earth
Is shed a holy glow of calm content,
That mingles with the feelings of the soul
In sweetest union blent. The vesper hymns
Of woodland songsters fill the scented grove,
Where creeping vines o'erarching tree-tops bend
Beneath their purple load of luscious fruit,
While sephyræ with their gentle breath touch light
The dark green foliage of the ancient wood,
And sport with glee amid its lofty boughs.
The murmur of some distant waterfall,
With music low and sweet, steals on the ear,
And, with its magic tones, weaves round the heart
Its strongest spell of dreamy bliss.
The sinking sun, with radiant glory crowned,
Now flings o'er all his lingering lovely rays,
Whose silver feet dance on the ripples of Yon widening stream; while amber clouds, wreathed in Fantastic forms, impelled by evening's breath,
Lie cradled on the mountain's rugged brow;
Or, spreading forth their fleecy wings, mount up,
And with the night dissolve in silver dews.
The busy hum of labor now has ceased;
No longer ringing through the forest shades
Is heard the woodman's axe—but all is still;
And, as the lengthened shadows of the even
Are falling o'er the lee—when woodbine sweets
Float gently round—when twilight's curtain falls,
Peace, like a spirit of diviner birth,
Assumes her gentle sway, and, with soft tones
That oft have soothed the troubled heart, breathes forth
The holiest influence of her love, and wakes
Fresh feelings of the soul that long to bathe
Their plumed wings in that vast fount whose waves
Of purity for circling ages past
Have rolled around the throne of God above.

REMINISCENCES OF KILKEE BAY.

BY M. H. FORTUNE.

WHAT of thy billowy roll,
Thou dark Atlantic tide?
What of the bounding, foaming waves
That lash the vessel's side?
Mighty thou art, no doubt, and proud—
Sublimely grand in that spray-formed cloud;
Wondrous the phosphorescent gleams
Streaking thy breast with their fiery streams:
Glorious thou art, O wondrous sea,
Grand in thy wide immensity!
Fierce in thy stormy bursts, and fair
Glitter thy waves in the noonday glare!
But there is a spot where thy waters glide
Glist'ningly sweet in the summer tide;
Where thy shore-pent waves in their fury roar,
Deep 'mid the caves of a rocky shore;
Or gently ripple in sunny sleep—
There, there thou art fairest, O mighty deep!

I see thee there—yet far away
Ripple thy waves in that circling bay!
Whitened and soft is the sparkling sand
Where thou leavest the foam on its sloping strand;
Rugged the shore where the sea-birds flock
Back, in the eve, to their homes of rock;
Green is the verdure high o'er thy foam,
High o'er the steep of the sea-birds' home.
I've seen thee oft in thy hours of pride,
And watched thee gleam in the bright noontide:
But quivering moon-beams may rest in vain
On thy brightened wave in the far-out main;
The land-bird's tremulous wing may glide
Lightly and swift o'er the near-shore tide;
 wooing the eye to thy glorious spray,
Or the foam thou bear'st on thy swell away;
In vain, for far in that circled spot
Tremble the waves I have ne'er forgot;
Glitters thy tide in its brightest glee!
There, there thou art fairest, O mighty sea!

Of have I sat through the summer day
At the rocky edge of that land-kissed bay;
There, where the tide, with a bending sweep,
Mingles in peace with the far-out deep;
There, where the ledge-nooked cliff is crowned
Verdantly green all the summer round!
And the foaming waves at its rugged base
Circle the rocks in their damp embrace.
There, where the wave in its breaking fall
Bursts through the rocky and creviced wall;
Rushes in pride up the sloping steep,
Then fast recedes to its parent deep:
There have I sat till the evening shade
Mantled the spot where the late sun played;
Till the power of the o'erstrained eye was vain
To pierce through haze on the wide-spread main;
Till I lost the white sail far away,
And the cresting foam on the nearer bay—
And striven in vain through the spell to glide
That bound me fast to its dark'ning side;
Till the deepest shades of the eve came on,
And the faintest gleam from its breast had gone.
And even now, at this distant day,
Memory clings to that far-off bay,
Where still the waters in brightness leap—
There, there thou art fairest, O mighty deep!

BLESS THE CHILDREN.

BY H. MERRAN PARKE.

Bless the little children!
 Happy little children!
 Seeking for the daisies white,
 In the morning's early light;
 Rushing down the mossy dell,
 Where the blue-eyed violets dwell;
 Peeping low for berries rare,
 While the mists of floating hair
 Vell their eager, shining eyes,
 Like the wings of butterflies—
 Or, as I have seen at even
 On the radiant floor of heaven,
 Amber clouds all damp with dew
 Shut the trembling stars from view.

Love the little children!
 Darling little children!
 See them, with the good old Rover,
 Softly push each other over
 On the beds of scented clover
 See the little winsome Mary
 (One would deem her some lost fairy)
 Struggling 'mong the pink-eyed flowers
 As the blossoms fall in showers,
 Thrown by Charlie—wayward brother—
 While she, kind, and loving other,
 Lifts her from the nest of posies,
 Shakes her to let fall the roses!
 See them now beneath the pines,
 Wreathed with slender shining vines,
 Nestling in the feathery moss,
 With the leaves dropt thick across,
 And their little rosy feet
 Palling in their cool retreat!

Bless the little children!
 Angels' care, the children!
 All the pleasant summer day
 With the breezes hard at play,
 Coming now at twilight's dawn
 O'er the velvet-covered lawn,
 With their little sunburnt hands
 Clasping tight the flowery bands,
 Wreathed with joy and tender care
 For a mother's raven hair,
 Little Mary quickly springs
 Close into my arms, and clings,
 In a weary, soft embrace,
 And a little happy face,
 Lays a velvet cheek to mine—
 Lips like Shiraz' perfumed wine
 Lift their richness for a kiss,
 Filling all my soul with bliss.

Bless the little children!
 God's best gift—the children!
 Bless them—not my darlings only—
 But the suffering, poor, and lonely;
 All the little weary brood
 Tolling daily for their food,
 Strangers to the pleasant breeze
 Dancing in the hemlock trees,
 Knowing naught of joy-winged hours
 'Mong the dear bee-haunted flowers;
 In some hovel, dark and small,
 Where the sunbeams never fall,

Living all their childish years
 Rife with poverty and tears.

THE LADY OF HADDON HALL.

BY MRS. WM. A. SULLIVANT.

THE lady sat in the twilight—
 Her tears flowed fast and free:
 What cause had those drops of sorrow
 On such lovely cheek to be?
 The grief that ruffled her bosom—
 The frequent and stormy sighs—
 Shook the gems on its snow that clustered,
 Till they twinkled like serpents' eyes!

The lady sat in the twilight—
 The pride of the festival day;
 She had shone the fairest and brightest
 In her jewelled and rich array.
 Soft words in her ear had whispered
 Their homage to beauty's queen,
 The mistress of lordly Haddon,
 And many a broad demesne.

From flowers by the dew-fall freshened,
 Sweet odors were breathing round:
 The distant tinkle of fountains
 Stole up with a lulling sound
 And heavily-gorgeous hangings
 Swept, with their purple fold,
 Ebony, oak, and silver,
 And mirrors, with frames of gold.

Afar in the misty gleaming,
 Lay meadow and woodland wide;
 Broad parks, where the deer were grazing,
 Or bounding in antlered pride.
 Yet still from her downcast lashes
 Do the large drops slide and fall;
 Still doth she weep at twilight—
 The Lady of Haddon Hall.

She wreathed but vernal blossoms
 In her floating and sunny curls,
 When she tripped round the May-pole lightly,
 The simplest of village girls.
 She blushed at the shamefaced glances
 Of Robert, the farmer's son:
 Why scorns she the sweet lip-worship,
 From courtly flatterers won?

She left but a lowly cottage,
 In a valley far away,
 Where the hours were told by the sunlight,
 On the threshold stone that lay.
 The rustic pane was shaded
 By vines she had trained to cling,
 And a tree, 'mid whose waving branches
 The robins built in spring.

Paths in the green turf trodden,
 Sloped down to a brooklet bright.
 Where she hastened to fill her picher
 At the dawning of summer light.
 Why, when a dozen menials
 Spring now to obey her call,
 Doth she weep as her heart were bursting—
 The Lady of Haddon Hall?

THE DEW-DROP.

BY "MARY NEAL."

SWEET dew-drop, tell me why
Thou left'st thy home in yon blue sky,
Thy lovely Iris-home,
And to this weary world art come?

Bright drop, didst thou not know
'Twas filled with anguish, sin, and woe?
That naught so pure or fair,
But must its pain and sorrow share?

If thou shouldst make thy home
Within the lily's pearly dome,
(And meet, sweet drop, it were,
That thou shouldst dwell in home so fair,)

Some one would break the stem,
And rudely shake thee hence, sweet gem;
Then tread thee to the earth,
As though thou wert of little worth.

Or if thou chose to dwell
Within the violet's azure bell,
(And lovelier home, I ween,
Was never on this dark earth seen,)

Some careless passer-by
Would crush the flower without a sigh,
And thus of every charm
Thee and thy lovely bower disarm.

Or if thou shouldst prefer
To deck the waving gossamer,
And on its fairy threads
To string thy tiny diamond beads—

Some rude blast, sweeping by,
Would rend the thread that floats on high,
And scatter down thy pearls,
To be o'ertrud by passing churls.

I had a dew-drop, bright
As ever shone on earthly light,
And shed upon my brow
A lovelier beam than diamond's glow

Hath ever thrown around
The fairest brow that e'er was crowned;
For 'twas the light of Love—
A bright reflection from above.

But, transient as 'twas bright,
It soon was taken from my sight
Up to a heavenly home,
And sparkles now in yon blue dome.

Thus, all things bright and pure
Must, while in this dark world, endure
Their meed of earthly woes,
Until in Heaven they find repose.

Then, dew-drop, tell me why
Thou left'st thy home in yon blue sky,
Thy beauteous Iris-home,
And to this desert earth art come?

Lady, dost thou not know
There is a balm for every woe,
To draw thy hopes above,
And fix them on a Father's love?

My Father sent me here,
Only as His love-messenger,
To raise a drooping flower,
That would have faded in an hour:

And, though I fall to earth,
His power again will call me forth,
A brighter, lovelier gem,
To deck his rainbow diadem.

And when I home return,
My heart with gratitude will burn
To Him who gave me power
To call to life so fair a flower.

Oh! often doth He send Me and my sisters bright, to tend
The flowers that bloom on earth,
And in their hearts His love call forth.

'Twas thus thy dew-drop came,
And kindled in thy heart a flame
Of love, that could not die—
Then left thee for its native sky.

And thus thy heart, which twined
Round things of earth, is now enshrined
In yon bright heaven above,
Where dwells this blossom of thy love.

Now, lady, know'st thou why
I left my home in yon blue sky,
My lovely Iris-home,
And to this weary world am come?

And seest thou not that He
But sent thine angel-one to thee,
To draw thy hopes above,
And fix them on a Father's love?

STANZAS.

BY A STRAY WAIF.

WHEN fortune, with relentless frown,
O'erthrows the work of years,
Why sink, sad soul, despairing down
In unavailing tears?
Will tears restore one fallen leaf,
Revive one withered flower,
Or give the careworn breast relief
In that embittered hour?

Ah no! A squalid usurer,
Grief adds to every woe;
'Mid brooding gloom, sees phantoms stir,
And formless perils grow.
Who would a deadly adder press,
Enraptured, to his breast?
Then why, sad soul, the grief careers
That stings thee from thy rest?

Away with grief! In evil hour,
Give not thy sorrow sway;
Let hope, with its angelic power,
Point to a brighter day.
O'er buried joys fresh flow'rets spring,
To cheer the heart bereft;
Then wheresoever to dead treasures cling,
While life and hope are left!

WORK-TABLE COVER.

Materials.—Six shades of scarlet 4-thread Berlin wool, six skeins of each shade; three shades of blue green, five skeins of each; five shades of amber, three skeins of each; the lightest to be a bright lemon, the darkest deep claret; two skeins of middle tint violet or lilac wool. Two reels of Evans's boar's head drab cotton, No. 6. Steel crotchet hook, No. 16.

1st row.—Darkest shade of scarlet, this cover must not be worked tightly, but worked so that the cotton and wool shall work easily together; the size when worked will be twenty-seven inches in diameter. Make a chain of 9 stitches, unite the ends, make 3 long under the chain,* 3 chain, 3 more long under the same, repeat from,* 3 times more, 3 chain, unite and draw the wool to the back, cut it off and tie it securely, this must be done at every row.

2d row.—Next shade,* 3 long under the 3 chain, 3 chain, 3 more long under the same chain, 3 chain, repeat from,* 4 times more.

3d row.—Next shade,* 3 long under the 3 chain between the 6 long stitches, 3 chain, 3 more long under the same chain, 3 chain, dc under the next 3 chain, 3 chain, repeat from,* 4 times more.

4th row.—Next shade,* 3 long under the 3 chain between the 6 long stitches, 3 chain, 3 more long under the same, 5 chain, dc on dc, 5 chain, repeat from,* 4 times more.

5th row.—Next shade, 3 long under the 3 chain between the 6 long stitches, 5 chain, 3 more long under the same chain, 5 chain, dc into the third loop from the last long stitch in last row, 5 chain, dc into third loop from dc stitch in last row, 5 chain, repeat from beginning, 4 times more.

6th row.—Lightest shade, 3 long under the 3 chain, 5 chain, 3 more long under the same chain, 5 chain, dc into centre of 5, 5 chain, dc into centre of 5, 5 chain, dc into centre of 5, 5 chain, repeat from beginning, 4 times more.

7th row.—Commence again with the darkest shade, 3 long under the 5 chain between the 6 long stitches, 5 chain, 3 more long under the same chain, 5 chain, dc into centre of 5, 5 chain, dc into centre of 5, 5 chain, dc into centre of 5, 5 chain, dc into centre of 5, 5 chain, repeat from * 4 times more.

8th row.—Next shade, 3 long under the 5 chain between the 6 long stitches at the point, 5 chain, 3 more long under the same chain, 5 chain, dc into centre of 5 chain, 5 chain, dc into centre of 5 chain, 3 chain, 3 long under the next 5 chain, 3 chain, 3 more long under the same chain, 3 chain, dc into centre of 5 chain, 5 chain, dc into centre of 5 chain, 5 chain, repeat from beginning.

9th row.—Next shade, 3 long under the 5 chain at the point, 5 chain, 3 more long under the same chain, 5 chain, dc into centre of 5, 5 chain, dc into centre of 5, 5 chain, 3 long under the 3 chain between the 6 long stitches, 5 chain, 3 more long under the same chain, 5 chain, dc into centre of 5, 5 chain, dc into centre of 5, 5 chain, repeat from beginning.

10th row.—Next shade, 3 long under the 5 chain at either point, 5 chain, 3 long under the same chain, 5 chain, dc into centre of 5, 5 chain, dc into centre of 5, 5 chain, dc into centre of 5, 5 chain, repeat from beginning.

11th row.—Next shade same as last row, only making 5 chain, dc into centre of 5 additional.

12th row.—Lightest shade, same as last row, only making 5 chain, dc into centre of 5 additional.

13th row.—Darkest shade of green. Begin on a short point, 3 long under the 5 chain, 5 chain, 3 long under the same chain,* 5 chain, dc under centre of 5, repeat from,* 5 times more, 7 chain, dc under the 5 chain at the top of the point, 7 chain, dc under centre of next 5, 5 chain, † dc under centre of next 5, 5 chain, repeat from † 4 times more, then repeat from beginning.

14th row.—2d shade of green, commence at a point with the dc stitch, make 3 long into the space under the dc stitch, 5 chain, 3 more long into the same space, 5 chain, dc under centre of 7, 5 chain,* dc under centre of 5, 5 chain, repeat from,* 5 times more, 3 long under the 5 chain at the top of the point, 5 chain, 3 long under the same chain, 5 chain, † dc under centre of 5, 5 chain, repeat from, † 5 times more, 5 chain, dc under 7 chain, 5 chain, repeat from beginning.

15th row.—Lightest green, 3 long under the 5 chain at the top of the point, 5 chain, 3 more long under the same chain, 5 chain,* dc under the 5 chain, 5 chain, repeat from,* 7 times more, then repeat from beginning.

16th row.—Drab cotton, dc on the 1st of the 6 long stitches at the point, 3 chain, dc under the 5 chain, 5 chain, dc under the same chain, 3 chain, dc on the last of the long stitches, 3 chain,* dc under the 5 chain, 3 chain, repeat from* 9 times more, then repeat from beginning.

17th row.—Cotton, 5 long under the 5 chain at the point, 3 chain,* dc into the centre stitch of the 3 chain, 3 chain, repeat from,* 11 times more, then repeat from beginning.

18th row.—Cotton, 7 long, the first into the first loop beyond the 5 long in last row, 7 chain, 1 long into the centre loop of the first 3 chain,* 5 chain, miss 1 chain of 3, 1 long into the centre loop of the second 3 chain, repeat from,* 4 times more, 7 chain, repeat from beginning.

19th row.—Cotton, 9 long, the first into the first loop beyond the 7 long in last row, 7 chain, dc on first long stitch,* 5 chain, 1 long on long, repeat from,* 3 times more, 5 chain, dc on next long stitch, 7 chain, repeat from beginning.

20th row.—Cotton, dc on the first long stitch, 5 chain, dc into 4th loop, 5 chain, dc on last long stitch, 5 chain, dc on dc, 5 chain,* 1 long on long, 5 chain, repeat from,* 3 times more, dc on dc, 5 chain, repeat from beginning.

21st row.—Cotton, 5 long under the first 5 chain on the top of the long stitches, 3 chain, 5 long under the next 5 chain, 7 chain, dc on second dc stitch, 4 chain, 1 long on long, 4 chain, 7 long, the first on next long, 4 chain, 1 long on long, 4 chain, dc on dc, 7 chain, repeat.

22d row.—Cotton, 5 long under the 3 chain at the top of the point, 5 chain, dc on last long stitch, 5 chain, dc on dc, 4 chain, 6 long, the first on next long, 5 chain, 6 long, the first on last long, 4 chain, dc on dc, 5 chain, dc on first long stitch, 5 chain, repeat.

23d row.—Cotton, dc on the first dc stitch on the point, 3 chain, 5 long under the 5 chain, 5 chain, 5 more long under the next 5 chain, 3 chain, dc on dc, 5 chain, 1 long on next dc, 4 chain, 1 long on long, 4 chain, 7 long, the first into fifth loop, 4 chain, 1 long into 5 loop, 4 chain, 1 long on dc stitch, 5 chain, repeat from beginning.

24th row.—Darkest amber, 7 long, the first into the first loop beyond the first 5 long on the point, 5 chain, 7 long, the first into fourth loop, 4 chain, 1 long on long, 4 chain, 6 long, the first on next long, 5 chain, 6 long, the first into sixth loop, 4 chain, 1 long on long, 4 chain, repeat.

25th row.—Next shade amber, begin at the point, 9 long, the first to come in the first loop beyond the 7 long in last row, 5 chain, 9 long, the first into fourth loop, 7 chain, dc on the first of the 6 long, 7 chain 7 long, the first on the last of the 7 long, 7 chain, dc on the last of the 6 long, 7 chain, repeat.

26th row.—Next shade amber, 5 long, the first on the second of the 7 long in last row, 5 chain, dc into fifth loop, 7 chain, 11 long, the first into sixth loop from dc stitch in last row, 5 chain, 11 long, the first into fourth loop, 7 chain, dc into third loop from dc stitch in last row, 5 chain, repeat.

27th row.—Next shade amber, 3 long, the first into the second of the 5 long in last row, 5 chain, dc into the fourth loop, 5 chain, dc into third loop from dc stitch in last row, 5 chain, 13 long, the first into fourth loop, 5 chain, 13 long, the first into fourth loop, 5 chain, dc into fourth loop, 5 chain, dc into third loop from dc stitch in last row, 5 chain, repeat.

28th row.—Lightest amber, dc on the second stitch of the 3 long in last row, 7 chain, miss 1 chain of 5, dc into centre of 5, 7 chain, 14 long, the first into the fifth loop, 6 chain, 14 long, the first on first long, 7 chain, dc into centre loop of the 5 chain, 7 chain, repeat.

29th row.—Violet wool, begin on the first 14 long stitches, 1 long, 2 chain, 1 long into every third loop, repeat this till the end of the long stitches, 5 chain, dc into fourth loop, 5 chain, 3 dc stitches under the next 7 chain, 3 chain, 3 dc stitches under the next 7 chain, 5 chain, do into fourth loop from dc stitch in last row, 5 chain, repeat.

30th row.—Cotton, dc on first long stitch,* 5 chain, dc on next long stitch, repeat from,* 10 times more, in all 12 times, 5 chain, dc into third loop, 5 chain, dc on dc, 5 chain, do into third loop, 5 chain, dc on first dc, 5 chain, do into fourth loop, 5 chain, dc into fourth loop, 5 chain, dc into third loop, 5 chain, dc on dc, 5 chain, dc into third loop, 5 chain, repeat from beginning.

31st row.—Cotton, dc on the centre of the first chain of 5 nearest the first long stitch in 29th row,* 5 chain, dc into centre of 5, repeat from,* 10 times more, then 3 chain, dc into centre of 5, repeat this 8 times more, then 5 chain, repeat from beginning.

32d row.—Cotton, 1 long into the centre loop of the first 5 chain, 4 chain, 1 long into centre loop of next 5 chain, repeat this till there are 11 chains of 4, then 2 chain, 1 long into the centre loop of the 3 chain till there are 10 chains of 2, then 4 chain, and repeat from beginning, the 4 chain is included in the 11 chains of 4, therefore in the first commencement there will be only 10 chains of 4, afterwards 11.

33d row.—Darkest green wool, 3 long under the first 4 chain, 3 chain, 3 long under the same chain, 3 chain, dc on second long stitch, 3 chain, miss 1 chain, of 4, 3 long under next 4 chain, 3 chain, 3 long under the same 3 chain, dc on second long stitch, 3 chain, miss 1 chain of 4, 3 long under next 4 chain, 3 chain, 3 long under the same 3 chain, dc under the 2 chain,* 5 chain, miss 1 chain of 2, do under next two chain, repeat from,* 3 times more, then 3 chain, repeat from beginning.

34th row.—Second shade of green,* 3 long under the 3 chain between the long stitches, 4 chain, 3 more long under the same, 3 chain, dc on dc, 3 chain, repeat from,* 3 times more, (the last time omitting the 3 chain, dc on dc, 3 chain,) working instead† 5 chain, dc on dc, repeat from† 4 times more, 5 chain, repeat from beginning.

35th row.—Lightest green, same as last row only making 4 chain, dc on dc, 4 chain instead of 3.

36th row.—Third shade of Scarlet reckoning from the lightest shade,* 3 long under the 4 chain between the 6 long stitches in last row, 4 chain, 3 more long under the same, 5 chain, 1 long on dc, 5 chain, repeat from,* 3 times more, the last time omitting the 5 chain, dc on dc, 5 chain, working instead† 5 chain, dc on dc, repeat from,† 4 times more, 5 chain, repeat from beginning.

37th row.—Next shade scarlet,* 3 long under the 4 chain in last row, 5 chain, 3 more long under the same, 5 chain, 1 long on long, 5 chain, repeat from,* 3 times more, the last time omitting the 5 chain, 1 long on long, working instead† 5 chain, dc on dc, repeat from,† twice more, 5 chain, 1 long on next dc stitch, 5 chain, repeat from beginning.

38th row.—Lightest scarlet, same as last row only making 4 long stitches instead of 3.

39th row.—Cotton,* 1 long on the first of the 4 long, 5 chain, 1 long on last of the 4 long, 5 chain, 1 long into third loop, 5 chain, 1 long on first long, 5 chain, 1 long on last long, 5 chain, repeat from,* 3 times more, 5 chain, dc on long stitch, 5 chain, dc on dc, 5 chain, dc on dc, 5 chain, dc on dc, 5 chain, dc on long stitch, 5 chain, repeat from beginning.

40th row.—Cotton,* 1 long into the centre loop of the 5 chain over the first 4 long stitches, 5 chain, 1 long into the centre loop of next 5 chain, 5 chain, 1 long into same loop, 5 chain, 1 long into centre loop of next 5 chain, 5 chain, 1 long into same loop, 5 chain, 1 long into centre loop of next 5 chain, 5 chain, repeat from,* 3 times more, the last time make 7 chain instead of 5, do on the second dc stitch, 5 chain, dc on next dc, 5 chain, dc on dc, 5 chain, dc on dc, 5 chain, dc on dc, 7 chain, repeat from beginning.

41st row.—Cotton, 1 long into the centre loop of the first 7 chain, 5 chain,* 1 long into centre loop of the 5 chain, 5 chain, repeat from,* 4 times more (omitting the 5 chain the last time) 3 chain, dc into centre loop of next 5 chain, 3 chain, repeat from the first,* 3 times more, (the last time omitting the 3 chain) making 5 instead, 1 long into the centre loop of the 7 chain, 7 chain, dc on third dc stitch, 7 chain, repeat from beginning.

When finished, damp it well and lay it between linen folded double, then place a heavy weight upon it to cover the whole surface; let it remain a day and night.

SHAVING TIDY.

Materials.—No. 16 Evans's boar's head cotton. No. 4 Penelope hook.

1st row.—Make 180 chain, turn back, 1 l into 9th loop, in the next row this forms 1 sq by working the 1st l into the 5th loop of the 8 ch, now 2 ch, 1 l into 3d loop till there are 58 sq.

2d.—1 row all squares.

3d.—6 sq, 3 l, 51 sq.

4th.—5 sq, 3 l, 3 sq, 15 l, 44 sq.

5th.—5 sq, 3 l, 2 sq, 9 l, 3 sq, 3 l, 43 sq.

6th.—6 sq, 12 l, 4 sq, 3 l, 43 sq.

7th and 8th.—14 sq, 3 l, 43 sq.

9th.—13 sq, 3 l, 24 sq, 3 l, 19 sq.

10th.—8 sq, 15 l, 7 sq, 12 l, 3 sq, 3 l, 5 sq, 9 l. 3 sq, 3 l, 3 sq, 18 l, 9 sq.

11th.—6 sq, 6 l, 1 sq, 3 l, 1 sq, 6 l, 5 sq, 6 l, 2 sq,

15 l, 5 sq, 3 l, 2 sq, 6 l, 2 sq, 3 l, 2 sq, 3 l, 5 sq, 6 l, 8 sq.

12th.—5 sq, 6 l, 2 sq, 3 l, 1 sq, 6 l, 4 sq, 6 l, 4 sq, 3 l, 3 sq, 3 l, 3 sq, 6 l, 1 sq, 3 l, 1 sq, 9 l, 2 sq, 3 l, 3 sq, 3 l, 3 sq, 6 l, 7 sq.

13th.—5 sq, 6 l, 2 sq, 3 l, 1 sq, 6 l, 4 sq, 6 l, 4 sq, 3 l, 2 sq, 3 l, 4 sq, 6 l, 1 sq, 3 l, 10 sq, 6 l, 2 sq, 6 l, 7 sq.

14th.—5 sq, 6 l, 1 sq, 6 l, 1 sq, 6 l, 1 sq, 3 l, 2 sq, 6 l, 3 sq, 6 l, 1 sq, 6 l, 4 sq, 6 l, 1 sq, 3 l, 10 sq, 6 l, 2 sq, 6 l, 7 sq.

15th.—5 sq, 6 l, 2 sq, 3 l, 1 sq, 9 l, 3 sq, 6 l, 4 sq, 3 l, 1 sq, 9 l, 3 sq, 6 l, 1 sq, 3 l, 1 sq, 3 l, 8 sq, 6 l, 2 sq, 6 l, 7 sq.

16th.—5 sq, 6 l, 1 sq, 6 l, 1 sq, 6 l, 4 sq, 6 l, 3 sq, 6 l, 1 sq, 6 l, 4 sq, 6 l, 1 sq, 6 l, 9 sq, 6 l, 2 sq, 6 l, 7 sq.

17th.—5 sq, 6 l, 2 sq, 3 l, 1 sq, 6 l, 4 sq, 6 l, 4 sq, 3 l, 1 sq, 6 l, 4 sq, 6 l, 1 sq, 3 l, 10 sq, 6 l, 2 sq, 3 l, 8 sq.

18th.—5 sq, 6 l, 2 sq, 3 l, 1 sq, 6 l, 4 sq, 6 l, 4 sq, 3 l, 1 sq, 3 l, 5 sq, 6 l, 1 sq, 3 l, 2 sq, 3 l, 7 sq, 3 l, 2 sq, 3 l, 3 sq, 3 l, 5 sq.

19th.—5 sq, 6 l, 2 sq, 3 l, 1 sq, 9 l, 1 sq, 3 l, 1 sq, 9 l, 3 sq, 15 l, 3 sq, 9 l, 4 sq, 3 l, 3 sq, 18 l, 4 sq, 3 l, 5 sq.

20th.—5 sq, 9 l, 1 sq, 6 l, 1 sq, 9 l, 3 sq, 33 l, 2 sq, 3 l, 1 sq, 9 l, 2 sq, 6 l, 1 sq, 3 l, 3 sq, 21 l, 6 sq.

21st.—6 sq, 9 l, 2 sq, 3 l, 1 sq, 3 l, 5 sq, 15 l, 4 sq, 3 l, 1 sq, 3 l, 3 sq, 12 l, 3 sq, 3 l, 5 sq, 12 l, 7 sq.

22d.—11 sq, 3 l, 46 sq.

23d and 24th.—58 sq.

25th.—5 sq, 3 l, 3 sq, 3 l, 48 sq.

26th.—4 sq, 3 l, 1 sq, 9 l, 49 sq.

27th.—3 sq, 3 l, 35 sq, 3 l, 18 sq.

28th.—3 sq, 6 l, 33 sq, 3 l, 19 sq.

29th.—4 sq, 12 l, 2 sq, 6 l, 1 sq, 6 l, 4 sq, 6 l, 5 sq, 6 l, 4 sq, 6 l, 1 sq, 6 l, 1 sq, 3 l, 3 sq, 3 l, 3 sq, 12 l, 4 sq, 3 l, 3 sq.

30th.—4 sq, 3 l, 2 sq, 3 l, 1 sq, 3 l, 1 sq, 3 l, 2 sq, 3 l, 3 sq, 3 l, 1 sq, 3 l, 3 sq, 6 l, 1 sq, 3 l, 3 sq, 3 l, 1 sq, 3 l, 2 sq, 3 l, 1 sq, 3 l, 3 sq, 3 l, 2 sq, 6 l, 1 sq, 21 l, 3 sq.

31st.—4 sq, 3 l, 2 sq, 3 l, 3 sq, 3 l, 2 sq, 3 l, 5 sq, 3 l, 3 sq, 3 l, 2 sq, 3 l, 5 sq, 12 l, 1 sq, 3 l, 3 sq, 3 l, 1 sq, 6 l, 3 sq, 15 l, 4 sq.

32d.—4 sq, 3 l, 2 sq, 3 l, 3 sq, 3 l, 1 sq, 6 l, 1 sq, 3 l, 3 sq, 3 l, 1 sq, 3 l, 1 sq, 3 l, 1 sq, 6 l, 1 sq, 6 l, 1 sq, 3 l, 3 sq, 3 l, 1 sq, 3 l, 2 sq, 3 l, 2 sq, 6 l, 1 sq, 6 l, 4 sq, 3 l, 7 sq.

33d.—5 sq, 6 l, 4 sq, 6 l, 1 sq, 6 l, 4 sq, 6 l, 2 sq, 6 l, 1 sq, 6 l, 4 sq, 6 l, 4 sq, 6 l, 1 sq, 3 l, 1 sq, 3 l, 1 sq, 3 l, 1 sq, 21 l, 5 sq.

34th.—42 sq, 3 l, 2 sq, 3 l, 1 sq, 21 l, 4 sq.

35th.—42 sq, 3 l, 2 sq, 6 l, 1 sq, 3 l, 4 sq, 6 l, 3 sq.

36th.—20 sq, 3 l, 21 sq, 3 l, 3 sq, 21 l, 1 sq, 3 l, 3 sq.

37th.—38 sq, 3 l, 2 sq, 3 l, 5 sq, 24 l, 3 sq.

38th.—39 sq, 6 l, 4 sq, 3 l, 7 sq, 3 l, 4 sq.

39th.—45 sq, 6 l, 2 sq, 6 l, 2 sq, 3 l, 4 sq.

40th.—45 sq, 12 l, 1 sq, 9 l, 5 sq.

41st and 42d.—Two rows of squares.

Now work 3 dc into every space on three sides, but not on the side above the top of the letters, making 7 dc at each corner.

Border. 1st row.—Begin at the side where the letter S is, 3 l the first into first loop, 3 ch, 3 l the first into fourth loop, repeat this till within 4 loops of the corner, then in the corner loop make 3 l, 3 ch, 3 more l into same loop, now 3 ch, miss 3 loops, then 3 l the first into fourth loop, now repeat till the corner loop of next corner, then 3 ch, then 3 l into the same loop in which the last of the 3 l was worked, now 3 ch, 3 l, the first into fourth loop and repeat.

2d.—When at the end, turn back, work 3 l on l, 3 ch, repeat; at the corner, after the last 3 l and 3 ch, make 3 l under the 3 ch at corner, 3 ch, 3 more l under same, 3 ch, 3 l on l, repeat.

3d.—Turn back and work the same.

4th.—Turn back, dc on the first of the l stitches,* 5 ch, 3 dc, under the 3 ch, repeat from*.

5th.—Turn back, 6 ch, 3 dc on the dc, repeat.

6th.—Turn back, 7 ch, 3 dc on dc, repeat.

Now, along the top work a row of extra long stitches, made by twisting the cotton twice over the hook instead of once, beginning on the dc stitches of the border, and working 5 l stitches across the width of the border at regular spaces, then 1 l, 2 ch, 1 l on every l across the squares, terminating with 5 l in the width of the border.

Now 3 dc into every space between the l stitches, then crochet the two pieces together on the right side of the work, or sewing will do as well. If the tidy should require washing, let it now be done, and pressed between a double linen cloth, under a heavy weight; when dry, line it with colored cambric, omitting the border; double it in half, and run a small tuck at the bottom of the extra l stitches; in this tuck insert a narrow piece of whalebone, not quite so long as the work, and secure it at both ends; get a yard of satin ribbon, place a pin in the centre, and on one side of this pin sew on to the ribbon some pieces of old linen fringed about 3 inches in width, and 8 inches long; if this is doubled over the ribbon, it will make each piece 4 inches long; sew then on the other side of the pin some soft chamois leather the same width and length, now place it in the centre of the tidy, draw the ribbon over, and tie it in a bow at the back. This should be laid on the toilet-table, and not hung up, it will have the appearance of a book.

PLATES OF WINDOW DRAPERY.

(See Cut.)

In another month, watering-places will be deserted, and thrifty housewives will be removing what Dickens, in his "Bleak House," so cleverly calls the "drawing-room pinafors and curl papers." Brown Holland will be consigned to the linen chest for the winter, and well-papered cornices will shine forth in undiminished lustre. In anticipation of this annual house-cleaning and refurbishing, Mr. Carryl has prepared two elegant designs for parlor-window drapery.

No. 1 is distinguished for the peculiar elegance of the cornice and lambrequin; the first having wreaths of fine design and execution surmounting the heavy burnished bar which forms the base. From this depends a lambrequin with a new design, being a simple centre-piece, hung with rich fringe, which also depends from the cornice itself. The curtains are of satin laine, a deep contrast of maroon color and blue; the fringe, of course, matching it in hue. It is bordered with a wide gimp, and has a novel arrangement of pulleys and cords, by which it can be drawn back entirely from the window, if the room is too much shaded—or, as it sometimes happens, pictures require a stronger light—leaving the lace curtain and lambrequin only to obstruct the view. This is a most admirable arrangement, as our readers will see, if they consider the matter, and one that removes almost the only objection that is ever urged against drapery curtains. It will be noticed that the cords and tassels attached to the lambrequin are very elegant; those looping back the drapery are made to correspond in style and color. The lace curtain is slightly full, and of a light and graceful design. No heavy curtains are now in use without one of lace or muslin to soften the effect.

No. 2 is in quite a different style, the cornice being lighter, and graceful as well as elegant in shape, the curved line being preferred by many. We would have our lady readers notice particularly the heavy cords and tassels, of Louis Fourteenth style, which we have attempted to describe to them in an earlier notice of Mr. Carryl's establishment. They are almost massive in weight, and yet are finished as carefully as the most delicate lace gimp intended for a lady's dress. The central pendant is particularly tasteful, and will, in style, take the place of the lambrequin. The drapery is of bracetelle gold and green, shading in stripes as it is gathered back in full fluted folds. It is lined with white India silk, and the edge is finished with a heavy green and gold cord, instead of a gimp. The lace curtain is a very rich foliage pattern, in application work, the border running around the piece.

Mr. Carryl has imported an Oriental or palm pattern, also in application, which surpasses anything we have ever seen for richness of design and execution.

The rose is also a very beautiful style, rich wreaths of buds and foliage forming the centre, and one of still more delicate work, making a border, fine enough for a lady's robe, or even undersleeves.

We shall have occasion, in a future number, to give other new fall styles, and more particularly designs for bed-draperies and chamber windows.

KNITTED BERRIES AND FRUIT.

THE YEW AND ITS BERRIES.

BERRIES.

As they have a kind of waxy appearance, it is preferable to make them always in wool; but if the leaves were made of fine chenille, instead of wool, a branch of yew with its berries would be a very handsome ornament for a winter bonnet.

Cast on nine stitches on three needles (No. 20); three stitches on each needle, with drab Berlin wool split in two; knit one plain round, fasten on a bright pinkish scarlet shade of Berlin wool split, work one more plain round; in the next, increase one stitch at the beginning of every needle; knit four or five plain rounds, and cast off all the stitches. Cover a piece of leto, or very fine wire, with the thread of the same scarlet wool; sew this round the scarlet edge of the little cup just made; when the two ends of the wire meet, continue to sew one of them round the edge, so as to bring it exactly opposite to the other; turn down both ends inside the cup, make a little ball of drab Berlin wool, or cotton wool covered with drab silk, about the size of a young green pea; place it in the scarlet cup, gather the drab stitches; twist the wires together to make a stem, and cover it with green wool.

LEAVES.

If chenille is used, as it can be procured stiffened with wire, it will be sufficient to fold the chenille in two for each leaf, and tie one leaf alternately on each side of the branch; after ten or twelve leaves, place one berry and begin another similar bough. The boughs are afterwards added together in the same manner as the leaves have been, that is to say, one at the top, and the others alternately on each side of the branch.

If Berlin wool is used for the leaves, cover with green wool, split a few inches of the finest leto that you can find; take a piece of Berlin wool, not split, of bright, though rather deep shade of green; place it across your leto, near one end of it; twist the leto tight two or three times, cut the shortest end close to the twist, turn down both ends of the Berlin wool along the remaining leto, fasten both Berlin wool and leto together to a piece of wire, with a thread of brown half twist silk, split in two, and continue, as directed, for the branch of chenille leaves.

PATTERNS FOR SILK EM-BROIDERY.

To be worked on flannel or merino, with fine silk.

EDITORS' TABLE.

THE author of "Friends in Council" has, in a recent work, "Companions of my Solitude," advanced many sound arguments in favor of a better system of female education in England. His last work, which the British reviewers commend as "altogether a thoughtful book, full of wisdom as well as gentleness and beauty," owes its chief interest to the subject of woman's wrongs, and the means of her improvement. He says, "If we consider the nature of the intellect of women, we really can see no reason for the restrictions laid upon them in the choice of employments. They possess talents of all kinds." p. 143. And again, "How well women might work under direction! In how many ways, where tact and order alone are required, they might be employed! and also in how many higher ways, where talent is required!" p. 144.

One of these "higher ways" is now familiar to the American people. Thanks to the Puritans for establishing the common school system, which gives girls as well as boys access to the "well of English undefiled," if not yet an equal participation in the "waters from the Castilian Spring." Then our republican institutions, making the diffusion of knowledge among the people imperative, has led to the employment of female teachers in the common schools: at first, because their services were less expensive, and now from a conviction that women are the best instructors.

In our last number, we dwelt at large on this subject, offering a humble petition to Congress for aid in qualifying the daughters of the republic to fulfil the duties of their noble profession as educators of American children.

That paper, we are happy to record, has met with kind approbation. Men, eminent in the halls of Congress, have promised to lend their aid in advancing the plan. We now subjoin a few of the many reasons which may be urged for the appropriation of such a portion of the public lands as will enable each State and Territory, on becoming a State, to found and endow one Free Normal School, for the preparation of Female Teachers of Common Schools.

1st. That there are now two millions, at least, of children and youth in the United States nearly destitute of school instruction, requiring, at this moment, 20,000 additional teachers, if we give to each instructor the care of one hundred pupils, quite too many for any common school with only one teacher.

2d. That to find 20,000 young men, who would enter on the office of pedagogue, would be utterly impossible, while the Great West, the mines of California, and the open ocean laving China and the East, are inviting them to adventure and activity.

3d. That, therefore, young women must become the teachers of common schools, or these must be given up.

4th. That young women are the best teachers has been proved and acknowledged by those men who have made trial of the gentle sex in schools of the most difficult description (see Reports of the "Board of Popular Education," "Reports of Common Schools in Massachusetts," &c.), because of the superior tact and moral power natural to the female character.

5th. That female teachers are now largely employed, on an average of six of these to one male teacher, in New England, New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, and wherever the common school system is in a prospering condition; and everywhere these teachers are found faithful and useful.

6th. That, to make education universal, it must be moderate in expenses, and women can afford to teach for one-half, or even less, the salary which men would ask, because the female teacher has only to sustain herself; she does not look forward to the duty of supporting a family, should she marry; nor has she the ambition to amass a fortune; nor is she obliged to give from her earnings support to the State or Government.

7th. That the young women of our land, who would willingly enter on the office of teacher, are, generally, in that class which must earn their livelihood; therefore these should have special and gratuitous opportunities of preparing them for school duties: thus the Normal Schools, in educating these teachers of Common Schools, are rendering a great national service.

8th. That, though the nation gives them opportunity of education gratuitously, yet these teachers, in their turn, will do the work of educating the children of the nation better than men could do, and at a far less expense; therefore the whole country is vastly the gainer by this system.

9th. That it is not designed to make a class of celibates, but that these maiden school teachers will be better prepared to enter the marriage state, after the term of three or four years in their office of instructors, than by any other mode of passing their youth from seventeen or eighteen to twenty-one. That earlier marriages are productive of much of the unhappiness of married women, of many sorrows, sickness, and premature decay and death, there can be no doubt. We look to the development of this system of constituting WOMAN THE EDUCATOR OF THE YOUTH, giving her the fitting requirements, as a measure which will not only preserve all her natural gifts and graces of person and character, but enhance them a hundredfold, making her truly what the Apostle declares her to be, "the glory of the man."

HOSPITAL FOR SICK CHILDREN.—It is the intention of the Faculty of the "Female Medical College of Pennsylvania," to open a HOSPITAL FOR SICK CHILDREN, in Philadelphia, as soon as possible. We state this before quoting the following heart-stirring appeal lately put forth by a popular English journal.* We are glad to state, also, that this American Child's Hospital will be under the charge of a female physician, who can consult, when necessary, with the Faculty of the College; but to woman's tender care the little "drooping buds" will be given. Woman is gifted with insight to understand the nature of children. God has endowed her for this mission; and when she is encouraged to cultivate her gifts, and permitted to exercise them in treating the diseases of women and children, the world will see a marked improvement in the health of our people.

"DROOPING BUDS.—In Paris, Berlin, Turin, Frankfurt, Brussels, and Munich; in Hamburg, St. Petersburg, Moscow, Vienna, Prague, Pesth, Copenhagen, Stuttgart, Grätz, Brinn, Lemberg, and Constantinople, there are hospitals for sick children. There was not one in all England until the other day.

* Dickens's "Household Words."

"No hospital for sick children! Does the public know what is implied in this? Those little graves two or three feet long, which are so plentiful in our churchyards and our cemeteries—to which, from home, in absence from the pleasures of society, the thoughts of many a young mother sadly wander—does the public know that we dig too many of them? Of this great city of London—which, until a few weeks ago, contained no hospital wherein to treat and study the diseases of children—more than a third of the whole population perishes in infancy and childhood. Twenty-four in a hundred die during the first two years of life; and, during the next eight years, eleven die out of the remaining seventy-six.

"Our children perish out of our homes; not because there is in them an inherent dangerous sickness (except in the few cases where they are born of parents who communicate to children heritable maladies), but because there is, in respect of their tender lives, a want of sanitary discipline and a want of medical knowledge. What should we say of a rose-tree, in which one bud out of every three dropped to the soil dead? We should not say that this is natural to roses; neither is it natural to men and women that they should see the glass of death upon so many of the bright eyes that come to laugh and love among them—or that they should kiss so many little lips grown cold and still. The vice is external. We fall to prevent disease; and, in the case of children, to a much more lamentable extent than is well known, we fail to cure it.

"Think of it again. Of all the coffins that are made in London, more than one in every three is made for a little child; a child that has not yet two figures to its age. Although science has advanced, although vaccination has been discovered and brought into general use, although medical knowledge is tenfold greater than it was fifty years ago, we still do not gain more than a diminution of two per cent. in the terrible mortality among our children."

Nor will the mortality ever be much diminished till women are instructed in their own nature, and encouraged to study the laws of health and of disease peculiar to themselves and their children. Female physicians must be trained to practice among these patients, and thus the knowledge so necessary and salutary will be diffused. This plan of "A Hospital for Sick Children, under the care of an educated Female Physician," should be welcomed by every Christian philanthropist. Who will aid? Funds are wanted. Let Philadelphia lead the way, and soon every large city in our land will have its hospital for sick children.

OLD AND NEW ENGLAND.—Out of every hundred persons in England, forty cannot write their names. In Massachusetts, according to the last census, but one person in every two hundred is in this condition; and nearly all these are recent emigrants from Europe.

DEACONESSES.—Extract from a letter dated Paris, 1852: "The Protestant clergy of France have revived the order of Deaconesses. They have a house in Paris called 'Le Maison des Deaconesses,' an hospital comprising schools for the lower classes, from infancy to a comparatively advanced age; a retreat for those unhappy outcasts who wish to retrieve their past errors; a chapel and a hospital for both sexes. This admirable institution, of great extent, is conducted entirely by these Protestant Sisters of Charity, or Deaconesses, who choose to devote themselves to so pious a work, but who are not bound by any vows to remain in it longer than they feel disposed. A detailed account of the institution would occupy more space, perhaps, than a mere letter should occupy; but suffice it to say, that never did a place breathe more of the spirit of order, cleanliness, cheerfulness, and industry, or appear more completely to fulfil its object."

PROGRESS IN THE EMPIRE STATE.—The Board of Education of New York has determined to establish a free academy for females, in New York city, in which the higher branches of education will be taught.

CULTIVATION OF THE HEART.—It is easier to educate the mind than to educate the soul; and no training is more difficult than that of the moral affections, though the results of the latter, in this and the future world, are infinitely more important than the former. "It is much easier," says Flavel, "to pull up many weeds out of a garden, than one corruption out of the heart; and to procure a hundred flowers to adorn a plot, than one grace to beautify the soul."

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—The following articles are accepted: "To Mary," "Standees," "The Land of Beauty," "What is True Love?" "Then—Now," "Lines," "The Hidden Love," "We Parted," and "Life."

The following articles are declined:—(Several of these deserve notice, as only wanting a very little improvement to make them worthy of a place in the "Book." Young writers must not "make haste" to send off their productions to the editor. Be sure you have done your best to correct and polish your poem before submitting it to the critical examination of a stranger.)—"The Blooming of the Trees," "The Brave Boy of Tyrol," "A Land of Dreams," "The Blue Bird," "Death," "The Children of the Wilds," "The Household Treasure," "The War Spirit," "To my Cousin Marion," "The Sleeping Magician," "The Hours," "Unrest," "Sins of Superstition," "The Farewell of the Heart," and "Their Memory is Mine."

OUR TREASURY.

THE MINISTRY OF WOMAN.

BY THE REV. CHARLES WADSWORTH.

HERKEN is set forth the high ministry of woman, even in evangelical utterances. Nobler, indeed, her commission than that of the twelve disciples. Not in apostleship unto the world was she sent, but more glorious far—in apostleship to the apostles. She might not preach Christ crucified unto the Gentiles, but better, and higher, and holier—she could preach Christ risen unto the faint-hearted disciples. Not hers to point the stricken multitudes to the cross of Calvary, but hers a loftier task—to point the apostles themselves to the presence of their risen Lord on the mountains of Galilee.

Oh, it was an honor eclipsing forever man's loftiest—put by Christ, in the hour of his triumph, on these meek sisters of his ministry! It was woman's voice that first made proclamation on this ransomed world of a Risen Redeemer.

"That was a task of glory all her own;

Nobler than e'er the still small voice assigned
To lips in awful music making known

The stormy splendor of some prophet's mind.

'Christ is arisen!' by her, to wake mankind,

First from the sepulchre these words were brought:

She was to send the mighty, rushing wind

First on its way with those high tidings fraught—

'Christ is arisen!'

Yea, loftier her credentials than those borne along earth's circumference by the wonder-working disciples of Jesus, bearing the Gospel to the nations. An apostleship unto the apostles—this, this was her high calling.

And the lesson of it all is—the glory of woman's ministry in the triumphs of the Gospel.

What though she may not proclaim from the sacred desk a crucified Redeemer? Yet may her evangelical service be altogether as high, altogether as holy. The wheel of her sacred influence plays into the machinery of salvation at a point nearer the great mainspring, and is therefore more hopefully efficient than even pulpit utterances.

She may not carry the preaching to men; but she is mighty, through God, to lead the preachers to Jesus.

In the sacred sphere of her own beautiful and matchless ministry—as a mother by the cradle of her child, as a teacher with her class in the school—she may be taming the Samson whose strength shall win great victories for Israel, and sending forth influences that, more mighty than all human eloquence, shall hasten the Gospel consummation as the salvation of a world.

WOMAN'S LOVE.

BY WASHINGTON IRVING.

MAN is the creature of interest and ambition. His nature leads him forth into the struggle and bustle of the world. Love is but the embellishment of his early life, or a song piped in the intervals of the acts. He seeks for fame, for fortune, for space in the world's thought, and dominion over his fellow-men. But a woman's whole life is a history of the affections. The heart is her world; it is there her ambition strives for empire—it is there her avarice seeks for hidden treasures. She sends forth her sympathies on adventure; she embarks her whole soul in the traffic of affection; and, if shipwrecked, her case is hopeless—for it is a bankruptcy of the heart.

To a man, the disappointment of love may occasion some bitter pangs: it wounds some feelings of tenderness—it blasts some prospects of felicity; but he is an active being; he may dissipate his thoughts in the whirl of varied occupation, or may plunge into the tide of pleasure; or, if the scene of disappointment be too full of painful associations, he can shift his abode at will, and taking, as it were, the wings of the morning, can "fly to the uttermost parts of the earth, and be at rest."

But woman's is comparatively a fixed, a secluded, and a meditative life. She is more the companion of her own thoughts and feelings; and, if they are turned to ministers of sorrow, where shall she look for consolation? Her lot is to be wooed and won; and, if unhappy in her love, her heart is like some fortress that has been captured, and sacked, and abandoned, and left desolate.

How many bright eyes grow dim—how many soft cheeks grow pale—how many lovely forms fade away into the tomb, and none can tell the cause that blighted their loveliness! As the dove will clasp its wings to its side, and cover and conceal the arrow that is preying on its vitals—so is it the nature of woman to hide from the world the pangs of wounded affection. The love of a delicate female is always shy and silent. Even when fortunate, she scarcely breathes it to herself; but when otherwise, she buries it in the recesses of her bosom, and there lets it cower and brood among the ruins of her peace. With her, the desire of her heart has failed—the great charm of existence is at an end. She neglects all the cheerful exercises which gladden the spirits, quicken the pulses, and send the tide of life in healthful currents through the veins. Her rest is broken—the sweet refreshment of sleep is poisoned by melancholy dreams—"dry sorrow drinks her blood," until her enfeebled frame sinks under the slightest external injury. Look for her, after a little while, and you find friendship weeping over her untimely grave, and wondering that one, who but lately glowed with all the radiance of health and beauty, should so speedily be brought down to "darkness and the worm." You will be told of some wintry chill, some casual indisposition, that laid her low—but no one knows the mental malady that previously sapped her strength, and made her so easy a prey to the spoiler.

She is like some tender tree, the pride and beauty of the grove: graceful in its form, bright in its foliage, but with the worm preying at its heart. We find it suddenly withering, when it should be most fresh and luxuriant. We see it drooping its branches to the earth, and shedding leaf by leaf; until, wasted and perished away, it falls even in the stillness of the forest; and as we muse over the beautiful ruin, we strive in vain to recollect the blast or thunderbolt that could have smitten it with decay.

SUGGESTIONS TO WOMEN.

BY MRS. S. C. HALL.

WE have much yet to do for a class whom it is a shame to name, and that much must be done by women—by women, themselves sans tache, sans reproche. It is not enough that we repeat our Saviour's words, "Go and sin no more;" we must give the sinner a refuge to go to. Asylums calculated to receive such ought to be more sufficiently provided in England. One lady, as eminent for her rare mental powers as for her charity and great wealth, is now trying an experiment that does her infinite honor; she has set a noble example to others who are rich and ought to be considerate; safe in her high character, her self-respect, and her virgin purity, she has provided shelter for many "erring sisters"—in mercy, beguiling,

"By gentle ways, the wanderer back."

Of all her numerous charities, this is the truest and best; like the fair Sabrina, she has heard and answered the prayers of those who seek protection from the most terrible of all dangers—

"Listen! for dear honor's sake Listen—and save!"

THE PEASANT'S FAMILY.

BY MRS. SIGOURNEY.

WE saw a rustic household wandering forth
That cloudless afternoon, perchance to make
Some visit promised long, for each was clad
With special care as on a holiday.
The father bore the baby awkwardly
In his coarse arms, like tool or burden used
About his work, yet kindly bent him down
To hear its little murmur of delight.
With a more practised hand, the mother led
One who could scarcely totter, its small feet
Pating unequally—from side to side
Its rotund body balancing. Alone,
Majestic in an added year, walked on Between the groups another ruddy one.
She faltereth at the stile; but, being raised
And set upon the greensward, how she shouts,
Curvets, and gambols like a playful lamb!
Plucking, with pride and wonder, here and there,
Herb or flower, o'er which the baby crows
One moment, and the next, with chubby hand
Rendeth in pieces like a conqueror.

Literary Notices.

From the Editor, Philadelphia:—

THE PRESBYTERIAN QUARTERLY REVIEW. B. J. Wallace, Editor; Albert Barnes, Thomas Brainerd, E. D. Gilbert, Joel Parker, Associate Editors. With the assistance of the New York Union, Auburn and Lane Theological Seminaries. Vol. I., No. 1, June, 1852. We need hardly add, after giving the above list of distinguished clergymen as coworkers in this enterprise, that the number is rich in its literary merits, as well as marked by a high tone of religious zeal. The first article, "Our Church and our Review," sets forth the reasons, powerfully, that led to the publication. Christians of this denomination will hardly allow such a noble effort to fail for lack of patronage.

THIRD ANNUAL ANNOUNCEMENT AND CATALOGUE OF STUDENTS OF THE FEMALE MEDICAL COLLEGE OF PENNSYLVANIA. Located in Philadelphia, at 229 Arch Street. For the Session commencing September 13, 1852, and ending January 31, 1853. There have been fifty-two students in this college, eight of whom graduated last December. A much larger number is expected to enter on the next session. The prospects of the College are highly flattering to its friends and the faculty who sustain it.

From HENRY CAREY BAIRD (successor to E. L. Carey), S. E. Corner of Market and Fifth Streets, Philadelphia:—

A TREATISE ON A BOX OF INSTRUMENTS AND THE SLIDE RULE. For the Use of Gaugers, Engineers, Seamen, and Students. By Thomas Kentish. The steady sale which several editions of this work have met with, and the approbation it has universally received from practical men, are the best testimonials of its merits.

NORRIS'S HANDBOOK FOR LOCOMOTIVE ENGINEERS AND MACHINISTS: comprising the Proportions for Constructing Locomotives, Manner of Setting Valves, Tables of Squares, Cubes, Areas, &c. &c. This is another of the valuable practical publications for which the public are indebted to the enterprise of Henry Carey Baird.

THE PAPER-HANGER'S COMPANION. A treatise on paper-hanging, in which the practical operations of the trade are systematically laid down; with copious directions preparatory for papering; preventions against the effect of damp on walls; the various cements and pastes adapted to the several purposes of the trade; observations and directions for the panelling and ornamenting of rooms, &c. By James Arrowsmith, author of "An Analysis of Drapery," etc. The value of this little work is fully set forth in the title.

From G. P. PUTNAM, New York, through H. C. Baird, Philadelphia:—

We have received a complete set of "Putnam's Semi-Monthly Library for Travellers and the Fireside." These volumes are printed in large type, on superior quality of paper, and embrace the following popular works, from the pens of authors of literary distinction:—

HOME AND SOCIAL PHILOSOPHY. From "Household Words." Edited by Charles Dickens.

WHIMSICALITIES. By Thomas Hood. With woodcuts.

WALKS AND TALKS; or, an American Farmer in England. With illustrations.

THE WORLD HERE AND THERE; or, Notes of Travellers. From "Household Words." Edited by Charles Dickens.

HOOD'S OWN. Selected papers. With woodcuts.

HOME NARRATIVES. Edited by Charles Dickens.

UP THE RHINE. By Thomas Hood. With illustrations. First and second parts.

These volumes are sold at the cheap rate of twenty-five cents each; and, from their size, durable structure, and amusing and interesting contents, are admirably suited to administer comfort to the minds of travellers.

From THOMAS, COWPERTHWAIT & Co., Philadelphia:—

A LIFE OF ROBERT EMMETT, the Distinguished Patriot and Martyr. Containing the principal events in his life; his speeches made on various occasions, with his celebrated defence before Lord Norbury; his trial, condemnation, and death. Also, a sketch of the life of Thomas Addis Emmett, of Theobald Wolfe Tone, and other Irish patriots. A brief account of the trial and banishment of Mitchell, Smith O'Brien, Meagher, and their compatriots; with much other valuable matter. By John W. Burke, Esq. Octavo, 388 pages, bound in embossed muslin. Price only one dollar. A book for the people.

From A. HART (late Carey & Hart), corner of Fourth and Chestnut Street, Philadelphia:—

PENCIL SKETCHES; or, Outlines of Character and Manners. By Miss Leslie, author of "Kitty's Relations," etc. Including "Mrs. Washington Potts" and "Mr. Smith," with other stories. In two volumes. Price fifty cents each volume. Most of these sketches and stories were originally published in the "Lady's Book," and have been favorites with the public ever since, as they deserve to be.

EOLINE; or, Magnolia Vale. A Novel. By Caroline Lee Hentz, author of "Linda," etc. This is a very interesting novel, the incidents of which are related in the usually attractive style of the author.

From BUNCE & BROTHERS, New York, through A. HART, Philadelphia:—

THE ROMANCE OF THE REVOLUTION: being a History of the Personal Adventures, Heroic Exploits, and Romantic Incidents, as enacted in the War of Independence. By Oliver B. Bunce. The intention of the compiler of this work was to present to his countrymen numerous sketches of extraordinary adventure, and of the most novel and thrilling kind, connected with the history of the Revolution. He has ably performed that duty, and has presented to the American reader numerous grateful memorials of the past, which will not fail in leaving their patriotic impressions upon the future defenders of our country. The work is neatly printed and illustrated.

From BLANCHARD & LEA, Philadelphia:—

ELEMENTARY LATIN GRAMMAR AND EXERCISES. By Dr. Leonhard Schmitz, F. R. S. E. This introductory grammar of the Latin language forms one of the classical series edited by Drs. Schmitz and Zumpt, and is intended to be put into the hands of new beginners.

From DANIELS & SMITH, 36 North Sixth Street, Philadelphia:—

THE OLD FARM GATE; or, Stories and Poems for Children and Youth. By Richard Coe. The publishers have sent us a copy of this neatly printed work, which we are sure will find a multitude of admirers among the class of readers for whose pleasure and edification it has been especially prepared. The readers of the "Lady's Book" have long been familiar with the simple and truthful style of Mr. Coe—simple in its construction, and truthful to the dignity of nature—and have, besides, observed how touching and how affectionate are all his sentiments, and will therefore be able to judge of the merits of his work, even without making a critical examination of its pages.

From CHARLES SCRIPNER, New York, through LIPPINCOTT, GRAMBO & Co., Philadelphia:—

PENCILINGS BY THE WAY: written during some years of Residence and Travel in Europe. By N. Parker Willis. A new edition. This is a very beautiful edition of a work which will long continue to be a favorite with American readers.

From GEORGE P. PUTNAM, No. 10 Park Place, New York, through LIPPINCOTT, GRAMBO & Co., Philadelphia:—

DOLLARS AND CENTS. By Amy Lothrop. Two volumes. This is a domestic tale, artlessly and affectionately told, without any pretension to romance or startling incidents; but agreeable and interesting in its very simplicity.

From HARPER & BROTHERS, New York, through LIPPINCOTT, GRAMBO & Co., Philadelphia:—

COSMOS: a Sketch of a Physical Description of the Universe. By Alexander Von Humboldt. Translated from the German by E. C. Otte and B. H. Paul, Ph. D., F. C. S. Vol. 4.

THE LIFE AND WORKS OF ROBERT BURNS. Edited by Robert Chambers. In four volumes. Vol. 2. We have noticed this as a very full and superior edition of the works of the Scottish poet.

THE LIFE AND LETTERS OF BARTHOLOMEO GEORGE NIEBUHR. With Essays on his Character and Influence. By the Chevalier Bunsen, and Professors Brandis and Lorbell. The subject of these memoirs was an able historian and statesman, and early in his career laid the foundations of a reputation which grew brighter as his years increased.

From M. W. DODD, New York, through W. S. MARTIN, 144 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia:—

THE "FRIEND OF MOSES;" or, the Defence of the Pentateuch as the Production of Moses and an Inspired Document, against the Objections of Modern Scepticism. By Wm. T. Hamilton, D. D., Pastor of the Government Street Church, Mobile, Ala. This is an able work of 552 pages, and on which the learned author appears to have bestowed a great amount of labor and critical research, and in which the sacred authority and the consistency of the Bible are maintained in a masterly manner. Such a volume will naturally attract the attention of all serious seekers after the truths of the Holy Scriptures.

WHAT NOW? For Young Ladies leaving School. By Charles T. Deems, President of Greensboro' Female College, N. C. This neat little volume contains a great deal of excellent advice, intended peculiarly for the class of young persons to whom it is addressed, but which will be found equally worthy of all educated Christian ladies.

From J. S. REDFIELD, Clinton Hall, New York, through W. B. ZIEGLER, Philadelphia:—

ON THE STUDY OF WORDS. By Richard Chenevix French, B. D., Vicar of Itchenstoke, Hants; Examining Chaplain to the Lord Bishop of Oxford; and Professor of Divinity, King's College, London. From the second London edition, revised and corrected. There are many curious and useful things interspersed through these six lectures on words, which will greatly interest the student and the general reader.

BRONCHITIS AND KINDRED DISEASES, in Language Adapted to Common Readers. B. W. W. HALL, A. M., M. D.,

VOL. XLV.—17

New York. The author of this book is a gentleman who has had many years' experience in this and European countries, and who believes that he has adopted a system of practice for the treatment of consumption which has been attended with encouraging success.

LILLIAN, AND OTHER POEMS. By Winthrop Mackworth Praed. Now first collected. The present edition of these poems is represented to be much more full than any hitherto published. A brilliant fancy, a warm heart, a playful and agreeable style, and a close adherence to the truthfulness of nature, are the peculiar characteristics of the author of these poems.

From W. HILDREDGE, New York, through LEARY & Co., 198 North Second Street, Philadelphia:—

CALIFORNIA ILLUSTRATED: including a Description of the Panama and Nicaragua Routes. By a returned Californian. This is a fine volume of more than two hundred pages, with numerous illustrations, in which the author claims that he has endeavored to convey a correct impression of the country, and to have stated only such facts as fell under his own observation.

From DEWITT & DAVENPORT, Tribune Building, New York:—

LIFE AND ADVENTURES OF CAPTAIN JACOB C. ARMSTRONG. A very interesting narrative, and full of stirring incidents.

From JAMES MUNROE & Co., Boston and Cambridge:—

THE AMERICAN MATRON; or, Practical and Scientific Cookery. By a Housekeeper. The above publishers seldom send forth an indifferent work. Their books are good of their kind, as well as good in all belonging to the printer's art. This "American Matron" shows a marked advance in the science of domestic economy, from the books that used to treat only of cookery. Mrs. Child led the way in this kind of literature: her "Frugal Housewife" was an original and sensible little book. She has been followed by a number of our best lady writers, each endeavoring to add some new and useful feature to her own work. The author of this last has given a capital preface, containing facts and suggestions of much value to every housekeeper. The science of preparing food is of great importance; every effort to advance it deserves encouragement and praise.

APPLETON'S POPULAR LIBRARY. An agreeable collection of beautifully printed and tastefully bound volumes, for family reading, at the remarkably low price of fifty cents a volume. Books that, when once read, are not to be thrown by, but will bear re-reading and learning, both from their intrinsic value and the durable style in which they are published. The motto from Cicero is very aptly chosen; a good quotation being an excellent thing, and going a great way as an introduction.

"Books to quicken the intelligence of youth, delight age, elevate prosperity, shelter and solace us in adversity, loving enjoyment at home, befriend us out of doors, pass the night with us, travel with us, go to the country with us."

THE MAIDEN AND MARRIED LIFE OF MARY POWELL has sweet, womanly grace and excellence portrayed; but most of our readers are familiar with the volume ere this.

In another view, we have "THACKERAY'S YELLOW-PLUSH PAPERS," somewhat of the "Vanity Fair" school, purporting to be the private memoirs of James Yellowplush, footman; that is to say, of his various masters, on the principle that "our servants know more of our affairs than we do ourselves." The history of Mr. Deuceace is a startling comment upon the selfish hollowness of fashionable life and principles.

THE PARIS SKETCH-BOOK, by the same clever author, forms two volumes of the same series; papers upon leading incidents and topics of conversation in the gay French capital, at the time of Mr. Thackeray's visit. George Sand and the disciples of the new school are admirably discussed, in a fire of scorching satire; French actors and dramas, authors and fashions, are clearly hit off in succeeding papers.

To the gayeties of the collection also belong "THE INGOLDSBY LEGENDS," a volume that has been the subject of much criticism and controversy abroad, and abounding in strong, racy wit of prose and verse, the pretended ghost stories serving as vehicles for the author's natural drollery. Some have raised the cry of coarseness; and we must say there is, at least, considerable daring in the conception and execution; but the wit is undeniable, and we leave caviling to the reader.

To the "GAYETIES AND GRAVITIES OF HORACE SMITH," no objection can be made. The author of "Rejected Address" was a moralist as well as humorist; and the fine vein of sentiment which pervades what he has written reminds us of Lamb, Hood, and our own Neal; since

"The root of some grave, earnest thought is understuck so rightly,

As to justify the flowers and fruit of the waving tree above."

"My Kettle," "The Chapter on Noses," "Lips and Kissing," "The State and Post Nuptial Journal," are among the good things bound up in these pages.

For travels—and what is a family library without its travels and adventures?—we have "HUC'S JOURNEY THROUGH TARTARY, THIBET, AND CHINA," comparatively untrodden ground, and described with naïve simplicity and freshness by the tourist, a Catholic priest, on a perilous and romantic expedition. It was accomplished in the years of 1844, '5, and '6, and a full journal kept of adventures, perils, manners and customs of the people, etc. etc., from which the present volumes are condensed. It is a valuable as well as entertaining record.

The "London Times," "whose leaders are finished essays," and the "Quarterly Review," have furnished two delightful volumes of criticisms and essays. We have already quoted, in our "Centre-Table Gossip," a paper entitled, "The Art of Dress," from the last, a paper which we commend to our lady readers in full. "Music" is also admirable. The essays from the "London Times" are not, as might be supposed, only of political or passing interest. They have been carefully selected, and commend themselves to the cultivated reader. The "Appleton Library" has claims to the attention of every household that eschews useless light reading.

NOVELS, SERIALS, PAMPHLETS, &c.

From Lippincott, Grambo & Co., Philadelphia: "Waverly Novels." Abbotsford edition. "Guy Mannering; or, the Astrologer." Handsomely printed and illustrated. The second volume of the edition has also been received, containing "The Antiquary," "The Black Dwarf," and "Old Mortality." The best edition published, and very cheap.

From W. B. Ziebler, Philadelphia: "Chambers's Pocket Miscellany." Vol. 2. Price 20 cents.

From John Murphy & Co., Baltimore, through T. B. Peterson, Philadelphia: "The Spawwife; or, the Queen's Secret." A story of the times of Queen Elizabeth. By Paul Peppergrass, Esq., author of "Shandy Maguire." Part 1. This work is to be completed in four parts, at 25 cents. It is from the pen of an able and practiced writer, who, however, is very evidently no admirer of the "good Queen Bess."

From T. B. Peterson, Philadelphia: "Viola; or, Adventures in the Far West." By Emmerson Bennett, author of the "Prairie Flower," to which the present work is "a companion." Price 25 cents.—"The Necromancer; or, the Mysteries of the Court of Henry the Eighth." Printed from the advanced sheets purchased from the author in London. By George W. M. Reynolds, author of the "Mysteries of the Court of London."—"The Gypsy's Daughter." A Novel. By Mrs. Grey, author of the "Gambler's Wife." etc. etc. Three English volumes complete in one. Price 25 cents. We recognize in the incidents of this work, and in their relation, the imagination and the pen of a very superior writer.

From George P. Putnam, New York, through Lippincott, Grambo & Co., Philadelphia: "The Napoleon Ballads." By Don Gaultier. The poetical works of Louis Napoleon, now first translated into plain English. These ballads are very clever satires on the man who is himself a living satire on the republican progress of France.

From Harper & Brothers, New York, through Lindsay & Blakiston, Philadelphia: No. 172 of the "Library of Select Novels." "Pequinillo: a Tale." By G. P. R. James, Esq., author of "Aids and Obstacles," etc. etc.

From Dewitt & Davenport, New York: "Kate Penrose; or, Life and its Lessons." By Miss Hubbuck, author of "The Wife's Sister," etc. This is a novel of very superior merit, chaste and agreeable in style, as well as in its morality and sentiments.

From Hermann J. Meyer, 164 William Street, New York, through W. B. Ziebler, Philadelphia: Vol. 1, Part 1, of "Meyer's Universum." This is the commencement of a half-monthly publication, illustrated with engravings from drawings by the first artists. It will contain forty-eight plates in the first volume, and is sold at the low price of twenty-five cents each part. The work will present views of the most remarkable places and objects of all countries, in steel engravings by distinguished artists, with descriptive and historical text, by eminent writers in Europe and America. Edited by Charles A. Dana.

Godey's Arm-Chair.

INFLUENCES OF THE "LADY'S BOOK."—Our good friend of the "Arkansas Traveller," after saying that "Godey seems—and justly, too—to be the universal favorite of the ladies," adds the following expressive sentence: "Those husbands who do not lay this popular work on their wives' centre-table, should not be furnished with good dinners and clean shirts. The neglect is unpardonable." Now we do most solemnly assure our friend that the last idea that could ever enter our head or our heart, would be that of carrying dissensions into families, and especially of creating unhappiness between man and wife! Our book is emphatically the "Lady's Book," and hence it is next to an impossibility that it should ever teach anything unbecoming a lady; and therefore we hope, nay, we feel confident that its influences, present or absent, will never deprive a good husband of a good dinner, or of the luxury of a clean shirt. It does seem, however, without any intention on our part, that such things do happen, and that the only means of preventing results so disastrous, is for the husband to subscribe without delay.

A short time since, we received a very agreeable letter from one of our old subscribers, who had previously declined renewing his subscription, assuring us that he found it impossible to get along good-humoredly in his family circle without the "Book." Soon after it was discontinued, he said his wife had, on one occasion, positively refused to mend his clothes, when her aid in that branch of housewifery had been suddenly and urgently required, unless he would consent to send forthwith for the "Lady's Book." He had the good sense, he tells us, to submit at once to the demand, and inclosed the amount of two years' subscription, informing us, at the same time, that he had been convinced that the "Book" was a promoter of peace and cheerfulness, which he had found absolutely essential to the well-being of his family. We give these facts, in connection with the opinions of the "Arkansas Traveller," simply expressing the hope that no prudent husband will go without a good dinner, a clean shirt, or without a darn or a patch on his clothes, on our account! The "Book" is always at the command of our friends.

BELMONT HALL, SCHOOLER'S MOUNTAIN, N. J.—This fashionable and favorite summer retreat, having undergone a thorough repair, was opened for visitors in the early part of the season, under the judicious management of Mrs. E. A. Hinchman. The great celebrity of the springs, on account of their medicinal qualities, and the romantic beauty of the scenery by which they are surrounded, together with the established ability of the lady in charge, will doubtless attract a crowd of visitors, anxious to escape from the heat and enervating influences of our large cities during the warm season.

STEAMBOATS GENERAL McDONALD AND THOMAS POWELL.—These swift and splendidly arranged steamboats are now employed in conveying passengers between Cape May and Philadelphia. Better boats, or finer accommodations, could not be required or expected by the most careful and timid of the travelling public. G. H. Huddell, Esq., fills the place on this and the Baltimore Railroad and steamboat lines, which is filled with so much ability, and with such great confidence and satisfaction to the public, on the New York line, by W. H. Gatzmer, Esq. With such men to manage and to select, the conveyance of travellers, whether by steamboat or railroad, is always performed, by all concerned, as a responsible and conscientious duty, which looks as well to the comforts as to the safety of the passengers.

IMITATORS.—We thank our new friend of the "Burlington (N. J.) Gazette," for the very flattering notices he has been pleased to take of the "Lady's Book" since his devotion to the tripod. We particularly appreciate his allusion to imitations and imitators in his notice of the June number. We certainly have had enough of both to contend with for the last twenty years; yet, as our friend very justly remarks, have not only pursued our course unmoved and unchecked, but are still able to project something new every month for the benefit of those same imitators. By the way, it is rather a disagreeable fact to reflect upon, that in this country imitations are so numerous and so unblushingly made of everything that is not secured to the originator by copyright. No matter what new business a man may originate, what new path he may strike out from an old and worn-out road—no sooner has he opened his wares than an imitator and a competitor seats himself beside him, having filched his "thunder," and very likely his good name—no sooner has he entered on his new path than he finds it crowded with "envious imitators," anxious and determined to crush him if he does not get out of their way, or if he does not do as we have done, keep them continually in the rear by supplying them with something new to arrest and engage their powers of imitation. But the evidences of this curse of the times is not confined to literary, commercial, mechanical, and agricultural enterprises; we behold the same servility in the senate, in the pulpit, in the rostrum, and the lecture-room; nay, we behold them at every turn, among the monuments of our otherwise beautiful cemeteries. Laurel Hill, among other places, affords some sad specimens of the coolness, we had almost said the shamelessness, with which imitators can appropriate to themselves the chaste and original designs of others, until there have been raised so many monuments of similar structure and emblems, that they remind us of the verres that appear from day to day among the death notices in the "Ledger," without any other alteration than that of the name of the lamented deceased.

A DELIGHTFUL TRIP.—It does not always happen that the further we go from home, the greater will be our pleasure. We, too, have been abroad in our time, as well as others of our countrymen, some of whom affect to have been entranced and enraptured with Italian, Swiss, and all sorts of foreign scenery. We have always thought that our own Schuylkill, if not so classical in its reminiscences as the Arno, or the Thames, or the Tiber, is nevertheless more beautiful and refreshing than either of them—a brighter, purer, clearer stream, and surrounded by scenery far more picturesque and enchanting than they are. If any one doubts us in this matter, let him step on board the steamboat Washington, Captain Green, or the steamboat Frederick Graeff, Captain Cline, at Fairmount, and proceed to Laurel Hill, the Falls, and Manayunk. If, after completing the voyage, the traveller is not pleased and delighted with the limpid stream, and the scenery on the banks and shores of the Schuylkill—if he does not confess that they are as charming and as enchanting as any he has ever witnessed abroad, then it will be our turn to doubt—either his judgment or his love of country.

But we have a few words to say for the kindness and the attention paid to passengers, especially to the juvenile travellers, who are generally the most numerous class on board, by the worthy captains of these steamboats. They are not only extremely careful of children, providing for their safety in every possible manner, but they are also very accommodating in their charges, generally compounding the expenses of the little parties in such a manner as to reduce them much below the regular fare. It is really amusing to see these boats, omnibus-like, moving from shore to shore whenever a passenger presents himself at any point on the route, the momentary stoppages serving rather to increase the interest in the voyage. They always have on board a plentiful supply of that greatest of all luxuries and refreshments at this season of the year, pure, cold ice-water. To Messrs. Bender and Wright are we indebted for this enterprise.

WEST POINT HOTEL.—This popular and healthy retreat during the summer months was opened early in the season by Mr. Cozens, a gentleman well known throughout the country as one of the most accomplished, agreeable, and accommodating hotel-keepers in that or any other region. The location of the hotel is delightful, affording the most picturesque scenery the eye could desire, and the purest air the lungs could inhale, and full, withal, of revolutionary and patriotic remembrances, dear to the heart of every American. It is exactly the spot to which the young statesman and soldier should retire for a while, to study the political and military history of the "Old Thirteen," and where the student of nature may seclude himself from the world, and calmly reflect upon the beauty and sublimity of all her works, thus nerving the minds of each to renewed and vigorous efforts in their respective pursuits. Meantime, the visitors will find Mr. Cozens to be attentive, assiduous, and unremitting in his efforts to make his house not merely the resting-place of the stranger, but the quiet and hospitable home of all who enter his doors.

SATURDAY EVENING POST.—This is the oldest, and has always been one of the most popular of the Philadelphia weeklies; and, we believe we may add very justly, one of the most prudent, consistent, and really meritorious in its character. It has, from its very commencement, maintained a high moral tone, while its literary department has evinced the management of able and discreet minds. Under its present editors and proprietors, the former reputation of the "Post" has not only been fully sustained, but it has been made to excel, in its varied excellencies, and consequently in its popularity, any past period in its existence. More faithful, industrious, and independent caterers for the public, through the medium of the press, we presume are not to be found engaged in its arduous duties in any other city of the Union.

BALM OF THOUSAND FLOWERS.—This is the name of a new article for the toilet, extracted from plants and flowers, and which is of the most agreeable perfume and peculiarly pleasant in its operation. It would be impossible, in a brief notice, to detail all the uses to which it may be applied, or one-half the benefits which are said to result from its application. Suffice it to say that it imparts, as we have been told, a delightful softness to the skin; removes cutaneous eruptions; is an emollient for the hair, giving it a soft and glossy richness; it is not surpassed by any dentifrice for arresting the decay of teeth, in preserving them, and rendering them clean and white as alabaster; for shaving, also, it is superior; and, in short, answers the purpose of some half a dozen compounds now designed for the toilet, the nursery, and the bath, and for all which it has been recommended by the faculty of London and Paris. Peterson, 98 Chestnut Street, is the agent here for Fetridge & Co., of Boston, the patentees of this celebrated compound.

LACEMAKERS OF BOHEMIA.—Recent intelligence from Europe informs us that at present great misery exists among the lacemaking population in the mountain villages of Bohemia. It is stated that the unfortunate people descend in bands upon the low country to beg for subsistence, many perishing of hunger by the wayside. This destitution, and the consequent sufferings, are caused by the famine which has prevailed in several of the most populous districts of Germany. But it is not perhaps generally known, even among those who most highly prize the delicate fabrics of the lacemakers, that those fabrics are made at the cost of sight, of health, and of life. In order that the threads or fibres, of which the finest laces are formed, may sustain sufficient strength to hold together during the operation, the lacemakers are obliged to perform their tasks in damp cellars, into which only a single concentrated ray of light is admitted from above; and, consequently, so destructive upon the sight and the health is the occupation, that they seldom come from their cells until one or both are destroyed. How few of our fashionable ladies reflect upon this melancholy fact, while decorating their persons with the productions of impoverished and life-killing labor!

NEW OPERA HOUSE.—Many of our readers are aware that an act was passed by the last Legislatures of New York and Pennsylvania, authorizing companies in the cities of New York and Philadelphia to erect new Opera Houses on large and magnificent scales, competing with the very best in London or Paris. So far, the movement in both cities is an excellent one; but then there are some of the details, as we have seen them published, which, in our opinion, will prevent the success of any such undertakings. One of the articles before us, in relation to the proposed opera house in Philadelphia, says that, "in order to meet the tastes of all classes of visitors, the house will contain boxes with elegant drawing-rooms attached to each, private inclosed boxes, open private boxes, public boxes, single chairs and sofas, and the boxes varying in capacity from four up to twelve seats." In addition to these exclusive classifications of seats, and of the visitors, we have been told that the stockholders are to form still another class, with their families, who shall be entitled to seats set apart expressly for their convenience. Now, we do not mean to raise a question of precedence, or of equality, in this republican land, but we do intend freely to express the opinion that all such distinction in places of public resort for amusement must fall of receiving the adequate support. In the present state of American society, it will be found impossible to arrange a theatre for classes, without leaving the impression on the mind that the class that occupies the first class boxes are, indeed, assuming to be the first class people; that those occupying the second class boxes are, consequently, a little inferior; and so on down to an imaginary inferiority, which, after all, is only to be discovered in the depth of purses, or in the honesty and prudence which keep certain people within their actual means.

In all attempts to construct or to sustain places of amusement on such principles as have here been laid down, we can see only disappointment and failure. For saying this, we have the example of the Astor Opera House before us, and we have also some reminiscences of the silly attempts that were made a few years since to classify the arrangements, and consequently the visitors, of the Chestnut Street Theatre. The fact is, until we have a law-established nobility, and a permanent aristocracy, such as they have in England and on the continent of enslaved Europe, no such distinctions will be tolerated. Not that there will be a war proclaimed against those who make the attempt; but because the self-respect which is inherent in every American heart will not permit those who attend public theatres or opera houses to submit to classifications, made by those who can only assume to be above them to-day, but who may be far below them, in point of fact, to-morrow.

In these remarks, we beg to be understood as not making the least reference to the worthy and highly respectable gentlemen whose names are included in the act of incorporation. We have been speaking only of the objectionable features of the proposed plan and classifying arrangements of the house, and drawing our arguments from ascertained and long-established public opinion.

In regard to the proposed New York opera house, the same objections have been forcibly urged by a cotemporary. Alluding to the Astor Place Opera House, he says, "The monopoly of the best seats by certain subscribers and stockholders of the Astor Place Opera House, has been the great objection and great drawback to that establishment. To the masses of the rest of the community, it has an appearance of exclusiveness and monopoly which will not be tolerated by them. The stockholders in the new opera house must place themselves on the same level with the rest of the community, and not arrogate any particular rights to themselves, merely because they may have subscribed to, or been stockholders in the speculation."

THE AZTEC CHILDREN.—Along with many thousands of our fellow-citizens, we have paid several most agreeable visits to those diminutive, but perfect specimens of humanity, the Aztec children. As to the origin of these singular little beings we do not feel called upon to give an opinion. They may be just what they are represented to be, or they may have sprung from a very different source. But, whatever else they may be, they are at least very great curiosities, and most wonderful representatives of the diversified family of man. Without waiting, therefore, to make any philosophical inquiries into their beginning, the probable design of their creation, or the end for which they were born into the world, we pass to the simple fact that they have been here in our midst, and have been viewed with astonishment by all beholders. Without being dwarfs, they are certainly the smallest specimens of humanity, fully and even beautifully developed, that have ever been seen or described, except through the imagination of Swift, who, were he consulted by a spiritual medium, would probably recognize them as the veritable offspring of some of his old friends in Lilliput. They have the senses in the ordinary perfection; they are intelligent, playful, and happy; and seem fully to understand that they are the points of attraction which bring together so many curious and admiring people. But what more can we say in regard to these little curiosities, when we see that the learned Medical Convention of Pennsylvania, before whom they were exhibited, could do no more than unanimously resolve that they were highly interesting specimens of diminutive human beings, well worthy the attention of the naturalist and physician. Truly, we have nothing more to add to this explicit declaration than the assurance given by a cotemporary, to the effect that the exhibitors are gentlemen of the most perfect urbanity, and ready to answer all questions relative to the children under their charge. There is nothing repulsive in their appearance; on the contrary, they are rather pleasing objects to contemplate.

Our neighbors, Wagner & McGuigan, have sent us their business card, very beautifully printed in colors, from their lithographic and steam power printing establishment, Athenian Buildings, Franklin Place. We greatly admire the figures and the coloring of the card, and sincerely hope that the spirit of its motto—"Encourage American Arts"—will be amply realized by the encouragement extended to their skill and industry. We have before us a fine specimen of their art, in the portrait of Colonel Thomas B. Florence, representative in Congress from the third district.

We have been favored with several very finely drawn and colored plates from P. S. Duval, of Philadelphia. They were drawn on stone by C. Schuetele, and printed in colors by Mr. Duval, and are very beautiful specimens of the perfection to which the lithographic art has attained. The principal figures are those of Washington and Lafayette, and the "Death Cry," and two most gorgeous representations of flowers. Such efforts to excel will doubtless receive the approbation and patronage of the American public.

We have received several numbers of the "Massasoit Balance and Waltham Advocate," published at Waltham, Mass., by our old and excellent friend, J. F. Kelly, Esq. and Company. Of the company we profess to know nothing, but presume it to be excellent, otherwise our friend would not have fallen into it. Of the principal we can say truly, that he is a good-hearted, clever fellow, a man of talents and of singular humor, and therefore deserving of all the encouragement and prosperity he can receive, through a long list of gentlemanly, paying subscribers to his very neatly printed and ably edited paper.

FITZGERALD'S CITY ITEM.—The other day, this beautiful and ably conducted weekly came to us clothed in a new suite of type, and printed upon white and firm paper. The "ITEM" is now one of the largest and handsomest of our weeklies. All who take an interest in business, literature, the fine arts, music, and the drama, are recommended to subscribe to it. On these, and kindred subjects, it has ever been regarded a first-rate authority. Every family, every gentleman and lady of taste and leisure in the country, should take "Fitzgerald's City Item." It is furnished at the moderate price of two dollars a year, in advance. Address Fitzgerald & Co., 46 South Third Street, Philadelphia (post-paid).

SEVEN MILE MIRROR.—This beautiful picture, or series of pictures, ought to be seen by every person. While in this city, it attracted crowds. Some of the principal scenes depicted are Falls of Niagara, Chippewa, Shores of the St. Lawrence and its numerous Islands, Quebec, Falls of Montmorency, a Snow Storm, &c. The incidental parts are well managed, the light and shade beautifully diversified.

THE sale of the "scrap plates" advertised on our cover has been so great, that we have been obliged to publish a second edition. This will account for the delay to those who have remitted. Several plates have been added, and we again offer this unique collection for fifty cents. The "Michigan Whig," in noticing these engravings, says:—

"GODEY'S GALLERY OF SPLENDID ENGRAVINGS, FROM PICTURES BY

PICTURES BY THE FIRST MASTERS.—This is the title of a collection of some thirty or more beautiful engravings, colored and plain, apparently selected from amongst the most choice which have appeared in the 'Lady's Book.' A more tasteful present for a lady could hardly be devised. The impressions are good, and the collection would form an invaluable contribution to an album, or an appropriate and elegant ornament for a drawing-room table."

A YOUNG AUTHOR ASKS OF US ADVICE.—We commence: In the first place, pay postage on your communications. To be continued.

WE have reason to feel proud of our immense increase for the last three months. It shows that the public, like individuals, never can forget their first love. The "Freeport Journal" says, "Godey's magazine now contains more and better reading than any of the Philadelphia magazines, and it is needless for us to say that, in embellishments, it always has been the best."

The "Danbury Times" comments in this wise: "Godey now gives as much reading matter as other magazines, with the addition of fine steel plates."

WE copy a few from the many complimentary letters daily received. Our exchanges are always true to us and themselves. They have stood by us for twenty-two years, and we most heartily thank them.

No. 1 is a most excellent letter; it contains two points, one complimentary to the "Book," and the other a superb hint to those who owe.

"GREENSBORO, Md.

"MR. L. A. GODEY—SIR: If I were bidden to a marriage or a feast, I doubt much if I would defer my attendance until the eleventh hour; but infinite more delight and profit have I derived from the periodical visits of your valuable 'Book' than the gayeties of one, or even many evenings, however delightful, could afford me; and still I find myself giving suitable acknowledgments only at the last moment. I have thereby not only done you, but myself injustice; for I can never enjoy the reading of a paper or book entirely, with the ghost of a three dollar bill due obtruding itself upon my imagination. I believe the terms are three dollars, if paid within the year, and now, as the twilight of the year is closing around us, I remit you six dollars, my subscription for the past and coming year.

"As good wishes cannot be obtrusive, allow me to say, I hope this gem of the monthlies has a long race yet to run, pleasant and profitable to both readers and editors!

"Respectfully, M. A. T."

No. 2 is a comparative letter:—

"EAST PITTSBORO, Maine.

"MR. GODEY—DEAR SIR: I have the pleasure of sending you four subscribers, to be added to the list of six I sent you before. This will make a club of ten; and I have a prospect of obtaining more.

"Already the merits of 'Godey' and 'Graham' are compared and discussed, most scientifically, by our good people, and I am happy to say the ladies are unanimous in favor of the former. How could it be otherwise?

"Yours, &c., J. T. S."

No. 3 is a letter from an editor, giving his opinion in writing:—

"ROCKERSVILLE, Tenn.

"L. A. GODEY: I can assure you, sir, that I am a friend to your work. Your magazine is doing more good to-day, in my humble opinion, by circulating a fine, high-toned literature throughout the length and breadth of the republic, than any other work. It ought to be a source of pride to you, too, to know that yours is the leading literary periodical of the Union. The others are good; but can only compels their most ardent friends to confess that they are simply imitations of 'Godey's Lady's Book': they are striving to be what you already are.

"It will give me much pleasure to receive your 'Book' monthly during the year '52; and, if I can do you any service in this neighborhood, you have but to inform me to secure immediate attention to it.

"Yours, very truly, L. S. P."

"ARTHUR'S HOME GAZETTE" commences a new year in September. Now is the time to subscribe to this valuable paper. It will be seen by the advertisement on our cover, that we offer the "Lady's Book" one year, and "Arthur's Home Gazette" one year, for four dollars.

In noticing that useful article, the "Sewing Bird," in our June number, we committed an error in the name of the inventor. It should be C. E. Stearns, Middletown, Conn.

WE return our thanks to Jas. R. Armstrong, of Columbus, O., for the "Sixth Annual Report of the Board of Agriculture of the State of Ohio, for the year 1851, to the Fiftieth General Assembly."

OUR subscribers will please remember that we have no travelling agents, and that their remittances must be made directly to us; and that they may do so speedily is our most earnest wish. We sent bills to all subscribers indebted to us in our May number, that each might see the amount of his indebtedness.

Receipts, &c.

THE CURATE'S PUDDING.—To one pound of mashed potatoes, while hot, add four ounces of suet and two ounces of flour, a little salt, and as much milk as will give it the consistency of common suet pudding. Put it into a dish, or roll it into dumplings, and bake a fine brown.

SINGING is exceedingly beneficial in indigestion, as well as in cases of weakness of the lungs; but the opinion of a medical practitioner should be taken before a child, supposed to be consumptive, is allowed to sing; for, if an inflammatory tendency exists, the exertion will be highly dangerous. A liability to indigestion has been cured by regular lessons in singing.

TO MAKE SNOW BALLS.—Swell half a pound of rice in water with a roll of lemon-peel until tender, and drain it. Divide it into five parts, and roll a pared apple, cored, and the hole filled with sugar and cinnamon, into each heap, tying them up tightly in separate cloths. Boil for an hour, and serve with pudding sauce.

TO MAKE CAKES THAT WILL KEEP FOR SOME TIME.—Mix two pounds of flour, one pound of sugar, and one ounce of cereals, with four or five eggs and a few spoonfuls of water, to make a stiff paste; roll it thin, and cut it to any shape. Bake on tins lightly floured. While baking, boil a pound of sugar in a pint of water to a thin syrup; while both are hot, dip each cake into it, and put them on tins into the oven to dry for a short time; and, when the oven is cooler still, return them there again, and let them stay four or five hours.

Centre-Table Gossip.

MODERN PIANO FORTE PLAYING.

WE have a nice, old-fashioned aunt who cannot understand, though she has been a long time trying to, why young ladies are always having "music lessons." In her day, "two quarters," or at most three, were deemed sufficient for that most expensive accomplishment, and the performer was then ready to play quicksteps, marches, reels, and, more latterly, cotillions, for the country round. "The Battle of Prague" was the test of a remarkable execution, and the "Storm Rondo" an Alp on Alps of musical performance, which few had the daring to attempt. But there were Scotch ballads, and sweet Irish, Scotch, and even Italian airs, that moved the listener to sad or pleasant reveries, played with feeling and expression as they often were, which surpassed the triumphs of execution, and fatigued neither the ear nor the attention.

But those unsophisticated days have passed. The importation of European pianists has changed the current of taste, and, especially since the thunders of De Meyer, impossibilities "are your only hearing." Music composed for the most accomplished masters has been republished, and is attempted on all sides by amateurs, who give all the noise and the notes, it is true, but cannot hope to attain the grace and ease which, under the hands of the composers, brought pleasure as well as astonishment. They cannot condescend to play a simple air, even were it one of Rossini's; it is so draped by variations and muffled by "movements," that the composer himself would scarcely recognize a favorite child, in the skipping, tripping, waving, thundering production which it has been educated to. "Oh, play that simple air again!" is a song we can never find use for in these accomplished days. It is to accomplish all these prodigies of execution that the music-master is so constantly "abroad," and fashionable young ladies give so much time and exertion to practice. But the best description we have ever seen of their efforts we quote from the clever pen of Mrs. S. C. Hall, which, like the ruby mouth of the fairy tale princess, is ever dropping pearls of sense or sentiment. The young lady has been invited to play by a gentleman of the old school:—

"She obeyed with prompt politeness. Her white hands, gemmed with jewels, flew over the keys like winged seraphs; they bewildered the eye by the rapidity of their movements. The instrument thundered; but the thunder was so continuous that there was no echo! 'The contrast will come by and by,' thought the disciple of the old school: 'there must be some shadow to throw up the lights.'

"Thunder—crash—thunder—crash—drum—rattle—a confused, though eloquent running backwards and forwards of sounds, the rings flashing like lightning! Another crash—louder—a great deal of crossing hands—violent strides from one end of the instrument to the other—prodigious displays of strength on the part of the fair performer—a terrific shake! 'What desperate exertion!' thought the general; 'and all to produce a soulless noise.' Then followed a fearful banditti of octaves—another crash, louder and more prolonged than the rest; and she looked up with a triumphant smile—a smile conveying the same idea as the pause of an opera-dancer after a most wonderful pirouette.

"Do you keep a tuner in the house, my dear young lady?" inquired the general.

"If a look could have annihilated, he would have crumbled into ashes.

"And that is fashionable music," he continued. "I have lived so long out of England, only hearing the music of Beethoven, and Mozart, and Mendelssohn, I was not aware that noise was substituted for power, and that execution had banished expression. Dear me!—why, the piano is vibrating at this moment! Poor thing! How long does a piano last you?"

OUR WORK-BASKET.

Of course, our centre-table has its work-basket; and acting upon this supposition, we find it, this bright morning, enriched by a package of patent "Helix Drilled-Eyed Needles," of assorted sizes, scissors that would be dear to the lovers of shining English cutlery, and a penknife to mend the pencil with which our desk is expected to be supplied. Our acknowledgments are certainly due to the importers, E. C. Pratt & Brother, of this city, for them, as well as the information with regard to really good needles which we requested from them. Our lady readers must have noticed how easily the eye of a bad needle severs the thread, making those untidy inequalities in the seam, as well as wasting the time of the seamstress. An English house has secured a patent obviating this. The eye of almost every needle, when examined by a microscope, has a spiral series of brilliant and extremely sharp edges. The manufacture of the patent needles obviating this, is thus briefly described: The needles are set up in the machine with great precision in parallel rows, and helices are passed through their eyes with great rapidity, removing even the most microscopic inequality. This explains a fault which ladies often observe, and, at the same time, secures them against annoyances. We have already yielded to the feminine impulse of trying them, and therefore speak from experience of the smoothly gliding thread following their even way.

BOOKS FOR THE CENTRE-TABLE.

We are very apt to form our notions of the members of the home circle from the books we find upon the table, for we know that the spirit partakes of the nature of its sustenance.

The showy annuals, in their gilt bindings, one so often sees, promise little more than graceful, showy girls, as elegant, but as useless, as their favorite light reading. Neither are histories or grave essays exactly in their place in the room where visitors are to be entertained, or cheerful household talk to be carried on. Study has its own consecrated nook, but the household volume should possess its own characteristic of grace, purity, and real interest. We have before mentioned new books that would seem to possess these characteristics, and since then several more have been added to our list.

In strange contrast, we find the lives of "Margaret Fuller" and "Margaret Godolphin," the first the type of the intellectual woman, the latter the embodiment of all domestic and Christian excellence, combined with rare intelligence and elegance of manner.

"Polite as she in courts had ever been;
Yet good as she the world had never seen."

In her journal, in her letters, in the thousand delicate and feminine traits of character recorded by her friend, John Evelyn—himself the pattern of a true gentleman—we find her preserving the purity and dignity of her woman's nature, "keeping her garments white" in the midst of the corruptions of the most dissipated court that ever has sullied the fair fame of England. The touching, yet simple story of her love and death has, withal, its own romance, and we commend the volume especially to our young lady readers as an example that cannot fail to brighten their own hearts and lives.

"Madeline," by Julia Kavanagh, is a tale of peasant love and steadfastness; a delineation of that strong, self-denying, faithful spirit, that seems nursed only amid rugged hills and hardy mountain air. "Madeline" has a word of reproof for those who fold their hands idly in life's harvest-field, because the object they had marked out is taken from them, leaving a lonely home and hearth.

There is also another volume from the same pen, and marked with the same vigorous and delicate characteristics of style and manner. "Women of Christianity," a simple, yet touching record of their faith and charity; the noble Julia and Paula, the faithful Monica, Margaret of Scotland, Elizabeth of Hungary, with many others of later and more modern times, show us a true type of womanhood. Such books as these have more than a passing influence on the home circle, and every mother may safely commend them to her daughter's hands.

The Appleton Brothers, of New York, send us these admirable works, together with "Hearts Unveiled," an American tale, by S. E. Saymore, which has also food for thought.

POETICAL ENIGMA.

We have received several poetical responses to our last enigma, "Lady Grey;" one by Annie E. Rushton, and another by S. W. T. We give one below with rather less sentiment, but one of the very cleverest we ever have seen, for which we solicit the same kind attention.

MY AUNT.

My aunt, at her mansion on Mulberry Green,
Was a kind-hearted lady as ever was seen;
For true hospitality, friendship, and mirth,
There was not a more good-natured creature on earth.
She wrote to me thus: "My dear nephew, come down,
You need relaxation from duties in town;
Dogs, horses, and guns, at your service shall be,
If you like to enjoy a snug fortnight with me.
But as I, upon second thoughts, think you 'll prefer
A young friend to a 'crusty old woman like me,'
You may bring one or two good companions—and all Shall find a warm welcome at Mulberry Hall."

Well, I thought, such a kind invitation as this—
With such pleasures in prospect—'twere folly to miss;
So, with cheerful Bob Goodwill and Theodore Bright,
I spent the first week in incessant delight,
And said, "Aunt, I have profited finely, you see,
By the friendly indulgence you granted to me;
I have strictly adhered to your liberal tone,
And have made your nice house and your servants my own."

Three words, of one syllable each, she replied,
And I cantered off briskly—my blushes to hide.

I soon joined my friends and the bounds in full cry,
And no one could feel more delighted than I.
The breeze was refreshing—the sun's early ray
Was expanding around into beautiful day;
The scent of the hawthorn, the lark in loud song,
So charmed me, as, heedless, I galloped along,
That, careless of all but the bounds and the horns,
We fell in a ditch full of briars and thorns.
With scrambling, and kicking, and pulling, my horse
Was soon out of this awkward dilemma, of course;
But alas, in the struggle, I nearly was stripped,
And every seam in my coat was unript!

My mortification, at seeing my aunt,
In my woful condition, describe it I can't;
She laughed, as my prison I made my way through,
And held out my coat, and said, "What shall I do?"

Her reply was the very same words as before
Pronounced—the real words are for you to explore.

IDLE HOURS.

It is Miss Leslie who says, "We would think a lady never had but two dresses in her life before marriage, by the quantity purchased and made for the bridal." We do not quote the words exactly, perhaps, but such is the sentiment. And a very natural conclusion it seems; this inundation of dresses is a custom as fixed and unalterable as that which insists on every stitch in the whole trousseau being set, leaving the poor bride nothing but folded hands after the wedding-day is over. The hurry of six months is succeeded by an appalling calm; there is not even the lace of a cap or handkerchief to be sewn on, or an apron to be hemmed; and listless ennui threatens the bride of a month.

We have lately heard of one—a sober, New England citywoman—who was discovered sitting on the carpet of her elegantly furnished apartment playing solitaire, the cards spread out upon an ottoman before her. What a picture to illustrate our theme—the husband gone to business, the wife tired of the piano, too heedless for reading, and with an empty work-basket! We should have prescribed a set of house-linen immediately; there is nothing like the needle to tranquillize the mind and raise the spirits, if taken moderately. It reminds one of the old song—

I don't care two and sixpence now,
For anything in life;
My days of fun are over now,
I'm married and a wife!
I'm sick of sending wedding-cake,
And eating wedding-dinners,
And all the fun that people make
With newly-wed beginners.

I wonder if this state be what
Folks call the honey-moon?
If so, upon my word, I hope
It will be over soon!
I cannot read, I cannot think,
All plans are at an end;
I scarcely know one thing to do—
My time I cannot spend!

Think of it, ye fair fiancées, and, by the warning, do not exhaust your stock of work and plans; for, where idleness is, discontent is sure to creep in.

Fashions.

NOTICE TO LADY SUBSCRIBERS.

Having had frequent applications for the purchase of jewelry, millinery, etc., by ladies living at a distance, the Editress of the Fashion Department will hereafter execute commissions for any who may desire it, with the charge of a small percentage for the time and research required. Bridal wardrobes, spring and autumn bonnets, dresses, jewelry, bridal cards, cake boxes, envelopes, etc. etc., will be chosen with a view to economy, as well as taste; and boxes or packages forwarded by express to any part of the country. For the last, distinct directions must be given.

Orders, accompanied by checks for the proposed expenditure, to be addressed to the care of L. A. Godey, Esq., who will be responsible for the amount, and the early execution of commissions.

Instructions to be as minute as is possible, accompanied by a note of the height, complexion, and general style of the person, on which much depends in choice. Dress goods from Levy's or Stewart's, bonnets from Miss Wharton's, jewelry from Bailey's, Warden's, Philadelphia, or Tiffany's, New York, if requested.

THE NURSERY.

We have long since promised a continuation of our nursery articles, and now that the August dearth of news items gives us space, we go on to the consideration of that important point in a child's toilet, the introduction of short clothes.

The age at which this becomes advisable is somewhat a matter of opinion and circumstance, some mothers adopting the abbreviation as early as four months, others keeping the graceful sweep of long drapery twice that time. The season, too, must be consulted. It is not advisable to expose the little creature to the chance of taking cold in the severity of winter, or the inclemency of fall and spring. But somewhere between the ages of four and eight months the newcomer seems to crave a freer use of limb than the swaddling clothes will permit; and the disposition to creep about the carpet which now becomes developed, is also impeded by them.

Many mothers lay aside the long dresses, and procure an entirely new wardrobe, which should be made up, save the skirt, much after the fashion of those for which we have already given directions. Others think it easier to tuck up the skirts, and, if need be, widen the waists of the dresses already in use. It is decided economy to keep a child in white until it is a year old. It then always looks neat and clean, and its clothes are easily taken care of. Bird-eye aprons, made to come a little below the waist, will be found most serviceable, much more so than cambric or gingham. The material may be somewhat expensive at first, but it wears better than any other, and, when washed, always has a fresh, sweet look, appreciated, though perhaps not understood, by all fathers and uncles expected to kiss and admire. It is never in good taste to have aprons much trimmed; the neck may have its narrow edge of embroidery, but nothing more is needed.

For outside garments, there is the summer and winter cloak, the cap and hood. Caps seem now to be altogether the style for a child of a year old and under; indeed, some mothers retain them after they are old enough to go toddling along by the nurse's side. Those most in use are of spotted Grecian net, fitting the head well, and lined throughout with a silk of some delicate shade. The border is a double ruche, also of wash or silk illusion, and the trimming consists of large rosettes, on one or both sides, composed of very narrow satin ribbon of the same hue as the lining. Blue is the favorite color; but a straw or pink tint is not unfrequently seen. For ordinary country wear, there is a neat drawn muslin cape bonnet, that can be washed and starched, and is never in any danger of spoiling. It is made of plain or drawn muslin, or cambric; the sharer the material the better, in our opinion. The brim is somewhat stiffened by cords, the crown plain and slightly elevated, with a bow at the back, of the same. For little girls of two years, white and blue silk drawn hats, of close cottage shape, are made, or light fancy straws. For boys, leghorn flats, with a narrow, rolling brim, are now in season, trimmed with a straw band and tassels, or white satin ribbon and small feather. There is also a straw cap that is very becoming for boys a little older, and less expensive flats of China pearl, plain braid, etc. We shall note the change in the fall, to felt hats and velvet caps, of Oakford or Genin patterns.

Very pretty summer cloaks for infants are made of white muslin or cambric, with a long, full skirt, and a round hood, lined with silk, instead of a cape. They will be found very convenient; and we have seen one at Miss Wharton's rooms, ordered for the South, of exquisite embroidered muslin, lined throughout with white Florence silk. The hood was also embroidered with a wreath, and drawn up with a broad bow and pendants of white pearl-edged ribbon. The edge was trimmed with costly Valenciennes, and the whole effect was wonderfully airy and delicate.

Winter cloaks are composed mostly of plain-colored cashmeres and merinos, embroidered either in braid or silk. The cost at a furnishing store is from ten to twenty-five dollars, according to the richness of material and decoration. A favorite style is a cloak made in the ordinary way, with a sacque with sleeves over it, that can also be removed and worn separately in warmer weather. The embroidery surrounds the cloak, cape, and sleeves, the edge being a deep button-hole scallop. The most elegant are of white cashmere, lined throughout with white silk, the pattern being a deep wreath of grapes and tendrils. Mouse color, or fawn, lined with the same shade, and edged only with a deep scallop, will be found far more economical and serviceable.

Fig. 1.

Fig. 2.

Fig. 3.

Fig. 1 is a still newer French pattern, of white cashmere, with a hood of the same, that can be drawn up over the child's cap in damp or boisterous weather. It is lined throughout with silk, and trimmed with narrow braid, satin finish; lappels make it the more secure.

Fig. 2 is a very elaborate dress for a little girl of three or four years of age. It is of white cambric, the front of the skirt en tablier, or apron fashion, composed of rows of narrow tucks and alternate rich embroidery. The waist and sleeves are in the same style.

Fig. 3. Also a dress for a little girl, of tucked India or Nansook muslin. The tucks upon the skirt form the heading to two deep scalloped ruffles. The waist has a slight basque, also tucked and ruffled, and the sleeves correspond.

We give these as late and graceful fashions; but, nevertheless, recalling our first nursery rule to the attention of young mothers—the more simply a child is dressed, as a general thing, the better the effect.

A profusion of buttons, and cords, and gimps, is never in good taste, or, more especially, a mixture of the three. An undue quantity of braiding always gives a tawdry effect, reminding one of the "infant phenomenon," whose nankeens were "bedecked with braid, buttons, and gingerbread." For little boys hovering between dresses and the first pair of "pantaloons," we recommend short trousers or drawers of white linen, and cambric sacques of plain colors, pale green, blue, pink, or buff, with a narrow edge of white braid in parallel rows. They should be made low in the neck, very loose, and with short sleeves. A broad belt of patent leather will confine them sufficiently at the waist. For the street, high brown-linen aprons, of sacque pattern, are a sufficient protection, the belt to be worn upon the outside, sleeves long.

SCOTT'S WEEKLY PAPER

IS THE LARGEST FAMILY JOURNAL IN THE UNITED STATES. It has been acknowledged by the press, for six years past, and thousands of subscribers in letters to the publisher, as decidedly the best now published for

THE FAMILY CIRCLE, THE FARMER,
THE BUSINESS MAN, THE ARTISAN,
THE HOUSEWIFE, AND THE MAN OF LEISURE.

And, since its enlargement, it surpasses anything in the newspaper line ever attempted. It is conceded by all to be

THE FAVORITE FAMILY NEWSPAPER.

THE CONGRESSIONAL PROCEEDINGS are given in full during the sessions of Congress, and correspondents in most of the principal cities keep our readers advised of every incident of note occurring there. In matters of News our Paper is second to none.

THE BEST ORIGINAL TALES AND STORIES

appear in Scott's Weekly Paper, and every attention is paid to procuring CHOICE POETRY, Select Reading, the LATEST NEWS from all parts of the Globe, Reports of Markets, Stock Tables, Rates of Discount, &c. &c.

FORTY COLUMNS OF READING MATTER!

OBSERVE.—There is no deception in this statement. The forty columns are full length; each column is of the usual newspaper width, and is two feet six and a half inches long.

The best way to determine the size and quality of newspapers is to send for specimens, before subscribing or making up Clubs. We prefer that our paper should be selected for its merits alone.

The publisher is not connected with any other publication, and his whole time and attention are devoted to his favorite Weekly Paper. It will be perceived that, notwithstanding the size and character of the journal, the prices to Clubs are less than those of any other first-class journal in the world.

LOWEST TERMS:

|                   |           |       |     |   |            |   |   |     |  |
|-------------------|-----------|-------|-----|---|------------|---|---|-----|--|
| One Copy,         | one year, | - - - | $2 |   |            |   |   |     |  |
| Two Copies,       | "         | - - - | 3   | - | Full price | - | - | $4 |  |
| Four Copies,      | "         | - - - | 5   | - | "          | - | - | 8   |  |
| Ten Copies,       | "         | - - - | 10  | - | "          | - | - | 20  |  |
| Twenty-one Copies | "         | - - - | 20  | - | "          | - | - | 42  |  |

And an extra premium to the getter-up of the clubs of ten and twenty. To insure the paper at the club rates, which are lower by 20 per cent. than any paper of equal size and character has ever been offered at, the full complement should be ordered at one time. Additions to clubs will be made at the same rates.

17 Copies of Scott's Weekly Paper will be sent as specimens to any address desired.

Address ANDREW SCOTT, Publisher,
No. 116 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

IMMENSE INCREASE OF READING MATTER!

NEW VOLUME OF GODEY'S LADY'S BOOK, Commencing with July the Forty-fifth Volume.

Twenty-third year of Godey's Lady's Book, and during the whole of that time it has been published by L. A. Godey. There is no other instance in America of a work having been for so long a period under the superintendence of one person.

TERMS FOR GODEY'S LADY'S BOOK FROM JULY TO DECEMBER INCLUSIVE.

|                                                                               |         |                      |      |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------|----------------------|------|
| 1 copy six months,                                                            | $1 50. | 2 copies six months, | $3. |
| 5 copies six months and a copy for six months to the person sending the club, | $5.    |                      |      |
| 8 " " " " " " " "                                                             | 7 50.   |                      |      |
| 10 " " " " " " " "                                                            | 10      |                      |      |

Small notes of the different States are received at par for Godey's Lady's Book.

Where a club is made up by individuals who reside at a distance from each other, the Book will be sent to the town in which each resides.

Additions of one or more to clubs are received at club prices.

REGISTER your letters, and, when remitting, get your postmaster to write on the letter "Registered." The money will then come safely. Remember, we have no traveling agents now, and all money must be sent direct to the publisher.

A Specimen or Specimens will be sent to any Postmaster making the request.

We can always supply back numbers for the year, as the work is stereotyped.

The Lady's Book is for sale by all Booksellers in the United States.

Address, L. A. GODEY,
No. 113 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

GAS FIXTURES.

ARCEER & WARNER,

No. 119 CHESTNUT STREET, PHILADELPHIA,
MANUFACTURERS,

WOULD INVITE THE ATTENTION OF PURCHASERS TO THEIR EXTENSIVE ASSORTMENT OF NEW PATTERNED
CHANDELIERS, BRACKETS, PENDANTS, LAMPS, GIRONDALES, &c. &c.

They also introduce GAS PIPES into public buildings and dwellings, and attend to all kinds of Gas Work, including repairing and extending Gas Pipe.
Gas Fitters supplied with BRASS FITTINGS, AIR PUMPS, and every article connected with the trade.

ARTHUR'S HOME GAZETTE FOR 1852.

THE "HOME GAZETTE," through the Editor's untiring efforts to produce a weekly family paper combining the highest degree of interest and instruction, with an entire

FREEDOM FROM VULGARITY, LOW SLANG, PROFANITY,

OR ANYTHING THAT CAN CORRUPT OR DEPRAVE THE MIND, has already gained a circulation that is exceeded only by a single one of the Philadelphia weekly literary papers, and won the fullest confidence of a virtuous and discriminating public. In their Prospectus, for 1852, the publishers have little to say beyond what has already been said. They have given to

T. S. ARTHUR, THE EDITOR,

entire control of the paper. Not a line goes in without his supervision; and he is, therefore, responsible for all that appears therein. So that just the same confidence felt in him by the public, as a sound and safe moral teacher, may be felt in his "HOME GAZETTE," which is emphatically

A supporter of Religion and Virtue, and the conservator of good morals and social well-being.

In the ORIGINAL LITERARY DEPARTMENT, no magazine in the country is better sustained than the "Home Gazette." Besides a regular series of articles from many of the best writers in the country,

Nearly all that the Editor writes will appear first in the "Home Gazette."

In order to keep the columns of our paper perfectly free from all that may injure either body or mind, ALL MEDICAL ADVERTISEMENTS WILL BE EXCLUDED; AND, ALSO, ALL ADVERTISEMENTS OF BAD BOOKS, OR ANYTHING THAT CAN DO HARM.

The "HOME GAZETTE" is printed on white paper, with LARGE CLEAR TYPE.

TERMS OF "ARTHUR'S HOME GAZETTE."

|                      |   |   |   |        |                        |   |   |   |         |
|----------------------|---|---|---|--------|------------------------|---|---|---|---------|
| One copy, per annum, | - | - | - | $2 00 | Ten copies, per annum, | - | - | - | $15 00 |
| Three copies "       | - | - | - | 5 00   | Fourteen copies "      | - | - | - | 20 00   |
| Six copies "         | - | - | - | 10 00  |                        |   |   |   |         |

ARTHUR'S HOME GAZETTE and GODEY'S LADY'S BOOK, one year, FOUR DOLLARS.

Where a club of six, ten, or fourteen copies are sent, an extra copy will be furnished to the postmaster, or other person, who makes up the club.

✍ Money current in the States from which subscriptions are sent will be taken at par at this office.

✍ In making up Clubs for the "HOME GAZETTE," it is not required that subscribers shall be at the same post-office.

✍ Additions of single subscribers can always be made to a Club at the regular Club price.

Address, post-paid, T. S. ARTHUR & Co.,
No. 107 Walnut Street, Philadelphia.

GODEY'S LADY'S BOOK

ONE YEAR, AND

ARTHUR'S HOME GAZETTE

ONE YEAR,

WILL BE SENT TO ANY PERSON OR PERSONS ON RECEIPT OF FOUR DOLLARS.

OR, THE "LADY'S BOOK" AND "ILLUSTRATED FAMILY FRIEND," PUBLISHED AT COLUMBIA, S. C., FOR FOUR DOLLARS.

THE WHOLE WORK COMPLETE FOR TEN DOLLARS.

THE
NATIONAL PORTRAIT GALLERY

DISTINGUISHED AMERICANS,

Now Publishing in Numbers, at TWENTY-FIVE CENTS each;

THE WHOLE TO BE COMPLETED IN FORTY NUMBERS,

Making four handsome volumes, bound in two.

Containing upwards of One Hundred and Twenty Engraved Portraits

THE MOST EMINENT PERSONS

WHO HAVE OCCUPIED A PLACE IN THE HISTORY OR COTEMPORARY ANNALS

THE UNITED STATES.

All of which are executed on STEEL, by the best Artists, and from the most esteemed likenesses known, or extant; and each Portrait accompanied by a concise, authentic, and characteristic Biographical Sketch of the individual: in the preparation of which, the work has been aided by the ablest writers in the country: and recourse has been had invariably to the most competent and unequivocal authorities in the statement of facts.

THIS splendid and truly American work, being published only by subscription, a brief account of its design and progress can scarcely be otherwise than acceptable, especially to all who desire to possess themselves of such an interesting record of their country's greatness as displayed in its pages, and its pictorial illustrations. A more favorable time than the present can scarcely occur for a proper estimate of its merits; or obtaining the entire series of Portraits and Memoirs, which it will include. The publication is sufficiently advanced to demonstrate the excellence of its execution, while by the terms of subscription yet offered, its acquisition will require but a small expense.

The National Portrait Gallery of Distinguished Americans is intended to preserve the Portraits of distinguished individuals of our own and earlier times, to embrace in its pages the most important points in their lives and characters; its design has at the same time nothing in common with the promotion of party views of any kind; it aims in this respect at the strictest impartiality, both in the selection of subjects, and the exposition of character.

The object of the work is to perpetuate the memory of DISTINGUISHED AMERICANS, of our own and earlier times, by preserving their Portraits and Biography, giving their features and expression of countenance, and the most important points in their lives and characters. The object, in fact, is, to save from oblivion our friends and benefactors; the Fathers of our Nation, and her gifted sons; those eminent as Statesmen and Warriors; those distinguished for their genius, talents and acquirements, in the field of Literature and Science, or in the field of Battle, on the land or on the ocean; those distinguished by their agency in laying the foundation of our independence, in rearing or fitting up the Temple of Liberty; or by the rank they sustain in their profession, or by promoting the great objects of Society, or the cause of Freedom.

In the execution of the task, it is evident that the Publishers are not sparing of either pains or expense, that they may do it with fidelity and skill, while they aim, we believe, at the strictest impartiality, both in selection of subjects, and the exposition of character.

America is the New World, but in the Constellation of her genius, in the stars which stud her mental firmament, are those which shed as pure and clear a radiance, a light as steady and intense, and which beam with as rich a glory, as those of any other to which the astronomer can point us.

"But America has been reproached for the want of attractive specimens of those Fine Arts," employed in handing down to posterity correct portraits of her worthies.—"This is owing to the little encouragement that has heretofore been extended to this species of industry, which has kept some men of talents in the back ground, while others have bid their country good night, and gone in search of better fortunes in transatlantic regions." In Europe the Arts are celebrated in Poetry and Song—Orators take fire at the theme—Subjects are made tributary to their service—Kings and Princes step from their thrones to foster, to cherish, to patronise the arts and reward her artists.—And we need not say what radiance, and solid benefits, the Fine Arts have yielded to the Nations by whom they have been most loved and perfected. Examples of great men beget a moral emulation, that descends fruitfully from age to age. No nation is prouder, or more justly proud, of her distinguished sons than America.

"A proud inheritance we claim,
In all their sufferings, all their fame;
Their deeds of old renown inspire
The bosom with our fathers' fire."

Their names are associated with all the valued institutions of our land

"These our immortal sages wrought,
Out of the deepest mines of thought."

And can any true patriot, a proud son of the proudest ornaments of our country be willing that such a work should be proposed—an eternal monument of the wisdom the bravery, the accomplishments of the enterprising Fathers of the nation—and not record his name among the foremost to encourage this laudable effort to rescue so important a matter from oblivion? Let this attempt fail, and a few years pass away, and where will be materials for this truly National Work? gone! the waters of Lethe will have covered them, and they will rest with the days beyond the flood.

The work will, without fail, be completed in 40 numbers, and will be finished on or before the first of July, 1853.—The first number is issued on the first of July, 1852—The second will be published on the 1st of August, and one number will be regularly issued every week thereafter. Each number will contain three Portraits.

We will have the work, when completed, handsomely bound (for subscribers only) in two volumes, morocco, embossed sides, and gilt edges,—costing $6.00 for the two volumes, which makes only $16.00 for the whole work, bound

Persons throughout the Union, by remitting us the subscription price, TEN DOLLARS, will have a copy of the work sent to them regularly every week, per mail, free of postage. A specimen number will be sent on the receipt of twenty-five cents.

ROBERT E. PETERSON & CO., PUBLISHERS,

North-West corner of Fifth and Arch Streets,

PHILADELPHIA.

Agents wanted in every part of the Union to obtain subscribers for the above work.

LIST OF PORTRAITS

CONTAINED IN THE

NATIONAL PORTRAIT GALLERY

OF

DISTINGUISHED AMERICANS.

---

VOL. I

GEORGE WASHINGTON, First President of the United States. (Two Portraits.)
 MARTHA WASHINGTON, Consort of George Washington.
 THOMAS JEFFERSON, Third President of the United States.
 JOHN HANCOCK, President of Congress, Governor of Massachusetts, &c.
 CHARLES CARROLL, of Carrollton, last survivor of the Signers of the Declaration of Ind.
 WINFIELD SCOTT, Major General U. S. Army.
 ANTHONY WAYNE, Major General U. S. Army.
 THOMAS MACDONOUGH, Commodore U. S. Navy
 WASHINGTON IRVING, Author of "The Sketch Book," "Life of Columbus," &c.
 WILLIAM WHITE, D. D., Bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church in Pennsylvania.
 JOHN MARSHALL, Chief Justice of the United States.
 LEWIS CASS, Senator from Michigan, &c.
 ANDREW JACKSON, Seventh President of the U. S.
 J. FENIMORE COOPER, Author of "The Spy," "Naval History of the United States," &c.
 PATRICK HENRY, First Republican Governor of Virginia, &c.
 JOHN C. CALHOUN, Senator from South Carolina, &c.
 WILLIAM MOULTRIE, Major General U. S. Army.
 HENRY CLAY, Senator from Kentucky, &c.
 DANIEL WEBSTER, Senator from Massachusetts, &c.
 WILLIAM WIRT, Attorney General, &c.
 TIMOTHY DWIGHT, D. D., President of Yale College, &c.
 JOEL BARLOW, Author of "The Columbiad," Minister to France, &c.
 JOHN TRUMBULL, President of the American Academy of the Fine Arts.
 JOHN JAY, Chief Justice of New York, Minister to England and Spain, &c.
 JOHN E. HOWARD, Colonel U. S. Army, Senator from Maryland, &c.
 GILBERT STUART, Painter.
 ISRAEL PUTNAM, Major General U. S. Army.
 ALEXANDER HAMILTON, Secretary of the Treasury, &c.
 OLIVER H. PERRY, Commodore U. S. Navy.

VOL. II.

BENJAMIN FRANKLIN. (Two Portraits.)
 JAMES MONROE, Fifth President of the U. S.
 JOSEPH WARREN, Major General, fell at the battle of Bunker Hill.
 HENRY KNOX, Major General and Secretary of War
 JOHN BROOKS, Major General and Governor of Massachusetts.
 DAVID RITTENHOUSE, President of American Philosophical Society, &c.
 EDWARD PREBLE, Commodore U. S. Navy.
 DAVID WOOSTER, First Major General of the Militia of Connecticut.
 DANIEL BOONE, Pioneer of Kentucky, Colonel, &c.
 JOHN BARRY, Commodore U. S. Navy.
 PHILIP SCHUYLER, Major General, Senator from New York, &c.
 NOAH WEBSTER, Author of the "American Dictionary of the English Language."
 JAMES KENT, Chancellor of the State of New York.
 ROBERT Y. HAYNE, Senator from South Carolina, &c.
 JAMES A. BAYARD, Senator from Delaware, &c.
 LEVI WOODBURY, Secretary of the Treasury, &c.
 CASPAR WISTAR, M. D., Professor of Anatomy in the University of Pennsylvania.
 DE WITT CLINTON, Governor of New York.
 DAVID HUMPHREYS, Brigadier General, &c.
 DAVID HOSACK, M. D., Professor of Materia Medica, N. Y.
 JOHN DICKINSON, Pres. of the Executive Council of Pa., Author of the Farmers' Letters, &c.
 DANIEL MORGAN, Brigadier General U. S. Army.
 FISHER AMES, Representative from Massachusetts.
 JOHN PAUL JONES, Commodore U. S. Navy.

DAVID RAMSAY, M. D., Historian of the Revolution, of South Carolina, &c.
 ARTHUR ST. CLAIR, Major General U. S. Army.
 FRANCIS MARION, Brigadier General U. S. Army.
 ANDREW PICKENS, Brigadier General U. S. Army.
 HENRY LEE, Brigadier General U. S. Army.

VOL. III.

JAMES MADISON, Fourth President of the U. S. (Two Portraits.)
 MRS. D. P. MADISON, Consort of Jas. Madison.
 LACHLAN MCINTOSH, Major General U. S. Army.
 WM. A. WASHINGTON, Brigadier General U. S. Army.
 JAMES JACKSON, Brigadier General U. S. Army, Governor of Georgia, &c.
 RICHARD DALE, Commodore U. S. Navy.
 WILLIAM BAINBRIDGE, Commodore U. S. Navy.
 STEPHEN DECATUR, Commodore U. S. Navy.
 RUFUS KING, Senator from New York, &c.
 STEPHEN VAN RENSSELAER, Major General and Lieutenant Governor of N. Y., &c.
 WILLIAM PINCKNEY, Senator from Maryland, &c.
 ROBERT FULTON, Artist, Inventor of the Steamboat, &c.
 LINDLEY MURRAY, Author of "Power of Religion on the Mind," English Grammar, &c.
 CHARLES BROCKDEN BROWN, Author of "Arthur Mervyn," &c.
 JOSEPH STORY, Associate Justice of the U. S.
 WILLIAM HENRY HARRISON, Ninth President of the U. S.
 MARTIN VAN BUREN, Eighth President of the U. S.
 OLIVER ELLSWORTH, Chief Justice of the United States.
 JONATHAN TRUMBULL, Governor of Connecticut.
 ROBERT MORRIS, Financier, &c.
 JOHN RUTLEDGE, Governor of South Carolina.
 HENRY LAURENS, President of Congress, &c.
 THOMAS PINCKNEY, Major General, Governor of S. C., &c.
 RICHARD MONTGOMERY, Major General commanding, and falling at Quebec.
 THOMAS SUMPTER, Major General and Senator from South Carolina.
 THOMAS MIFFLIN, Major General, Governor of Pennsylvania, &c.
 THOMAS McKEAN, Governor of Pennsylvania, &c.
 FRANCIS HOPKINSON, Judge of the Admiralty for the State of Pennsylvania.
 JOSHUA BARNEY, Commodore U. S. Navy.

VOL. IV.

JOHN ADAMS, Second President of the United States.
 ABIGAIL ADAMS, Consort of John Adams.
 SAMUEL ADAMS, Governor of Massachusetts, &c.
 CHARLES COTESWORTH PINCKNEY, Major General, &c.
 SAMUEL CHASE, Associate Justice of the U. S.
 R. R. LIVINGSTON, Chancellor of the State of New York.
 JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, Sixth President of the U. S.
 LOUISE C. ADAMS, Consort of J. Quincy Adams.
 EDWARD EVERETT, LL. D., Governor of Massachusetts, Pres. of Harvard University, &c.
 NATHANIEL BOWDITCH, LL. D., F. R. S., Mathematician, &c.
 THOMAS SAY, Naturalist.
 JOHN W. FRANCIS, M. D., Professor of Forensic Medicine, &c., N. Y.
 NATHANIEL GREENE, Major General U. S. Army.
 EDMUND P. GAINES, Major General U. S. Army.
 WM. C. C. CLAIBORNE, Governor of Louisiana.
 JOHN RANDOLPH, Senator from Virginia, &c.
 JOHN MCLEAN, Associate Justice of the U. S.
 LYDIA H. SIGOURNEY, Authoress of Zinzendorf and other Poems.
 ISAAC SHELBY, First Governor of Kentucky, &c.
 EDWARD LIVINGSTON, Author of the Code of Louisiana, &c.
 BENJ. LINCOLN, Major General and Secretary of War.
 BENJ. RUSH, M. D., Professor of the Institutes and Practice of Medicine in the University of Pa.
 JOHN BOUVIER, Author of the Institutes of American Law, Law Dictionary, &c.
 HENRY W. LONGFELLOW, Poet.
 JOHN TYLER, Tenth President of the U. S.
 JAMES K. POLK, Eleventh President of the U. S.
 ZACHARY TAYLOR, Twelfth President of the U. S.
 GEO. BANCROFT, Historian.
 WM. H. PRESCOTT, Historian.
 MILLARD FILLMORE, Thirteenth President of the U. S.

THE WIFE.

Engraved expressly for Godey's Lady's Book.

FASHION PLATES

FOR DECORATING PARLOR WINDOWS,

No. 1.

No. 2.

HINGLEY

IN THE NEWEST PARIS STYLES,

From the celebrated establishment of W. H. CARRYL, No. 169 Chestnut Street, corner of Fifth.
(For description, see page 288.)

ADELAIDE POLKA,

BY THOS. A'BECKETT.

COMPOSED EXPRESSLY FOR GODEY'S LADY'S BOOK.

PIANO. p

cres. f PED.

This page contains musical notation for a piano piece, organized into two systems of staves. The notation includes various musical elements such as notes, rests, and dynamic markings.

System 1 (Left):

- Staff 1 (Treble Clef): Contains a series of notes, including a triplet of eighth notes. A dynamic marking of f (forte) is present.
- Staff 2 (Bass Clef): Contains a series of notes, including a triplet of eighth notes. A dynamic marking of f (forte) is present.

System 2 (Right):

- Staff 3 (Treble Clef): Contains a series of notes, including a triplet of eighth notes. A dynamic marking of f (forte) is present.
- Staff 4 (Bass Clef): Contains a series of notes, including a triplet of eighth notes. A dynamic marking of f (forte) is present.

Additional markings and symbols include:

- PED. (Pedal): Marked at the beginning of the first system.
- DOLCE. (Dolce): Marked at the beginning of the second system.
- D. C. (Da Capo): Marked at the end of the second system.
- Triplet markings: Indicated by a '3' over a bracketed group of notes.
- Accents: Marked with a small 'L' over a note.
- Dynamic markings: f (forte) and DOLCE. (Dolce).

COTTAGE FURNITURE.

Fig. 1.

Fig. 2.

Fig. 3.

Fig. 4.

Fig. 5.

Fig. 6.

Fig. 7.

Fig. 1 is a bench for the hall, in the old Gothic style.

Figs. 2, 3, 4, and 5 are fancy chairs in the Gothic style, suitable for drawing-rooms and parlors.

Fig. 6 is a table for the drawing-room, with rich mouldings.

Fig. 7 is a circular drawing-room table of a rich pattern.

GODEY'S

LADY'S BOOK.

PHILADELPHIA, SEPTEMBER, 1852.

EVERYDAY ACTUALITIES.—NO. IV.

ILLUSTRATED WITH PEN AND GRAVER.

BY C. T. HINCKLEY.

CALICO-PRINTING (Continued).

CALENDERING.

A TERM said to be corrupted from cylindering, and signifying the finishing process in the manufacture of cotton or linen goods, by which they are passed between cylinders or rollers, and made of a level and uniform surface. When such goods have been bleached and washed, they are generally entangled and twisted, so as to be unfit for passing at once between the cylinders: they are therefore passed over the surface of a water cistern, kept constantly full, and as they thus make their way to the rollers, they unfold and accommodate themselves to the water, and are prepared as effectually as if by hand. But the action of the first pair of rollers does not spread or smooth the cloth effectually, neither does it dry it: it has, therefore, to be pulled out breadthwise, and the edges knocked against a smooth beating-stock. Pieces are also stitched together by a sailor's needle, to prepare them for the mangle. The domestic mangle will be noticed presently; but that used for calendering does not at all resemble it. It consists of a number of rollers, fixed in a strong upright frame; the rollers being forced together by levers, to which a considerable weight is attached, or by means of screws, as in calendering machine. In some mangles, the bottom rollers are grooved, the grooves gradually spreading from the right to the left on either side. The effect of this is to remove creases, by spreading out and extending the cloth as it passes between them. Above these are three smooth rollers, two of wood and one of brass, in passing between which the surface is equalized, and the cloth stretched. It is then wound upon a roller, ready to be starched.

The starch used in calendering is made from flour, deprived of gluten by fermentation in water, in the proportion of a pound of flour to a gallon of water. The whole is passed through a sieve after fermentation, and this separates the bran. The flour is then boiled, and a small quantity of indigo added, to give it a blue color, after which more water is added, according to the degree of stiffness to be given to the goods. This liquid is frequently thickened with porcelain clay, or calcined plaster of Paris, or both, in order to give an appearance of strength and thickness to the cloth. This all disappears as soon as the goods are washed; therefore it merely makes them more attractive to the eye of the purchaser. The practice was originally deceptive; but it can scarcely be called so now that it is generally adopted, and is perfectly well known to the great majority of buyers.

EMBOSSING MACHINE.

The method of applying the starch is by a stiffening mangle, formed of rollers of brass and wood

DAMPING MACHINE.

pressed together by levers, the pressure being regulated by the quantity of starch required to be left in the material. The starch is contained in a trough, into which a roller dips, and the cloth, in passing under this roller, becomes filled with starch, the superfluous part of which is pressed out again by the upper rollers and falls back into the trough. The next operation is drying, which, in the more substantial goods, is effected by passing the goods over large tinned iron or copper cylinders (see drying cylinders in calico-printing), heated by being filled with steam; but, for muslins, the process merely consists of stretching out the material on long frames in a warm room. This is done with such celerity, that two young women can stretch a piece twenty-five yards long, and fasten it to the frame, by pressing down numerous clamps prepared for that purpose, in the space of two minutes. The piece is from ten to fifteen minutes in drying, and is then transferred to the making-up room. But, in some cases, it receives on the frames what is called the patent finish; that is, as soon as it is stretched, the two long sides of the frame are made to work backwards and forwards in opposite directions, giving the muslin a diagonal motion, which is continued till it is quite dry. The effect of this is to remove the harsh and stiff appearance which the starch would otherwise produce, and to make the muslin very clear and elastic. It has, in fact, the same effect as the beating and clapping of muslin articles by the laundress, in what is called clear-starching.

The finish for cotton goods often consists of a glazing, which is distinctively and especially known as calendering, and which gives a bright and beautiful gloss to the material. But this must first be damped by passing slowly over the damping or degging-machine, containing a circular brush, the points of which, as they rapidly revolve, just touch the surface of the water, and dash up a cloud of fine spray against the cloth. This being completed, and the whole of the cloth uniformly damped, it now passes to the calendering machine—a number of rollers contained in a massive framework. The rollers are connected with a long lever loaded with weights at the further extremity, by which, or by means of screws, almost any amount of force may be obtained, and the surface texture of the cloth varied at pleasure. With considerable pressure between smooth rollers, a soft and silky lustre is given by the equal flattening of all the threads. By passing two folds at the same time between the rollers, the threads of one make an impression on the other, and give a wiry appearance with hollows between the threads. This may be varied at pleasure. The article of “watered silk” is produced in the same manner. Two pieces of ribbed silk are run between cylinders, which has the effect of watering each piece. By folding a silk handkerchief in the middle, and holding it up to the light, an idea may be formed of the principle of watering. It will be taken for granted by those who have never witnessed the operations, that the rollers are all of iron; but this is not the case: they are of cast-iron, wood, paper, or calico, according to the uses for which they are designed. Great care is taken in the construction of the rollers, whatever the material; and those of paper are far from being so fragile as the nature of the substance would seem to imply, for they are, in fact, a mass of circular disks of pasteboard, threaded upon a square bar of wrought iron, and secured by iron disks at each end. These disks are screwed down tightly together, making a solid cylinder, which is placed in a stove and kept at a high temperature for several days, to drive off all moisture, when the screws are tightened and the cylinder becomes remarkably dense and hard, so much so that, in being finished at a turning-lathe, it blunts all the tools employed, and requires two men to be kept constantly at work sharpening them. Copper-embossed rollers are also kept in great variety for producing figures and patterns on velvet goods. The water surface is produced by passing the goods in a very damp state through the calender with hot or cold rollers, plain or indented, and sometimes with a slight lateral motion. The roller is heated by the insertion into it of a red-hot cylinder. One of these embossing machines is shown in our engraving. From the great weight of calendering machines, it is necessary they should be fixed on the basement-floor. After the cloth has received its final gloss at these machines, it is smoothly folded on a clean board, and taken to the making-up room to be measured preparatory to being rolled or folded for sale.

The calenderer usually undertakes many of the operations of packing, sheeting, and preparing goods for shipment. In order to suit the great extent and variety of manufacture, and to adapt goods to the tastes or prejudices of an extensive range of customers, a multiplicity of foldings or lapings has been adopted. The objects proposed to be attained thereby appear to have been: 1. To preserve effectually the dressed surface of the goods from acute creases; 2. To imitate the external appearance of some descriptions of foreign goods; 3. To impart a peculiar external appearance to goods. This object is accomplished in England by stamping the words "British Manufacture" on the ends of the pieces, to show where they are made. In Irish cambrics and linens, a foreign fold has been adopted; the French flax, from superiority of climate and other causes, leading to the production of a superior fabric. Irish cambrics are therefore folded so as to imitate the French fold. The pieces, after being folded into lengths of about twelve inches, and twice laterally doubled, until the whole breadth of thirty-four inches is reduced to about eight and a half inches, are powerfully compressed, until fully flattened. They are then packed in purple-colored wrappers or papers, and a small engraved card or ticket is attached to each piece, stating the length, which is generally eight or eight and a half yards. As the importation of manufactured cambrics was illegal in England, the cards, in real French cambrics, were attached by a silken string, so as to be easily cut away, to avoid seizure. The same method was adopted with the Irish goods.

In linens, hollands, and sheetings, and also in cotton shirtings and sheetings, the foreign fold is that of a cylindric roll, somewhat flattened by subsequent compression, for the purpose of safety to the goods, and diminution in space in carriage. The Irish and British linens, &c., are made up in the same manner.

Cotton prints, and the extensive varieties of cotton cloths are also lapped in imitation of the rude Indian method practised in Hindostan long before the art of calico-printing was known to us. The method is, to double a piece of twenty yards, to reduce its length to ten yards, which, by again doubling, is reduced to five; and in this way they continue to redouble until the piece is reduced to a moderate length, capable of being packed in a chest or bale.

Muslins are usually folded to a yard in length, with a small allowance for extra measure: the folding is alternately from right to left, so that every part can be opened and examined with ease, like the leaves of a book, before it is cut open. The piece, when folded, is reduced by doubling it lengthwise to about nineteen inches, and it is then folded across the breadth of about thirteen inches. A writer on calendering says, "Even the Indian ornaments of gilt silver threads, which were at first woven into one end of each piece, although they did not exceed the value of twopence each, have been either greatly curtailed or totally given up, upon principles of economy. Even the cost of this trivial ornament has been computed to have amounted annually, in Glasgow and Paisley, to about 30,000/."

CALENDERING-MACHINE.

Some kinds of handkerchiefs are folded in dozens; but for the African and a few other markets they are made up in pieces containing only eight handkerchiefs. Indeed, so successful have been the imitations of Indian and other foreign goods, in texture, in dye, in pattern, in finishing, and in the packages, that instances have occurred of seizure at the English custom-house, as India goods either illegally imported, or stolen from some of the company's ships.

At many of the calendering works, the goods are measured, preparatory to being lapped or folded, either at a long table or at the booking-frame. The measuring-table is a long smooth plank, with a scale of inches, feet, and yards marked at the side. A man stands at one end of the table, with the goods to be measured, and there is a boy at the other end. A length of cloth being spread out, the boy holds its extremity down at a line drawn on the table, while the man at his end marks a length of a certain number of yards, usually about five, with a piece of red or white chalk, according to the color of the goods, the red being used for white stuffs. The boy then draws the cloth towards him, until the chalk-mark comes opposite to the line on the table, when he stops: the man then makes a second mark; the boy draws the length towards him until this mark arrives at the line, when the man repeats the mark, and so on until the proper length for a piece of goods is run off. Goods for the foreign market are measured by what is called short stick; those for the home market by long stick. In short stick, the yard is made to consist of "thirty-five inches and a thumb," which is, in fact, thirty-six inches, the usual length of the yard, or it may be a trifle more. In long stick, the yard contains "thirty-six inches and a thumb," which is equivalent to thirty-seven inches. There is also middle stick, containing "thirty-five and a half inches and a thumb" to the yard, and this is equal to thirty-six and a half inches.

HOOKING-FRAME.

The measuring-table is used chiefly for goods that are made up into rolls: when made up in folds, the hooking-frame is used. This consists of an iron bar, rather more than four feet long, graduated into inches and parts, supported by a wooden frame, and capable of being raised to different heights. At one extremity of the bar is a projecting needle, which is fixed: a second needle, attached to an iron slide, can be moved along the bar, and fixed at any point by means of a screw. The length of the yard varies at the hooking-frame as at the measuring-table. This length being determined for the goods to be measured, the children who act as hookers hang the cloth in regular folds upon the hooks, until a sufficient quantity is collected to form a piece, which is then cut off and removed, to be made up.

There are upwards of a hundred different methods of making up goods, and each method has its own particular name, such as the falling lap, the Wigan way, the cloth way, the Preston way, &c. Muslin, as already noticed, is made up in book-folds, in pieces of twenty-four yards; but usually two half-pieces, called demis, are made up in one book, with yellow paper under the first fold, to show the pattern, and the corners are secured with variegated silk thread. Tickets containing various devices in gold or bronze, upon a blue or red ground, are pasted upon each piece, varying according to the market. Some of these tickets are of large size, and very costly. The devices on these tickets are as various as their appearance.

A notice of calendering would not be complete without an allusion to the common domestic mangle. This, though very inferior to the machines described above, is yet a useful means of improving the surface of linen, and approaches in its results the more perfect operations of the calendering-machine. It is simply an oblong wooden chest filled with stones, resting upon two cylinders which roll backwards and forwards over the linen, spread upon a polished table beneath. Formerly the chest was moved by means of a handle attached to an upper roller or windlass, to which straps from each end of the chest were attached. In this case, the linen was wrapped round the cylinders, and the motion of the chest had frequently to be arrested and changed. This was laborious work, and it was a valuable improvement when a continuous motion of the handle in one direction would effect the object, and when a flywheel was added to equalize the motion.

THE MUSE.

A KING of beauty is ever before me,
A halo of glory encircles her brow,
And an eye full of loftiest meaning dwells on me,
As, in 'rapt adoration, before her I bow.

And sometimes a smile, though so doubtful its meaning,
I scarcely may tell if in favor or scorn,
Plays on those lips of such classical seeming,
My soul with both rapture and anguish is torn.

For it is rapture too wild, too intense to believe
That, by my fond worship, her favor I win;
And the simoom scathes not like the thought I deceive
My own soul, and am fostering hopes that are vain.

Transcendent immortal! oh, tune thou my lyre!
And then shall I sing, as the mighty before,
The strain that dies while the ages expire,
The strain that shall thrill until time is no more.

THE WIFE.

BY FLORENCE MACDONALD.

(See Plate.)

"I AM hopeless!" said the young man, in a voice that was painfully desponding. "Utterly hopeless! Heaven knows I have tried hard to get employment! But no one has need of my service. The pittance doled out by your father, and which comes with a sense of humiliation that is absolutely heart-crushing, is scarcely sufficient to provide this miserable abode, and keep hunger from our door. But for your sake, I would not touch a shilling of his money, if I starved."

"Hush, dear Edward!" returned the gentle girl, who had left father, mother, and a pleasant home, to share the lot of him she loved; and she laid a finger on his lips, while she drew her arm around him.

"Agnes," said the young man, "I cannot endure this life much longer. The native independence of my character revolts at our present condition. Months have elapsed, and yet the ability I possess finds no employment. In this country, every avenue is crowded."

The room in which they were overlooked the sea.

"But there is another land, where, if what we hear be true, ability finds employment and talent a sure reward." And, as Agnes said this, in a voice of encouragement, she pointed from the window towards the expanse of waters that stretched far away towards the south and west.

"America!" The word was uttered in a quick, earnest voice.

"Yes."

"Agnes, I thank you for this suggestion! Return to the pleasant home you left for one who cannot procure for you even the plainest comforts of life, and I will cross the ocean to seek a better fortune in that land of promise. The separation, painful to both, will not, I trust, be long."

"Edward," replied the young wife, with enthusiasm, as she drew her arm more tightly about his neck, "I will never leave thee nor forsake thee! Where thou goest I will go, and where thou liest I will lie. Thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God."

"Would you forsake all," said Edward, in surprise, "and go far away with me into a strange land?"

"It will be no stranger to me than it will be to you, Edward."

"No, no, Agnes! I will not think of that," said

Edward Marvel, in a positive voice. "If I go to that land of promise, it must first be alone."

"Alone!" A shadow fell over the face of Agnes. "Alone! It cannot—it must not be!"

"But think, Agnes. If I go alone, it will cost me but a small sum to live until I find some business, which may not be for weeks, or even months, after I arrive in the New World."

"What if you were to be sick?" The frame of Agnes slightly quivered as she made this suggestion.

"We will not think of that."

"I cannot help thinking of it, Edward. Therefore entreat me not to leave thee, nor to return from following after thee. Where thou goest, I will go."

Marvel's countenance became more serious.

"Agnes," said the young man, after he had reflected for some time, "let us think no more about this. I cannot take you far away to this strange country. We will go back to London. Perhaps another trial there may be more successful."

After a feeble opposition on the part of Agnes, it was finally agreed that Edward should go once more to London, while she made a brief visit to her parents. If he found employment, she was to join him immediately; if not successful, they were then to talk further of the journey to America.

With painful reluctance, Agnes went back to her father's house, the door of which ever stood open to receive her; and she went back alone. The pride of her husband would not permit him to cross the threshold of a dwelling where his presence was not a welcome one. In eager suspense, she waited for a whole week ere a letter came from Edward. The tone of this letter was as cheerful and as hopeful as it was possible for the young man to write. But, as yet, he had found no employment. A week elapsed before another came. It opened in these words:—

"MY DEAR, DEAR AGNES! Hopeless of doing anything here, I have turned my thoughts once more to the land of promise; and, when you receive this, I will be on my journey thitherward. Brief, very brief, I trust, will be our separation. The moment I obtain employment, I will send for you, and then our reunion will take place with a fulness of delight such as we have not yet experienced."

Long, tender, and hopeful was the letter; but it brought a burden of grief and heart-sickness to the tender young creature, who felt almost as if she had been deserted by the one who was dear to her as her own life.

Only a few days had Edward Marvel been at sea, when he became seriously indisposed, and, for the remaining part of the voyage, was so ill as to be unable to rise from his berth. He had embarked in a packet ship from Liverpool bound for New York, where he arrived, at the expiration of five weeks. There he was removed to the sick wards of the hospital on Staten Island, and it was the opinion of the physicians there that he would die.

"Have you friends in this country?" inquired a nurse who was attending the young man. This question was asked on the day after he had become an inmate of the hospital.

"None," was the feebly uttered reply.

"You are very ill," said the nurse.

The sick man looked anxiously into the face of his attendant.

"You have friends in England?"

"Yes."

"Have you any communication to make to them?"

Marvel closed his eyes, and remained for some time silent.

"If you will get me a pen and some paper, I will write a few lines," said he, at length.

"I'm afraid you are too weak for the effort," replied the nurse.

"Let me try," was briefly answered.

The attendant left the room.

"Is there any one in your part of the house named Marvel?" asked a physician, meeting the nurse soon after she had left the sick man's room. "There's a young woman down in the office inquiring for a person of that name."

"Marvel—Marvel?" The nurse shook her head.

"Are you certain?" remarked the physician.

"I'm certain there is no one by that name for whom any here would make inquiries. There's a young Englishman who came over in the last packet, whose name is something like that you mention. But he has no friends in this country."

The physician passed on, without further remark.

Soon after, the nurse returned to Marvel with the writing materials for which he had asked. She drew a table to the side of his bed, and supported him as he leaned over and tried, with an unsteady hand, to write.

"Have you a wife at home?" asked the nurse; her eyes had rested on the first words he wrote.

"Yes," sighed the young man, as the pen dropped from his fingers, and he leaned back heavily, exhausted by even the slight effort he had made.

"Your name is Marvel?"

"Yes."

"A young woman was here just now inquiring if we had a patient by that name."

"By my name?" There was a slight indication of surprise.

"Yes."

Marvel closed his eyes, and did not speak for some moments.

"Did you see her?" he asked at length, evincing some interest.

"Yes."

"Did she find the one for whom she was seeking?"

"There is no person here, except yourself, whose name came near to the one she mentioned. As you said you had no friends in this country, we did not suppose that you were meant."

"No, no." And the sick man shook his head slowly. "There is none to ask for me. Did you say it was a young woman?" he inquired, soon after. His mind dwelt on the occurrence.

"Yes. A young woman with a fair complexion and deep blue eyes."

Marvel looked up quickly into the face of the attendant, while a flush came into his cheeks.

"She was a slender young girl, with light hair, and her face was pale, as from trouble."

"Agnes! Agnes!" exclaimed Marvel, rising up. "But no, no," he added, mournfully, sinking back again upon the bed; "that cannot be. I left her far away over the wide ocean."

"Will you write?" said the nurse, after some moments.

The invalid, without unclosing his eyes, slowly shook his head. A little while the attendant lingered in his room, and then retired.

"Dear, dear Agnes!" murmured Edward Marvel, closing his eyes, and letting his thoughts go, swift-winged, across the billowy sea. "Shall I never look on your sweet face again? Never feel your light arms about my neck, or your breath warm on my cheek? Oh, that I had never left you! Heaven give thee strength to bear the trouble in store!"

For many minutes he lay, thus alone, with his eyes closed, in sad self-communion. Then he heard the door open and close softly; but he did not look up. His thoughts were far, far away. Light feet approached quickly; but he scarcely heeded them. A form bent over him; but his eyes remained shut, nor did he open them until warm lips were pressed against his own, and a low voice, thrilling through his whole being, said—

"Edward!"

"Agnes!" was his quick response, while his arms were thrown eagerly around the neck of his wife.

"Agnes! Agnes! Have I awakened from a fearful dream?"

Yes, it was indeed her of whom he had been thinking. The moment she received his letter, informing her that he had left for the United States, she resolved to follow him in the next steamer that sailed. This purpose she immediately avowed to her parents. At first, they would not listen to her; but, finding that she would, most probably, elude their vigilance, and get away in spite of all efforts to prevent her, they deemed it more wise and prudent to provide her with everything necessary for the voyage, and to place her in the care of the captain of the steamship in which she was to go. In New York they had friends, to whom they gave her letters fully explanatory of her mission, and earnestly commending her to their care and protection.

Two weeks before the ship in which Edward Marvel sailed reached her destination, Agnes was in New York. Before her departure, she had sought, but in vain, to discover the name of the vessel in which her husband had embarked. On arriving in the New World, she was therefore uncertain whether he had preceded her in a steamer, or was still lingering on the way.

The friends to whom Agnes brought letters received her with great kindness, and gave her all the advice and assistance needed under the circumstances. But two weeks went by without a word of intelligence on the one subject that absorbed all her thoughts. Sadly was her health beginning to suffer. Sunken eyes and pale cheeks attested the weight of suffering that was on her.

One day it was announced that a Liverpool packet had arrived with the ship fever on board, and that several of the passengers had been removed to the hospital.

A thrill of fear went through the heart of the anxious wife. It was soon ascertained that Marvel had been a passenger on board of this vessel; but, from some cause, nothing in regard to him beyond this fact could she learn. Against all persuasion, she started for the hospital, her heart oppressed with a fearful presentiment that he was either dead or struggling in the grasp of a fatal malady. On making inquiry at the hospital, she was told the one she sought was not there, and she was about returning to the city when the truth reached her ears.

"Is he very ill?" she asked, struggling to compose herself.

"Yes, he is extremely ill," was the reply. "And it might not be well for you, under the circumstances, to see him at present."

"Not well for his wife to see him?" returned Agnes. Tears sprung to her eyes at the thought of not being permitted to come near in his extremity. "Do not say that. Oh, take me to him! I will save his life."

"You must be very calm," said the nurse; for it was with her she was talking. "The least excitement may be fatal."

"Oh, I will be calm and prudent." Yet, even while she spoke, her frame quivered with excitement.

But she controlled herself when the moment of meeting came, and, though her unexpected appearance produced a shock, it was salutary rather than injurious.

"My dear, dear Agnes!" said Edward Marvel, a month from this time, as they sat alone in the chamber of a pleasant house in New York, "I owe you my life. But for your prompt resolution to follow me across the sea, I would, in all probability, now be sleeping the sleep of death. Oh, what would I not suffer for your sake!"

As Marvel uttered the last sentence, a troubled expression flitted over his countenance. Agnes gazed tenderly into his face, and asked—

"Why this look of doubt and anxiety?"

"Need I answer the question?" returned the young man. "It is, thus far, no better with me than when we left our old home. Though health is coming back through every fibre, and my heart is filled with an eager desire to relieve these kind friends of the burden of our support, yet no prospect opens."

No cloud came stealing darkly over the face of the young wife. The sunshine, so far from being dimmed, was brighter.

"Let not your heart be troubled," said she, with a beautiful smile. "All will come out right."

"Right, Agnes? It is not right for me thus to depend on strangers."

"You need depend but a little while longer. I have already made warm friends here, and, through them, secured for you employment. A good place awaits you so soon as strength to fill it comes back to your weakened frame."

"Angel!" exclaimed the young man, overcome with emotion at so unexpected a declaration.

"No, not an angel," calmly replied Agnes, "only a wife. And now, dear Edward," she added, "never again, in any extremity, think for a moment of meeting trials or enduring privations alone. Having taken a wife, you cannot move safely on your journey unless she moves by your side."

"Angel! Yes, you are my good angel," repeated Edward.

"Call me what you will," said Agnes, with a sweet smile, as she brushed, with her delicate hand, the hair from his temples; "but let me be your wife. I ask no better name, no higher station."

---

SONNET.—CLIO.

BY WM. ALEXANDER.

Upon thy wide-stretched canvas we behold,
Like in a mirror, pictures of the past;
And present things, which flit away so fast,
Exhibit wit thou with the scenes of old!
Impartial Teacher! true thy reasonings be,
Since empires' mysteries thou canst well unfold,
Which, erst, in mystic characters enrolled,
Mind now deciphers understandingly;
Portraits of fair and darker spirits rise
Before us, pencilled all exactly true;
Nimrod and Nero's cruelties we view
Contrasted with the acts of good and wise;
Thy teachings are with profit ever fraught;
Kings, peasants, by them are true wisdom taught.

THE MAID AND THE MAGPIE.—A BALLAD.

BY JNO. B. DUFFEY.

(See Plate.)

Why cometh out the multitude with still and awful tread?
Why peals, from belfry and from tower, that requiem for the dead?

Has sudden visitation laid her darling chieftain low,
That Florence, in her every part, seems burdened down with woe?

Thickens the throng: a whisper runs, like light, o'er ashy lips,

That seem as if froze dumb by Death, with icy finger-tips:
And hark! from far a chorus dread rolls on the heavy air,
And faces fast are waxing white, and lips are moved in prayer.

Nigh and more nigh the chorus rolls; and windeth through the street

A sad and solemn train of priests, and monks with sandalled feet;

With cross, and torch, and censor's swing, they tread their doleful way,
And chant the fearful dying song—"That day, that wrathful day!"

With jolt and jar, a creaking car brings up the priestly train,

And laid thereon a coffin rude, tells why that mournful strain;

And kneeling in that bed of death a trembling girl is seen;
Her hands are pressed upon her breast, with helplessness of men.

* * * * *

From distant Rhine young Gretchen came, a maid of peasant birth,

Who, save her gray-haired sire, had not a kindred one on earth:

Need forced her from her fatherland, to wage the war of life,
With mind and heart too innocent, too pure for such a strife.

With wistful eyes oft looking back, she left her father's cot,
And in a strange and far countrie, her sire's subsistence sought;

Hoping, when winter's gathered snows had melted into rain,
With lightsome heart, and laden purse, to greet her home again.

Artless to higher work, with heart that knew no foolish shame,

In Count Uboldi's household she a kitchen-girl became;
Trusting that time, and growing skill, and duty's cheerful face

Would, from her high-born mistress, win the guerdon of her grace.

Alas! young Hope, how weak and vain are all thy flattering dreams!

How swiftly pales the brightest star that in thy Present gleams!

Thy Future's visions, what are they, though pleasant to thy sight,

But rosy clouds of waning joy—fair harbingers of night!

But why prolong our simple tale? Some silver spoons were lost,

A ring of rich and rare device, and pearls of princely cost.

220

Stolen they were—at least so deemed: on Gretchen fell the theft—

For 'tis the poor alone that steal—what other way is left?

Before her judges Gretchen stood, by innocence upheld;
But torture racked her limbs, and then her woman's spirit failed:

Confessed of theft, her doom was death—for such was then the law:

To Death they lead her, monk and priest, with all his pomp and awe.

The scaffold now is gained, and lo! above it, shining white,
A pillar tall, to Justice reared, breaks sudden on the sight:

Thereon an image, whose right hand a flashing sword reveals,

Bears balanced in its outstretched left a pair of golden scales.

And Justice sees the lifted axe, the maiden bent with fear,
The headsman grim, the white-faced throng—yet Justice is not here.

But look! the western sky grows black, and hushed is all the air—

Clouds are thy judgment-seat, and thou, O Justice, thou art there!

Kissing the cross her father gave, poor Gretchen kneels to pray—

Pray for the peace of God to bless the dear one far away:
And tears are in her eyes, to think how lonely he will pine,
How drear will be, when she is gone, that cottage on the Rhine.

Her head is on the block; her lips breathe out a lingering sigh:

"Farewell, dear father! God, thou know'st how innocent I die!"

The headsman's axe is lifted up—down falls the bloody stroke:—

Great Heaven! that flash! that fearful crash! Have earth's foundations broke?

Blinded and stunned, in fear uprose that multitude of men:
And oaths and prayers, and groans and yells, woke air to life again.

But all was o'er—that flash and crash the Father's will had done:

The blue sky looked from snowy clouds, and gayly above the sun.

The statue, see! the lightning's stroke has hurled it from its place!

And now a crowd is groping round the shattered pillar's base!

Inquiring hands lift up the scales you mocking Justice bore;

A magpie's nest is in them found—and find they nothing more?

Oh, faint not, soldier of the right, though often overthrown!
Poor Gretchen! God has proved thy truth—His voice has made it known:

For lo! inwoven in that nest the golden scales did bear,
Were found the spoons, the princely pearls, and ring of setting rare!

ILLUSTRIOUS CHARACTERS.

BY THOMAS WYATT, A. M.

(See Plate in August Number.)

MRS. MARTHA WASHINGTON.

THE illustrious subject of this memoir was born in the county of New Kent, in the State of Virginia, in the year 1732. She was the daughter of a Mr. Dandridge, a wealthy planter, whose ancestors had emigrated from Wales many years since. They had succeeded in obtaining from their government large tracts of land, which subsequently became the means of their wealth. But little is known of the early part of the life of Martha Dandridge, but that she excelled in personal charms, with prepossessing manners, and great loveliness of character. In the early days of the colonial settlements, it was difficult for females to obtain anything beyond a plain education, and that generally imparted by their parents, with a few exceptions, where they were so fortunate as to obtain a resident instructor for their children. Mr. Dandridge received into his family a young Englishman, of superior education, who remained sufficiently long to lay the foundation for those accomplishments which became so important in the high and varied station his daughter was destined in after years to fill.

Miss Dandridge had many admirers, but among her numerous suitors she selected Colonel Daniel Parke Custis, a planter living on the banks of the Pamunky River. This gentleman was the son of the Hon. John Custis, of Arlington, a king's counsellor, and a man of great wealth. The marriage took place in the year 1749—Miss Dandridge being only in her seventeenth year—the fruits of which were four children; two boys and two girls. One boy and one girl died in their infancy; Martha, the surviving daughter, lived to the age of twenty years, and died at Mount Vernon.

John, the only surviving child, died in the service of his country, as one of the aids of the commander-in-chief, during the siege of Yorktown, in 1781, in the twenty-seventh year of his age, leaving behind him four children—the Hon. George Washington Parke Custis, now proprietor of Arlington, and three daughters. After the death of her husband, Mrs. Custis and her family continued to reside on their plantation. He being wealthy, it was some years before she could settle and arrange his large estate, which at last, however, she accomplished with that strict accuracy which distinguished her through life.

In the year 1758, Mrs. Custis was on a visit to a friend residing on an eminence of a branch of the Pamunky River, overlooking the ferry called Williams's Ferry, the direct road from Fredericksburg to Williamsburg. Mr. Chamberlayne (of whose house she was then an inmate), a man of leisure and a Virginia gentleman of the old school, was fond of society. He would frequently watch the ferry with great eagerness, and, as the boat reached the shore, if there were among the passengers gentlemen of respectable exterior, he would address them by an invitation to his house, and offer some refreshment before they proceeded farther on their journey.

On one of his peregrinations to the ferry, he espied an officer attired in a military undress, with his servant and horses. Mr. C. addressed him, requesting he would spare time to partake of his hospitality before he proceeded further. The soldier pleaded his haste to Williamsburg, having despatches to the governor (Williamsburg being thirty miles distant); but Mr. Chamberlayne insisted that he must spare time to dine with him, and remarked that he would introduce him to the beautiful widow Custis, who was then on a visit to his family.

The officer reluctantly consented; the gentlemen exchanged cards, and Mr. Chamberlayne found that his new guest was Colonel Washington. On their arrival at the house, Col. W. was introduced to the family of his hospitable host, and, among them, the interesting widow before spoken of. It is believed that the first interview proved the source from which sprung so many joys. Before entering the mansion, Col. W. gave orders to his servant to have the horses ready precisely at four o'clock, that they might arrive at their destination that night. Bishop, true to the orders of his master, waited with the horses in hand long after the appointed hour, wondering at the unusual delay. "Ah, Bishop!" says a fair writer, describing the occurrence, "there was an urobin in the drawing-room more powerful than King George and all his governors. Subtle as a sphynx, he had hidden the important despatches from the soldier's sight, shut up his ears from the tell-tale clock, and was playing such mad pranks with the bravest heart in Christendom, that it fluttered with the excess of a new-found happiness." Colonel Washington found so much difficulty in separating from such fascinating society, that he eventually yielded to the solicitations of his excellent host to pass the night with them. Some hours after breakfast on the following morning the enamored soldier was on his road to Williamsburg.

Having made an early arrangement of his affairs at Williamsburg, he returned the same evening to feast once more on the charms of the captivating widow.

Within a year from this time, Mrs. Custis became the wife of Colonel Washington. They were married at St. Peter's Church, in New Kent County, on the 6th of January, 1759, by the Rev. Mr. Mossom, a clergyman sent from England by the Bishop of London, Virginia being at that time considered a part of that diocese.

From private memoirs we are able to give a few particulars of this interesting event.

Colonel Washington was dressed in a suit of blue and silver, lined with red silk, embroidered vest, small clothes, gold shoe and knee buckles, dress sword, and hair in full powder.

The bride in a suit of white satin, rich point lace ruffles, pearl ornaments in her hair, pearl necklace, earrings, and bracelets, white satin high-heeled shoes, with diamond buckles. She was attended by several ladies in the gorgeous costume of that ancient period. Colonel W. was attended by the Governor of Virginia, several English army and navy officers in full costume, with the very élite of Virginia chivalry of the old régime. The dress of the governor was scarlet embroidered with gold, with bag wig and sword. The other gentlemen in the fashion of the time. The old-fashioned coach of the bride was drawn by six horses, while the bridegroom rode the fine English charger bequeathed to him by Braddock after the battle of Monongahela. From the account of the marriage handed down from those who were present, it appears that the bride and her ladies occupied the coach, and the gallant bridegroom and his brilliant cortège accompanied them on horseback.

As this was the gay season at Williamsburg, Colonel and Mrs. Washington remained there for the space of three months after their marriage, allowing the colonel time to arrange the estate and affairs of his new wife. The first thing was to take upon himself the guardianship of Mrs. Washington's two children, which he did with the faithfulness of a father till the daughter died and the son came of age. By this marriage, Colonel Washington made an accession to his fortune of more than one hundred thousand dollars, and, possessing considerable property before, he intended now to turn his thoughts to the management of his private affairs. But about this time he was elected a member of the House of Burgesses, which he held for fifteen years, till the commencement of the Revolution. Mrs. Washington always accompanied her husband to Williamsburg during the frequent sessions, where she met the most distinguished families in Virginia, many of whom were the younger sons of the English nobility.

Williamsburg was at this time the school of manners and refinement.

* * * * *

Thus fifteen years of tranquillity had passed, and Mrs. Washington felt much anxiety for the future. The Revolution had commenced, and her husband, appointed commander-in-chief, was directed to repair to Cambridge, where the army was concentrated. He left Philadelphia in June, 1775; Mrs. Washington joined him the September following. Mr. Custis states that it was the habit of the commander-in-chief to despatch an aid-de-camp, at the close of each campaign, to escort his lady to head-quarters, and her arrival at the camp was always hailed with a cheering influence. She has often said that she heard the first cannon at the opening, and the last at the closing, of all the campaigns of the Revolution. The military journals mention her privations and fortitude, and, with much emphasis, notice the trying winter of 1777-8, at Valley Forge, presiding in the chief's humble cabin, and dispensing comfort and relief to the suffering soldiery. In a letter to Mrs. Warren, she says: "The General's apartment is very small; he has had a log cabin built to dine in, which has made our quarters more tolerable than they were at first." A French officer visiting General Washington, while on the banks of the Hudson, thus describes his head-quarters at Newburg: "They consist of a single house of the Dutch fashion, not large or commodious, and the inconvenience to which the General and Mrs. Washington had put themselves to receive me, obliged me to leave much earlier than I had intended."

Thus, for six years, did Mrs. Washington accompany her husband through the most trying scenes of our revolutionary struggle, till the year 1781, when all her Christian fortitude was called into action by a summons to the death-bed of her last and only child. Mr. Custis, who was an aid to General Washington, lived to witness the victory at Yorktown, was seized with a violent fever, brought on by incessant fatigue, and died, in the arms of his mother, on the 5th of November, in the 27th year of his age. The General arrived only two hours before his death, and on no occasion whatever had the General been seen to evince such intense sorrow; it is said that he wept as a child. This sorrowful event was not less trying to his sympathy than his sensibility, for he had watched over his childhood and youth with a parental love, and afterwards associated him as his companion and friend. Mr. Custis left four children. The two youngest, a son and daughter, were adopted by General Washington—the Hon. G. W. P. Custis, of Arlington, and Mrs. Lewis, of Audley, both now living.

Mrs. Washington now found it more agreeable to seclude herself for a time at her home at Mount Vernon, hoping that the arduous labors of her husband were drawing to a close, and that he would soon follow her. But he did not retire from the army for nearly two years after the surrender of Yorktown. In December, 1783, General Washington resigned his commission and retired to his home, where he remained till the year 1789, when he was notified that the choice of the people had fallen on him as president.

New York being chosen as the place of residence for the chief magistrate, Washington arrived in that city in the month of April, and in the June following he was joined by Mrs. Washington. The following letter to her friend, Mrs. Warren, written soon after her arrival in that city, is expressive of her feelings on the change which circumstances had forced upon her.

"Your very friendly letter of last month has afforded me more satisfaction than all the formal compliments and empty ceremonies of mere etiquette could possibly have done. I am not apt to forget the feelings which have been inspired by my former society with good acquaintances, nor to be insensible to their expressions of gratitude to the President; for you know me well enough to do me the justice to believe that I am fond only of what comes from the heart. It is owing to the kindness of our numerous friends in all quarters, that my new and unwished-for situation is not indeed a burden to me.

"When I was much younger, I should probably have enjoyed the innocent gayeties of life as much as most persons of my age; but I had long since placed all the prospects of my future worldly happiness in the still enjoyments of the fireside at Mount Vernon.

"I little thought, when the war was finished, that any circumstances could possibly happen which could call the General into public life again. I had anticipated that, from that moment, we should be suffered to grow old together in solitude and tranquillity. That was the first and dearest wish of my heart. I will not, however, contemplate with too much regret disappointments that were inevitable, though his feelings and my own were in perfect unison with respect to our predilection for private life. Yet I cannot blame him for having acted according to his ideas of duty in obeying the voice of his country. The consciousness of having attempted to do all the good in his power, and the pleasure of finding his fellow-citizens so well satisfied with the disinterestedness of his conduct, will doubtless be some compensation for the great sacrifices which I know he has made.

"Indeed, on his journey from Mount Vernon to this place, and in his late tour through the Eastern States, by every public and private information which has come to him, I am persuaded he has experienced nothing to make him repent his having acted from what he conceived to be a sense of indispensable duty. On the contrary, all his sensibility has been awakened in receiving such repeated and unequivocal proofs of sincere regard from his countrymen. With respect to myself, I sometimes think the arrangement is not quite as it ought to have been; that I, who had much rather be at home, should occupy a place with which a great many younger and gayer women would be extremely pleased. As my grandchildren and domestic connections make up a great portion of the felicity which I looked for in this world, I shall hardly be able to find any substitute that will indemnify me for the loss of a part of such endearing society. I do not say this because I feel dissatisfied with my present station, for everybody and everything conspire to make me as contented as possible in it; yet I have learned too much of the vanity of human affairs to expect felicity from the scenes of public life.

"I am still determined to be cheerful and happy in whatever situation I may be; for I have also learned from experience, that the greater part of our happiness or misery depends on our dispositions, and not on our circumstances. We carry the seeds of the one or the other about with us in our minds wherever we go.

"I have two of my grandchildren with me, who enjoy advantages in point of education, and who, I trust, by the goodness of Providence, will be a great blessing to me. My other two grandchildren are with their mother in Virginia."

NEW YORK, December 26, 1789.

As soon as the President was settled in New York, it became necessary to establish some rules for receiving visitors and entertaining company. It was essential to maintain the dignity of the office by forms which would inspire deference and respect; as for the chief magistrate and his lady to be accessible to all without respect of persons, at the same time securing the purity of our republican institutions. Accordingly, every Tuesday, from three to four o'clock, the President was prepared to receive all persons who chose to call. And every Friday afternoon, the rooms were alike open for visitors to Mrs. Washington, which were on a very sociable footing, and at which the General was always present.

It may not be considered out of place here to give an extract from a letter, never before published, from a gentleman who attended one of the first levees. His description of Washington is considered, by the family now living, as the most perfect ever given. He gives a minute description of the levee in the following:—

"NEW YORK, 1790.

"A servant, well looking and well dressed, received the visitors at the door, and by him they were delivered over to an officer of the United States service, in full uniform, who ushered them into the drawing-room, in which Mrs. Washington and several ladies were seated. The lady of the President received me with perfect ease and good breeding, entering at once into an agreeable and interesting conversation.

"In a few minutes, the General entered the room. It was not necessary to announce his name, for his peculiar appearance, his firm forehead, Roman nose, and projection of the lower jaw, his height and figure, could not be mistaken by any one who had seen a full-length portrait of him; he was remarkably dignified in his manner, and had an air of benignity over his features which his visitant did not expect, being rather prepared for sternness of countenance.

"After an introduction from Mrs. Washington, he requested me to be seated, and, taking a chair himself, entered at once into conversation. His manner was full of affability; talked of the infant institutions of America, remarking that they were yet in embryo, but the time was not far distant when the advantages she would offer by intercourse with other nations would be eagerly sought. His dress was of purple satin. There was a commanding air in his appearance, which excited greater respect, and forbade freedom towards him, independently of that species of awe which is always felt in the moral influence of a great character. In every movement, too, there was a polite gracefulness, equal to any met with in the most polished courts of Europe. His smile was exceedingly attractive. A gentleman present observed to me that there was an expression in Washington's face that no painter had succeeded in taking. It struck me no man could be better formed to command. A stature of six feet, a robust but well-proportioned frame, calculated to sustain fatigue, without that heaviness which generally attends great muscular strength and abates active exertion, displayed bodily power of no mean standard. A light eye and full—the very genius of reflection, rather than the eye of blind passionate impulse. His nose appeared thick, and, though it befitted his other features, was too coarsely and too strongly formed to be the handsomest of its class. His mouth was like no other I ever saw; the lips firm, and the under jaw seemed to gnash the upper with force, as if its muscles were in full action when he sat still.

"Neither with the General or with Mrs. Washington was there the slightest restraint or ceremony. There was less of it than I ever remember to have met with, where perfect good breeding and manners were at the same time observed. To many remarks, Washington assented with a smile or inclination of the head, as if he was by nature sparing in his conversation, and I am inclined to think this was the case. In alluding to a serious fit of sickness he had recently suffered, I could not help remarking, the country must have looked with anxiety to the termination of his indisposition. He made no reply to my compliment but an inclination of the head. His bow at my taking leave I shall never forget. It was the last movement I ever saw that illustrious character make as my eyes took their leave of him forever, and it hangs a perfect picture upon my recollection.

"The house of Washington was in Broadway near the Battery; the street front was handsome. The drawing-room, in which I sat, was lofty and spacious; but the furniture was not beyond that found in dwellings of opulent Americans in general, and might be called plain for its station. The upper end of the room had glass doors, which opened upon a balcony, commanding an extensive view of the Hudson River, interspersed with islands, and the Jersey shore on the opposite side. A grandson and granddaughter resided constantly in the house with the General; I understood they were his adopted children. Tea and coffee, with refreshments of all kinds, were laid in one part of the room; and before the company retired, each made their second obeisance to the General and his lady, and departed. Nothing could be more simple, purely republican; yet it was enough."

Neither Mrs. Washington nor the President received any visits on Sundays. In the morning they uniformly attended church, and the afternoons were generally spent in reading religious works.

As the second term of General Washington's presidency was drawing to a close, Mrs. Washington prepared for her return to the silent abodes of Mount Vernon. She retired there some months before her husband, and, in a letter to her friend, she expresses herself grateful to Providence for permission once more, and she hopes for the last time, to repose in their quiet home.

Nearly three years passed in tranquillity and happiness, surrounded by her grandchildren and a beloved circle of friends; but Death, envious of her happiness, removed from her side one of the best of men, and she became the widow of him for whom a country mourned.

During the last moments of her beloved husband, she sat on his bed in silent grief, watching his parting breath with true Christian fortitude. She saw the change, and said to the physician, in a firm and collected voice, "Is he gone?" When answered in the affirmative, she replied: "Then all is over; I shall soon follow him; I have no more trials to pass through." Letters and visits of condolence were received by the bereaved widow from all quarters, couched in terms of sympathy and sorrow.

But, within two years after the death of General Washington, she was attacked by a severe fever that proved fatal. When she found her dissolution fast approaching, she summoned her beloved grandchildren to her bedside, and endeavored to impress on their minds duties portraying the happiness of a Christian life, and the sweet influences of religion. She died on the 22d May, 1802, in the seventy-first year of her age, leaving behind her a character worthy the imitation of every American female.

ANECDOTE OF MRS. RADCLIFFE.

TOWARDS the middle of the year 1795, a short time after the deplorable affair of Quiberon, an English lady was taken prisoner just as she was entering France by the Swiss frontier. Her knowledge of French was limited to a few mispronounced words. An interpreter was soon found, and upon his interrogating her as to her motives for attempting so perilous an enterprise without a passport, she replied that she had exposed herself to all these dangers for the purpose of visiting the château where the barbarous Sieur de Fayel had made Gabrielle de Vergy eat the heart of her lover. Such a declaration appeared so ridiculous to those who heard it that they were compelled to doubt either the sanity or the veracity of the strange being who ventured upon it. They chose to do the latter, and forwarded the stranger to Paris, with a strong escort, as an English spy. Upon her arrival there, she was safely deposited in the Conciergerie.

Public feeling just then ran very high against the English. The countrywoman of Pitt was loaded with ill usage; and her terrors, expressed in a singular jargon of English mingled with broken French, served but to augment the coarse amusement of her jailers. After exhausting every species of derision and insult upon their prisoner, they ended by throwing her into the dampest and most inconvenient dungeon they could find. The door of this den was not more than four feet high; and the light, that dimly revealed the dripping walls and earthen floor, came through a horizontal opening four inches in height by fifteen in width. The sole movables of the place consisted of a rope pallet and a screen.

The bed served for both couch and chair; the screen was intended as a partial barrier between the inhabitant of the dungeon and the curious gaze of the jailers stationed in the adjoining apartment, who could scrutinize at will, through a narrow opening between the cells, the slightest movements of their prisoner.

The stranger recoiled with disgust, and asked whether they had not a less terrible place in which to confine a woman.

"You are very bad to please, Madame," replied her brutal jailer, mimicking her defective French. "You are in the palace of Madame Capet."

And shutting behind him the massive door, barricaded with plates of iron, and secured by three or four rusty bolts, he left her to repeat his joke to his companions, and enjoy with them the consternation of Madame Rosbif.

Meanwhile the prisoner fell upon her knees, and gazed around her with a species of pious emotion.

"What right have I," she cried, "to complain of being cast into this dungeon, once inhabited by the Queen of France, the beautiful, the noble Marie Antoinette? I sought food for my imagination; I undertook a journey to France to visit the most celebrated sojourns of the most celebrated individuals. Fortune has come to my aid. Here is what is better than the château of the Sieur de Fayel, and the terrible history of the bleeding heart. Never did a grander inspiration overflow my spirit. I will to work."

She drew from her pocket a small roll of paper, that had escaped the scrutiny of the jailers; and, passing her hand across her forehead, approached the horizontal opening, in order to make the most of the little remainder of daylight; then, taking out a pencil, she rapidly covered ten or twelve pages with microscopic characters in close lines. The increasing darkness at length compelled her to pause, and she was refolding the MS. to replace it in her pocket, when a rude hand snatched it from her grasp.

"Ah! ah! Madame Rosbif," cried the jailer triumphantly, "so you believe yourself at liberty to scribble away here, hatching plots against the Republic, and holding intelligence with the enemies of the nation. Nous verrons cela! These papers shall be remitted this very day to Monsieur Tallien, and we will know all about this new attack upon liberty. Entendez-vous? miserable agent of Pitt and Cobourg?"

The same evening Tallien received the stranger's manuscript. Being unacquainted with the English language, he rang for his secretary; but the latter was nowhere at hand, so the puzzled minister took the papers and proceeded to his wife's apartments.

Madame Tallien was just completing her toilet for a fancy ball. Leaning forward in a graceful attitude, she was in the act of twining round her slender ankle the fastenings of a purple buskin. Her Grecian tunic, simply clasped upon the shoulder with diamonds, and her hair, knotted like that of the Polyhymnia of the Louvre, harmonised admirably with the classical contour of her features. Monsieur Tallien, as he gazed upon her, half forgot his errand.

The lady uttered a little cry of surprise.

"Upon what grave errand has Monsieur deigned to favor me with a visit at this unaccustomed hour?"

"I have here some papers," replied the minister, "that have been seized upon the person of a female spy, and are said to contain proofs of a dangerous conspiracy. They are written in English; my secretary is absent; and I must ask you to do me the favor to translate them to me."

Madame Tallien took the MS., and looked it over.

"Shall I read aloud?" said she, in an amused tone of voice.

Her husband assented.

"The wind howls mournfully through the foliage, and the descending rain falls in torrents. The terrors of my prison become every instant more fearful. Phantoms arise on every side, and wave their snowy winding-sheets. Misfortune, with her cold and pitiless hand, weighs heavily on my youthful brow."

"Thus spoke the lovely prisoner, as she groped with her trembling hands over the humid walls of the dungeon."

"Here is a singular conspiracy truly," said Madame Tallien, as she finished reading the above. "Let me see the envelope; 'Chapter xii., The Dungeon of the Château.' And the authoress's name, 'Anne Radcliffe.' Vite, citoyen. Set this woman at liberty, and bring her to me. Your spy is no other than the great English romance writer, the celebrated authoress of the 'Mysteries of Udolpho!'"

Tallien now recalled the romantic intention of the stranger's hazardous journey, as confessed by herself; perceived the mistake of his agents, and laughed heartily. Going quickly out, he issued orders for the immediate liberation of the prisoner, and desired the messenger to bring her straight to the presence of Madame Tallien.

Meanwhile, the beautiful Frenchwoman, forgetting her toilet and the ball, paced the apartment with almost childish delight and impatience. She was about to make the acquaintance—in a manner the most piquant and unexpected—of the authoress of those romances which had so often filled her vivid imagination with ideas of apparitions, and prisoners dying of hunger in horrible dungeons. She consulted her watch perpetually, and counted the very seconds. At length there was a sound of carriage-wheels in the court-yard of the hotel. Madame Tallien rushed to the door; it opened, and the two celebrated females stood face to face.

The minister's wife could not avoid recoiling with surprise, and some degree of consternation, before the singular figure that paused in the open doorway; for Mrs. Radcliffe had stopped short, dazzled and bewildered by the lights of the saloon, which wounded eyes accustomed for some hours past to the humid obscurity of a dungeon. The English authoress presented a striking contrast to the radiant being before her. Dry, cold, and angular, her attire necessarily in some degree of disorder from her arrest, forced journey, and imprisonment, her whole aspect had in it something bizarre and fantastic, that added to her age at least ten years.

A little recovered from her first surprise, Madame Tallien advanced towards the stranger, gave her a cordial welcome in English, and told her how happy she esteemed herself in having been the means of setting at liberty so celebrated an authoress. The Englishwoman made a polite reply to this compliment, and then they seated themselves before the fire, whose clear flame and vivifying heat were very welcome to the liberated prisoner, and quickly restored an activity of mind that appeared to have been benumbed by the coldness of her dungeon. The ensuing conversation was gay, piquant, full of charm and abandon, and was only interrupted by the orders given by Madame Tallien to her femme de chambre to send the carriage away, and deny her to all visitors.

Mrs. Radcliffe had travelled much, and related her adventures with grace and originality. Hours flew by unheeded, and the Englishwoman was in the very midst of some bold enterprise of her journey in Switzerland, when the timepiece struck twelve.

She turned pale, and a visible shuddering seized her. Then pausing in her tale, she looked wildly and fearfully around, as if following the movements of some invisible being. Madame Tallien, struck with a species of vague terror, dared not address a single word to her visitor. The latter at length abruptly rose, opened the door, and with an imperative gesture ordered some one by the name of Henry to leave the room, after which she appeared to experience a sudden relief.

The lovely Frenchwoman, with the tact of real kindness, appeared not to notice this strange incident, and the new-made friends soon after separated, Madame Tallien herself conducting her guest to the apartment provided for her, where she took leave of her with an affectionate "au revoir!"

The following evening Mrs. Radcliffe appeared in her hostess's saloon, as soon as the latter had signified that she was ready to receive her. Calm and composed, habited à la Française, the English romancist appeared ten years younger than she had done the evening before, and was even not without a certain degree of beauty. She said not a word on the scene of the preceding evening; was gay, witty, amiable, and took an animated part in the conversation that followed. But as soon as the minute-hand of the timepiece pointed to half-past eleven, her color fled, a shade of pensiveness replaced her former gayety, and a few moments afterwards she took her leave of the company.

The same thing happened the next day, and every ensuing evening. Madame Tallien could not avoid a feeling of curiosity, but she had too much politeness to question the stranger confided to her hospitality. In this way a month elapsed, at the end of which time Mrs. Radcliffe could not avoid expressing, one evening when she found herself alone with her new friend, her disappointment at being detained a prisoner in France, without the power of returning to her own country. Upon this, Madame Tallien rose, took a paper from a desk, and handed it to the Englishwoman. It was a passport, dated from the same evening that Mrs. Radcliffe had been liberated from her dungeon.

"Since you wish to leave your French friends," said her lovely hostess, smiling, "go, ingrate!"

"Oh no, not ungrateful!" replied the authoress, taking the beautiful hands of her friend, and carrying them to her lips; "but the year is fast waning, and a solemn duty recalls me to my native land. In the churchyard of a poor village near London are two tombs, which I visit each Christmas day with flowers and prayers. If I return not before then, this will be the first time for five years that they have been neglected. You already know all my other secrets," she continued, lowering her voice; "it is my intention to confide this secret also to your friendly ears." Passing her hand across her brow, the Englishwoman then proceeded to relate a strange and tragic tale. Suffice it to say, that it had left our authoress subject to a distressing and obstinate spectral illusion. In the reality of this appearance she firmly believed, not having sufficient knowledge of science to attribute her visitation to its true origin—a partial disarrangement of the nervous system. This visitation regularly recurred at midnight, and at once accounted for the singular behavior that had so piqued the benevolent Frenchwoman's curiosity.

Mrs. Radcliffe now returned to London, where she shortly afterwards published "The Italian, or the Confessional of the Black Penitents."

We can, in our day, realize to ourselves very little of the effect produced by Anne Radcliffe's romances at the time of their appearance. All the contemporary critics agree in testifying to their immense success, only inferior to that of the Waverley novels in more recent times. Now they appear nothing more than the efflux of a morbid imagination, full of hallucinations and absurdities, and insufferably tedious to our modern tastes, accustomed to the condensed writing of the present day. Their unconnected plots are nevertheless not altogether devoid of a certain sort of interest, and are fraught with picturesque situations and melodramatic surprises. The living characters therein introduced present few natural features. We recognize everywhere the caprices of an unbridled fancy, and a prevailing vitiation of sense and taste.

Anne Radcliffe died near London, on the 7th February, 1823, at the age of 63. The "New Monthly Magazine," for May of that year, announces her decease, and affirms that her death was accompanied by singular visions, which had pursued her ever since a romantic event of her youth.

VEGETABLE PHYSIOLOGY.

BY HARLAND COULTAS.

THE distribution and development of plants on the earth's surface appear to be in proportion to the amount of heat and light received from the sun. In tropical countries, which may be truly termed the paradise of plants, the utmost variety and luxuriance of growth prevail. In those bright and sunny lands, vegetation positively rushes up from the earth's surface, the trees attain the most gigantic size, and are as numerous in species as herbs and shrubs are with us, whilst, within the compass of a few leagues, thousands of different kinds of wild flowers may be collected. As we pass from tropical into temperate latitudes, and the earth receives less heat and light from the sun, we find a corresponding decrease in the beauty, variety, and fragrance of flowers; whilst in the dark and snowy wildernesses of Spitzbergen, an extensive tract of country lying within the polar circle, the trees are mere dwarf shrubs, and not more than thirty species of plants can be enumerated in an area extending for hundreds of miles. Plants seem, indeed, to be capable of enduring all extremes of heat and cold. In one of the Geysers of Iceland, a spring, the water of which was hot enough to boil an egg in five minutes, a species of Chara has been found growing and reproducing itself; whilst the snow which covers the mountains and valleys around the North Pole is reddened by the Protococcus nivalis, a minute plant that grows on its surface, and which, from its rapid diffusion, was supposed to fall from the sky.

Plants are, in fact, found growing almost everywhere. The lonely isles that rise above the waves of the Pacific Ocean, the snowy summits of the loftiest mountains, the deepest caverns of the earth, and waters of the sea, have all their appropriate vegetable forms. Even the desert has its spots of verdure; whilst the slightest crevice or inequality on rock, or wall, or mouldering ruin, is sufficient to arrest the progress of those invisible germs of vegetable life which are everywhere floating on the breeze.

We are accustomed to admire the magnificent spectacle of the starry heavens; but let us look on the earth, at the splendors of the vegetable creation. From the lowly moss and lichen that cover, with their minute, but exquisitely beautiful foliage, the rugged rocks and the bark of trees, to the tall and stately palms, the noble arborescent ferns waving their crown of leaves in the pure breezes of heaven, far above the hot vapors of the Brazilian forest; from the minute inconspicuous aquatic plant, called the duckmeat, which covers the surface of pools and stagnant waters with its scum-like vegetation, to the splendid Victoria Regia, the queen of water-lilies, cradled in the floods of the Amazon—what differences in size! Yet nature has every variety of intermediate form. From the six thousand years Baobab on the shores of the Senegal, to the fungus or mushroom, the growth of a single night, what differences in duration! Now the whole of this vast assemblage of organic being, this wealth of vegetable form, is the result of the operation of a few simple laws. We shall endeavor to show with what simple means nature accomplishes these magnificent results; and let adoring thought rise to the Author of nature, whose is the plan and the building up of this beautiful fabric of vegetation, and of whose being and perfections we have the most abundant proof everywhere, whether the object of our contemplation be a moss or a sun.

If a section be taken through any part of a plant vertically or horizontally, and the section be placed under a microscope, between two plates of glass with a drop of water, so as to give the object the necessary degree of transparency, it will present to the eye the appearance of a network of cells, forming a structure not unlike a honeycomb (Fig. 1).

Fig. 1.

These cells are, in almost every instance, so small that it is impossible to see them without the microscope; so that this instrument is essential to the student, and without it no progress can be made with security in these researches. The primitive, or normal form of the cells is supposed to be a sphere (Fig. 2), and from this type every variety of form takes its rise, owing to the influence of pressure. It is by the growth of the plant that pressure is produced on its cells and their form altered. If the growth of the plant takes place more rapidly in one part than in another, the cells commonly elongate in that part, and become oblong or tubular when full and prismatic, if laterally compressed, as is the case in young shoots and branches. In the parenchyme, or stratum of green vegetable matter in the leaf, where they do not impress each other, they are globular; so also they assume this form in the loose and pulpy parts of fruits. In the pith, where they are exposed to pressure on all sides by the adjacent cells, they become hexagonal. It will be easy to see from this how, from so simple an element as a cell, may proceed a countless number of different forms of tissue.

Fig. 2.

In the fruit of the orange, the cell are of considerable size, and may be readily perceived by the naked eye. This cellular appearance is visible in all plants, when submitted to microscopic inspection. It is therefore evident that a plant is built up with cells, much in the same manner as a wall is built up of bricks. Its whole fabric consists of a countless number of cells, which assume a certain determinate form, according to certain fixed natural laws, and the whole process of vegetable growth consists, in its essential elements, in their continued and rapid multiplication. A knowledge of the processes of nature in the formation, growth, and propagation of cells, is therefore of the utmost importance, to enable us to understand the structure of plants, and clearly forms the foundation of the science of botany.

THE STAR OF EARTH

BY MRS. L. G. ABELL.

NIGHT's sable curtain was let gently down
Over the spacious window of the sky,
And sullen darkness, with a gloom profound,
Was all that met my weary aching eye!

From the deep stillness came a sudden gleam,
'Twas like the twinkling of some tiny star:
It stole upon me like a brilliant dream
Of some sweet land of beauty from afar!

'Twas a lamp-light: what beauty in its ray!
For there were gathered happy ones at home,
Darkness was light upon the dreary way,
For my own Earth-Star to my thoughts had come.

Oh! cheering, blessed light, the lamp of love,
That shines on every circle gathered round;
Afar, it seems but just dropped from above—
But near, a scene of Paradise is found!

O Star of Earth! what were our life below,
If from thee came no ray to human eye!
If never more love's beacon light should glow,
How starless—moonless, too—would be thy sky!

A LEGEND OF THE SECOND CRUSADE IN THE HOLY LAND.

THE LIFE AND ADVENTURES OF HÁSAN SÁBÁH.

BY MRS. S. H. WADDELL.

(Continued from page 134.)

CHAPTER I.

I saw one

Who loved the greenwood bank and lowing herd,
The russet prize, a restless life,
The din of battle, and the roaring sea.

ANONYMOUS.

THE River Cydnus rises in Mount Taurus, in the district of Cilicia in Asia Minor, and is celebrated for having borne upon its billows the victorious Alexander while bathing and wrestling with its rapid waters. The Egyptian queen, Cleopatra, daughter of Ptolemy Auletes, sailed in all the gorgeousness of Eastern magnificence over its flowing surface, and the city of Tarsus, celebrated for its rivalry with Athens, dresses its borders ere it falls into the depths of the Mediterranean.

In the section of the city known as St. Paul's birthplace, resided my parents. They were at this period in the possession of much wealth; and my father was well calculated from his talents, indomitable spirit, and prudence, to amass, rather than diminish it.

Being their first and only child, I was naturally an object of great solicitude, and my having made my appearance in the midst of civil and foreign war, tended additionally to increase their anxiety for my welfare. The Turks and Greeks were at war in consequence of the loss of the greater part of Lesser Asia, which Suleiman, a cousin of the Seljukian Sultan, Malek Shah, had wrested from the Byzantine emperor. The difficulties as to the rightful succession of the Prophet occasioned the immediate strife between the Fatimites or Egyptian Mohammedans, and the Seljucides or Syrian followers of the Prophet. Upon these contending parties Europe hurled the Crusaders.

Not to depart from the thread of my history, it is necessary to state that my father placed me, at an early age, in the care of a learned Imaum, whose excessive gravity and taciturnity rendered him impressive enough, I thought, without other opinions which he maintained as expedient in bringing the brilliant parts of youth forward, namely: the bastinado, which he held as equal to Aladdin's lamp in discovering the hidden treasures of a boy's mind. Suffice it to say that he thought it the best evidence of his affection for my parents, and myself, to carry out his theory into practice; and I have since, in an idle hour, reckoned one hundred different times that he gathered his sycamore twigs, and, having bound me, delved into the soles of my feet for sparks of genius and treasures of memory.

Well do I recollect my father's entering, one morning, the Imaum's apartment, and taking the Koran, with a troubled countenance, from my lap, raised me by the hand from the cross-legged position in which I was seated. My instructor's habit of silence debarred his inquiring into this singular and unusual conduct, and I quickly ran over in my mind all of my demeanor during the past week, apprehending that I had unwittingly incurred his displeasure, and was, in consequence, to have an interview with my adversary the bastinado; but he soon dispelled those fears by saying to the Imaum:—

"We must set forth, worshipful Al Alpo, and place all things of value in the Turkish garrison, for there is now marching, within a league of us, that limb of Eblis, Tancred, Prince of Otranto, with a thousand lances, crossbowmen, and men-at-arms, and they are but an atom, a mere fraction, from the great mass of the army. How many follow his route, Allah alone knows! Ah! by the beard of Abraham, we are in a rueful plight. The barracks—a spider's web arrayed against a falling pyramid; and the town, composed of so many Armenian and Greek Christians, must, of course, render us weakness itself. There is lunacy in resistance; but so sure as that obstinate mule, at the head of the garrison, takes it into his head to give battle, he will go for the sake of that maxim of his: 'Opinion to the death.' By the beard of Abraham, his motto is as mad as his actions. Some evil genii must have presided over the divan when he was placed in command."

Al Alpo said not a word, but, hastily rising, signified, by pointing to the door, that he was ready to depart.

We found my mother in possession of the news, and perfectly composed; indeed, she was a woman of unusual character and intelligence.

When my father and Al Alpo set forth to the garrison, I followed unobserved, and, although but a child, was provident enough to slip into my girdle a Damascus blade dirk, thinking my parent or preceptor might need the use of it in addition to their own, before the valuables were secured or they have time to reason with the garrison.

They found the commander engaged in sketching a plan of attack, and when the Imaum and my father reasoned as to the folly of such measures with their invaders, I heard the general say:—

"Allah Aabar! my opinion is already formed—the Infidels shall feel, this day, the edge of a Turkish scimitar, and yield as the enemies of Mohammed. Did not the inhabitants of Mecca, though a thousand in number, fall before the sword of the Prophet with one hundred and thirteen followers? Did not Omar overcome Greeks, Syrians, Egyptians, and Persians, overthrowing with the latter the ancient religion of the Magi? This was determination leagued with the scimitar, Allah Kebur!"

"But," continued my father, "most valiant, there is not now that fanaticism which in those days propelled to victory; then they expected supernatural assistance, but now Mohammedans rely only upon such aid as wisdom, united with strength, and a love of our religion and country, affords."

"Allah Karim! wise Zenghi," answered the commander of the garrison, "a man is but a child unless he preserves tenacity in all of his opinions: 'Opinion to the death!'" As he uttered the last sentence, my father rushed out of the apartment, followed by the Imaum Al Alpso, and I heard him mutter, "Infatuated—rushing to destruction—horrible massacre."

I remained standing by the wall of the courtway, when a point of war, sounded from the approaching army, roused all of my energy and enthusiasm. I thought of an expedient at once wild and daring: it was to go in the midst of those foreign foes, and see all of the beauty and grandeur of war. I darted off for the Armenian quarter of the city, for the purpose of finding an intimate friend of mine.

"Cosroes," said I, "go with me to the myrtle terrace; and bring, as soon as you can, a suit of your clothes for me."

"But why, Hâsan?" said the affectionate boy. "This is a strange request, and at such a time."

"If you love me," I responded, "bring the clothes, and ask me no questions at this time."

The clothes were brought, and I soon dressed; and, standing at the main gateway, in front of the encamping Crusaders, it was not long before it was opened, and an Armenian citizen of much influence in Tarsus passed through, for the purpose of parley with the nobles of the army. I stepped immediately after him, and had the satisfaction to hear the gate locked behind me.

Never shall I forget the impression made upon my young imagination by the gallant sight spread before me. The hum of voices in an unknown tongue confused me, and I found, from the commotion of men and horses, that it was necessary for me to secure for myself some corner, where I could indulge my curiosity without being trodden under foot. The base of a tall cypress afforded me a commodious sight of the entire encampment, from which my vision was occasionally obscured by the flash and glitter of their armor, and I frequently rubbed my eyes that I might better behold the gallant bearing of their knights, whose lances, tipped with pennons, resembled the spars of an undulating fleet. Their war-horses were led, and never mounted, as I afterwards saw, but for battle; the bow and arrow, the plaything of my childhood, was in their hands a new instrument. While I gazed intently, I heard a soldier say, "Now, Ned, our wager, man; bring thy arbelaſt, and bear upon yonder cypress."

The vassal stepped forward; he held the arbelaſt firmly with his feet, drew the iron-shod bolt with his right hand, and away darted the shaft; but, before I had time to observe its mark, my attention was absorbed by the appearance of the handsomest and noblest-looking man I ever beheld.

Pyrrhus, the Armenian, advanced towards him, and, placing his hand on his heart, said—

"Prince Tancred, we of Tarsus are followers of the cross, with the exception of a Turkish garrison of five hundred men, from whom we have suffered severe oppression and tyranny. Were we to show the smallest symptom of yielding the town to you, which we, under other circumstances, would gladly do, the scimitar would sever our heads ere the gates could be opened to you. So, by your noble presence, I beg leave to return to the town, bearing to the garrison any message your grace may please to honor me with."

"Deeply do we sympathise with your wrongs," said Prince Tancred. "It was even for this, and the overwhelming disgrace of the blessed sepulchre's being in infidel hands, that you now see the bloody symbol of the cross emblazoned on our breast, and fluttering sleeplessly by day and by night over our heads. Say to the garrison that we are aware that their number equals half of ours, that it is not my wish to shed blood recklessly; if they will elevate my banner over the walls of the city, all will be well with them."

Pyrrhus shook his head, bowed lowly, and left the encampment.

He had not been absent more than a half hour, before I heard, from five or six hundred voices, "Alla illa alla, Mohammed re soul alla!"*

The chivalrous Tancred hastened into his pavilion, and, in a very short time, was standing at the head of his troops, armed cap-à-pie, his countenance calm and commanding, and his gestures so full of manly grace, that I was only restrained by the recollection of my father from throwing myself at his feet, and begging that he would allow me to follow him through life.

I was roused by the sound of several trumpets, and the cry of "Remember the holy sepulchre! God * Mohammedan war-cry.

wills it! God wills it!" and all was silent for some time. I turned in the direction of the city just as some wild strains of music, with the cry, "Allah hu!" rose at the gateway. Out rushed the garrison, followed by such of the citizens as could bear arms; but, in a half hour, men and horses were rolling in the sand, and clouds of dust enveloped cross and crescent. But for the whiz of arrows, twang of crossbows, and crash of spears, the noise of kettle-drums and trumpets, with an occasional cry from the wounded and dying, I could never have known, so dense was the drapery of dust enveloping the place of skirmish, what was transpiring beyond it.

The Turks hurried towards the city in great confusion, and I gazed with the utmost anxiety at their retreat, until my eyes caught, over the walls of Tarsus, a broad banner unfolding its blue field and silver cross to the breezes of the Mediterranean. It was Prince Tancred's, speaking more loudly than trumpet peals his victory over the garrison.

I now, for the first time, thought that my father might be among the slain or wounded; for, although he was not an orthodox Mohammedan, being in his faith partly a Ghiber, or Fire-worshipper, yet he observed the essentials of the Koran, and so often were his slippers left at the door of the mosque, that they were as well known in Tarsus as his person—he was not regarded as the resident Christians: he paid no tribute money, and was not, like them, excluded from office, and prohibited military service.

I ran over the field of conflict, and was relieved by seeing nothing of him. The carnage shocked my young mind to such an extent, that it produced nausea, and I dropped on the ground, covering my face with my hands. A heavy sigh, and "Water, for St. Cyprian's sake!" induced me to look in the direction of the sound, and found that it proceeded from a knight in full armor, who was literally clothed in blood. I fled to a cistern near the walls of the city, unchained the copper cup, filled it with water, and returned.

Prince Tancred, and a youth of sixteen or seventeen, were unharnessing and stanching the blood which so freely flowed from the wounded knight. They gave him the cup, which he drained with an eagerness I had never before witnessed.

"May St. Cyprian assuage thee for that saving cup!" said he, reviving a little.

I followed the group, as they bore away the knight, heartily rejoiced to turn from this field of suffering and death, particularly as it was now attended by leeches with amulets, Hadgees and Imaums: I also saw the glitter of instruments in the hands of crusading surgeons, and the flowing gowns of sably-dressed priests.

St. Cyprian's votary was laid upon finely-dressed skins, in Prince Tancred's pavilion, while his chaplain, who well understood the healing art, pronounced him only exhausted from loss of blood, and not in danger from the wound. "Though," added the chaplain, "he would now have been in paradise, had he not been so promptly attended to."

"Ah, by my halidome, Valfrino," said Prince Tancred, "it is well for thee it was not a poisoned arrow, or Ernest there"—pointing to his page—"and myself would have been singing now, for my beloved squire's soul, the miserere; and happy am I that our good chaplain is not lighting wax tapers at thy feet, man, in place of heating them for thee! Canst thou say what manner of man it was that aimed his shaft so successfully at thee?"

Valfrino* made a grimace, in which he changed his countenance, and strikingly resembled the commander of the garrison. I involuntarily said—

"Opinion, to the death!" And, for the first time, arrested attention.

"Thou wast there, then?" said the squire—for such was Valfrino, and not a knight.

"No, sire," I replied; "some distance off. But I know the commander of the garrison."

"Well," he responded, "his last words were such as you repeated, when I returned, with a sword-blow on the head, the compliment of his arrow."

I shuddered to think of the bloody change produced in a few minutes; but my attention was abstracted by shouts from the garrison again, of "Alla illa alla," and by the arrival of several officers, who came to inform Prince Tancred that, in the direction of the hills, flying squadrons of Turks were pouring down, and, according to their mode of warfare, showers of arrows would be rained in the midst of the army, and they immediately disappear.

Prince Tancred made every arrangement for defence and attack, and marched in the direction of the Turks.

I was so much interested in their military evolutions, that I returned to my cypress post and climbed aloft, that I might see beyond the undulations of the hills. As soon as the troops advanced sufficiently near to be mutually recognized, what was my surprise when, in place of a furious charge, Prince Tancred and the advancing general cast their shields and arms on the ground, and rushed into each other's arms!

I was all curiosity to see the newly-arrived warriors, and set off to the pavilion. Upon reaching it, I went directly to Valfrino's couch. He extended his hand to me, and motioned that I should sit down. My Armenian dress, with the knowledge I possessed of Greek and lingua-francka—derived from associating with the Christians of Tarsus—enabled me to pass for one in the Frankish camp.

* Prince Tancred's squire was the greatest mimic of his day.

CHAPTER II.

BALDWIN, the brother of Godfrey of Bouillon, and, some two or more years after this period, his successor in the kingdom of Jerusalem, did not impress my mind with that sense of noble elevation that I always felt upon seeing Tancred; his personal advantages were greater too than usual, having a large and commanding figure, strong and regular features, with a grave and studied manner.

He was conducted by Prince Tancred into his pavilion, assigned the most honorable seat, and entertained with affectionate courtesy. Ernest brought, on a silver salver, goblets of wine, and served it kneeling on one knee.

"The health of the Lady Godchild!" said the prince.

I observed a shade pass over the brow of his guest, when the former observed—

"This is imperial wine: the Greeks, no doubt, would have us believe it the same served by Ganymede to Jupiter. While my liege lord, Bohemond, was persuading me to take the oath at Constantinople, the Emperor Alexius, after his subtle fashion, undertook to buy my allegiance and good-will. He sent me a pipe of Tokay, such, he avowed, as Hungary rarely produced. I returned his present with scorn, and requested him to recollect that 'I was a knight ere I became a Crusader.' He was foiled in his expectations; but again requested my acceptance of the wine, even should I determine never to acquiesce in the political measures of his cabinet. I sent, by my page, an embroidered sword-belt, with a buckle of gold set with costly jewels, directing him to take for me the pipe of wine, should the emperor show his disinterestedness by receiving the belt. Alexius, according to custom, vacillated, when his imperious queen remarked, 'Hast thou, noble emperor, not already been mistrusted enough, and accused of every humiliating and insidious mode of acquiring allegiance from, and dominion over the Crusaders, even to poisoning their chiefs, to show for once that an emperor of the ancient and renowned Greeks could make a paltry present without some hidden motive beneath it?'"

"But, leaving Constantinople, its emperor, and its wines," continued Prince Tancred, "for a subject of more immediate interest, tell me, noble Baldwin, whether your march, after our separation in Iconium, proved adventurous with the heathen or not?"

"As to adventures," replied Baldwin, "I will say we had enough of them; but they were in the heathenish form of famine and burning sands. Our arrival at the Bosphorus, and intended progress through Lesser Asia into Syria, spread like wildfire among the inhabitants, who thereupon left the country, taking with them every movable of value. We necessarily suffered many and severe privations; but it is the duty of a soldier, you know, 'not to look back when his hand is on the plough;' and, by your leave, we will discuss something of a merrier character than hunger and fatigue, if it were only for the sake of rejoicing that our trouble is so far over."

I now left the encampment without ceremony, as I had entered it, and returned to my parents. My father was pleased with the relation of my exploits, and promised that I should return, on the following morning, to the Christian encampment. This was the greatest indulgence he could have bestowed on me; and, accordingly, as soon as I partook of my morning's repast, I set forth, and was again by the side of Valfrino's couch, finding him much improved. He appeared glad to see me, and said—

"You shall be my page by and by, Hásan, when I become a belted knight; and we will have bright times among the infidels."

A sudden vision of Al Alpeo and my father flitted before me, and I was unable to thank him. My embarrassment was relieved by a loud altercation outside of the pavilion; and, from Valfrino's exclamations and chagrin, I saw that it was something of great moment. He would say—

"By all the saints, I knew it would be so! No man, who acts as he does towards his lady wife, could fail in having the worst of dispositions. By St. Cyprian, and that is beyond endurance! Only hear him!"

I went to the door-way of the pavilion as Prince Tancred said—

"But remember, our lord of Bouillon, and Bohemond of Tarentum, sent us from Antioch—as your noble brother was ill of wounds—to seek adventures with the heathen, and to explore the country. We separated, you remember, in Iconium, to fulfil in separate directions the command of our leaders and liege lords of the crusade. How now? Have I not a right to Tarsus, when won by my good sword? My determination is, as in duty bound from the laws of our combination, to hold possession until the arrival of my liege lord of Tarentum, or until I shall hear of his will as to the disposal of the city."

Baldwin replied to this by saying—

"Had I observed thy banner waving over those walls yesterday, parched be my tongue forever if I would have tasted thy wine, or entered thy pavilion, until thou hadst divided the honors of victory with me, or given over the town to be plundered."

"Why, my lord Baldwin," replied Tancred, "can you be mad? What possible shadow of a right have you to any part of Tarsus, when you were absent, and on a different mission, at the time I overcame the garrison?"

Baldwin made no reply; but, going into the city, he very soon raised a tumult, and I saw, with amazement, Prince Tancred's banner lowered and that of Baldwin elevated in its place.

The troops, led by the knights of each leader, arrayed themselves in order for combat, when the gallant and pious Tancred stepped forward, and, baring his demelike forehead, said to the Crusaders—

"My beloved brethren, look upon your bosoms, and those crimson crosses will reproach you. I appeal to you, by the great and holy cause in which we have embarked, to sheath your swords and trail your lances, as if for a funeral; for it is one, indeed, to our blessed cause, should such a scene as this be acted. Let Baldwin take the city of Tarsus, and welcome; so that he receives it in Christian peace—that peace which we have vowed to keep with every follower of the cross, under all circumstances of wrong and of aggression. I trust I shall now set you that example; for I will this moment turn from Cilicia, and seek, in more distant regions, other victories and other achievements, in which I hope to aid our united strength in wresting from infidel hands the sepulchre of the Saviour of the universe."

A deep silence prevailed, and, when Prince Tancred turned to his pavilion, shout after shout of "Long live the brave, the virtuous Tancred!" vibrated through the city, and echoed over the wide and blue waters of the Mediterranean.

With a heavy heart, I returned to my home, and seated myself on a mat. I heard my father relate the proceedings of Baldwin with indignation. He had caused the people of Tarsus to revolt by representing to them that his brother, Godfrey, of Bouillon, being chief in command of the Crusaders, would severely punish any disobedience on their part to his authority; and, should they not pull down Prince Tancred's banner and plant his in its place, they would find no quarter upon the arrival of Godfrey and Bohemond. My father added that he had seen, in that short time, enough of Baldwin to dislike him, and that he had formed a resolution as to his own movements—that, at midnight, he would leave the city; and "you, Hâsan," he continued, "will remember that you have been taught to obey your parents: you are not to leave this house but by my permission."

He then turned to the imaum—

"Worshipful hogia,* we buried our treasure in the garden, you know, when we found that the garrison would resist these infidel invaders. You will collect it when I give you an intimation of the time. And now I will see our camels fed, and look after other preparations."

I greatly desired to see Cosroes, and bid him farewell, but dreaded to disobey my father's commands.

The period of midnight found the imaum and my father mounted on mules; two sumpter camels bore our baggage and provisions, another carried my mother and myself, with a couple of handsomely-finished sacks filled with confectionery and dried fruits. We travelled in silence for two leagues, when my father slackened his pace, and remarked—* Teacher.

"Our journey now lies midway of these invading Franks; their armies are overrunning the interior of this country, and their fleets and piratical vessels cover the Mediterranean. As the latter seldom appear in sight of the Cilician coast, I propose that our route should be within a league of the sea-shore; that we cross the River Pinarus, thence over the Mountains of Amanus, where I hope to join a caravan which will touch at Antioch. There I will abide a while with my beloved friend, Phirous, the beni zerri.* The Crusaders will, from all apcounets, confine their warfare to Roum"—i. e., the Greek empire—"until the conquests made by the Turks are restored to Alexius, who will then unite with the Croisiers in attempting the conquest of Palestine."

The imaum nodded his assent, and my mother remarked that we would then be but a week on the road, which was a great relief to her, as she dreaded the Syrian sun as much as the cross-handled sword of these djours† from the west.

In crossing over the last ridge of Amanus, we saw beneath us the caravan so much desired by my father. Lights were glowing and glimmering, disappearing and rekindling, as you have seen ignes fatui in damp and marshy situations. They had just halted, and were lighting their fires; men were yet in the saddle, and women, inclosed in caftans and veils, stepping from kneeling camels and dromedaries; slaves were spreading carpets, dressing pilans, or unburthening camels, and piling up bales of goods, which were scattered about, in positions of greater security. Persons of distinction and Turkish merchants were sitting cross-legged upon mats and carpets; singers were amusing crowds, who were standing, sitting, and lying down about them; imaums were throwing themselves in different positions, as they prayed; while others performed their ablutions, or listened, with wonder and veneration, to green-turbaned hadgees.

As soon as my father stopped, and while he was assisting my mother to dismount, I slipped from the camel for the purpose of joining a group that I had observed perfectly enchanted by a tall man, with a turban as white as snow, a jetty beard, and flashing eyes. Before reaching him, I would occasionally hear the rich intonations of his voice, as he elevated it in various cadences. His gestures were full of animation and natural grace, and he would sometimes most expressively and rapidly change the style of his costume by a mere elevation or droop of his robe. He would, again, draw his dagger, and quickly sheath it; sometimes, as quick as light, his bow would be strung; and now he portrayed grief, with all of its overwhelming desolation: from this * Historians inform us that Phirous, though of a noble family in Armenia, was not ashamed of the title, "beni zerri" (or armor-maker).

† Dogs.

the alternation was as rapid. His white teeth would glitter, and his mouth assume all of the merriment of joyous laughter. During this time, the group would intuitively draw nearer; they elevated their arms, shouted aloud, then sunk their heads, and sorrowfully ejaculated, "Alla! Alla!"

This individual was called Merari, the poet and story-teller. I returned to my parents, thinking that Merari's eloquence would charm them into forgetfulness of their fatigue, and found that my father had employed a hired servant to attend him as groom, and was purchasing from hucksters, who had already spread out a furnished bazaar, every necessary for our supper. His very neat tent was pitched beneath the beautiful palm, at the base of which we had alighted.

I passed into the tent, and found my mother sitting on one of her handsome carpets, awaiting the return of my father, and the imamu, Al Alpo, telling over his rosary of date-stones.

When my father entered the tent, he brought with him the renegade, Phirouz. His appearance was always unpleasant to me, particularly a squint in both of his eyes, which gave him a barbarous look. He was tall and brawny, with a club-foot, on which he walked as if badly crippled.

"Well, brother," said my father to the renegade, "glad am I to find thee here. What brought thee off from Antioch?"

"Only to gratify the governor of the city," he replied, pointing towards the tent-door.

"And is he with the caravan?" inquired my father.

"Indeed, he is," responded the renegade, Phirouz. "You will recognize him in this crowd of two thousand souls—may the Prophet guard them!—by an elephant he travels on: it is white, and covered with fringed-silk hangings; above the canopy, under which he is seated, there are flags; the head of the elephant is dressed with ostrich feathers; and he has two lieutenants stationed by the animal, with drawn swords; twenty skillful archers follow him, and twenty precede him. He takes a letter from Sultan Kilidge Arslan,* which he has to read to a divan upon reaching Antioch. You must recollect to teach Hâsan the usual observances on these occasions.

"Hâsan," continued he, "you must not sit with your back towards that green tent surmounted by a golden crescent; the sultan's letter alone occupies it, and you see it is guarded by a soldier with a drawn scimitar. It was taken, a short time previously to your arrival, from the elephant on which the governor rides, with sounding trumpets and thundering drums."

CHAPTER III.

On the following morning, as the sun was reddening the east, and birds of the dawn were singing glad anthems, as they shook the dew-drops from their plumage, I was roused by the cry of the mace-sin; and, as soon as our orisons were performed, I saw all in motion for our departure.

The order of march was as follows: A mule was placed at the head of the caravan, and fastened to him were fifty camels in a string, one before another, on which riders, merchandise, and luggage were placed; then, after the ceremonies already mentioned, the green and gold tent was struck; near him was my father's party, with the renegade. We were with the second mule and fifty camels. After this followed many on foot and on mules. When, however, a cloud of dust was perceived, or voices heard, the rider in advance, who was mounted on the foremost mule, placed his thumbs at the back of his ears, and uttered a shrill cry; it was conveyed, from one to another, to the extremity of the caravan, which instantly formed a dense square, the valuables and defenceless occupying the centre, while the armed and strong closed the front, the rear, and the wings. In this way, we travelled pleasantly and safely, until we reached the towering walls of the mountain which border the north side of the city of Antioch, and saw the glitter of the Orontes, as it dashed its billows on the massive walls of Antioch. They are of solid pieces of stone, so broad in diameter that a chariot and four horses might make a circuit of the city. Four hundred and fifty towers are built, at proper distances, on the walls, and on the south is situated the city castle. We passed, in the rear of the governor, through the bridge gate on the north of Antioch, while the caravan remained for the night in the suburbs, being on their journey to Palestine and Bassora.

The renegade, Phirouz, had ingratiated himself with the governor of this city, and was often intrusted with the secret measures of the divan. His residence was near the palace of Baghi Seyan, who, being sprung from the race of the Seljukian princes, was regarded by the reigning sultan with all of the respect due to one of his descent; and the emir's nature commanded respect, although he possessed but a small portion of the affection of his people. He lived in great splendor, and the renegade promised my father that, should he require patronage, he would say all within his power that was favorable to the governor for him.

My father was in possession of a handsome residence in the city; and, after bidding adieu to his acquaintances, he set forth in the direction of his establishment, and was soon comfortably settled; while the imaum and myself carried on our investigation of parchment, with occasional introductions to the bastinado.

* (Sword lion), son of Suleiman, cousin of Sultan Malek Shah.

My father's profession was mercantile. He was soon installed in a part of the bazaar. As was his habit when residing in Tarsus, his business here had been carried on by agents; but now, although he employed many clerks, in accordance with the custom of other wealthy merchants, yet he chose to be a great deal in the establishment, and saw much of his large business transacted under his immediate inspection. I need not say that this added not a little to his wealth; and my mother's refined taste, and ample means of indulging her fancies, occasioned the appellation of Zenghi, the Guzel, or beautiful, by which his family were distinguished from two others of the same name in Antioch.

A Jew, known as Ben Joseph, was my father's homme d'affaires: indeed, all who undertook business of this nature invariably employed some one of these sons of Judah; their sagacity and attention to moneyed transactions were remarkable; and, indeed, what else could be expected from a people who saw that their only strength, so far as their fellow-men were considered, consisted in gold and silver. Ben Joseph was a small, thin man, with all of the national marks of his people; his beard was remarkably long, hanging to his girdle, and, being dyed of an orange color, with henna, according to their custom, as were his eyebrows, lent his aquiline nose and sharp eyes a peculiar expression.

I used to observe that, whenever Phirous, the renegade, made his appearance, as he frequently did, to converse with my father, Ben Joseph was serious and distant. He appeared to withdraw himself within himself; and the renegade, after observing his reserve for some time, would touch his heart, and immediately turn his back, as if determined to show the Jew that he cared as little for his acquaintance as he appeared to do for him.

On one of these occasions, while Phirous was sipping his sherbet, cooled by the snows of Caucasus, he said to my father—

"Holy St. Gregory—I mean holy Prophet—what is to become, brother Zenghi, of trade and traffic, when we are situated as the antelope told in story, who, being on his journey to the forest, and having to pass a plain in which the cusa-grass of the Fire-worshippers grew, found, from a burning coal dropped by a dervish, that the dry grass was kindling rapidly all around him. He deliberated in his dilemma, and bethought him of some expedient by which he could escape; but he found to remain was to be destroyed, and to fly was to be singed cruelly, if not to death. So, choosing the lesser of the two evils, he bounded off on his way home, carrying to his covey lacerated marks of his adventure. So, brother, is it with us; what with the Franks on one side, the marauding Arabs on the other, with the contending factions of the Caliphate, we are hemmed in by fire and sword very like the poor antelope I have just related the legend of."

"You are right, Phirous Beni Zerri," answered my father. "I trust we shall escape the scenes of war in this beautiful country. We have reason to hope that the infidels will confine their bloodshed to Lesser Asia; and, after satisfying that tyrant of a Greek, Alexius, by restoring those dominions he was too weak to keep in his possession, take shipping for Palestine. Jerusalem will be their headquarters. Our commerce, as you have observed, brother, is sadly tangled—ah, worse than the knot of Gordius, which the imaum taught Hâsan the nature of in his morning's lesson. But to be free from the immediate scene of war, as the imaum also says, and truly, is to be free from the dwelling of Eblis."

"Ah," muttered Ben Joseph, "a worse fire burns for an apostate like thee!"

When the renegade made his salaam and departed, my father turned to Ben Joseph, and said—

"Hear, Ben Joseph, hast thou received any tidings from thy tribe on the Rhine lately?"

"Ah," he replied, "these are times full of tribulation to the house of Jacob; the days of visitation are come. In the month Elul, at Worms and Treves, they were called on by those sworn to Baal* to renounce the religion of the Hebrews; but, when they asked time for consideration, it was only to prepare for death, and their blood mingled by their own hands with that of their wives and children. The holy Rabbi Isaac was slain for the sanctification of the law: his wisdom was as that of Asaph and Hymen. In Ments and Spire—but why enumerate? How shall we drink the bitter cup? They have gone to dwell in the dew of light; may God, in his mercy, avenge their innocent blood!"

I felt for Ben Joseph when I saw him rend his garments and shower ashes on his clean turban, until that and his face were completely disfigured.

Those who have never witnessed this ancient mode of evincing grief can form no adequate idea of its solemnity; the forlorn and expressive countenance, the figure developing an utter disregard to any interest in appearances, and consequently abstracted from the things of time, appears as if the heart and soul of the individual had fled away, leaving only a melancholy representation of what it once was.

I was engaged, while at Antioch, in close study with Al Alpao, during which time my life passed monotonously enough, with the exception of one or two visits, with my father and the renegade, to the outer court of the palace of Baghi Seyan. There my curiosity was roused by the accounts I heard of the great beauty of the expected bride of the governor. Baghi Seyan had never seen her; the negotiation of the marriage was carried on by his envoys and the family of the lady. It was a political contract; and the dower of the intended bride was said to be the chief inducement with the governor in suing for her as his wife. She was to bring a dowry of eight ships of gold, silver, and jewels, armor and arms of the most approved temper, and splendid materials, wines, and oil, with seven hundred troops, two hundred of which were her body-guard, being accomplished archers.

* Crusaders.

At this period, I was one day solitarily engaged in angling on the bank of the Lake Ofirinus, north of the city, when one of those long, narrow caïques, with a prow projecting twenty-five feet, on which a golden swan in the act of flight was perched, glided by; at its extremity an awning of silk, supported by gilded pillars of beautiful proportion, interspersed with golden sashes and festooned with crimson silk fringed with gold, fluttered in the air; surmounting the whole, flashed the crescent of Mohammed. Twelve boatmen dipped harmonious oars in the limpid waters of the placid lake, and so softly did it move onward, that the liquid silver of the lake was scarcely ruffled.

I could not imagine the design of this: were it the intended bride, the lake would be stormy with caïques, and the shores embattled with troops, with waving banners, dancing, and music.

I placed my little basket on my arm, and set off for my home, which was near the water. My father was in his gallery,* and I called his attention to the skiff. As it touched the strand, two figures, one a female all veiled, the other an elderly man, stepped from the slender and phantom-like caïque, when a sound from the eastern side of the city electrified the inhabitants, causing those who were sleeping to spring on their feet, the actively-engaged artisan to sit, while he listened, as motionless as a statue; children rushed to their mothers' arms, and groups of men would whisper as they conversed together. As this mighty tempest came onward, the earth trembled beneath our feet, and banners, pennons, and lances darkened the east like black and spreading clouds. I am ashamed to acknowledge that my heart gladdened when I heard the neigh and tramp of horses, the peal of trumpets, and the thunder of the drums.

Baghi Seyan had just returned from assisting Radvan, one of the sons of Tütüsh, brother of Sultan Malek Shah, who, since the death of their father, had been alternately engaged in civil quarrels; and their relative, the Emir Baghi Seyan, Governor of Antioch, would, as his judgment directed, assist one or the other of the brothers, according to his peculiar position; and in this way he was, if we may be allowed the expression, a species of warlike umpire, when the necessity of either of the brothers required his presence, and thereby preserved a balance of power in their government and warfare.

* The Turks build their houses with courts and open galleries all around them.

CHAPTER IV.

As the effendi, kyhalas, and tefterdar passed on their way to the council, which was called immediately on the arrival of the emir, the renegade being with them, stepped in my father's gallery, and, taking him by the arm, hurried him off with them. The confusion rather added to a vertigo he was troubled with, and he left his turban on the mat he had been sitting on, which my mother presently observed, when she turned to me and said—

"Run, Hâsan, and take thy father's turban to him. Oh, how must Zenghi, the Guzel, look without it! He will be a subject of ridicule to all who see him."

I must say, in explanation, that my father, according to the fashion of some Mohammedans, shaved his beard entirely, leaving only a tuft of hair on the top of his head, for the convenience of the Prophet in lifting him into paradise.

I was soon admitted, when I said, at the audience door, that the renegade, Phirouz, would explain my business.

The grandson of Sultan Malek Shah, being newly arrived from a fatiguing march, and aged withal, required the luxury of his velvet cushions, and was sitting reposingly, with his kyhalas on each side of him, when I entered. His court of audience was spacious enough for the accommodation of the prominent men of each regiment of his allies, including his own; and I saw, with delight, files of armed men enter the gateway, and lower their banners as they passed their chief. Turks in light armor, with fine white linen turbans, held bows and arrows, spears and scimitars, as if they were made of air. Arabs, swarthy, tall, and lean, with figures not unlike the long reed tipped with steel which they bore in their hands, their wild and restless look strikingly reminding the beholder of the denunciation, "His hand shall be against every man, and every man's against him." Tartars, with large heads, bronzed complexions, small, deep-set eyes, and flat noses, with longbows towering above their heads. Persians of majestic forms, their full beards forming a contrast to the scattering and stunted growth on the chins of the former.

I heard the effendi say to Baghi Seyan—

"We had hoped, great emir, to have been now engaged in making preparations for thy marriage with the 'Startled Fawn of Cashmere.' How would she have shone as the full moon on thy magnificence! The poets of her country compare her movements to 'a branch of the tamarisk waving to the southern breeze.' She desired to appear privately; and, arriving at the borders of the Lake Ofirinus, took there a caïque, which was held ready by her father, and landed but a few hours since. According to your directions, she was placed in the 'Hall of Perfumes,' and will be visited by the wife of Zenghi, the Gusel, who is a relative of hers."

"Out! out!" said the aged emir. "Tell me not of promised happiness; a prospect held before me as yon steel reflects the sunbeam, to dazzle and instantly disappear. We have only to look and think of resistance to those foreign and infidel dogs who are howling at our gates."

Many plans were formed for the defence of the city, and for sustaining the siege. The renegade was assigned the most important tower connected with the gate in front of the encampment of the Crusaders, and his son, Isamo, was selected as one of the spies to be sent among the Franks. I saw dissatisfaction in the countenances of those who occupied rank and office; for the renegade was no general favorite, and the circumstance of his apostasy rendered him additionally unpopular. His subtlety, daring, and strong discriminating powers elevated him with the governor, to whom he was often very useful.

Upon reaching home, we found the imaum in despair. His horror, upon finding Antioch besieged, severed for a time the strings of his tongue.

"Oh, wretched Antioch!" he exclaimed, "well would it have been had thy founder, Seleucus Nicator, styled the Victorious, been dead, ere he raised a corner-stone for thee! Oh, Antioch! thou hast been visited, indeed! Earthquakes, sword, and famine have been thy sisters! I had thought that thy strength and thy position would have given thee peace for years to come, and that thou wouldst have slept in thy flowery valleys uninterrupted but by the caravans and the laden caique of the Orontes and Ofrinus."

Al Alpo wept. He was not a man of the sword; and his thin beard was scattered about him, and his turban given to the winds, in the paroxysm of his grief.

As I have already stated, the castle was situated on the southern boundary of the city; its elevation was far above the walls, and its position on the rocky heights of the mountains afforded an extensive view of the descending ridges, which ran parallel with the Orontes, being branches of the Libanus, whose cedars furnished King Solomon with the fragrant materials of which the temple dedicated to the Most High was reared. There was only a perilous footway leading from the neighboring country to the portal of the castle; but the gentle slopes on the east of the city afforded sumptuous gardens, vineyards, and orchards, whose exhalations perfumed their declivities and valleys for leagues. On the opposite side of these mountains gush perpetually sweet and limpid waters, which were conveyed by subterranean pipes to every part of the city.

It was immediately in this region that the Crusaders stretched their lines, and I was not long in discovering Prince Tancred's banner in the section assigned his liege lord, the Prince of Tarentum, who, with his Normans, occupied the front of one of the city gates, called by them St. Paul's. Next was the camp of Robert of Flanders, Robert of Normandy, Stephen of Blois, and Hugh the Great, with Franks and Britons. Next came the Count of Toulouse, the Bishop of Puy, with Gascons, Provençals, and Burgundians. Then came the Duke of Lorraine, his brother Eustace, the Counts of Youl and Montague, with Lorrainers, Trisians, Swabians, Franconians, and Bavarians. Three hundred thousand of this Babel bore arms.

I do not know even now the policy of such measures, but at one time the governor, Baghi Seyan, determined in his council to put to the sword every Christian citizen of Antioch; he afterwards decided to keep as hostages for their good behavior, their wives, children, and property, while the men were allowed to visit the Croisiers, provided they meddled not with the war. It may have been for the convenience of his spies, who were disguised as Christians of Antioch.

I was now fourteen years of age, and felt that there was something morally wrong in my visiting my friend, Valfrino, in the company of Isamo. Innocent curiosity prompted my first acquaintance with him; but now I saw Isamo regarded as a Christian, and knew that his views were insidious. I scorned to betray my own country; and my father, when he acceded to my going into the encampment, threatened me with torture, and even death, should I give any intimation of the spies or their measures, or, indeed, meddle at all with either's movements. I had no disposition to be treacherous; the scruples I felt in being with Isamo and Valfrino was an evidence of the purity of my feelings.

Isamo resembled his father, and possessed the same gifts of ingratiating himself. His fund of humor, equal temper, and quick perceptions rendered him highly conventional, and he possessed all of the prudence, hypocrisy, and craft necessary to the task assigned him.

When he first entered the encampment—without any directions from me—he went directly to the tent of Valfrino, and, with perfect self-possession, said—

"Brother, let me introduce myself to thee. I am a Christian, a Syrian by birth, whose ancestors came originally as pilgrims from gay Normandy, and the ill-usage of the Turks rendered them too poor to return to their beloved country. Our oppressors were bad enough under the Turks of the house of Ortok, who were, fourteen years ago, expelled from Palestine by the Caliphs of Egypt. Those Saracens stripped us of all we possessed, and my father was even reduced to servitude. He made the best of what was inevitable, and, being truly a Christian, served uprightly and faithfully the man who held him captive, and so far won his confidence that he gave him his freedom, and would have given his daughter to me in marriage, had we consented to become apostates for Mohammed."

Valfrino extended his hand, welcomed him gayly and affectionately, offered to place a cross on his shoulder, and give him a place in the ranks to which he belonged. But Isamo sighed, placed his hand on his heart, shook his head, and stated the determination of the divan to put every man's family to the sword who ventured to meddle with the war.

I could not enjoy myself; and it was only after seeing Isamo depart that I could throw my arms around Valfrino's neck, and tell him how glad I was to see him.

Ten days after this, I carried some fine grapes, which were now in perfection, to my friend, and, while he was regaling himself with them, I heard something fall heavily at the door of the tent. What was my horror upon discovering it to be a human head, shot by a longbow from the walls of the city. By the time Valfrino came to the spot, another and another was hurled. He turned away, saying—

"Such is the fate of war! My own head, like these poor foragers, may be the next to roll in the sand, or perhaps be stuck on a spear in sight of the followers of the cross.

"Hâsan, do you know," he said, turning to me, "that it is suspected that treason is in the camp; at least that many who appear as Christians are assuming the cross that they may more successfully carry on their investigations as spies? Yesterday, our liege lord Bohemond sent out a foraging party. They were surprised by some Antiocheans, and a conflict took place. The Crusaders returned with a hundred heads hanging at their saddle-bows, and two prisoners. They were saved for ransom; but I now understand that Prince Bohemond has commanded their execution, and has summoned all of the Syrian Christians, who came from Antioch into the encampment, to attend. You will be obliged, my son, to march with me to the scene of execution."

When we arrived at the appointed place, I saw Bohemond, Prince of Tarentum, for the first time. He was apparently fifty years of age, and one of the tallest and stoutest men I ever saw; even with a stoop in the shoulders, he towered over the crowd like a palm in the desert. There was determination, indeed cruelty, in his thin, compressed mouth and cold, blue eyes. He wore his hair so short as only to appear below his helmet, while all from his country were seen with long and flowing locks; his crest was vermillion, in unison with the field of his arms.

I was struck with this descendant of Robert Guiscard, whose wonderful deeds of arms had been sung to me in my infancy as a lullaby; and, as he walked to and fro before his pavilion, and passed alternately beneath the shadow of the banner of his ancestors planted before his encampment, I thought that he almost united the powers of the lion and tiger with that of the man.

A vast multitude were assembled by the blast of his trumpeter, and, among the Syrians, I saw Isamo, whose anxiety of countenance betrayed apprehension, from the dashes of red and alternate pallor which his bronzed face, and quick tremulous glances exhibited. A herald, with the arms of the prince blazoned on a small red flag, brayed three peals from a trumpet to which it was attached; and presently an executioner, with bare arms and head, in a crimson dress, appeared. He placed a hacked and blood-stained block on the sand, and laid upon it a broadaxe. He now disappeared, and in a short time returned, leading by iron chains the two prisoners taken by the foraging party. I felt keenly for my countrymen, who were only known to me by the ensigns of Baghi Seyan, being soldiers of his. I felt some relief from the calm spirit of the men, and turned to Valfrino, my only friend in this motley crowd. I suppose my face must have expressed great emotion, for he jerked me back and stood before me, so as to shield me from the scene of death. I heard the last shout of the victims, "Alla! Alla!" and each stroke of the axe as it severed their heads. My feelings were now beyond control, and I rushed from Valfrino's side just in time to see the heads held up in each hand of the executioner, as he pronounced, while they dropped and trickled gore with features convulsed in death—

"Such awaits all who are enemies of the cross, and such awaits all who act as spies in the Christian camp."

I was hemmed in by armed men, and obliged to return to my friend to witness a scene still more horrible and revolting. Some of the beautiful shrubbery from the gardens, clothed with clinging vines and gay flowers, was brought and kindled into a fire by one of the prince's cooks; the aroma of these spicy boughs rose with the smoke, and perfumed the surrounding air. The bodies were stripped and laid before the fire, and I heard the head cook say to a subordinate—

"Look, and mind ye that the heathens do not burn, as their souls are now doing; for they are to be daintily feasted for the prince's supper, so soon as he be returned from vespers."*

I had sickened and nearly fainted on the field of Tarsus, and, had I not witnessed the carnage there, I should never have remained sensible during this horrible tragedy.

* Such scenes were only, of course, designed for effect by the Crusaders.

(To be concluded.)

THE BRANCH OF ROSES.

(1208.)

TRANSLATED FROM THE FRENCH OF MME. EVELINE RIBBECOURT, BY MRS. ANNE F. LAW.

CHAPTER I.

THE gleeful sound which attends a wedding awoke the slumbering echoes of the valley of Urseven. The relatives and friends pass, two by two, along the narrow road which winds between the rocks, and regard with great satisfaction the newly-married pair, who, seeking for solitude, have urged on their horses, and are far in advance of the cavalcade. The hand of Hedwige is clasped in that of her husband; Rodolph leans gently towards her, guiding with care the steps of the little Jennet, almost as white as snow, and which seemed proud of its lovely burden. Occasionally, the evening wind—playing with the bride's veil, and lifting it aside—discovers well-defined features; eyes blue as the azure billows of the lake; and luxuriant hair, which was still crowned with the nuptial wreath. Rodolph regarded with delight this gentle being, whose visage reflected only goodness and innocence, and pressed with great tenderness the little hand which had been given him at the altar. He eagerly quaffed this cup of human felicity, and often repeated, "How much I love you, and how happy I am!"

Hedwige, with feminine timidity, enjoyed, in the recesses of her bosom, a happiness not the less vividly felt. Rodolph de Wart was the handsomest, the most valiant, and the most loyal of the Swiss chevaliers. Truly noble, he was gentle towards the weak, and unbending to the powerful. If manly qualities were displayed upon his forehead and in his eyes, his mouth was embellished with an amiable smile; and his voice, so strong in the battle-field, when with women softened to those accents which penetrate the heart. He was rich and honored; and he could boast of a line of illustrious ancestry. His future was filled with brilliant hopes. Such was the husband of Hedwige—the happy Hedwige—who, beneath the eyes of her mother, and at the side of her beloved, did not believe that earth could offer felicity equal to hers. All around seemed in harmony with the sentiments of her soul; no cloud obscured the splendid blue of the heavens; the evening star appeared like a lighthouse placed in the midst of a dark forest of fir-trees. The descending pathway discovered to the eyes of the travellers a fertile vale, rich in pastures, which were enamelled by some rustic dwellings, and around which rose, in an amphitheatre, stern mountains. On one side appeared granite rocks, and on the other lively verdure. In the horizon, blending with the sky, rose the glaciers with sullen and silent dignity. They had lost the brilliant hues with which the sun paints them when bidding farewell; and, immovable and livid, one could imagine them an army of giant phantoms. But not towards these were the eyes of Hedwige turned. She sought—through the gauze veil with which evening dressed the valley—the cherished home of which her betrothed had so often spoken. At last, at a turn of the road, Rodolph again pressed the hand he held, and said, with a voice full of emotion, "Dear Hedwige, there is the tower of Wart; there is our dwelling."

Hedwige suspended the steps of her horse; she cast her eyes, wet with tears, on the tower which, with austere aspect, defended the borders of the little vale, and greeted it with tenderness. What young maiden does not cherish with true affection the abode of which a husband renders her the mistress! the roof to which she brings happiness in exchange for love! the walls which behold her a wife and a mother, and where, each day, invested with a mild sovereignty, she causes to reign paramount peace, order, and joy!

Some such ideas doubtless entered the thoughts of Hedwige, for she said, with emotion—

"That is, then, your home; your mother's home! May we live there happy and blest!"

"With you, where would I not be happy? Where you are, what blessing can be missing?"

"Ah! dear Rodolph, to obtain this, invoke the aid of God. He alone can dispense happiness."

"True, true! Since he has given me my cherished bride, my grateful prayers shall never cease."

Hedwige smiled, and her eyes, raised fervently towards heaven, fell again on the earth. Rodolph was certainly contented with the expression which he found in them, for he carried to his lips, with the devotion of a pilgrim for a pious relic, the floating veil of the young girl. At this moment, they arrived at the entrance of the valley. Rodolph saluted his vassals with a courteous and joyous gesture, and they replied with the familiar cordiality of the Swiss peasants. Hedwige blushing received their good wishes and their artless homage, and soon after, the brilliant cavalcade crossed the drawbridge of the castle of Wart, and entered the feudal court, where was gathered an eager crowd of grooms and servants. Rodolph leaped from off his horse, received Hedwige in his arms, kissed her brow, and proclaimed her lady and mistress of the manor, and conducted her, together with his guests, into an antique saloon, where torches, fixed in monstrous horns, contended with the fading light of day. The cups circulated, gay wishes were exchanged, and the hour for repose struck on the belfry. The young couple received, on their bended knees, the blessing of Hedwige's parents, and then retired to the large chamber where so many of other generations had before reposed. The servants conducted the guests to the apartments prepared for them; then the lights grew pale, one by one, and silence succeeded to tumult. Naught was heard in the surrounding country but the plaintive song of the nightingale, the clear noise of the cricket concealed in the hay, and the murmur of the rapid tide of the Reuss, which bathed the walls of the fortress.

CHAPTER II.

THE OATH.

THE next day, towards the middle of the morning, the young spouse and their guests reunited around the substantially served breakfast-table. Delicious fish from the lakes, birds from the forest, the roebuck of the ice-banks, the savory vegetables in which Switzerland abounds, and milk, in different forms, constituted the repast. The brown bear of Germany, and wines of Burgundy, circulated round in cups of maple encircled with gold. The servants, happy in the marriage of their master, had, in order to ornament the table, placed in rustic vases large bouquets of gentian and rhododendron.

Hedwige, seated beside her mother, smiled gently at the homage of which she was the object; and sometimes she raised her drooping eyelids to her husband's face, who contemplated her with loving looks, full of the delightful idea that she was his—that no earthly power could disunite them—and that many happy days were before them, to add to the joys of their union. He lent but an absent ear to the conversation of his friends, who spake of the revolt of the three cantons; the courage of the shepherds who had just returned from pursuing the stewards of the powerful Albert of Hapsburg; and the vengeance which a man, in manners calm and simple—a hunter named Tell—had taken on the bailiff Gesler.

The chevaliers spoke with warmth, and discussed the rights of the house of Austria to the sovereignty of the valleys of Switz, of Uri, and of Unterwalden, when the door was hastily opened, and afforded entrance to a man with a sun-burnt visage, and whose dust-covered clothes announced that he had arrived from a long journey. He passed his eyes over the company, and, advancing to Rodolph, he gave him a branch of faded roses.

On seeing them, Rodolph became pale; a dreadful thought seemed to pass through his mind; and he regarded the messenger with anguish, who, speaking to him in a low tone, saluted him, and then left the room with precipitation. Rodolph remained immovable and gloomy. The roses had fallen upon the table, and the pleasure of the guests seemed to have faded like the flowers. Hedwige timidly regarded her husband, when he said, with great effort—

"I must leave you. I must go away."

"You must leave us? No bad news, I hope," said his father-in-law.

"What, leave my daughter! But it will not be for any length of time," said Hedwige's mother.

"Rodolph, must you leave me?" And the young bride was paler than the veil which composed her headdress.

"Much as it costs me, it must be so. Perhaps my absence will not continue a long time. Dear Hedwige, calm yourself. My thoughts will ever remain with you. But—I have promised."

"Perhaps it is a service which a brother-in-arms claims?"

"Yes, my father, yes; it is a service."

"Oh, then, delay would be fatal!"

"But," said Hedwige's brother, smiling with malice, "this branch of roses, is it not rather the pledge of a fair lady, who appeals to her knight? Sister, do you not mistrust it?"

The young woman smiled, in the midst of her tears, and looked upon her husband.

"Dear Hedwige," replied he, kissing her forehead, "have you confidence in me?"

"Oh, yes; and yet there is a weight upon my heart."

"My well beloved, I will return to you soon. An oath binds me; but I will disengage myself from it. We will yet be happy."

"Oh, that it may be so!" replied she. "Farewell, Rudolph."

"Not farewell," said he, with animation, "but goodbye—my friends: pray for me, and may God keep you! My Hedwige, pray for your knight!"

He left the saloon, and soon the steps of his horse were heard resounding on the drawbridge. Hedwige rushed to the window, and waved her handkerchief; but she quickly drew back, and said to her mother, with secret fright, "Oh! how pale Rodolph seems! He appears like a corpse in a coffin. Mother, is it an omen from God? Shall I never see him again?"

CHAPTER III.

THE PILGRIM.

DAYS and weeks rolled on, and the young lady of Wart, who remained alone in the manor, received no news of her husband. The weight of a frightful sadness accumulated on her heart. The mysterious circumstances of his departure; the dull solitude of these places, where she had hoped to live with him to whom she had given her hand; the anguish which, in these troublesome times, must spring from his prolonged absence; all united to crush the soul of the sad Hedwige. She passed her days (seated in the deep recess of a window which opened upon the valley) occupied in watching the road—nearly always solitary, but occasionally animated by a goat-herd collecting his flocks from the heights, or by those of a hunter who, in passing, trilled a gay measure. Her spinning-wheel rested inactive at her feet. A precious manuscript, containing the poetry of Jacques de Wart, remained open at the page in which the minstrel celebrated the beauties of spring, without the bride's feeling any anxiety to finish the portion which she had commenced. Naught fell upon her ear save the monotonous sound produced by the waves of the Reuss, even less agitated than her thoughts; and when she cast her eyes—dazzled by the broad daylight—upon the gloomy and desolate room where she dragged on her life, she felt an indescribable anguish press upon her soul. Then she prayed, and then she descended to visit the thatched cottages in the valley. But neither prayer nor charity could distract her from her ceaseless tortures. At the end of the third week, as, at the close of the day, she returned from assembling together her domestics, a valet opened the door, and said, respectfully—

"Madam, a pilgrim from Germany asks for hospitality."

"Desire him to enter," replied the lady of the manor, "and serve him with supper."

An old man entered after the valet. The cowl, drawn from his head, displayed emaciated features, upon which experience and chagrin seemed graven in deep furrows. His thin white hair formed a crown around his head—as austere as that of an anchorite of ancient days—and his dark garments descended in stiff folds to his feet, which were encased in dusty sandals. A shepherd's scrip, that contained the black bread used on his journey, was suspended from his shoulders, and he held in his hand a stick, the ferrule of which served to assist him over the rocks and the glaciers.

Hedwige received the traveller with kindness, seated him near her, and with her own hands helped him to the dishes which she thought best fitted to restore him; and, when he had finished his repast, she interrogated him as to the cause of his pilgrimage.

"Noble lady," replied he, "I come from Prussia, where the warlike chevaliers continue the crusade against the heathen. I have visited the borders of the Rhine; and have prayed at Cologne, in the stately church raised to the memory of holy kings, who, like me, were travellers on the earth. Since my entrance into Switzerland, I have deviated from my route to go to the abbey of Einsiedler, to venerate our lady of Erintes, so well known by her miracles and her powerful kindness. I hope to salute the places where Maurice and his Christian legion received at the same time death and the celestial crown. Then, passing over the Alps, I will diverge towards Rome, in order to prostrate myself on the tomb of the holy Apostles. May they grant to their servant, with the pardon of his sins, the end of his pilgrimage, and of his too-long life!"

"Good father, the days you have spent on earth seem to have overwhelmed you, and perhaps some sorrow may trouble your holy life—consecrated to prayer, and to admiration of the works of God."

"We have all our burden, madam; and the youngest, the most happy even, are bowed to the ground, struck with some secret evil."

"Alas! you speak truth! But a truce to this sad discourse. Tell me some news from the world. All noise, all rumor, expires at the feet of these mountains, and we live here as ignorant of the universe as the hermit Saint Paul in his Thebaide."

"Bless your ignorance, noble lady. The world is sullied by vice and crime; and vice extends like a fatal contagion, and all the news bears token of the malice of men."

"But still, what have you heard related on your route?"

"News which will cause both tears and blood to flow. Know, madam, that the Emperor Albert—sovereign, without doubt, of this noble manor—died a few days ago."

"What! The son of the glorious Rodolphe of Hapsburg!"

"He is dead; traitorously assassinated!"

"O Heaven! May God have mercy on his soul, and on that of his murderer!"

"The terrible recital of his death was transmitted to me by one of his servants, who had seen him fall without having the power to defend him. Accompanied by a numerous suite, he repaired to Rhemfield, where the empress sojourned. Wishing to pass over the Reuss—that impetuous river which also washes the walls of this castle—he entered into a barque, followed by his nephew, John of Swabia, and some other chevaliers. The rest of his train remained on the banks. The emperor landed, and crossed over a cultivated field, near some antique ruins, the remnant of a Roman city, situated in front of the Chateau of Hapsburg, the cradle of this valiant race. He believed himself in safety, surrounded by those most dear and faithful, and it was at this very moment that, by the stroke of a poniard, John of Swabia struck him in the throat. He fell; his murderers redoubled their blows, and he soon expired, bathing his own inheritance with his blood, and killed by those who, the evening before, had drunk from his cup, and were seated at the same banquet. Such was this detestable parricide. Such was the end of Albert of Hapsburg—

the elect of the holy empire, and the absolute master of so many provinces. Power will depart from his house, and his kingdom, as the Prophet has said, will be given to the four winds of heaven."

"But did no one know the motive of so criminal an action?"

"Albert was ambitious, and retained the inheritance of his nephew, who, young and ardent, desired to reign. One day John of Swabia sought his uncle, and prayed him to restore to him his dominion; but the emperor received the request with raillery, and, taking a crown of roses which lay upon a table, he pressed them upon the brow of the young man. 'To you,' said he, 'belong these childish ornaments; to us, serious occupations.' These words incensed the prince's soul; he retired, with tears in his eyes and rage in his heart. His friends partook of his anger—bound themselves together by a terrible oath—and then the death of Albert was sworn. It is said that the prince agreed with his accomplices to send to each a branch of the mock crown, when the day and place of crime had been decided."

These words, like a sword, pierced the soul of Hedwige.

"A branch of roses?" stammered she.

"Yes, madam. Thus the innocent creations of God serve as signals for murder! But it is said, Those who strike with the sword perish by the sword; and these unhappy beings will soon prove the truth of these eternal words. Agnes of Hungary advances, burning to sacrifice these murderers to her father's blood, even to their last generation. None of them have been able to flee, and the punishment has already commenced at Rheinfeld."

"It is well," said Hedwige, in a subdued voice; "it is well, good father. But the hour of repose has arrived, and a servant will now conduct you to your chamber. Before you sleep, pray for the suffering hearts!"

The pilgrim bowed himself, and then left the room, guided by a valet. Hedwige remained alone, contemplating a horrible thought. A light had shed itself upon her mind, and she recalled circumstances which had been forgotten. She remembered her husband's friendship for the Duke of Swabia; the pity which his condition inspired—retained as he was in a servile minority; and she had seen agitation and fright depicted on the countenance of Rodolph when he received the rose from the conspirators.

"O Rodolph! Rodolph!" cried she, "art thou an assassin! Holy God! merciful Saviour! hear me. Grant to my prayers the life of my husband, and all my existence shall be consecrated to penitence."

Whilst pronouncing these words, the innocent wife had fallen upon her knees. She prayed a few moments longer, in a low voice, and felt arise within her bosom a strength equal to her grief.

"I must act now," said she, getting up. She then summoned before her an old squire, who had served Rodolph de Wart from the time of his childhood, and said to him: "Do you know the road which leads to Rheinfeld?"

"I have followed it often, madam, and, notwithstanding my age, I can go from here to there with my eyes bandaged."

"Very well! You shall conduct me, then. Saddle our horses; I wish to set off immediately."

Old Ulrich regarded her with profound surprise; but the accent of the lady was so firm and so imperative that he dared not resist. She retired to her apartment, and exchanged her silk dress for a dark-colored robe, a veil, and a travelling cloak. Then, casting a glance of adieu on this chamber, where she had hoped to pass her days so prosperously, she recommended herself to the care of Heaven, and descended to the court-yard, where the horses were in waiting. Bertha, the youngest and most favored of her women, kissed her lady's hand, and let some tears fall on Hedwige's fingers, which were burning with fever. The lady sighed, and, detaching a Viennese chain from her neck, she gave it to the young girl, saying, "It is for my mother, if I do not return. Now, adieu!"

She gave the signal of departure; but, at the moment they crossed the drawbridge, midnight sounded, and an owl sent forth upon the air his unlucky cry. "God protect us," said Ulrich, crossing himself.

"Be calm, my friend," said Hedwige, with an unspeakable smile, "this omen is not for you." She urged the steps of her beast, and soon the slumbering valley, the poor cottages, and the battlements of the old manor, disappeared from their sight in the nocturnal mist. They followed all night the borders of the Reuss, across dangerous paths, scarcely lighted by the moon, often veiled by the shadow of clouds. In the morning, they reposed for some time in a cabin, at which place they exchanged their horses for two mules, whose more careful and sure footing would guide them better on the edge of precipices, and over slippery rocks, moistened by the continual spray of water from cascades. Hedwige continued her journey; and neither the fatigues nor the perils of the road could relieve her of overwhelming thoughts. During several days, she leaped her horse over abrupt hills, which were placed in the lakes extended at their feet; she crossed through thick forests of fir trees, and hospitable valleys inhabited by shepherds, and at last, from the summit of a mountain, she saw before her the undulating waters of the Rhine, which bathed the embattled ramparts and spires of a large city.

"There is Rheinfeld, noble lady," said Ulrich.

"O, my God!" cried Hedwige, "it is there that shall be decided for me life or death!"

"Madam," replied Ulrich, with respectful compassion, "take courage! My master is a member of the holy empire, and he can only be judged by his peers."

"What! Do you know——"

"On our journey, I heard a great many things; among others, that the Knight of Wart is a prisoner. Alas!"

"But Agnes—Agnes is a woman. Can she resist the agony of a wife, when prostrate before her?"

"Alas!" repeated Ulrich, shaking his head.

CHAPTER IV.

AGNES OF HUNGARY.

At last they arrived at the gate of the city, guarded by a large detachment of soldiers, and passed it, demanding the way to the palace, which a man-at-arms pointed out. When Hedwige perceived the high towers and the sculptured portico of the imperial residence, she felt a convulsive trembling of her limbs; her throat became dry, her inanimate hands dropped the reins of her horse, and her eyes, raised to heaven, implored that assistance she could not attain on earth. At the doors of the palace, a page, dressed in mourning, arrested them.

"This noble lady," said Ulrich, "desires to speak with her grace, the Queen of Hungary. Perhaps the life of a human being depends upon this audience."

"Are you ignorant, sir esquire, that my noble mistress is plunged in affliction; that she sees no one; and that her days and nights are passed in praying for the soul of the glorious Emperor Albert?"

"She is a queen—she is a woman"—said Hedwige, with a weak voice; "to those who implore her aid, she owes justice and clemency. In the name of your mother, let me see her!"

Saying these words, she raised her veil. At the sight of her lovely countenance, which even a deadly paleness could not disfigure, the page yielded.

"Come, madam," said he, "you shall see the queen." Hedwige followed him. An ardent prayer, which gave itself no vent in words, escaped from her heart. She crossed, without seeing them, apartments decorated with an elaborate magnificence, and was introduced into a chamber hung with black, and illuminated, although it was day, by the sepulchral light of lamps and wax tapers. In the centre of this room, near a table on which were placed a crucifix, a death's-head, and an hour-glass, was seated a woman in the attitude of profound meditation. She was clothed in deep mourning. Her angular and severe features, and her pale brow, shrouded with a black veil, stood out like a sombre picture upon the mournful ground of the drapery; and Hedwige shuddered when she encountered the inflexible and piercing looks of this woman.

"What do you want?" said Agnes, in a rough voice.

Hedwige fell upon her knees, but her lips could not articulate a single sound—her eyes alone supplicated.

"What do you want?" again said Agnes, approaching her.

"Mercy—madam—mercy!"

"Mercy! And for whom? Explain yourself, young lady!"

"Oh, madam!" said Hedwige, seizing the serge robe of Agnes; "mercy for my husband!"

"Your husband! Who is he? Reply!"

"I am—I am—the wife of Rodolph de Wart."

"Race of vipers!" cried the queen, disengaging herself with violence; "away; dare you ask mercy from me? and have you granted mercy to an old man—to a prince? Parricide!"

"Madam," said Hedwige, extending her arms towards her, "you are a Christian. In view of all that you deem most holy, have mercy on my husband! Grant him time for repentance! Have mercy, as you yourself hope for mercy! We will flee; we will not disturb the empire with our presence. Oh, madam! by all that you love, have pity!"

"Have not you and yours ravished me of all that I love? No pity for murderers. No mercy for parricides. I have sworn it. Blood shall pay for blood; and the eagles of heaven shall make a repast of the assassin's flesh. Retire, woman; your presence taints the air I breathe."

"Madam——"

"Retire! I command!"

"May I not, at least, see my husband, and be shut up with him in the same prison?"

"Ah! You desire to see him!" said Agnes, with a ferocious laugh. "You shall be satisfied; and you shall see how Agnes renders justice."

She went towards the antechamber, and called the young page. "Conduct this lady to Blut-Aker," said she.

The page cast a sorrowful look upon her.

"Obey," repeated Agnes, with severity; and a dark smile appeared on her thin and pale lips.

The young man led the way, and Hedwige followed. They soon passed the gates of the city; he then paused, and said to her, with pity—

"Believe me, madam, and follow my advice. Flee; place yourself in safety. The spectacle to which the queen invites you—shame upon her!—is not fit for the eyes of a woman."

Hedwige shook her head, and continued her march. At last they arrived at a vast plain, where an immense crowd was collected—silent, but with a sorrowful aspect. The bells of the neighboring convent struck the death-knell; and above the plain soared birds of prey, which described large circles, and uttered fierce cries. The multitude instinctively opened before the steps of Hedwige, who went forward as in the delirium of a fatal dream. She at last discovered that which attracted the attention of the people. It was a scaffold, elevated several steps, and on which two men were standing. The one was arrayed in black, and, with clasped hands, appeared to incline his head towards an invisible object. The other, immovable, covered with a leathern jacket, leaned upon a heavy mass of iron. It was the priest, and the executioner. Hedwige went up the steps, and advanced some paces on the scaffold. She then perceived, through the mist, a man bound to a cross, on a wheel covered with blood. He still lived; his breast heaved with unequal pulsation, and heavy groans escaped from his pale lips, animated by an expression of unspeakable suffering. And she cried aloud, "O, Rodolph!" She had doubted until then!

The dying man, with his eyes, sought the priest, and said to him, with a broken voice, "Remain beside me, and pray, my good father—reason is leaving me. I thought I heard a voice—the voice of my Hedwige—of my own dear wife."

The charitable priest raised his eyes on the young woman; then, bending towards Rodolph, he said—"My son, it is she—it is your wife. She is here—she prays for you."

"Take her hence; she cannot support this sight."

"Oh, Rodolph! my Rodolph!" cried Hedwige; "I see you once more; but how? My husband, look upon me!"

Her tears fell on the criminal's breast, and she passed her pure hands around his bleeding and broken neck.

He raised himself as much as his bonds would allow him, and regarded her with eyes in which the strongest passions of life contended with the shades of death.

"Hedwige," said he, "my chaste and saintly Hedwige, thou, thou alone couldst follow me here, and regard a murderer with looks of love."

"On the scaffold, as on the throne, you are my master and my lord. I love you; and if the punishment you endure does not expiate your crime, I at least have tears to bewail it."

"Hedwige, what happiness was promised us! What happiness I have sacrificed!"

"That happiness will be attained in heaven. What could earth now offer to us? Let us raise our eyes to the cross; let us pray, Rodolph—let us together pray for the pardon of our sins."

"Our sins! What are thine, my Hedwige? thou who art more pure than the snow upon the Alps!"

"We are alike guilty in the sight of the Almighty; and if I live, it will be to exercise a life of penitence."

Thus speaking, she prostrated herself upon the scaffold, and, surmounting the terrible grief collected in her bosom, she prayed with a loud voice. The dying man united his accents, and this alone, in the midst of painful tortures, brought him hope. A fictitious strength, engendered by fever, sustained him; but sometimes a long swoon gave relief to his woes. Then Hedwige, with her veil, wiped off the cold sweat which covered his brow; but even pity itself forbid her from recalling him to life. He soon revived, however, restored to sense by his sufferings, and his darkened vision immediately sought his wife, who was always standing near him, like a consoling angel. Towards evening, the crowd dispersed; the guards alone remained at the foot of the scaffold; the sky was obscured, and a fine cold rain commenced falling. Hedwige removed her mantle, and spread it over her husband's bare limbs; and then she returned to prayer. Thus passed the night of their reunion—the dark and sombre night—in which the sighs of the expiring man, and the plaintive voice of his wife, alone broke upon the silence. Towards morning, the swoons became more frequent. The dawn arose pale and overclouded; and the birds of prey, warned by their instinct—and who had not quitted the field of death—recommenced their inauspicious cries. Rodolph looked upon them, soaring in the air like black spots, and said—

"They will soon have food. Hedwige, the nightingales sung when I led thee, a happy bride, along the path to Wart. O folly! O crime! you have cost me dear! Waves of Reuss—now stained by blood—how happy you once beheld me!"

"My son," said the priest, "think no more of earth."

"I only think of this angel that I leave behind me. But all is dark. Hedwige—where art thou?—repeat our Lord's prayer."

She obeyed. When she arrived at these words—Forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive those that trespass against us—Rodolph's voice united with that of his wife; then a slight shudder passed over his face, which was inclined towards Hedwige. All was ended.

Hedwige remained absorbed for a long time; then, rising, she demanded from the priest permission to remove the corpse, in order to give it Christian burial.

"My child," he replied, with tears, "the queen has ordered that the body remain on the wheel, and be left for the birds of prey."

Hedwige bent her head. She pressed a long last kiss on the forehead and on the hands of her husband, and withdrew without proffering a complaint.

The world saw her no more. After a few days, she retired to a convent of Argovia. But her youth had been consumed in a single day; and, even before she had cast aside the novice's veil, she passed hence, murmuring, for the last time, the name of Rodolph.

Agnes of Hungary accomplished her oath. Sixty-three chevaliers* perished by the executioner's hand, * Among the victims of Agnes, was a Swiss knight, named Multinen. His son, still a youth, was also condemned to capital punishment; but the spectators, moved by his tender years and beauty, threw themselves at the queen's feet, imploring the young orphan's pardon. Agnes remained inexorable. The successor of Albert, having recognized the innocence of the house of Multinen, joined to and John of Swabia only escaped punishment by taking refuge in a cloister. Agnes founded a convent, named Koeningsfeldt, on the spot where her their arms the colors of the empire, and a wheel upon a sable field or, with these words: Purity alone can move me.

father had been murdered. She retired there, and passed fifty years in the exercise of the most rigid austerities. Her tomb may still be seen, placed near those of the Emperor Albert, the Empress Elizabeth, and of the Archduke Leopold, killed at the battle of Sempach.

THE HIDDEN LOVE.

BY ANSON G. CHESTER.

"I said it was a wilful, wayward thing;
And so it is—fantastic and perverse!
Which makes its sport of persons and of seasons,
Takes its own way, no matter right or wrong."
ULRICH in "Love."

"Talk of height, breadth, depth!
There is no measure to a lover's passion!"—Ibid.

I WOULD I were a limner, and could paint
A face that haunts my soul upon the page
Devoted to my record: vain desire!
And worse than vain, to sigh for greater skill
Than Heaven sees best to grant my humble hand:
Yet in my poor description shalt thou learn
How mean a substitute for art are words!

The form was passing comely, such as those
Which walk with maidens in their dreams of man,
The features strangely classical, yet bland
As moon-beams smiling on the blooms of May.
The eye was like the morning, and the brow
A drift of snow upon the hills of Mind;
Locks such as midnight flings upon the breeze;
A lip too womanish for all but him,
Whose accents fell as soft and pleasantly
As water leaping over mossy rocks.
His salutation had a music in 't;
His smile was like the light of poetry:
A paleness, like a moonlight soft, subdued
The picture of his features—he had been Too much in books and parchments, and his poetry
Was a great name among his fellow-men.
One thing was lacking: he had never known
The gentle meaning of a woman's love;
And, though whole tomes of wisdom lay within
The boundless compass of his lofty mind—
That spacious grotto, whose stalactites, lit
By Learning's genial torch, outshine the sun—
He never saw the alphabet of hearts!

It came to pass that one, a gentle girl,
His counterpart in beauty—yet, indeed,
More dainty in her graces, inasmuch
As woman's fairness thus exceedeth man's—
It came to pass that she, at evening-time,
When in the heart all tender thoughts are born,
Met in her saunterings the noble youth,
And, seeing, loved him; and, in secret, pledged
The fulness of her vestal heart to his:
It was a budding heart—there would be flowers
Beneath the culture of a careful hand:
She spoke it not save to her spirit's ear,
The angels heard it, and they told it him!

VOL. XLV.—21

They met and parted often; but before
The Summer kneeled at Autumn's golden throne,
And there gave up her sceptre tipped with flowers,
Their hearts were pledged: then the student knew
How little he was master of before!
It was his first, sweet lesson in the heart—
The weak the teacher, and the strong the taught!
As if the violet should teach the oak
The secret of its simple tenderness.

Years passed; no change appeared, save as their souls
Grew unto greater perfectness in love;
They were a proverb, in the mouth of age,
Of the old-time affection, and the young
Were taught to imitate their constancy.
No old wife, crone, or gossip found a flaw
In their sweet intercourse whereat to carp;
But, when they passed, a hundred smiles were lit.
A hundred lips exclaimed, "See how they love!"

A shadow clouds the picture! He had vowed,
In former years, to one who long had been
A partner in his studies and his hopes,
That they, as boon companions, should explore
The wonders and the beauties of that world
Which lies across the prairies of the sea.
It was his boyish longing to behold
The glories of the sister continent;
To stand upon the seven hills of Rome,
To muse upon the soil where Athens was,
To gaze upon the awful Pyramids,
And float upon the bosom of the Rhine.
So boy and passion grew, until at last
The passion was the nightier, and became
A very Titan tugging at his heart!

The parting hour had come, and in its train
More sorrow than his fancy ever dreamed.
He had no words; but, in his mad embrace,
His frantic kiss, there was an eloquence
That rendered language mean and beggarly.
It was the morning then; but when the night
Recalled the stars they oft had gazed upon,
Leagues of the foamy sea were stretched between
The lover and his idol: he had gone!
Hearts bleed when they are sundered; pain is none
Like that which is the handmaid of farewell!
The moss of Time may not obscure the wound,
No reflux waves may wash the sorrow out
It pales the cheek, it dims the gentle eye,
Yet are its deepest traces on the heart!

It happened that, within that distant land,
The youth, by chance—if such a thing there be,
When all things come of God, yet such the form
And manner of our wild and reckless speech—

Beheld a maiden beautiful as heaven.
 If there might be a queen of loveliness,
 If beauty were a thing of courtly rank,
 Then she deserved the sceptre and the crown.
 There lay within the fountains of her eye
 Such dreams of peaming sweetness and desire,
 As none could glance upon and be at peace;
 Her cheek was like the velvet of the peach,
 And in its fairness like the almond bloom:
 Her voice was gushing music, and her smile—
 Perpetual sunshine on her beauteous lip!—
 Would win Misanthropy from all its hate,
 And make it fond as childhood; and her hair
 Flowed like a river from her Parian brow.
 Oh, that so fair a being should arise
 Between his eye and that bright image niched
 In the cathedral of his manly heart!

I would that here I might disguise the truth;
 But that were perjury unto the dead,
 Since to the grave he took my honest pledge
 To write his secret when he slumbered there.
He loved her, and she knew it; for a word,
 Wrung from the madness of his tortured heart,
 Revealed its secret: it had broken else.
 She likewise loved; and, telling him that love,
 She cursed each moment of his coming life,
 Sowing, like Cadmus, in his stricken breast,
 The dragon-teeth of sorrow, whence arose
 A host, full armed, to war against his peace.
 Oh, had she dreamed what anguish would attend
 The sweet confession of her silent love,
 She had from her fair bosom plucked her heart,
 And burned her lip to ashes ere it spoke
 The fatal word that knelled his happiness

Oh, question not the generous principles
 That ruled within the kingdom of his heart!
 Say not 'twas sin to cast another's thoughts
 Before a stranger's shrine; for man may love
 The angels with a heavenly warranty,
 And she, tho' mortal, had an angel's face.
 Who will uprear a barrier to love?
 Who dares essay to stop its dauntless flood,
 To tame the fury of its reckless blast,
 Or bind its glaring lightnings with a chain?
 What bold philosopher will seek to tell
 How love is by another love displaced?
 Are we the masters of our fickle hearts?
 How was it, then, that they were taken first?
 And, being once enslaved, it only proves
 That they may be enslaved a second time.
 All human love is guilty. Search thy breast,
 And, if thou findest not some rival there,
 I'll write a grand exception to my rule.

Oh, what a struggle in his tortured breast
 Raged as the tempest rages, when the stars,
 For very terror, shut their radiant eyes!
 There was a face that often lifted up
 Its patient orbs, and glanced upon his own;
 There was an accent stealing dreamily
 Unto his startled ear; and oft he felt
 The pressure of a soft, familiar hand,
 Which, though he knew nor eye nor hand was there,
 Thrilled every nerve, they seemed so palpable.

But Honor was the victor. She, whose eye
 Was such a fount of beauty, and whose smile
 Was as the sunshine of a day in June,
 Was sacrificed on Duty's painful cross.

She gave him commendation, called him just,
 Urged him to tear her image from his soul,
 And said that, while her heart in silence broke,
 In breaking, it should pray for him and his.
 That must be goodness, which will seek of Heaven
 Its blessings on a rival's hated head!

They parted; but that parting blotted out
 The radiance of his soul—the world was changed.
 He saw the gay and flowery wheel of Hope
 Receding, as he left the blessed land
 Sacred unto his heart's divinity;
 But, tutoring his heart to hide its griefs,
 His lip to keep its secret, he returned,
 And met, with manufactured smiles and tears,
 Her who, without his love, would be his wife.

The nuptial hour arrived. The aged priest, Whose lips dropped fatness, joined their hands, and thought,

Amid his blindness, he had joined their hearts.
 Parents and children, maids and white-haired men
 Gave smiling congratulations; yet I know
 That each particular word fell on his ear
 Like clods upon a coffin. While to her
 The hour was paradise—to him 'twas hell!

'Tis sad, and yet most true, that, when she placed
 Her hand in his, and pressed, with crimsoned lips,
 A wife's first kisses on his quivering cheek,
 He well-nigh loathed her fondness, tho' he gave
 No open token of his heart's disgust.
 She never guessed his feelings, tho' at times
 She deemed him over-thoughtful—sometimes sad;
 Yet had she no suspicion of a change;
 For to suspect, to her had been to die.
 And though one night, as lovingly she lay
 Upon the breast that held his widowed heart,
 He, in his dreams, gave incoherent hints
 Of some relinquished bliss, and madly pressed
 Her trembling lip, and called her by some name
 That was a stranger to her wounded ear,
 Yet when he woke, and saw her anxious face,
 And listened as she told him of his dream,
 He did but smile, and call her, playfully,
 "Oneirocritic;" and evadingly
 Said, Sleep had brought some fancy to his heart.
 And she looked up with all a woman's trust,
 The clouds rolled back, and heaven was seen again!

Thus till the end. His heart had guarded well
 Its burning secret, and had long endured
 With such a burden on its slender chords.
 The hour of its release came on apace,
 So wildly wished, so wildly welcomed now:
 How altered was he, as he lay and thought
 How long was Death in coming! 'Twas a sight
 To pay for only in the coin of tears!

She hung above him with a look that told
 How bitter was her bosom's agony,
 And shuddered, as she heard the muffled hoofs
 Of Death's pale charger in its dread advance,
 And knew that, when the fading sun went out,
 A double night would come upon her soul;
 When suddenly his eye waxed bright, his lips
 Moved in the utterance of his life's last word:
 She bent to catch the accent; but alas
 The tongue was ever silent—Death speaks not!
 It was his secret bursting from his heart—
 A name that made death lovely—but not hers!

HISTORY OF BOOTS AND SHOES.

NO. III.—ON THE MOST ANCIENT COVERING FOR THE FEET.

"Among the various innovations," continues Strutt, "made in dress by the Normans during the twelfth century, none met with more marked and more deserved disapprobation than that of lengthening the toes of the shoes, and bringing them forward to a sharp point. In the reign of Rufus, this custom was first introduced, and, according to Frederic Vitalis, by a man who had distorted feet, in order to conceal his deformity;" but he adds, "the fashion was no sooner broached than all those who were fond of novelty thought proper to follow it; and the shoes were made by the shoemakers in the form of a scorpion's tail. These shoes were called Pigacia, and were adopted by persons of every class, both rich and poor. Soon after, a courtier, whose name was Robert, improved upon the first idea by filling the vacant part of the shoe with tow, and twisting it round in the form of a ram's horn; this ridiculous fashion excited much admiration. It was followed by the greater part of the nobility: and the author, for his happy invention, was honored with the cognomen Conardus, or horned. The long-pointed shoes were vehemently inveighed against by the clergy, and strictly forbidden to be worn by the religious orders. So far as we can judge from the drawings executed in the twelfth century, the fashion of wearing long-pointed shoes did not long maintain its ground. It was, however, afterwards revived, and even carried to a more preposterous extent."

A specimen of the shoes that were worn at this period, and which so excited the ire of the monkish writers, is here given from the seal of Richard, constable of Chester in the reign of Stephen; in the original, the knight is on horseback; the stirrup and spur are therefore seen in our cut.

The effigies of the early English sovereigns are generally represented in shoes decorated with bands across, as if in imitation of sandals. They are seldom colored black, as nearly all the examples of earlier shoes in this country are. The shoes of Henry II. are green, with bands of gold. Those of Richard are also striped with gold; and such richly decorated shoes became fashionable among the nobility, and were generally worn by royalty all over Europe. Thus, when the tomb of Henry the Sixth of Sicily, who died in 1197, was opened in the Cathedral of Palermo, on the feet of the dead monarch were discovered costly shoes, whose upper part was of cloth of gold, embroidered with pearls, the sole being of cork, covered with the same cloth of gold. These shoes reached to the ankle, and were fastened with a little button instead of a buckle. His queen, Constance, who died in 1198, had upon her feet shoes also of cloth of gold, which were fastened with leather straps tied in knots, and on the upper part of them were two openings, wrought with embroidery, which showed that they had been once adorned with jewels. Boots ornamented with gold, and embroidered in elegant patterns, at this time became often worn. King John of England orders, in one instance, four pair of women's boots, one of them to be embroidered with circles; and the effigy of the succeeding monarch, Henry III., in Westminster Abbey, is chiefly remarkable for the splendor of the boots he wears; they are crossed all over by golden bands, thus forming a series of diamond-shaped spaces, each one of which is filled with a figure of a lion, the royal arms of England.

The shape of the sole of the shoes, at this time, may be seen from the cut here given of one found in a tomb of the period, and called that of St. Swithin, in Winchester cathedral. The shoe is engraved in "Gough's Sepulchral Monuments," and the person who discovered it in the tomb thus describes it: he says, "The legs of the wearer were inclosed in leathern boots or gaiters, sewed with neatness; the thread was still to be seen. The soles were small and round, rather worn, and of what would be called an elegant shape at present, pointed at the toe and very narrow, and were made and fitted to each foot. I have sent the pattern of one of the soles, drawn by tracing it with a pencil from the original itself, which I have in my possession." This shoe was ten inches in length from toe to heel, and three inches across the broadest part of the instep. They are as perfectly "right and left" as any boots of the present day; but, as we have already shown, this is a fashion of the most remote antiquity. As these boots are at least as old as the time of John, Shakespeare's description in his dramatised history of that sovereign, of the tailor, who, eager to acquaint his friend, the smith, of the prodigies the skies had just exhibited, and whom Hubert saw

"Standing in slippers, which his nimble haste Had falsely thrust upon contrary feet," is strictly accurate; yet, half a century ago, this passage was adjudged to be one of the many proofs of Shakspeare's ignorance or carelessness. Dr. Johnson, ignorant himself of the truth in this point, but yet, like all critics, determined to pass his verdict, makes himself supremely absurd by saying, in a note to this passage, with ridiculous solemnity, "Shakspeare seems to have confounded the man's shoes with his gloves. He that is frightened or hurried may put his hand into the wrong glove, but either shoe will equally admit either foot. The author seems to be disturbed by the disorder which he describes."

In the "Art Union," a journal devoted to the fine arts, are a series of notices of the various forms of boots and shoes in England, by F. W. Fairholt, F. S. A., from which we may borrow the description of the elegant coverings for the feet in use in the reigns of the first three Edwards. Boots buttoned up the leg, or shoes buttoned up the centre, or secured like the Norman shoe in the second figure of the second group given on page 162, were common in the days of Edward I. and II. The splendid reign of the third Edward, says Mr. Fairholt, extending over half a century of national greatness, was remarkable for the variety and luxury, as well as the elegance of its costume; and this may be considered as the most glorious era in the annals of "the gentle craft," as the trade of shoemaking was anciently termed. Shoes and boots of the most sumptuous description are now to be met with in contemporary paintings, sculptures, and illuminated manuscripts. They remind one of the boots "fretted with gold" and embroidered in circles mentioned by John. The greatest variety of pattern, and the richest contrasts of color, were aimed at by the maker and inventor of shoes at this period.

The boots and shoes worn during the fourteenth century were of peculiar form, and the toes, which were lengthened to a point, turned inward or outward, according to the taste of the wearer. In the reign of Richard II., they became immensely long, so that it was asserted they were chained to the knee of the wearer, in order to allow him to walk about with ease and freedom. It was, of course, only the nobility who could thus inconvenience themselves, and it might have been adopted by them as a distinction; still very pointed toes were worn by all who could afford to be fashionable. The cut here given exhibits the sole of a shoe of this period, from an actual specimen in the possession of C. Roach Smith, F. S. A., of England, and was discovered in the neighborhood of Whitefriars, in digging deep under ground into what must have originally been a receptacle for rubbish, among which these old shoes had been thrown, and they are probably the only things of the kind now in existence.

Two specimens of boots of the time of Edward IV. are here given to show their general form at that period. The first is copied from the Royal MS., No. 15, E. 6, and is of black leather, with a long upturned toe; the top of the boot is of lighter leather, and thus it bears a resemblance to the top-boots of a later age, of which it may be considered as the prototype. The other boot, from a print dated 1515, is more curious; the top of the boot is turned down, and the entire centre opens from the top to the instep, and is drawn together by laces or ties across the leg, so that it bears considerable resemblance in this point to the Cothurnus of the ancients.

Fashion ran, at this time, from one extreme to the other, and the shoes which were at one time so lengthy at the toe as to be inconvenient, now became as absurdly broad, and it was made the subject of sumptuary laws to restrain both extremes. Thus Edward IV. enacted that any shoemaker who made for unprivileged persons—the nobility being exempted—any shoes or boots, the toes of which exceeded two inches in length, should forfeit twenty shillings, one noble to be paid to the king, another to the cordwainers of London, and the third to the chamber of London. This only had the effect of widening the toes, and Paradin says that they were then so very broad as to exceed the measure of a good foot. This continued until the reign of Mary, who, by a proclamation, prohibited their being worn wider at the toe than six inches.

We have here engraved two specimens of these broad-toed shoes of the time of Henry VIII. The first is copied from the monumental effigy of Katharine, the wife of Sir Thomas Babynton, who died 1543, and is buried in Morley church, near Derby.

It is an excellent specimen of the sort of sole preferred by the fashionables of that day. The second cut exhibits a front view of a similarly made shoe: they were formed of leather, but generally the better classes wore them of rich velvet and silk, the various colors of which were exhibited in slashes at the toes, which were most sparingly covered by the velvet of which the shoe was composed. In the curious full-length portrait of the poetical Earl of Surrey, at Hampton Court, he is represented in shoes of red velvet, having bands of a darker tint placed across them diagonally, which bands are decorated with a row of gold ornaments.

During the reign of Edward VI., a sort of shoe with a pointed toe was worn, not unlike the modern one. It was of velvet generally with the upper classes; of leather with the poorer ones; the former indulged in a series of slashes over the upper leather, which the others had not. We give here two specimens of these shoes, from prints dated 1577 and 1588, and they will serve to show the sort of form adopted, as well as the varied way in which the slashes of the velvet appeared, and which altered with the wearer's taste. Philip Stubbes, the puritanical author of the "Anatomy of Abuses," 1588, declares that the fashionables then wore "oorked shoes, pumets, pantoffles, and slippers, some of them of black velvet, some of white, some of green, and some of yellow; some of Spanish leather, and some of English, stitched with silk and embroidered with gold and silver all over the foot with gewgaws innumerable." Rich and expensive shoe-ties were now brought into use, and large sums were lavished upon their decorations. John Taylor, the water poet, alludes to the extravagance of those who

"Wear a farr in shoe-strings edged with gold,
And spangled garters worth a copy-hold."

The shoe-roses were made of lace, which was as beautiful, costly, and elaborate as that which composed the ruff for the neck, or ruffles for the wrist.

21*

They were elaborately decorated with needlework and gold and silver thread.

During the reign of the first Charles, the boots—which were made of fine Spanish leather, and were of a buff color—became very large and wide at the top. Indeed, they were so wide at times as to oblige the wearer to stride much in walking, a habit that was much ridiculed by the satirists of the day. There was a print published during this reign of a dandy in the height of fashion, whose legs are "incased in boot-hose tops tied about the middle of the calf, as long as a pair of shirt sleeves, double at the end like a ruff band; the top of his boots very large, fringed with lace, and turned down as low as his spurs, which jingled like the bells of a morris-dancer as he walked." These boots were made very long in the toe; thus, of this exquisite we are told, "the feet of his boots were two inches too long."

The boot-tops at this time were made wide, and were capable of being turned over beneath the knee, which they completely covered when they were up-lifted. They were, of course, made of pliant leather to allow of this—"Spanish leather," according to Ben Jonson.

During the whole of the Commonwealth, large boot-tops of this kind were worn even by the Puritans; they were, however, large only, and not decorated with costly lace. The shoes worn were generally particularly simple in their construction and form, and those who did not wish to be classed among the vain and frivolous took care to have their toes sharp at the point, as a distinction between themselves and the "graceless gallants," who generally wore theirs very broad.

With the restoration of Charles II. came the large French boot, in which the courtiers of "Louis le grand" always delighted to exhibit their legs. Of the amplitude of its tops, the wood-cut will give an idea; it is copied from one worn by a courtier of Charles's train, in the engravings illustrative of his coronation. The boot is decorated with lace all round the upper part, and that portion of the leg which the boot incases seems fitted easily with pliant leather: over the instep is a broad band of the same material, beneath which the spur was fastened: and the heel is high, and toe broad, of all the boots and shoes then fashionable.

With the great Revolution of 1688, and his majesty William III., came in the large jack-boot, and the high-quartered, high-heeled, and buckled shoe, which only expired at the end of the last century. Sir Samuel Rush Meyrick has one of these jack-boots in his collection of armor at Goodrich Court, England. It is a remarkably fine specimen of these inconvenient things, and is as strait, and stiff, and formal as the most inveterate Dutchman could wish. The heel is very high, and the press upon the instep very great, and consequently injurious to the foot, and altogether detrimental to comfort. An immense piece of leather covers the instep, through which the spur is affixed, and to the back of the boot, just above the heel, is appended an iron rest for the spur. Such were the boots of cavalry and infantry, and in such cumbrous articles did they fight in the Low Countries, following the example of Charles XII. of Sweden, whose figure has become so identified with them, that the imagination cannot easily separate the sovereign from the boots in which he is so constantly painted, and of which a specimen may be seen in his full-length portrait preserved in the British Museum.

A boot was worn by civilians, less rigid than the one last described, the leg taking more of the natural shape, and the tops being smaller, of a more pliant kind, and sometimes slightly ornamented round the edges.

We have here two examples of ladies' shoes, as worn during the period of which we are discussing. The first figure, copied from vol. 67 of the "Gentleman's Magazine," shows the peculiar shape of the shoe, as well as the clog beneath; these clogs were merely single pieces of stout leather, which were fastened beneath the heel and instep, and appear to be only extra hindrances in walking, which must materially have destroyed any little pliancy which the original shoe would have allowed the foot to retain. The second figure is copied from the first volume of "Hone's Everyday Book," and that author says, "This was the fashion that beautified the feet of the fair in the reign of King William and Queen Mary." Holme, in his "Academy of Armory," is minutely diffuse on the gentle craft: he engraves the form of a pair of wedges, which, he says, "is to raise up a shoe in the instep, when it is too straight for the top of the foot;" and thus compassionates ladies' sufferings: "Shoemakers love to put ladies in their stocks, but these wedges, like merciful justices upon complaint, soon do ease and deliver them. If the eye turns to the cut—to the cut of the sole, with the line of beauty adapted by the cunning of the workman's skill, to stilt the female foot: if the reader behold that association, let wonder cease, that a venerable master in coat armor should bend his quarterings to the quartering of a ladies' shoe, and, forgetful of heraldic forms, condescend from his high estate to the use of similitudes."

This shape, once firmly established, was the prevailing one during the reigns of George I. and II. They always wore red heels, at least all persons who pretended to gentility. The fronts of the gentlemen's shoes were very high, and, on gala days, or showy occasions, a buff shoe was worn. The ladies appear to have preferred silk or velvet to leather.

The making of the high-heeled shoe was, at all times, a matter of great judgment and nicety of operation; the position required to be given to the heel, the aptitude of the eye and hand, necessary to the cutting down of the wood; the sewing in of the cover, kid, stuff, silk, or satin, as it might be; the getting in and securing the wood or "block;" the bracing the cover round the block; and the beautifully defined stitching, which went from corner to corner, all round the heel part, demanding altogether the cleverness of first-rate ability.

The shoes became lower in the quarters during the reign of George III., and the heel was made less clumsy. As fashion varied, larger or smaller buckles were used, and the heel was thrust farther beneath the foot until about 1780, when the shoe took the form here delineated, and which is copied from Mr. Fairholt's notes in the "Art Union," already alluded to.

From the same source, we borrow the following notices by the same writer: "About 1790, a change in the fashion of ladies' shoes occurred. They were made very flat and low in the heel, in reality more like a slipper than a shoe. This engraving, copied from a real specimen, will show the peculiarity of its make; the low quarters, the diminutive heel, and the plaited ribbon and small tie in front, in place of the buckle, which began to be occasionally discontinued. The Duchess of York, at this time, was remarkable for the smallness of her foot, and a colored print, of 'the exact size of the duchess's shoe,' was published by Fores, in 1791. It measures five and three-quarter inches in length; the breadth of the sole being only one and three-quarter inch. It is made of green silk, ornamented with gold stars; is bound with scarlet silk; the heel is scarlet, and the shape is similar to the one engraved above, except that the heel is exactly in the modern style." Models of this fairy shoe were made of china, as ornaments for the chimney, or drawing-room table, with Cupids hovering around it.

Shoes of the old fashion, with high heels and buckles, appear in prints of the early part of 1800; but buckles became unfashionable, and shoe-strings eventually triumphed, although less costly and elegant in their construction. The Prince of Wales was petitioned by the alarmed buckle-makers to discard his new-fashioned strings, and take again to buckles, by way of bolstering up their trade; but the fate of these articles was sealed, and the prince's good-natured compliance with their wishes did little to prevent their downfall. The buckles worn at the end of 1700 were generally exceedingly small, and so continued until they were finally disused.

Early in the reign of George III., the close-fitting gentleman's boot became general; the material used for the leg was termed grain leather, the flesh side being left brown and the grain blackened, and kept to the sight. In currying this sort of leather for the boot-leg, it went, in the lower part, through an ingenious process of contraction, to give it life; so that the heel of the wearer might go into it and come out again the easier; the boot, at the same time, when on, catching snugly round the small of the leg, in a sort of stocking-fit.

After this appeared the "Hessian," a boot worn over the tight-fitting pantaloons, the up-peeking front bearing a silk tassel. This boot was introduced from Germany, about 1789, and sometimes was called the Austrian boot. Rees, in his "Art and Mystery of the Cordwainer," published 1813, says, "the form at first was odious, as the close boot was then in wear; but like many fashions, at first frightful, it was then pitied, and at last adopted."

The top-boot was worn early in the reign of George III., and took the fulness of the Hessian in its lower part, and, on the introduction of the "Wellington," the same fulness was retained.

To describe the last-named boot were useless; it has become, par excellence, the common boot, and is perhaps as universally known as the fame of the distinguished hero, Wellington.

AUNT TABITHA'S FIRESIDE.

NO. V.—A SLIGHT TIFF.

BY EDITH WOODLEY.

"WELL, Aunt Tabitha," said Mrs. Carver, as she seated herself in a comfortable rocking-chair before the ruddy fire—"well, Aunt Tabitha, I've just been in to see Mrs. Lincoln, the new minister's wife."

"Do tell," said Aunt Tabitha. "But do take off your things. It don't look sociable to set with 'em on."

"No, thank you; I can stop only a few minutes. As I was saying, I have been to call on the new minister's wife; and, to confess the truth, I was downright disappointed in her. Call her handsome? Why, she cannot hold a candle to Lizzie here, nor to either of my daughters—Lucretia, in an especial manner."

"But you know," said Aunt Tabitha, "that handsome is that handsome does."

"Well, I didn't see that there was anything so very genteel in her manners; nothing, at least, that was particularly overpowering. Before I called, I expected that I should feel myself to be a mere cipher in her presence—a perfect nonentity, as you may say—I had heard her cried up so by Mrs. Page. But I can tell you that I not only lived under it, but didn't feel a mite more put down than I do this minute. I might have remembered that Mrs. Page is one of them kind of women that always thinks there must be something marvellous about the squire's wife, the doctor's wife, and, above all, the minister's wife; and I believe, as much as I believe I am alive, that, if Mrs. Lincoln should go to meeting next Sunday with her husband's boot on her head, instead of a bonnet, the same as I once heard a certain woman did, because somebody made her believe 'twas the fashion in Boston—she and her five daughters would appear out the Sunday afterward in the same ridiculous style."

"We all have our failin's and weaknesses," said Aunt Tabitha, "and Miss Page, of course, has hers; but, accordin' to my mind, it is better to think too well of our feller-critters than not well enough; and, if you and I and others have such inquiring minds as al'ays to be searchin' into our neighbor's conduct and affairs, it is better to hunt up their good qualities than their bad ones."

"To hunt up the good qualities of those it has been my fortune to have for neighbors would, in a general way, be like hunting for a needle in a haystack. The truth is, with the exception of you, and Lizzie, and Paul, there isn't a person in the whole parish I have any great opinion of. As for Mrs. Lincoln, if she is to be held up as a pattern for the female part of the parish to follow, I, for one, shall take good care not to follow the pattern."

"Well now, Miss Carver," said Aunt Tabitha, "I kind o' mistrust that I shall like Miss Lincoln right-down well; for I'm al'ays tickled to death—in my element, as 'twere—when I come across a woman of good education that's free and sociable, and ain't starched up. For my part, I think 'tis the greatest sign of a real lady in the world when a woman, who is somethin', is able to make them that have no great pretensions—such as you and I, Miss Carver—feel easy and at home, as 'twere."

"I don't know what you call great pretensions," said Mrs. Carver. "I calculate that Ezekiel Carver's wife can hold her head as high as any other woman in the parish, let the other be who she will. I except neither the doctor's wife nor the minister's wife."

"I say so, too. Mr. Carver is a purty nice sort of a man in most things—equal to the ginerall run, I should say."

"The general run! What am I to understand by that, Aunt Tabitha?"

"Why, jest as I say. Mr. Carver, in my opinion, is on a par with the rest of the neighbors; and, take 'em all in all, they are real good neighbors. They ain't perfect, and we don't expect perfection in this world."

"Well, I must say, if my husband is to be placed on a level with every poor, mean fellow in the place, that he has got down to a pretty low notch. One thing is certain, and that is, he pays the highest tax of anybody in the parish, and has always held some kind of office ever since we were married. Sometimes he has been first selectman, sometimes constable, sometimes deacon, sometimes captain, sometimes one thing, and sometimes another."

Aunt Tabitha smiled, but did not speak. There was something in the smile which did not suit Mrs. Carver, though to Lizzie it appeared quite a commonplace kind of smile.

"I don't know what I am to understand by your laughing at what I say," said Mrs. Carver, reddening. "If there is any hidden meaning in it—anything which you would meanly insinuate, yet have not the courage to speak out, I say 'tis false; for, if ever there was a zealous, wide-awake man, that man is Ezekiel Carver."

"Well, I guess nobody disputed it. I'm sure I don't."

"What did you laugh for, then, when I was enumerating the responsible offices he has filled?"

"Oh, nothin' in particular—nothin', only some nonsense that popped into my head."

"You needn't try to make me believe you were not laughing at anything in particular; for that is what you nor any other living person can do, if you should try till you were blind. Nothing in particular! I know what you were thinking of; but there isn't a word of truth in it. What if he did fall off of his horse coming home from training last fall?—it was because the horse stumbled; for Ezekiel Carver never allows himself to drink anything stronger than tea and coffee. You wouldn't believe such a scandalous story, if you didn't owe him a grudge."

"Land o' massy, Miss Carver! what should I owe him a grudge for?"

"You pretend you don't know, do you?"

"I sartainly don't."

"Well, it is as plain as the nose in your face, I should think."

"Well, that's purty plain to be seen, I'll allow; but, large as it is, I can't smell out why I should owe Mr. Carver a grudge."

"Why, when we were girls, he happened to take a fancy to me instead of you."

"You think that's the reason, then, do you? Well, all I can say is, you are mistaken; for I never seed the day that I'd 'ave had Zeke Carver, if he'd been made of Guinea goold."

"I've heard of sour grapes before to-day. He was above your reach, Ezekiel Carver was, and the whole parish ought to be thankful that he was. A pretty deacon's wife you would have made!"

"About as purty as the ginerall run, I mistrust. But there, Miss Carver, we won't quarrel about it."

"You needn't be afraid. You are too mean for me to quarrel with."

Without taking any notice of this last remark, Aunt Tabitha turned to Lizzie, and asked her if Paul, before he went out, told her where he was going?

"He said," replied Lizzie, "that he and a number of young men were going to meet at Franklin Hall this evening, to decide whom to vote for for town officers and representatives next year."

"Oh," said Aunt Tabitha, "they are holdin' a kind of a corks, then."

"Do tell if there's a caucus this evening?" said Mrs. Carver. "I don't believe that Mr. Carver knew a word about it."

"None, except some of the young men were going to meet," said Lizzie. "There, that is Paul's step; they've got through in good season."

Paul, the next moment, entered, with a smiling countenance. He shook hands with Mrs. Carver, and appeared quite glad to see her.

"You have been holding a caucus this evening, I understand?" said she, rather gloomily.

"Yes; a few of us young men, just 'out of our time,' thought we would assert our dignity by meeting together, and agreeing whom to vote for at next town-meeting; for several have been talked of who are so grossly ignorant that they would be a disgrace to the place; and we found that, by combining together, we could turn the scale in favor of those who are better qualified."

"It appears to me," said Mrs. Carver, "that, for such youngsters, you are taking rather too much upon you."

"Perhaps so; though your husband is not of your opinion."

"Why?"

"We are thinking of him for one of the representatives; and, when Sam Barton and I called to consult with him about it this evening, he didn't appear to be at all opposed to it."

"Well," said Mrs. Carver, "I always said that you were one of the most discriminating young men in the village. There isn't one in a hundred that would have had the discernment to know that Mr. Carver was a mite better fitted for the office than forty others."

"I am much obliged to you for your good opinion," said Paul; "but I believe I am not the one who first thought of him, and, therefore, am not entitled to your praise on that account. To confess the truth, I had been using what little influence I had in favor of Mr. Fabens; but Aunt Tabitha heard me mention it, and told me that there was no man in the whole town so well qualified for the office as Mr. Carver, and, on investigation, I soon found that she was right."

"Well," said Mrs. Carver, "I always knew that your aunt was the best woman in the world, and had the quickest discernment. I was saying the other day to Mr. Carver, if all the women in the place were like Aunt Tabitha, 'twould be a heaven on earth, as 'twere. So good in sickness, and so charitable to the poor! And Mr. Carver agreed with me. Says I, 'Aunt Tabitha isn't one of those kind of women that's always seeking out people's failings.' 'No, indeed,' says he; 'and I don't know of but one woman in this place, or any other, that is equal to her in that respect.' Says I, 'Who is that?' 'If you must know,' says he, 'tis Sukey Carver.' Then I laughed, and says I, 'Tis, of course, nothing more than manners to except the present company.' Then he laughed, too, and winked in his sly way—the same as he always does when he feels pretty crank—and says he, 'To be sure it isn't, Sukey.' I can tell you, Aunt Tabitha, it did my heart and soul good to hear him praise you; for you are my chosen friend, as 'twere. There, if the clock ain't striking nine! I'd no thought it was so late. Well, it isn't to be wondered at, for Aunt Tabitha and the rest of you are so agreeable that I always, when I'm with you, forget to count time. I meant to have called on Dorcas Low a few minutes; but it is too late now. Good-night, and pleasant dreams to you all! La, Paul, you needn't be at the trouble of seeing me home; though, come to look out, it is a little darker than I thought it was."

ARCHERY.

"Better to sweat in fields for health unbought,
Than fee the doctor for a nauseous draught;
The wise for cure on exercise depend—
God never made His work for man to mend."—DRYDEN.

"We deem it great pittance to suffer this excellent exercise to go to decay amongst us."—ASCHAM.

It is a well-known and generally admitted fact that a considerable part of that delicacy of constitution which is unhappily too prevalent among our fair countrywomen, arises from the sedentary nature of most of their occupations and accomplishments. Half the evils "flesh is heir to" originate in want of muscular exertion, and of that stirring and exhilarating exercise which gives a healthy circulation to the blood. The occupations of women, from girlhood upwards, lying within a limited sphere, are too apt to incline them to a species of semi-indolence, to induce a preference for sedentary amusements, and either from inadvertence, or from ignorance of the functions and nature of their bodies, they often neglect to take that amount of regular exercise which is vitally necessary to the maintenance of health. Hence it soon results that the circulation becomes languid, the blood is not properly purified, and the muscles become flaccid and weakened. To remedy this, and also with a view to render the form graceful and flexible, various calisthenic exercises have been introduced into the education of young girls; and these, if judiciously conducted, are to a certain extent productive of good; but far better is the practice, in the open air, of games requiring skill, attention, and activity; these exhilarate the spirits, exercise the muscles, circulate and purify the blood, and give a healthy tone to the system.

It is our present intention to dwell on but one of those exercises which furnish the best antidote to the sedentary life of females of all ages—archery—which from its eminent gracefulness, from its being adapted to every age, and every degree of strength—for, by altering the strength of the bows, it may be practised from childhood to "green old age;" from its occupying both the eye and mind, and awakening and stimulating the faculties, as well as bringing into exercise the muscles of the legs, arms, chest, and body, cannot be too highly recommended. Roger Ascham, tutor to Queen Elizabeth, says of it, "It is an exercise most wholesome for the body, and a pastime most honeste for the minde: of all others the best, not only because it increaseth strength and preserveth health the most, but because it is not vehement, but moderate, not overlaying one part with weariness, but softly exercising every part with equalness." Dr. Mulcaster, a contemporary of Ascham, thus eulogizes archery: "To say enough of this exercise in a few words, which no words can praise enough for the commodities which it bringeth to the health of the body, it consisteth of the best exercises, and the best effects of the best exercises." And Sir Wm. Wood, Marshal of the old Society of Finsbury Archers, thus sings its praise in his "Bowman's Glory":—

"It is an exercise (by proof) we see Whose practice doth with nature best agree;
Obstructions of the liver it prevents,
Stretching the nerves and arteries, gives extent
To the spleen's opplings, clears the breast
And spongy lungs; it is a foe protest
To all consumptions."

There are so few healthful recreations in the open air of which women can partake, without being considered to encroach on the privileges of the "lords of the creation," and incurring the imputation of being unfeminine, that we cannot wonder archery is making rapid progress among our countrywomen. Besides its beneficial effect on the health, too, it is an elegant amusement, developing as much grace as can ever be displayed in actual dancing, far more than the indolently paced quadrilles, or romping polkas, or deux temps of the present day can ever hope to call forth.

A slight sketch of what is known of the bow and arrows may not be deemed uninteresting, before we enter further on our subject.

There is no authentic history or tradition relative to the invention of the bow, but it is evidently of very remote antiquity. The first mention of it occurs in the Book of Genesis (xxvii. 3), 1760 B. C. Isaac bids Esau take his weapons, his "quiver and his bow," and go into the field and get him some venison. Ishmael, we are told (Gen. xxi. 20), "grew and dwelt in the wilderness, and became an archer." Indeed, repeated allusions to this ancient weapon of the Jews occur in the Old Testament: Jonathan presented his bow to David (1 Sam. xviii. 4); the archers "hit and sore wounded" Saul (1 Sam. xxxi. 3).

In the Greek mythology, and in the ancient Grecian and Egyptian sculptures, are various allusions to, and delineations of the bow. Records of archery have also been traced in many Persepolitan, Macedonian, and Parthian antiquities. The Chinese had this weapon. One of their proverbs says, "When a son is born in the family, hang the bow and quiver up at the gate;" and their great sage, Confucius, wrote a treatise on archery.

All the eastern nations seem to have used the bow as a weapon of warfare, and practised archery as an amusement in times of peace; in Persia, equestrian archery was much practised, and shooting at the popinjay was a favorite recreation. The Arabs were skillful archers; in Chinese Tartary both sexes were equally expert in the use of the bow. The Manilla Indians, the Caribbee Indians, the Demarara Indians, the natives of Florida, and the savage tribes of North as well as of South America, all were more or less acquainted with, and expert in the use of this weapon. Some warriors, exhibited at one of our theatres about fifty years since, excited universal astonishment by the skill and certainty with which they hit a mark scarcely so large as a shilling.

The Scandinavians were likewise expert archers.

Homer mentions the bow several times. In his Iliad, b. ix. l. 152, Pandarus is thus described aiming an arrow at Menelaus:—

"Now with full force the yielding horn he bends,
Drawn to an arch and joins the doubling ends;
Close to the breast he strains the nerve below,
Till the barbed point approach the drelling bow;
Th' impatient weapon whizzes on the wing,
Sounds the tough horn and twangs the quivering string."

He mentions the Locrians as being "skilled from far the flying shaft to wing."

Again, in the Odyssey, we find the suitors of Penelope vainly endeavoring to bend the bow which Ulysses had left at home; and the hero himself, disguised as a beggar, having obtained permission to compete with them, thus proves his skill:—

"One hand aloft displayed,
The bending horns, and one the string essayed,
From his essaying hand the string, let fly,
Twangs short and sharp, like the shrill swallow's cry."

Æneas, too, is made to introduce archery when celebrating the anniversary of his father's funeral.

We read that the armies of Alexander the Great were chiefly composed of archers.

Plato, who was a great advocate of archery, and was desirous that qualified persons should be appointed by the government to teach the youth of Athens this art, mentions that the standing guard of the city numbered among its force one thousand archers.

Livy makes mention of the skill and prowess of the Cretan archers.

Plutarch signalizes the defeats of the Romans by the Parthians, and ascribes it to the manner in which these latter galled the enemy with their arrows.

The Huns were likewise skillful archers.

The Romans, as a people, were not skilled in the use of the bow, although many of the nobles and several of the Roman emperors practised it as an amusement. Herodian speaks of the feats and the "unerring hand" of the Emperor Commodus, who exhibited his skill on the wild beasts in the Amphitheatre.

It is a disputed point at what time the long-bow was introduced into England; some writers assert that it was the arbalest, or crossbow only, which was used from the time of the Norman Conquest until that of Edward II. Prior to the battle of Hastings, we have no record at all of archery being practised in Britain. Others again assert that it was an arrow, and not a bolt, which slew William Rufus, and which caused the death of Richard Cœur de Lion; and that the longbow, and not the crossbow, was the weapon of war in the contests between Matilda and Stephen, and with which Richard made such havoc among the Saracens. Certain it is that that famous hero of ballad romance, Robin Hood,* would be divested of half his charms if we took from him the graceful longbow and the "feathery arrows;" therefore, if not from stronger conviction, we side with the last-mentioned opinions, and are convinced that, although the arbalest may possibly have been the most common weapon of war, yet in the "merrie green wood" at least the other was expertly handled. Ritson, in the "Old Garland," a quaint collection of ballads on Robin Hood, gives the following characteristic anecdote of nearly the last words and actions of this famous outlaw; when he felt his end approaching, he said—

"But give me my bent bow in my hand,
And a broad arrow I'll let see;
And where this arrow is taken up,
There shall my grave digg'd be."

At the battles of Cressy and Agincourt the longbow was evidently used; in the reign of Edward III. again we find express mention of our archers, to whom indeed the victory seems generally to have been chiefly owing in most battles wherein they were engaged. Sir John Smith attributes this not only to the skill of the archers, but to the "dazzling, bemusing effect which a volley of arrows, flying thick as hail through the air, must have on the enemies' soldiers, and also on their horses."

In the reign of Edward IV., we find sundry curious laws relative to archery, to the importation of bow-staves, &c.; in one of which, "unlawful games, as dice, quoits, tennis," &c., are prohibited; but "every person strong and able of body" is required to use his bow.

Henry VII. instituted a band of archers to guard his person.

Henry VIII. was a great patron of archery; and a law made in his reign enacted that "all men not having any lawful impediment, except religious and judges, under sixty years of age, shall exercise shooting in longbows; and teach their children, servants, &c., having a bow with two arrows for each under seventeen years of age, and with four arrows for those above seventeen. Penalty, 6s. 8d. per month."

Queen Elizabeth, too, was a patroness of archery, and did not disdain herself to "wing the feathered shaft." By some statutes made in her reign, we find that the use of the bow formed part of the education of youth. At some of the public schools, and especially at Harrow, every parent was called upon to allow "to each boy a bow, three shafts, a bow-string, and a brace, to exercise shooting;" and prizes were given to be shot for by twelve competitors.

Shakspeare, who in his works introduces numberless allusions relative to this science, was, if we may credit any of the accounts of his midnight onslaughts on the deer, an archer of no mean skill.

Charles I. was a practical lover of archery, as was his father, James I.; and by these two sovereigns commissions were issued for the purpose of preventing inroads on, and removing obstructions from, the public grounds and fields devoted to the practice of archery; for it would seem that brick and mortar were even then beginning insidiously to encroach on the "pleasant green fields."

Archery was neglected by James II. in the troubles of his reign; and after his abdication, and the accession of a new family, bringing with them other predilections, the practice of it declined, and gradually fell into almost total disuse, being kept up only by a few companies or societies, among which the oldest, and the one which survived the longest, was the Society of Finsbury Archers, who had records dating as far back as 1676. In Clerkenwell church is a monument to Sir William Wood, one of their old marshals, who died at the age of 82. It has been restored by the Toxophilite Society; part of the inscription runs thus:—

"Long did he live, the honor of the bow,
And his great age to that alone did owe.
But how can art secure? Or what can save
Extreme old age from the appointed grave?
Surviving archers much his loss lament,
And in respect bestow this monument."

A splendid silver badge, presented to the Finsbury Archers by Catherine, Queen of Charles II., was, by Mr. Constable—one of the oldest and few remaining members of that body—transferred to the Toxophilites, when he joined them soon after their formation in 1780, under the auspices of Sir Ashton Levers and Mr. Waring. That society was the parent of most of those which have since sprung up, and of late multiplied so rapidly: its grounds are in the Regent's Park.

George IV., when Prince of Wales, was a munificent patron of archery, and by his influence mainly contributed to make it fashionable, and thus reanimate it. The following circumstances will alone suffice to show how rapid has been its spread lately, and how generally its healthfulness and power of amusing have been acknowledged: Little more than twenty years since, there were only two or three establishments in London for the sale of archery accoutrements; there are now probably twenty at least.

* Who could "Hit a mark a hundred rod,
And cause a hart to die."

It seems strange that the French should have at no period of their history appeared to devote much attention to archery. Greatly as they have suffered at various times from the skill of their English foes, one would have imagined that they would have endeavored at least to foil them with their own weapons. A few small societies of "tireurs" have occasionally existed, and one or two do so now: they have, however, a quaint old proverb on the subject, which says (what is well worth noting)—"Debander l'arc ne guérit pas la plaie;" or that the regret we may feel at having wounded the feelings of any person is but a poor atonement for the evil. "Faire de tous bois flèches," and "Cette flèche n'est pas sortie de mon carquois" are also two other trite allusions to archery.

Ere we proceed to the chief bearing of our subject, viz., archery as a recreation for females, we must not forget that celebrated archer Tell, who, when Gesler asked him why he took the second arrow, boldly replied—

"Mit diesem zweiten Pfeil durchschoss ich Euch, Wenn ich mein liebes Kind getroffen hätte,
Und euer—warlich hätte ich nicht gefehlt."

We have said already that archery is peculiarly adapted for females; nor are we in the present day singular in that opinion. If we go back as far as the ancient mythology, we find Diana with her bow: if we seek in the writings of the poets, we find Tasso's beautiful description of Clorinda—

"Her rattling quiver at her shoulder hung,
Therein a flash of arrows feathered well.
In her right hand a bow was bended strong,
Therein a shaft headed with mortal steel.
So fit to shoot she singled out among
Her foes who first her quarrel's strength should feel;
So fit to shoot Latona's daughter stood
When Niobe she killed, and all her brood."

If we speed our way to Asia, we shall find in some of the harems the fair slaves practising archery in the gardens of the seraglio. A traveller in Persia (we forget who) eloquently describes the bow of buffalo horn, black as jet, and highly polished, with its richly gilded and painted back, and string of pure white silk, decorated at the ends with loops of scarlet and gold; the delicate and costly arrows, the sleeve of rich satin, embroidered with gold, worn to protect the arm; and the jewelled thumb-ring (an article peculiar to the East), used by these beautiful captives; as well as the curious target, composed of softened clay, at which they shoot.

But we need not seek in the realms of the east, in the dream-land of poets, or the superstitions of ancient idolaters, in order to demonstrate that archery has been practised by females. Froissart mentions that it was one of the recreations of the stately dames of his day. Black Douglas, wife of one of the warlike and rebellious race of Douglas, was an expert archeress, and more than once, when besieged, tried her prowess on her own sovereign. Margaret, the daughter of Henry VII., is stated to have killed a buck in Alnwick Park, by shooting it with an arrow. In the privy purse expenses of Henry VIII., we find entered so much for bows, arrows, belts, braces, &c., for Anne Boleyn. Queen Elizabeth was evidently skilled in the practice of archery, for we find it recorded that at one hunting-party she with her own hand did shoot three deer. Catherine, queen consort of Charles II., encouraged this science, if she did not actually practise it, as is testified by the silver badge already alluded to, which she presented to the Royal Society of Finsbury Archers. And last, but not least, Queen Victoria is a lover and patroness of archery; and herself, at the Highland Fête at Holland Park, in 1850, added as a prize, expressly to be competed for by ladies, a handsome bracelet.

We now approach the most difficult part of our subject—the reducing practice to theory, or giving verbal directions for that which is best acquired manually. There are but few works on archery, and of these, "Hansard's Book of Archery," "Hastings's British Archer," and "Roberts's Bowman," are the best; and these are rather histories and treatises on the art than instructions for the practice of it. Our old friend Roger Ascham, in his quaint way, gives a very reasonable guess why more had not been written on this subject: "The faulte is not to be layed on the thinge which was worthe to be written upon, but of the menne which were negligent in doynge it; and this is the cause thereof as I suppose. Menne that used shootinge moste, and knewe it best, were not learned: men that were learned used shootinge little, and were ignorant of the nature of the thyng." Not that we believe that archery, any more than dancing, can be verbally taught; attention, imitation, practice, flexibility of the muscles, and concentration of the faculties, will advance a pupil in this art more than volumes of written directions: nevertheless, we will endeavor to give a few general instructions as lucidly as may be.

The accoutrements requisite for the practice of archery consist of a bow, a bow-case, about half a dozen arrows; a tin case or quiver for them; an arm-guard, a glove, a belt, a tassel, and a grease-box. These may all be obtained, sufficiently good in quality for general use, for two pounds.

Various materials have at different periods been used in manufacturing bows. In Job, we read of "the bow of steel." Homer tells us that the bow used by Pandarus was "formed of horn, and smoothed with artful toil

A mountain goat resigned the shining spoil."

In many parts of the East, horn, and sometimes ivory, are used. The yew-tree has also furnished many bows; now various woods are employed besides the yew, as lancewood, rosewood, snake-wood, and tulip-wood, combined with hornbeam and hickory. Bows are made of two kinds, "self-bows," or those formed of one piece of wood, and "back-bows," composed of two kinds of wood, one tough and the other elastic; the common lancewood self-bow is the cheapest of any; the continental yew self-bow is the most expensive. Bowstrings have been made of silk, catgut, and hemp: the last is the best and most durable material.

Arrows are chiefly manufactured of prepared lime-wood, old deal, pine, and aspen; the "nock," or notch, for the reception of the string, is of horn; the feathers from the wing of the gray goose, the turkey, or the eagle; and the head or pile of thin steel or iron. The length of the arrow depends much upon that of the bow; for a bow five feet long the arrows may be twenty-four or twenty-five inches in length. Arrows vary in weight as well as length, and are usually proportioned to the strength of the bow; their weights are always marked on them between the feathers, and archers should take care, when shooting at a mark or target, to keep to one certain weight.

The "quiver" is of tin, and usually japanned; it is generally made to hold about half-a-dozen arrows: it may be made of very rich and ornamental materials.

The "brace," or arm-guard, used to protect the arm from being hurt by the rebound of the string, is made of morocco leather, calf, or pigskin; the surface is smooth, hard, and polished, to prevent the string from being fretted in its passage over it.

The "belt" is composed of the same leather as the brace, and dyed the same color, viz., crimson, purple, or green, but generally the latter: from it on the left side is suspended the "tassel," which is of worsted, and the same color as the belt: its use is to wipe the arrows after they have been used, as a small particle of dirt adhering to them will impede their flight. The "grease-box," if not an absolutely necessary appendage, is a very useful one for keeping the fingers of the glove moist and supple; it usually consists of an ornamental box worn on the same side as the tassel.

The "glove" is used to protect the fingers from being injured by the string: it is made to match the belt and brace, and should fit well, or it will be of no use; it must be kept supple while being used, or it impedes the action of the hand.

The target is of twisted threshed straw, similar to that of which beehives are made; this is covered with a surface of canvas, on which equidistant circles of different colors surround an eye or centre of gold; these circles determine the value of each shot, and test the skill of the archer.

Our ancient friend Ascham pithily observes: "Archery is more pleasant to behold than easy to be taught; less difficult to be followed in practice than to be described." The preliminary rule we lay down is to begin practising with a bow which can be managed without any extra exertion of the arms and chest; thus, one of some twenty or twenty-five pounds power will generally be the best for young ladies during the first season; during the next, they can increase the power to thirty or thirty-four pounds, but we should never advise them to exceed forty pounds. Good instruction and example, backed by diligent attention and practice on the part of the learner, will be rewarded by proficiency: at the moment of taking aim, the powers of the mind should be concentrated on the affair in hand, much judgment and coolness being requisite: nervousness, inattention, or a wandering of the thoughts or eyes, will cause the aim to be false. Vegetius (cap. 15) says that "the left hand should be steady, the right hand draw the string with judgment, and both the eye and the mind be brought to bear together on the object of the aim."

"Shoot straighte and of a good lengthe, Then shall ye win of any strengthe," is the advice of an old author who wrote in the sixteenth century; and to shoot straight the eye must be fixed on the mark, the mind bent to assist the eye, and then the hands will obediently, governed by these two potentates, perform their duty. To shift the eye from the shaft to the mark, and from the mark to the shaft, is to insure a failure.

The bow must be held in the left hand, the arm extended in a straight line, and the wrist turned inwards; the hand grasps the bow at the handle, as nearly level with the top of it as possible. With the right hand take the arrow by the middle, and pass it under the string and over the bow; when the pile reaches the left hand, the forefinger of that hand must be clasped over it to steady it; the right hand now glides back to the nock, and grasps it with the thumb and finger; the cock feather is looked for, and the arrow slid down the bow and arranged with the cock feather upwards, and in a line with the top of the handle of the bow; during this manoeuvre, the bow may be held horizontally: it is now brought by a semicircular sweep of the arms into an almost perpendicular position, the forefinger of the left hand entirely detached from the arrow, and the whole of that hand grasps the bow at the handle, while with the right hand the arrow is adjusted to the string; by the time the bow is raised to its proper position, and the arrow brought to a level with the ear, it should be nearly three-quarters drawn. The body should stand sidewise as regards the target, the face only being turned directly to it; the eyes looking straight at the mark. Aim should now be taken, and the bow not kept fully drawn for more than a second, or it will be injured, but the arrow loosed at once. One of our celebrated opera-dancers is said to have observed that, of all the attitudes she ever studied, not one was so graceful, or displayed the form to better advantage than that of drawing the bow.

As almost every archery society has its own peculiar rules for the practice of this pastime, we abstain from entering on those points which are merely optional, and conclude our remarks with a few slight hints relative to the archery dress, leaving our readers to modify them according to their own taste.

In a variable climate, all out-door amusements must be pursued with precaution if we would preserve health. Hence it is evident that a costume must be chosen which will not only be graceful and effective, but which will preserve the body from chilly winds, dampness in the atmosphere, &c. We recommend a jacket of velvet or cashmere, braided or trimmed with buttons fitting well but not tightly; a gilet of silk, or poplin, or pique, and a skirt of the same material as the jacket ornamented up the front with braiding or buttons, and a lawn habit-shirt and undersleeves. The jacket and skirt may be of emerald or Lincoln green, or of royal blue, or violet; or the gilet of white, or the palest shade of color; and the jacket may be of either of these colors, and the skirt of white, tastefully trimmed to match. The belt, &c., must be chosen in accordance with the prevailing color. A hat of felt or beaver, in the style of that worn by la Figlia del Reggimento, decorated with a short feather or rosette to match the dress, will cover the head and protect the eyes from the sun. Lastly, but not least, the feet must be attended to and well guarded from the damp engendered by heavy dews, by the frequent showers, and by the sward having been watered to give it freshness; boots of kid, having channelled or cork or gutta percha soles, will be best, and if high heels are added, it is an advantage, as these prevent the whole of the sole from coming in contact with the ground.

Commending, then, to countrywomen the practice of archery as a healthful and graceful recreation, and pleasant change from their other occupations and pursuits, we wish them

"Stout arm, strong bow, and steady eye, Union, true heart, and courtesy."*

* A new invention for propelling arrows has lately been brought into use successfully. A sheath, about the size and appearance of a dice-box, is furnished at one end with an elastic Indian-rubber cord, which, by being drawn to its full limit, forces the arrow with considerable effect to an immense distance. It is a very portable, cheap, and handy weapon; but not so stylish as the ordinary bow.

CROSSING THE OBION.

AN INCIDENT OF WESTERN LIFE.

BY WORTHINGTON G. SNETHEN.

Mrs. THOMAS was an unusually hard-favored woman.

She must have been at least forty-five years old, and was blessed with an extraordinary amount of muscle, and a comfortable absence of that unnecessary fat which is one of the legacies of sedentary pursuits. Inured from infancy to a frontier life, with all its activity, severe bodily labor, and hardships, she never shrank from any of the conflicts of the elements, which usually keep at home people better to do in the world than she was, when she had anything to do which required her immediate attention and presence.

A small, sharp gray eye, peering out from beneath a rather projecting forehead, and from either side of a knifelike and aquiline nose, and a thin-lipped mouth, that curled downwards and then contemptuously upwards at each corner, were the characteristics of Mrs. Thomas's face. Her voice had a sort of nasal twang about it, combined with a sound similar to that which a cracked plate utters when held up and struck with a knuckle.

With her head encased in an old Leghorn straw bonnet, of the shape in which the fashionable world used to delight just after the war of 1812, resembling a coal scuttle with its under lid projecting high over the forehead, and tied closely under her lean and lank jaws with two bits of dingy ribbon, one piece longer than the other, and with her yellowish-gray hair combed back in Chinese style from her furrowed and expansive forehead, an expression was imparted to her face which the most enthusiastic artist, in search of the new and striking in the human countenance, could not find pleasure in contemplating.

And yet Mrs. Thomas was not a bad woman. On the contrary, she was eminently a good woman, in the true sense of the term good. She was the mother of five sons and three daughters, having been married at an early age, and had brought up all her children in the way they should go. She herself had been a dutiful daughter, and was now a widow of little more than a year. In all the works of life, she had been and still was a strict follower of our Lord Jesus Christ. She and all her family belonged to that denomination of Christians who had carried the Gospel into the wilderness with so much success—the Methodists.

Her hard-favored face was the result of her exposed life. She never knew what were the comforts of a home of wealth, with others to work for her. She had labored with her own hands hard all the days of her life, had lived simply, and had practised all the Christian virtues. No traveller had ever passed her door without having a cup of water offered him to quench his thirst. Her husband, and her parents before her, had been tillers of the soil, and her sons and sons-in-law—for her daughters were all married—followed the same pursuit. A rude cabin, not an elegant house, had been her dwelling-place since her marriage, and she still cultivated the homestead farm with her two youngest sons, who had not yet taken to themselves wives.

On a rainy, though not a very cold day, in the month of December, in the year 1830, Mrs. Thomas, with the aforesaid-described bonnet upon her head, dressed in a high-waisted, unedged, natural-white linsey-woolsey frock, with long, tight sleeves, and a bodice high up in, and closely fastened about the neck, and the skirt so short as to display rather too much of a pair of coarse, bluish woollen stockings, and her feet, of no ordinary size, well shod with roughly-made brogans, with enormously thick soles, and tied firmly with leather strings, stood in the doorway of her humble and windowless cabin, waiting patiently for a huge, gawky boy, her youngest son, who was driving before him across a field a fine, fat, sleek, large cow. Mrs. Thomas had sold this cow to one of her sons, who was tilling a farm on the other side of the river Obion, in western Kentucky, not more than five miles distant from his mother's residence; and, as it was in the bargain that she should deliver the cow on that very day, she was about to set out upon this mission.

"Here, 'Old Lady,' here 's your corn before we start. Come," said Mrs. Thomas to the noble animal, which was striding towards the door before John, and which knew her name to be "Old Lady."

She moaned her joy at sight of the corn, which Mrs. Thomas had placed in an open basket near the door of the cabin, and hastened to devour her food. John, with his white, homemade, linsey-woolsey, close-bodied coat, whose waist crept high up his back, his short-legged trousers, his foxy-looking and muddy boots of primitive fashion, and his well-worn wool hat, whose black had turned to be brown, and with his hands thrust into his pockets almost up to their elbows, walked slowly up to the door, looking inquiringly towards the clouds, that were then, and for some days past had been steadily pouring their contents down upon mother earth.

"I think, mother," said he, "that we had better not go out to-day. It looks as though it will rain still faster; and I doubt whether brother William will care if you are not up to the very day in delivering 'Old Lady.'"

"Ah, my son," replied Mrs. Thomas, "it is not my way of doing things to put off to another day what ought to be done now. This you know. Besides, we ought always to remember that the night cometh when no man can work, and that we should work while it is day."

As the Bible had been, from necessity, the only book that Mrs. Thomas had ever read, she constantly applied its thoughts and language to the incidents of everyday life; and, as her son knew that, when his mother used Scripture allusions in reference to any subject, her mind was unalterably made up, he said no more.

In a few moments, "Old Lady" despatched her meal, and Mrs. Thomas, shutting and fastening the creaking door of her cabin, hid her cow onwards in company with her son. After a tramp of some three miles along a road almost instep-deep in mud, the party reached the ferry on the Obion, which was now banks full, and rolling its turbid waters rapidly on to the Mississippi, into which it emptied.

Imagine her surprise when she was informed, by one of the ferrymen, that the ferry-boat had been swept away the night previous, having been torn from its moorings by the drifting trees and dead timber, which are the accompaniments of every flood in the western rivers. What was to be done? Mrs. Thomas was a woman who never trod a step backwards in all her life. The rain was descending rather more rapidly than when she left the door of her cabin, and to traipse back again with her cow was not to be thought of for a moment, seeing that her destination was only two miles distant.

As she stood communing within herself upon this unexpected state of things, she espied, shooting from behind a projecting point of the bank below where she was, a canoe, vigorously propelled by a man with a broad-brimmed hat upon his head, and whose body was bent forward almost horizontally, in order to give himself the greatest possible power in the wielding of his paddle. Hugging the shore close in, he soon brought his canoe into the little eddy within which was the landing of the ferry-boat, and, leaping from his punt upon the bank, he drew it almost entirely out of the water, so as to fasten it to a crooked, gnarled cottonwood-tree, that flourished near at hand.

"A wet day, Mrs. Thomas," exclaimed the canoe-man, Mr. Williams, who had just returned from an ineffectual pursuit after his ferry-boat. "Going over the river, I suppose, with that cow yonder? Sorry I have to disappoint you. I have lost my ferry-boat. It left us last night while we were asleep. This has been a ruinous flood to me, I am sure you. Sorry to drive you home again; but it is impossible to put you across till I can get a new boat, and when that will be I cannot tell."

"Can you not put me across in that canoe?" asked Mrs. Thomas, who seemed not to hear the canoe-man's harangue, which was kept up while he tied his canoe-rope to the tree.

"Put you across in that canoe? To be sure I can. It will carry ten people; but how about the cow?"

"We'll make her swim by the side of the canoe," replied Mrs. Thomas, calmly, and in a tone of determination.

"So we can. I did not think of that. But had we not better go to my house yonder, stop awhile, and dry ourselves before the fire, which, I am sure, my wife has ready for me, for she is a considerate woman, you know."

"I see no need for taking so much trouble only to get wet again. It will not take you very long to put us all over. I will pay you double ferrage, Mr. Williams, if you will go at once."

The canoe man assented, and, launching his canoe again, he jumped into it and took his seat. Mrs. Thomas went up to the cow, which was as tame as a pet kitten, and, taking out of her pocket a short piece of bed-cord, tied it around her right horn.

"Here, John," said she to her son, "lead 'Old Lady' by this into the water, along the left side of the boat; take your seat just behind Mr. Williams, and I will sit in the end of the canoe behind you, so as to speak a kind word to our swimmer."

The docile animal obeyed her leader with a slight unwillingness, manifested by two or three shakes of the head, and two or three heavy breathings, which horned cattle almost always display on taking to the water. When the parties were snugly seated in the canoe, the cow stood not more than leg deep in the river, which was so high as to cover the gently sloping bank for some distance.

"Now, Mr. Williams, go ahead. John, be steady. Don't hold her too tight. Give her head all the play you can. Mr. Williams, row up the stream, on this side, for some distance, before you strike across."

Mr. Williams was an experienced canoe man. He did not need the admonition of Mrs. Thomas. He gave the head of his canoe a brisk turn up the river, and, leaning forward almost flat, plied his paddle with all his might. His punt obeyed its impulses, and, in a few moments, canoe and cow were struggling with the raging and turbid waters of the river; the canoe inclining rather more towards the cow than was comfortable, and the cow puffing and blowing a cloud of white breath, and showing nothing but her horns, head, startled eyes, wide-spread nostrils, and broad back above the surface of the flood. Onward went canoe and cow for some hundred yards or more, breasting and tossing aside the swift-rolling current, the swimmer all the while, instinctively, keeping close to the left-hand side of the canoe, and every now and then casting a wishful look towards John and her old mistress, as though she wished to be out of the watery element with which she was so boldly contending.

Mr. Williams had now come to the point from which he was to turn the head of his canoe across the river. This was just opposite his cabin, which stood on the bank, and in the door of which were seen his good wife and their half dozen flaxen-haired children, gazing upon this novel ferrying party with no little alarm.

"Steady, John!" exclaimed Mrs. Thomas, at this juncture. "Sit over on the right side of the canoe, so as to balance it there. Take care of that ugly-looking log, Mr. Williams."

Mr. Williams had an eye upon that log. It was a huge one. It came on with booming rapidity. The canoe had now reached the middle of the stream. A dark cloud had arisen, unnoticed by our mariners. At that moment it opened its fountains, and it seemed as though a second deluge had come on. "Old Lady" had eyed that log, too, hurrying right towards her; for she was now on the side of the canoe up the stream, and she groaned audibly and with signs of great distress at the approaching mass. Mr. Williams plied his paddle in double-quick time, now urging forward the canoe, now turning its head, so as to avoid contact with the small floating timber and brushwood.

Suddenly, the whole heavens seemed to be on fire, so fiercely and vividly did the lightning flash across the firmament; and, on the instant, while the eye was yet blinded by the intensity of the gleam, so overwhelming was the crash, that John was prostrated senseless in the canoe, and the paddle was struck from the hands of Mr. Williams. At this juncture, the huge log, that had excited the fears of the canoe man and Mrs. Thomas, struck the head of the canoe, and, turning it aside, moved majestically on; while the swimming cow, finding her head no longer compelled by John's strong arm, turned it up stream, with the evident intent of leaving the boat. In doing so, the hinder part of her body was brought in contact with the stern of the canoe, where Mrs. Thomas was sitting, and, in the exertion of the moment, "Old Lady" flirited her caudal appendage over the side of the canoe plump into her former faithful mistress's lap. At this instant, Mrs. Thomas seized "Old Lady's" tail with an iron grasp, and boldly essayed to prevent her escape from the canoe. The essay was of short duration; for the strong swimmer, not relishing the freedom taken with her tail, which the holder would not release, made a resistless dash forward. By this time the canoe and the cow were in a straight line, the head of the cow up stream and the head of the canoe down stream, and Mrs. Thomas, holding with all her might to the tail, was pulled over the stern of the canoe, turning a complete somerset in her rapid progress, and plunging into the boiling flood without the utterance of a single emotion.

The paralyzed canoe man, and poor John, lying stunned in the bottom of the canoe, observed none of these things, so brief was the time in which they occurred; and it was not till the canoe was some yards distant from the swimming animal, with Mrs.

Thomas heroically holding fast to her tail, that Mr. Williams discovered what had happened. Fortunately for him, there was a spare paddle lying in the canoe, and, with his eyes fixed upon the cow and Mrs. Thomas, he seized it with undue violence. In doing so, he roused John from his stupor, whom he had supposed to have been pulled overboard by the struggling cow, which he had been holding.

Meantime, the cow made towards the bank of the stream to which she was, in the outset, bound, with Mrs. Thomas dangling at her tail. Mrs. Thomas had, in her girlhood, learned to swim, and was thus enabled to follow her leader without experiencing any inconvenience, other than what she felt from her chilled limbs. It was a ludicrous sight that, with all its danger, to see that wide and long-horned animal struggling with the rushing stream, but slowly moving across it, though carried rapidly down the current, and to see Mrs. Thomas, with her old-fashioned, scoop-shaped Leghorn bonnet rising out of the water, looking more like the uplifted head of a sea-serpent than anything else, and keeping pace with the groaning, grunting, and snorting cow! After a lapse of ten minutes or more, for the Obion is not more than two hundred yards wide at the point where this extraordinary natatory feat was performed—a natatory feat, by the side of which that of Leander across the Hellespont sinks into insignificance—when it is even banks full, “Old Lady” landed Mrs. Thomas safely, some distance below the usual ferry-landing; almost at the same moment, the canoe, with its two astonished passengers, touched the shore at the same place. Before John and Mr. Williams could leap from the canoe, Mrs. Thomas and “Old Lady” stood upon the bank, both shivering and dripping, the cow moaning from her exertion and evident fright, whilst the mistress coolly disentangled her right hand and arm from the hair of the cow’s tail, with which they had become entangled.

“Was not that a terrible exhibition of God’s power, Mr. Williams?” inquired Mrs. Thomas, alluding to the electrical display, all the while pressing the water from her dripping garments.

“It was; but, terrible as it was, it came near being more terrible still,” said Mr. Williams.

“How?” asked Mrs. Thomas, quickly.

“By the death of all of us.”

“God is merciful, Mr. Williams, to those who love him, and do what our Saviour commands us to do. My conscience bears me testimony that I have done no more than my duty in attempting to deliver this cow to my son, who has purchased her to be delivered this day; and God has approved my purpose to do what I thought I ought to do, against every obstacle, by saving us all from a watery grave.”

So saying, Mrs. Thomas, her son, and “Old Lady” went on their way, the rain still falling heavily; and Mr. Williams returned to his canoe, which soon bore him to his wife and family, who had seen, with no light rejoicing, from the door of his cabin, that all the parties had been saved.

COSTUMES OF ALL NATIONS.—THIRD SERIES.

CHAPTER X.

TOILET IN CHINA AND JAPAN.

THE inhabitants of the Celestial Empire seem to agree with Beauty, in considering that Fashion mars, instead of improving, the charms of her votaries; for, ever since the days of the wise and renowned Confucius, they have steadily resisted all her blandishments, closed their ears to her flatteries, and followed, in every respect, the ordinances of their great lawgiver with regard to dress.

By this decree, the poorer classes are obliged to wear their clothes of a dark blue, red, or black color. The emperor and princes of the blood are alone allowed the privilege of having yellow dresses, and many of the most delicate colors are reserved exclusively for the ladies. Pure white is the emblem of mourning among all classes.

So strictly is everything relating to the toilet managed among this grave people, that even when the seasons change they are not allowed to clothe themselves in thick or thin coverings, according to their fancy, but must wait with patience to change the winter for the summer, or the summer for the winter garb, till the viceroy of the province has performed this important ceremony, when the whole outward appearance of the people alters as if by magic; and a stranger to their laws, who, the evening before, had seen the streets of Peking crowded with people, all enveloped to their chins in the warmest furs, would imagine everybody struck by a magician’s wand, when, on going forth the following day, he finds the same people all, by one accord, habited in their summer attire.

The upper dress of the Chinese ladies resembles that of the lords of the Celestial Empire; but it is more decorated with rich and beautiful embroidery. The trowsers are tied round the ankle, so as to give a full view of their small feet, encased in highly ornamented shoes. They appear anxious to conceal rather than to display, the elegance of their figure, though a small waist is much admired. Their sleeves, being very long, protect their hands, and render gloves unnecessary.

The married ladies tie the hair on the top of the head; and, to make the tuft as large as possible, add a quantity of false hair, and stick it full of long gold or silver pins, or bodkins, the ends of which are frequently highly ornamented with jewels; while the young women wear their jet black ringlets clustering on each side of the face. Artificial flowers are also often used to ornament the head. But the favorite coiffure, the object of a Chinese lady's greatest admiration, is an artificial bird, formed of gold or silver, intended to represent the Fong-whang, a fabulous bird, of which the ancients relate many marvellous tales. It is worn in such a manner that the wings stretch over the front of the head; the spreading tail makes a kind of plume on the top, and the body is placed over the forehead, while the neck and beak hang down. The former being fastened to the body with an invisible hinge, it vibrates with the least motion.

In a Chinese novel, called by the euphonious title of "Hung-how-Mung," is the following description of a Chinese élégante: "On her head, her knot of hair was adorned with gold and silver, and eight precious stones pendent. It was fastened with a pin of pearls dropping from five little eagles. An ornament of virgin gold, enlivened with insects, embraced her neck. Around her waist was an upper dress of deep red-colored silk, on which were embroidered an hundred golden butterflies fluttering among flowers. Over this a narrow garment made of the skins of stone-blue wice, and silk of five different colors. Below all was a petticoat of foreign crêpe, of a green color, sprinkled with flowers."

The Chinese wear their nails of an immense length; and neither men nor women are often seen without a painted fan in their hands, many of them most beautifully figured.

The extraordinary admiration of this people for small feet subjects them to much pain and inconvenience. As soon as a female child in the higher ranks is born, the toes are bent under the foot, and tightly bandaged day and night, till the growth of the foot ceases. This barbarous custom is attributed by some old writers to Takya, the wife of one of the first Chinese emperors. She is represented as having been very beautiful, but haughty and imperious. She persuaded her husband to allow her to make what laws she pleased, and, having very deformed feet, she bound them with fillets, and ordered all the ladies of the country to imitate her example; thus attempting to make a deformity pass for a beauty.

The Chinese people of rank never go abroad without boots made of satin or silk, or sometimes even of cotton. They are made without heels, and fit with the greatest nicety. Their stockings are of silk stuff, quilted and lined with cotton, and ornamented with velvet or cloth. In summer they have light slippers, and the common people black cotton shoes. Besides wearing quantities of false hair, the Chinese women also employ paint to heighten the charms of their complexion.

In the "Journal of the Embassy to China," by Henry Ellis, we read that the dress of ceremony of the mandarins consists of blue gauze or crape, with some flowered satin beneath; and that it is plain and not unbecoming. An embroidered badge, marking their rank, whether civil or military, is fixed upon their robe, either before or behind. The peacock's feather, or, more properly, tail of peacock's feather, answering to our orders of knighthood, is worn behind. Two of these are equivalent to the garter.

In the journal of Dr. Thunberg, we find the following account of the dress of the Japanese: "The fashion of their clothes has remained the same from the highest antiquity. They consist of one or more loose gowns, tied about the middle with a sash; the women wear them much longer than the men, and dragging on the ground. In summer they are very thin; but, in winter, quilted with silk or cotton wadding. People of rank have them made of silk; the lower class of cotton stuffs. Women generally wear a greater number of them than the men, and have them more ornamented, often with gold or silver flowers woven into the stuff. These gowns are generally left open at the breast; their sleeves are very wide, but partly sewed up in front, so as to make a kind of pocket, into which they can easily put their hands. Men of consequence are distinguished from those of inferior rank by a short jacket of thin black stuff, which is worn over their gowns, and trousers open on the sides, but sewed together near the bottom part, into which the skirts of the robe are thrust. Some use drawers, but all have their legs naked. They wear sandals of straw, fastened to the feet by a bow passing over the instep, and a string, which passes between the great toe and that next to it, fixing it to the bow. In winter they have socks of linen, and, in rainy or dirty weather, wooden shoes.

"In their sash they fasten the sabre, fan, and tobacco-pipe. They never cover their heads but on a journey, when they use a conical cap made of straw; at other times, they defend themselves from the sun or rain by fans or umbrellas. Their hair is universally black; and such a sameness of fashion reigns throughout this whole empire, that the head-dress is the same from the emperor to the peasant. The mode of the men's head-dress is singular: the middle part of their heads, from the forehead very far back, is close shaven; the hair remaining round the temples and nape of the neck is turned up and tied upon the top of the head into a kind of brush, about as long as a finger; this brush is again lapped round with white thread, and bent a little backwards. The women preserve all their hair, and, drawing it together on the top of the head, roll it round a loop, and, fastening it down with pins, to which ornaments are affixed, draw out the sides till they appear like little wings; behind this a comb is stuck in. Physicians and priests are the only exceptions to the general fashion; they have their heads entirely, and are by that means distinguished from the rest of the people."

---

INDUSTRY AND PUNCTUALITY.

We scarcely know of any other word in our language which has been so completely and so fatally misapplied as the word "genius." Young men too commonly suppose that genius—or, in other words, aptitude for a particular pursuit, conjoined to inclination for it—exempts them from aiming at any other requisite for success in it. They seem to suppose that there is something vulgar and unworthy in that steadfast application to any given pursuit, which they think proper to speak of as "plodding." And yet the history of almost every really eminent man, no matter in what pursuit he has signalized himself and served mankind, abounds with proofs that to steady industry, fully as much as to genius, have all really great human achievements been attributable. Great scholars, for instance, have always been, not merely laborious, but they have also studied both methodically and regularly; they have had for every portion of the day its proper and allotted study, and in no wise would they allow any one portion of time to be encroached upon by the study to which another portion was especially appropriated in their fixed plan of action. The numerous and—considering the barbarous state of learning in his time and country—the really marvellous attainments of Alfred the Great, king of England, were won far less by any very striking and brilliant original capacity than by his Herculean powers of application, and by the steady resolution with which he applied the various portions of his day to the pursuits in which he found it necessary to engage. And surely, if he could do this, it would ill become the more humbly gifted and infinitely more humbly situated student of our own times, to think industry and steadiness otherwise than necessary. Another important virtue which the inordinate admirers of the fits and starts, which they call genius, and think so brilliant an acquisition, are too commonly in the habit of both thinking meanly of, and speaking meanly of, is punctuality; and yet there is not a quality of greater importance to the man who would be either useful or prosperous. Lord Nelson attributed his success in life far more to his punctuality than to his genius. Peter the Great, Frederick of Prussia, Washington, Napoleon—in short, all men of great merit and success have been distinguished for industry and punctuality. To those who never nerved themselves to the task of being industrious and punctual, the wonderful power of being so can scarcely be imagined.

MODEL COTTAGE.

PLAN OF A COTTAGE, OR MANOR-HOUSE, ON THE TELlico RIVER, MONROE COUNTY, EAST TENNESSEE.

DRAWN, FOR THE LADY'S BOOK, BY THE OWNER.

FRONT ELEVATION.

Elevation.—Two feet base below sill; eighteen feet from bottom of sill to top of plate; twelve feet front half of house between floor and ceiling; rear half ten feet, which gives conveniences and variety in appropriating the rooms. The belt forms the rail to porches, and continued to form the frieze.

A, Kitchen: B, Nursery: C, Dining-Room: D, Parlor: E, Hall and Library: F, Hall and back entrance: G, China Closet: H, Vestibule: I, Private passage to dining-room: J, Closet, six by six feet: K, Family entrance: L, L, L, Porches, five by ten feet: M, Glass Door.

Windows four by ten feet, and side sash one foot by ten at entrance. Windows opening to the floor, and casements open with hinges. Glass eight by twenty, two lights wide each casement, and side lights one light wide. Caps to windows six inches wide. Roof projects two feet, with frieze and bracket finish. This house is built of wood, sides and partitions two-inch plank. Same plan may be brick. The chimneys form a part of support of attic floor;

they have castellated tops, with four points. Scale, twelve feet to the inch.

Plan of the Chambers, or Second Floor.

A, A, A, A, Porches with deck floor and railing, with canopy above: B, Cabinet and Porch: C, Well, or stairs: D, Hall and entrance to the five chambers: E, Closet and Stairs from I into an attic story, twenty-two by twenty-two feet: F, Closet to chamber H: G and H, Chambers seventeen by nineteen, and recess leading to porch six feet high at plates and ten feet under the attic: I, K, Chambers seventeen by nineteen, four feet at plates, and eight feet under the attic: J, Chamber ten by twenty, with front porch. I, J, K, two feet above G and H, three steps from D into each. Windows on hinges opening to the floor, the belt in front elevation passing windows of G and H two feet above floor, and latticed in front of windows.

Cost of building, about $3,000.

FIRST FLOOR.

SECOND FLOOR.

FRANK COLLEMORE.

BY MRS. SARAH J. HALE.

"Prepared I was not
For such a business; therefore was I found
So much unsettled."

Among the adventurers who came over to Virginia in 1619 was a young gentleman by the name of Frank Collemore. His family boasted a long pedigree; but, as their purse was not long enough to support their pretensions, they had become in a manner rusticated, being under the necessity of residing constantly in the country. Better prospects seemed to court the young Francis. A maiden aunt of his mother's, possessing a large property in the funds, besides an estate in Yorkshire, adopted the boy, and educated him with the avowed intention of making him fit to be a judge. Of course he was designed for the law, and was entered as a student; but the prospect of a rich inheritance operating on him as on many others, rendered him careless of pursuing any business that would qualify him to gain an estate, when supposing that he should, in a short time, be fully occupied in spending one. He reckoned without his host, for his old aunt never intended her money should be spent, as her last will and testament sufficiently showed. She therein set forth that "she had purposed to make her young kinsman her heir, but being well advised that he frequented boisterous company, and allowed himself to be called Frank, when he should have so demeaned himself as to have been known at his age only by the appellation of Francis Collemore, Esq.; and, furthermore, that he was addicted to various extravagances, which she had signified she did not approve, and was, also, unacquainted with business, therefore, she only gave him a legacy of fifty pounds, superadded to a suit of mourning apparel, devising her whole remaining property to Mr. Scroll, her attorney, who was a discreet man, and would doubtless be careful to improve her estate, and take care of her tenants."

Thus ended Frank's dreams of heirship, and, after a few unavailing complaints, threats, and exclamations, he had no better resource, when his fifty pounds were gone, and his friends fairly tired of supplying his necessities, than to seek his fortune in the New World. He was warm tempered, generous hearted, and somewhat visionary, as my readers will believe when they read the following resolution, which he penned in his memorandum the day he sailed for America.

"I have good reason for believing there are rich mines of gold in Virginia; I will go thither, and there tarry till I have gained a sufficiency of wealth, and then I will return and invite all my old friends, and all those that are now jeering and gibing at poor Frank Collemore. Remember to invite Lady Hewitt.

"I do not care to be very rich—fifty thousand pounds will answer."

The voyage was prosperous and speedy, though Frank's eagerness to be gathering gold, in addition to sea-sickness, made him impatient, and the sight of land was almost as welcome to him as to the crew of Columbus. It was a grand sight to a man who had never before been out of old England, to look on a new world to which discovery had then set no limits, which imagination represented as stretching away in measureless distance, till it reached those golden Indies, from whence the riches of Solomon had been brought. The thought had bewildered wiser people than Frank Collemore; and it need not be reckoned a proof of folly, but of foresight, that, after he had gazed on the vast amphitheatre that ascended regularly from the shore towards which he was slowly sailing, in the glorious magnificence of waving woods, till the green forest blended with the blue sky, and considered that but very little of the country before him had been searched for gold, he took out his tablets and noted down his intention of persevering till he had accumulated at least one hundred thousand pounds!

But the hope of finding gold was soon weakened in the mind of Frank. The appearance of the colony, after he had landed, thoroughly disappointed him. Jamestown, and the plantations around it, were in that state of half-cultivation, half-wilderness, which makes the complete barbarous to the eye of taste. The clearings had never been made with reference to anything save present convenience: the blackened stumps of trees, remaining in their enclosures, were only partially concealed by the vegetation; the rude log buildings promised few of the comforts of an English cottage, and the palisades around every dwelling not enclosed within the defences of the town, plainly proved the dangers to which the people were constantly exposed.

Then the inhabitants themselves were, in the opinion of Frank, little better than savages. There were but very few women, not a single unmarried woman, in the colony, and a set of bachelors, many of them growing rather old, we can imagine would not be much in the habit of sacrificing to the graces. He was absolutely shocked by their manners and appearance, nor could he see any reason they had to wish to live only because it was daily necessary to defend their lives. The difficulties of exploring and searching for mines also appeared appalling to Frank. If the Europeans could not maintain themselves on the sea-coast without being obliged to go constantly armed, even while within sight of their own town and forts, how could they penetrate into the country unless they had an army to clear their path? In fine, Frank was soon sick of his adventure, and wondered why the people did not, all of them, quit the country and return to England. He proposed such a step to several who seemed almost worn out with fatigue; but their answers were, "We have got through with the worst"—or, "We shall soon have better times"—or, "I don't like to leave the country now I've done so much here, and been here so long," &c.

Among Frank's letters of introduction was one to Andrew Bates, an old colonist, who was, in the estimation of the London Company, a tried and diligent settler, to whose patronage they had especially recommended Mr. Collemore. Frank soon sought him out. He was a dingy-looking, middle-aged man, with a very doubtful expression of countenance, vibrating between the simplicity with which nature seemed to have invested him, and the cunning circumstances had made familiar to his mind. In short, he was one of those who prefer generally to gain their ends by honest means, but rather than not gain their ends, will do what is not honest.

He soon understood the bias of Frank's mind, for his eagerness to leave the country had increased his desire to discover the gold which would accelerate his departure.

"You have the name of being prosperous, Mr. Bates," said Frank; "do you gain your wealth by labor? or have you found some of the secret places where we must believe the rich ores of this country abound?"

The wary planter shook his head and assumed an air of mystery—but after a few minutes the sincerity of his disposition seemed to predominate, and, taking Frank by the arm, he led him to his tobacco field, then in full flower, and very minutely began to detail the whole process of cultivating that plant, and the profits it might be expected to yield.

"I understand your meaning, good man," said Frank. "You think that successful industry will, in time, make one rich. Perhaps it may; but for myself, I despise such drivelling. I came over here to make my fortune at once."

"And then you purposed to return to England?"

"Certainly. I would not live here if King James would give me the whole country."

"But you do mean to tarry here till you are rich?"

"I—I—cannot say as to that. The colony does not equal my expectations. But—I have little temptation to return without I am fortunate."

"I understand it all," said Mr. Andrew Bates, placing his hands on his sides, and assuming an air of great consequence. "I am glad you applied to me, as no man in the colony has had more experience than myself. I can give you something better than advice; I can give you example, young gentleman. I was just about your age when I came over here, expecting to gather gold like stones. Well, I should like to tell you some of my adventures, when I went up the river with Captain Smith, and all the time I was looking anxiously around for some prize; but none fell to my share. But I cannot tell you many particulars now, only that I passed three years here, searching for gold till I was almost starved, and had been several times wounded by the Indians. So we, being all discouraged, concluded to return to England; but just as we set sail, the fleet arrived, bringing provisions and men from home, and so we tacked about—and Lord de la War, who came out Governor, made an excellent speech, setting forth how much better it would be to earn our property by planting corn than working mines, &c. I was convinced then, though I cannot now remember all his good advice, but I resolved to follow it; and I said to myself, 'here I have been for several years dreaming of finding riches—it is all a cheat—I will now keep myself awake, and see what I can do.' So I petitioned for this piece of ground, and I was one of the first that began to cultivate tobacco. And thus I have gone on steadily, till I reckon myself worth as much property as any gentleman in the colony, except just two or three. And I tell you that, though I once believed I never could be contented to think of living here, yet now I feel it is my home; every improvement I have made on my land has added a link to bind me closer to this country, till finally I have no wish to leave it. So take my advice, young gentleman, and if you mean to return to England, go before you are rich—should you wait till that time, you will never go."

"And you can be contented to dwell here like a hermit, or something worse," said Frank, shrugging his shoulders contemptuously. "I care little for wealth on such conditions. Give me friends to share my prosperity; but if I must be poor—why, welcome solitude."

"I have no greater relish for solitude now I am rich, than yourself, sir," returned Andrew Bates, winking and rolling his small black eyes with a peculiar facetious expression. "I am not intending to die a bachelor, though I have so long lived one."

"Then you calculate, perhaps, on wooing some of the wild beauties of yonder forest. Could you find another Pocahontas?"

"Pho, pho—there never was another Indian girl like her on the face of this earth. I would have married"—he paused, and something like the effort which is made to suppress the expression of feeling when a sudden twinge of pain afflicts one, might have been seen in his face and manner; but whether it proceeded from what is commonly called a "stitch in the side," or whether unpleasant reflections obtruded on his memory, was never known.

"But you expressed your intentions of marriage so unequivocally that you will pardon my curiosity," said Frank, laughing. "I own I cannot imagine where you will find the lady fair, unless you beat the bush, or wait the demise of some of your friends who have been so lucky as to be accompanied by their wives to this wilderness."

"I shall do neither, Mr. Collemore," and he assumed an air of importance while he added, after a little pause—"To you, sir, in confidence, I will tell my plans. I have written home to the treasurer of the Company—I knew him when I was young, as good a fellow at our clubs and frolics as ever I wish to see—I have written home to him—his father and mine were very intimate friends, and I writ to him by the vessel in which you came over, and he will have the letter now soon; I writ to him how well I was prospered, how much tobacco I had raised this year, and so on, and I told him that I now wanted nothing but a good wife to make me contented and happy."

"He would naturally have inferred that, sir. We men know pretty well, whether we acknowledge it or not, that for our comfort, our happiness, we are mainly dependent on the other sex. This, I presume, you will own."

"Yes, sir, yes; but still I think it well we have not as yet had many women to share the hardships of our colony. It is but a short time since we have, any of us, really made up our minds to live and die in this country. We all came with the same intention you express—to make our fortunes and then go home; and women, sir, would make miserable adventurers. Besides, we have several times been very near starving; and nothing, let me tell you, makes Christian men behave so much like savages as the want of food. We should, I fear, have treated our wives cruelly had we had them. But now we have become settled, in a manner, and industrious, and there is no fear of a famine; and now is the time for women to come among us. They would be worshipped, almost. And this I have hinted to the treasurer; and moreover I have told him that I thought if the Company really wished to have the colony continue, they must send out wives for the young men—at any rate I wished for one."

"So, so, you have ordered your wife as you would your wig, to be forwarded from London. Pray, have you sent directions for the purchase? or have you promised to be satisfied with his selection?"

"Neither way, exactly. I named some qualifications as indispensable; but engaged to judge charitably."

"That will do, that will do," said Frank gayly. "Charity is the main thing. A multitude of faults, and no young woman can have more, may be overlooked if her lover only has charity. And after she is your wife, and you are both one, her faults, you know, are then yours. I think your plan a good one—only, supposing the fair damsel should, after she arrived, prefer some other man"—

"No fear of that," interrupted Andrew, giving him another wink of self-complacency. "I have a house and land; and women—I know them pretty well—women, though we call them angels, and all that—women like a little of this world as well or better than we do."

Frank could only answer by a sigh; for his experience had taught him that, in fashionable life, the rich dunce was, by parents at least, often preferred before the sensible youth who had no rent-roll to exhibit.

The rumor that Andrew Bates was expecting a young lady from London the following spring, whom he had pledged to marry immediately on her arrival, was soon circulated among the inhabitants of Jamestown; and a corollary to the rumor was soon added, namely, that a number of young women would accompany her. The Governor took advantage of the enthusiasm with which the news was greeted while making a speech to the people, and exhorted the unmarried men to industry and economy, that they might not disappoint those who, if they came, would be entirely dependent on them for support and protection. The speech was received with loud cheers, and from that time a visible improvement in the behavior of several, who had appeared, to say the least, like demi-savages, was noticed, and nearly all the young men seemed more industrious and persevering.

Frank Collemore derived much amusement from listening to the different speculations of those with whom he mingled, on the effect this new kind of importation would have upon the colonists. Some avowed their eagerness to have the fair adventurers arrive, others affected indifference—but to the honor of the gallantry of those founders of our nation, there was but one, out of somewhat upwards of six hundred "single gentlemen," which the colony contained, who inveighed in the true Jacques style against the world in general, and women in particular, and declared his intention of living all his life in a cave.

I pass over, as matters not pertaining to this story, the Indian alarms and skirmishes which occurred during the first year of Frank's residence in Virginia. I write merely a sketch, exhibiting some particular traits of his character, and incidents in his life, and make no pretensions to giving "a true and veracious historie of all his experiences." So suppose, reader, that the time has drawn near when the vessel, freighted as never ship was before or since, is expected by the colonists. We cannot realize the emotions such an event created. Not an individual belonging to the settlement but was interested in the arrival of the ships. Only think with what intense anxiety they must have been expected by those who were placed in a new world, with a wide ocean rolling between them, and what they still considered their own dear land! And then, independently of the news!—news that in idea made every heart thrill with hope or fear—there were the real benefits which would accrue, and the wants which would be supplied. A vessel was not then, as now, freighted with one, or at most, with a few kinds of merchandise. It had all the variety that a country store, with an apothecary's and stationer's shop superadded, now exhibits. They seemed dependent on England for everything. From thence came their laws, luxuries, clothing, arms, ornaments, books, medicine, furniture, and utensils. But all these things now lost their interest—to the men, I mean—in comparison with the living treasures which were expected.

At length, early one morning in June, 1620, a signal gun was heard, and, shortly after, the vessel hove in sight. Never was such a trepidation manifested among the inhabitants of Jamestown. Such washing, and combing, and brushing, and dressing! Every man that intended to appear at the landing put on his best, and faces that usually wore the sternness of Ajax tried to assume the smooth smile of Paris. Then it was that the superiority of Frank Collemore shone conspicuous. He had brought with him an elegant wardrobe, and, arraying himself in a rich suit, which, as he had so lately come from London, was still in the pink of fashion, he walked down to the shore, and purposely stationed himself very near Andrew Bates. That worthy had done his best to look the agreeable in the eyes of his expected mistress. He had, in his younger days, been a dashing beau; but his long exposure to the wear and tear of life in the woods had led him to regard clothing merely as a defence, which was valuable only in proportion to its strength and durability. True he had ordered a new suit to be sent over for his wedding array, but it was in the vessel that contained his bride; nor would the circumstance have given him a moment's uneasiness, had he not felt a rising jealousy while looking at Frank. A boat dispatched from the vessel was welcomed with loud cheers; and the letters, among which Andrew Bates had one, were distributed.

"You are a happy man, Mr. Bates, if I may judge by your countenance," said Frank. "Do you tell your news?"

"Yes, sir, yes—there are a hundred young maidens in yonder vessel."

"A hundred for you? Why, are you intending to turn Turk?"

"There is only one for me, sir, as you well know. One for me; but they tell me she is a lovely one. Eleanor Bliss is her name;" and he again examined his letter. "I like her name—Bliss—Bates—both begin with a B—a good omen. I like her name."

"Perhaps she may like it too, and not wish to change it, or perhaps she may fancy some other letter to begin with—C, for instance."

VOL. XLV.—23

Andrew Bates started up; his countenance expressed rage, chagrin, perplexity, and fear, while in his peculiar language he poured forth his threats against any one who should dare attempt to supplant him in the lady's affections. As Frank still continued his railery, it is impossible to say how the affair would then have terminated had not the vessel approached so near as to draw the attention of all parties.

The whole transaction respecting the coming over of those young women has an air of fiction, and is among the few circumstances in the early annals of America that may be termed the romance of our history. The London Company had found that all attempts to draw profits from their colony were idle, unless means could be devised to bind the roving spirit of the adventurers to their new country as their home. The Spaniards in South America, and the French in Canada, often intermarried with the natives; but Englishmen, alike from pride, prejudice, and principle, revolted from such alliances. There was then no means of establishing the household ties but by encouraging the planters to return to England and select their partners—a very doubtful policy; or sending over some young maidens to share the prosperity which then began to be no longer doubtful. The latter scheme was advocated warmly by the treasurer, probably in consequence of Andrew Bates's epistle; and, accordingly, a number of young women were selected, with strict reference to excellence of character, and, as far as possible, personal appearance; but wealth—that grand desideratum in modern matches—formed no item in their recommendations. They were to be received and provided for by the governor, Sir George Yeardly, and, should they be dissatisfied and wish to return, they were to be reconveyed to England, at the expense of the company.

"Few will wish to return," said the treasurer.

Had he seen the enthusiasm with which their arrival was greeted, he would have added that not one would willingly be suffered to return. Yet the exultation of the men was restrained by that respect which the presence of virtuous women never fails to inspire in the hearts of civilized Christians. Not a shout, hardly a loud word was heard among the assembled crowd, while the maidens were disembarking and passing from the vessel to the shore. The young men, it is true, were active to facilitate the landing of these fair ones, without exposing them to the danger even of a wet foot; but this gallantry called forth no token of approbation, hardly of notice, from an individual among the ladies. With downcast or averted eyes, and cheeks alternately pale and crimson, they advanced and were greeted by the Governor and wife, and several elderly women, wives of the most respectable settlers, in whose families they were to reside. The newcomers were all possessed of the charms of youth and health—many of them were pretty, and a few very beautiful. Cupid never had such a triumph since he first drew his bow—for more than fifty of the young men fell desperately in love—it was the real novel love, at first sight—but then it proved more rational and sincere than such a passion usually does, for not one of the innamoratos proved a Phaon.

In short, for I fear my story is growing too long, the following six weeks were occupied with rejoicings and weddings; all the young women, excepting one, being married in that space of time. Many of the fair maidens objected to this haste; but their lovers were so importunate, representing the bachelor condition to which they had so long been doomed, as miserable beyond endurance; they had no domestic friends, companions, &c.—and so each “won his Genevieve;” and those men, many of them apparently rude and unreflecting, made kind and provident husbands. Indeed, there never was a nation where woman has always received the respect, the rational affection, and esteem that have been rendered her in our country. Much of the moral excellence of our people may be traced to that source. The influence of virtuous and sensible women, when acting in their sphere, is of the highest importance to individual and domestic happiness, and also to national character.

But one of those fair damsels remained still in single blessedness, not for lack of lovers, but for the same reason that many ladies nowadays remain unmarried—because she did not have an offer to her mind. This was Miss Eleanor Bliss, who had made no demur at rejecting honest Andrew, house, land, and all. It was a terrible disappointment to him, worse because his expectations had been known, and were now by many ridiculed. He shared the fate of many a crafty projector, that of seeing others made happy by a scheme he had devised solely for his own benefit. None but a philanthropist can feel wholly resigned to such a disappointment—and Andrew, I am sorry to say it, did not conduct like a philanthropist.

He was especially enraged with Frank Collemore, whom he accused of supplanting him in the affections of Eleanor Bliss. The truth was, Eleanor had been a reigning belle in some of the first circles of the metropolis, and, being rich, and a little inclined to coquetry, she had rejected lovers by the dozen—but unluckily her banker failed, absconded, and she found herself five-and-twenty and penniless. Her suitors drew off—she said farewell to them cheerfully—friends who had formerly flattered, began to advise—she said farewell to them uncomplainingly; but at last a relation, whom she had assisted in various trying difficulties, and on whom she thought she might depend, assumed the dictatorship, threatening to turn her out of her house unless she consented to wed an old, decrepit, worthless wretch, who had no recommendation on earth save his wealth. It was then that Eleanor, disgusted with the heartlessness and selfishness of the Old World, determined to seek her fortune in the New. She was handsome, sensible, agreeable, and good-humored; only she had a high-spirited independence, which, if opposed by what she deemed unjust arguments or reproaches, became obstinacy. She was well acquainted with Sir Edward Sandys, treasurer of the London Company; to him she communicated her plans; and he, knowing her taste and temper, had named her to Andrew Bates as one who would make him an excellent and charming wife, merely to give the Governor's family, to whose care she was especially recommended, a little amusement. Andrew had taken it all in earnest, and insisted that the encouragement he had received amounted to a contract of matrimony, as he was ready to fulfil his stipulations to the treasurer. But Eleanor would listen to none of his reasoning on the subject, though she willingly listened to all Frank Collemore's witticisms concerning it. There was good reason for this. Frank was a gentleman, and moreover, though they had never met in London, they had heard of each other, they knew the same people, had been to the same fashionable places, &c. In short, they were delighted to meet. They found the climate of the New World as propitious to the growth of friendship as tobacco. There was something absolutely enchanting in being permitted to throw aside formal etiquette while they retained all the polish of high life. They had become better acquainted with each other in six weeks spent in Virginia, than they would have been in England in as many years. Eleanor's heart began to feel quite interested in the decision Frank was about making, namely, whether he should return to Europe that season, or wait till the following Spring. He believed it best to go immediately; yet he was, at times, very reluctant to leave Eleanor. An unexpected event determined the course of his future life differently from what his plans had ever proposed.

In one of his morning rambles, he encountered, at a little distance from the settlement, Andrew Bates, with one of his friends, a stout ragamuffin, who had agreed to assist him, if necessary, in giving Frank Collemore a hearty thrashing. Andrew opened the battery by some very sneering remarks on the frequency of Frank's visits to Eleanor. These were replied to with a causticity of ridicule which provoked Andrew to begin the assault, when he had calculated to keep the windy side of the law and only “bite his thumb.” But, enraged, he forgot his caution, called Frank a villain, struck his hat from his head, and then, putting himself in an attitude of boxing, dared his foe to come on.

Frank coolly adjusted his hat, took from his pocket a pair of pistols, and calmly told Andrew that, being a gentleman himself, he could not condescend to fight like a blackguard; but that he was ready to give him satisfaction with sword or pistol, and he might take his choice of the weapons before him, adding: “You shall either ask my pardon, or fight me in this way, or I will shoot you on the spot, and I presume this gentleman here will say I am fair."

The man, proud to be addressed as a gentleman, agreed it was very fair.

Andrew had forgotten the sword exercise, but from a knowledge of fire-arms he could not excuse himself. In short, the preliminaries were settled—the combatants took their stations—the man, who acted as impartial second to both parties, was to give the word when he had counted ten. He began.

Andrew was as brave as a lion when opposed to Indians in the woods; and he would have cared little had he known half a dozen guns were pointed at him, could he have been sheltered behind a tree, or crouched beneath a rock; but to stand erect, stiff as a poker, without even winking, and allow himself to be shot at, was quite another affair. He had, almost necessarily, imbibed the idea that any stratagem was fair against an enemy; but he chose an injudicious occasion for the practice of his theory. He was not, like Bacon, Milton, Columbus, and some other worthies, one step in advance of his age; and our modern duellists, who have the advantage of studying at their leisure the improved and important code of honor in all its polite and particular requirements, should be very lenient in condemning his ignorant interpretation of the said honor, which was to take care of himself.

In obedience to this law of self-preservation, he hesitated not to take advantage of the interval of counting; and to fire his pistol aimed directly at Frank's face, hurl the weapon at him, and sink nearly flat on the ground, was the work of a moment! Frank was holding his pistol aimed at Andrew's knee, for it was not his intention to take his life; at the moment he felt his antagonist's ball graze his temple he fired—Andrew was then sinking to the earth—and the ball that ought to have shattered his knee, entered his shoulder and lodged against the collar-bone.

The report of fire-arms brought a number of men to the spot. Andrew was borne off, lamenting loudly his fate, and Frank, without any complaint, submitted to be taken into custody. But on the trial, so many extenuating circumstances appeared in his favor; he had behaved, on the whole, so honorably and bravely; and Andrew had shown himself such an arrant knave, to say nothing of his cowardice, that Frank was acquitted. As every one thought the duel had originated in Frank's partiality for Miss Eleanor Bliss, he felt himself that she might have the same expectations; so, to keep up the reputation of an honorable man, he immediately offered her his hand. He certainly liked her, but it is doubtful whether he would ever have married her, had he not been involved in the quarrel on her account, because his marriage also involved the necessity of remaining in Virginia, as neither he nor his wife possessed the means of living in London. But they married, he turned planter, and soon began to acquire property—and moreover had the satisfaction of knowing they were at the head of the ton in the New World. Their descendants are now among the "first families" in Virginia.

Poor Andrew never could regain his credit, notwithstanding he urged, as an excuse for his ungallant conduct, that he was taken so unawares by the challenge, "he did not know what he did." All was vain; he was a standing jest, and, to console or revenge himself, he turned woman-hater. Poor Andrew!

The termination of that first duel at the South was so different from the first one fought at the North, where the combatants were both of low degree, and both sentenced to a ludicrous and degrading punishment,* that we may reasonably conclude much of the difference of opinion, between the two sections of our country, respecting the necessity and the honor of deciding quarrels by the single combat, must have originated in those early impressions and prejudices.

There are no two States in our Union that exhibit so many points of resemblance as Virginia and Massachusetts. Not that on the "map of the world, the situations, look you, are both alike"—it is in their histories that the coincidence exists; and we need not, with the ingenuity of Fluellen, refer to the rivers, and state there are "salmon in both" to make out the comparison between them. In the earliest notices of the two colonies, it might be remarked that they both bore the same name; but then we must confess that the term "North Virginia" included all New England, so we will only refer to the circumstance that both Virginia and Massachusetts were alike eulogized by that remarkable man, Capt. John Smith, as being the most "delectable countries" ever seen on this lower world. Then the two colonies were first settled by English emigrants only, their lawgivers were equally strict in enforcing uniformity of religious worship, and, though not of the same ceremonial, they united in persecuting the Quakers: they bargained the Indians out of their lands because they were not civilized, and then exterminated them from the face of the earth because they would not be Christianized. To mention circumstances more honorable to human nature—the inhabitants of both sections have been equally noted for their devotion to Freedom, for the jealousy with which they have watched every infringement of their rights, and the spirit with which they have resisted the encroachments of arbitrary power.

These two colonies simultaneously took the lead in the war of our Independence. The master-spirits

* The two men, who fought the first duel in Massachusetts, were arraigned before the elders of the colony, and sentenced "to be tied together, neck and heels, and thus kept twenty-four hours without meat or drink." This ridiculous punishment effectually prevented any idea of honor from being attached to the duel, and thus effectually destroyed the practice.

that directed the movements of that great event, were men of Virginia and Massachusetts. The first tragic scene of that immortal drama was performed in the one State, the closing scene in the other; and for nearly half a century the first office in the government of the Union was held by natives of those two States only. Yet the people, in their habits, manners, and peculiar modes of feeling and reasoning on many important subjects are not alike, and it would involve quite a curious philosophical investigation to trace how the circumstances of climate, soil, and other natural, and even accidental causes have modified or changed the temperament and pursuits of the people of these two Commonwealths.

The first adventurers to Virginia were speculators. To gain gold was their object: they thought little of cultivating the earth, of founding a nation, and owing their prosperity to steady industry. But, fortunately, they discovered no mines, and, after their first disappointment had subsided, and the fertility of the soil had been ascertained, they quietly betook themselves to planting and other rural pursuits, that have silently, but surely been sources of wealth. They have not, it must be acknowledged, carried onward the physical improvements of the "Old Dominion," nor the intellectual advancement of the people in a ratio corresponding with the political importance she has always held both as Colony and State. But the true nobility of soul is there, for it will be found generally that those who accumulate their property directly from the profits of the soil, are rarely engrossed by that anxiety to be rich which leads men to disgrace themselves by petty tricks, by what is called meanness and artifice.

The first settlers of Massachusetts, on the other hand, were self-denying men, who seemed to have thrown all worldly considerations to the winds: they came not to gather gold, but with the expectation of enduring labors and hardships for the mighty privilege of being free in spirit, and preparing a government where their posterity might enjoy religion unmolested. But the rough and sterile country yielded them such a scanty supply, that they were compelled to engage in the fisheries; commerce followed, and, as a foil to its real benefits, which are many, it has introduced a thirst for gain, an ardor for speculation, an avarice, which would be more excusable in the children of gold-finders than the descendants of the Puritans.

There seems to be no period of youth in the history of Massachusetts. The colony, in the beginning, may be likened to a very respectable, serious, heavenly-minded old gentleman, who has daily in his thoughts the intention of making his will; then he appears sufficiently renovated by the climate to attend to worldly calculations, but yet he never indulges in the merriment and fanciful sallies of that age—

"When the fresh blood grows lively, and returns Brisk as the April buds in primrose season."

No—he is cool, calculating, disciplined, brave; a downright energetic, sensible, middle-aged person, presenting, in his career, many good subjects for odes, orations, essays on morals and politics, and such like sublime, serious, and severe literature; but very few and meagre materials for the writers of amusing fiction.

Virginia has a far more ample field for the novelist. There was the juvenile recklessness, the rash extravagance, the dreaming of gold, in the spirit of prodigal youth, to spend it. Then there was the diversity of character among the settlers—and the savages! Smith, adventurous, unconquerable, courteous, the perfect mirror of knighthood. Powhatan, wily and vindictive as Hannibal, ambitious and brave as Cæsar; ferocious and generous, tender and terrible—a savage in situation—a sovereign in spirit. There too is Pocahontas—but to what earthly imagining shall she be likened? She has no parallel in history; neither has fiction, as yet, portrayed a feminine being like her. The novelist who could give her semblance in all its angelic benignity and purity to the world, would be immortalized. It will probably be attempted hereafter by some bold pen, when American writers of genius are suitably rewarded.

THE DESERTED HOMESTEAD.

BY JOHN M. EVANS.

I LOVE to linger o'er these scenes
Where youth's first holy hours were spent,
Where all with beauty round me teems,
Where joys and griefs seem strangely blent.
The changing seasons come and go,
Amid these old ancestral bowers—
Stern Winter, with his frost and snow—
Sweet Spring, with all her blooming flowers.

Mutation marks all earthly things—
Death severs nature's strongest ties;
Mistrust and doubt in fondest hearts,
To blast our hopes, will oft arise:
But, 'mid the changes round me wove,
The stranger's hand my home hath spared,
Beneath whose roof, th' abode of love,
Its richest blessings oft I've shared.

The proudest palace wealth can rear,
Or prince's stately marble dome,
No joys afford to equal those
That clustered round this ancient home.
Oh! could I but call back the friends
Who filled these vacant seats ranged round,
And hear once more the merry laugh
That caused my heart with joy to bound!

A mother's face among the throng,
A lovely sister's gentle lay,
Seem still to greet where'er I turn,
And chide me for my long delay:
But echo answers to the calls
That through these dreary halls resound,
While they who moved amid these scenes
In heaven superior bliss have found.

LE MÉLANGE.

EVERYTHING FROM THE SOIL.

"ALL the artists, manufacturers, and commercial-ists of the world are employed on the produce of the soil, and on that only. The watchmaker and the anchor-smith, the clothier and the lacemaker, the goldsmith and the lapidary, are all, and each of them, equally engaged in one object, namely, that of rendering the productions of the earth subservient to the use and convenience of man. The stock of every warehouse and shop, the furniture of every mansion and cottage, all implements and utensils, may easily be traced to the same origin. Even the books of the scholar, and the ink and quill through whose means he communicates his thoughts to others, are derived from the same source as the material on which the naval and civil architect exercises his ingenuity and skill. The loftiest spire and the smallest needle are both the effects of labor and skill exercised on the soil."—MIDDLETON'S Survey of Middlesex, p. 174.

COMBING THE PERUKE.

COMBING the peruke at the time when men of fashion wore large wigs was even at public places an act of gallantry. The combs for this purpose were of a very large size, of ivory or tortoise-shell, curiously chased and ornamented, and were carried in the pocket as constantly as the snuff-box. At court, on the mall, and in the boxes, gentlemen conversed and combed their perukes. There is now in being a fine picture by the elder Laroon, of John Duke of Marlborough at his levee, in which his grace is represented dressed in a scarlet suit, with large white satin cuffs, and a very long white peruke, which he combs, while his valet, who stands behind him, adjusts the curls after the comb has passed through them.—Ibid., vol. iv. p. 447.

LORD PETERBOROUGH AND THE CANARY BIRD.

"LORD PETERBOROUGH, when a young man, and about the time of the Revolution, had a passion for a young lady who was fond of birds. She had seen and heard a fine Canary bird at a coffee-house near Charing-cross, and entreated him to get it for her; the owner of it was a widow, and Lord Peterborough offered to buy it at a great price, which she refused. Finding there was no other way of coming at the bird, he determined to change it; and, getting one of the same color, with nearly the same marks, but which happened to be a hen, went to the house; the mistress of it usually sat in a room behind the bar, to which he had easy access; contriving to send her out of the way, he effected his purpose; and, upon her return, took his leave. He continued to frequent the house to avoid suspicion, but forbore saying anything of the bird till about two years after; when, taking occasion to speak of it, he said to the woman, 'I would have bought that bird of you, and you refused my money for it; I dare say you are by this time sorry for it.' 'Indeed, sir,' answered the woman, 'I am not, nor would I now take any sum for him, for—would you believe it?—from the time that our good king was forced to go abroad and leave us, the dear creature has not sung a note.'"—SIR JOHN HAWKINS'S History of Music, vol. v. p. 304.

ON THE EDUCATION OF GIRLS.

NOTHING is more neglected than the education of girls. Custom and the caprice of mothers determine it altogether. A careful education of boys is thought necessary for the public good; though it is frequently as defective as that of girls. Women in general have feebler minds than men; the weaker the mind is, the more important it is to fortify it. They have not only duties to fulfil, but duties which form the basis of social life. Is it not women who are the blessing or the ruin of families; who regulate the detail of domestic affairs; and who, of course, govern what most nearly relates to man? Thus they have a decided influence on the happiness or unhappiness of those who are connected with them. A judicious, industrious, religious woman is the soul of her family. Men, who exercise authority in public, cannot by their deliberations affect the general good, if women do not aid them. The occupations of women are not less important to the public than those of men; they have families to govern, husbands to make happy, and children to educate.

It is ignorance which renders women frivolous. When they have arrived at a certain age, without habits of application, they cannot acquire a taste for it; whatever is serious appears to them sad; whatever demands continued attention, fatigues them. Idleness and weakness thus being united to ignorance, there arises from this union a pernicious taste for amusements. Girls brought up in this idle way have an ill-regulated imagination. Their curiosity, not being directed to substantial things, is turned towards vain and dangerous objects. They read books which nourish their vanity, and become passionately fond of romances, comedies, and fanciful adventures. Their minds become visionary; they accustom themselves to the extravagant language of the heroines of romance, and are spoiled for common life.

To remedy all these evils, it is necessary to begin the education of girls with their earliest infancy.—FENELON: Selections from his Writings, p. 132.

MANNER OF EDUCATING GIRLS.

As women are in danger of superstition, we must try to enlighten and strengthen their minds. We must accustom them not to admit things without authority. Nothing is so painful as to see people of intellect and piety shudder at the thoughts of death. A woman ought to know how to resist weak fears, to be firm in danger, and to feel that a Christian, of either sex, should never be a coward; the soul of Christianity, if we may so call it, lies in the disregard of this life, and the love of another.

There are several faults which are common to girls brought up in indolence and timidity; they are incapable of a firm and steady conduct; there is a good deal of affectation in those ill-founded alarms, and those tears that they shed so easily. We must begin by treating them with indifference; we must repress our too-tender love, little flatteries, and compliments. We must teach them to speak in a concise manner. Genuine good taste consists in saying much in a few words, in choosing among our thoughts, in having some order and arrangement in what we relate, in speaking with composure; whereas, women in general are enthusiastic in their language. Little can be expected from a woman, who does not know how to express her thoughts with correctness, and how to be silent.

Girls are timid and full of false shame, which is a source of dissimulation. To correct this, we must lead them to discover their thoughts without disguise; when they are tired, to say so; and not oblige them to appear to enjoy books, or society, while fatigued by them. When they have unfortunately acquired the habit of disguising their feelings, we must show them, by examples, that it is possible to be discreet and prudent without being deceitful, and tell them that prudence consists in saying little, and distrusting ourselves more than others, not in dissembling speeches. Simplicity and truth excite more confidence, and succeed better, even in this world, than dissimulation.

What is there more delightful than to be sincere, tranquil, in harmony with our conscience, having nothing to fear and nothing to pretend; whereas she who dissembles is always agitated, and under the necessity of hiding one deception by a hundred others, and yet, with all these efforts, she never fails to be discovered; sooner or later she passes for what she is.

We should never coax children; if we do, we teach them to disguise the truth, and they never forget it. We must lead them by reason as much as possible. They observe everything. We must accustom them to speak little. The pleasure we derive from playful children often spoils them. We teach them to say everything that comes into their minds; to speak of things of which they have no distinct idea. This habit of judging with precipitation, of speaking of things without understanding them, remains during the rest of their lives, and forms a very defective order of mind.

We should never laugh at anything which is in any way associated with religion, before children. We sometimes indulge ourselves in ridiculing the devotions of a simple mind, but we commit a great fault in so doing. We should speak of God with seriousness and reverence, and never trifle upon sacred subjects. In matters of propriety, we must be careful before children.—Ibid., p. 137.

THE DUTIES OF EDUCATED WOMEN.

THE education of women, like that of men, should tend to prepare them for their duties; the difference of their employments will of course render their studies different. It is the duty of a woman to educate her children, the boys until a certain age, and girls until they are married. How much wisdom is requisite to manage the mind and disposition of each child, so as to guide their intellects, manage their humors, to anticipate the effects of their growing passions, and to rectify their errors. How much prudence should a mother have in order to maintain her authority over them, without losing their friendship and their confidence. Surely the mother of a family ought to possess a religious, mature, firm mind, acquainted with the human heart. St. Paul attaches such importance to the education of children, that he says, it is by "mothers the souls of children are saved."

I shall not attempt to specify all that they ought to know, in order to educate their children well. To do this, it would be necessary to enter into an entire detail of their studies; but we must not omit the subject of economy. Women in general are apt to neglect it, and think it proper only for the lower classes; those women, especially, who are brought up in idleness and indolence, disdain the detail of domestic life. It is nevertheless from ignorance that the science of economy is despised. The polished Greeks and Romans took care to instruct themselves in this art. That mind is of a low order which can only speak well, and cannot act well; we often meet with women who utter wise maxims, yet, nevertheless, are very frivolous in their conduct.—Ibid., p. 139.

EMPLOYMENT OF WOMEN IN CITIES.

No. II.—THE PHILADELPHIA SCHOOL OF DESIGN.

BY ALICE B. NEAL.

DID it ever occur to any of you, ladies, of the many pretty things you use daily—enjoying, with a refined taste and artistic eye, the beauty of shape and coloring—that the first process in the manufacture of each was to design the grace and loveliness afterwards brought to such perfection?

Take the journal of a summer's day, for instance. You are a thrifty housewife, perhaps, and adhere to the good old custom of washing the china and silver yourself. You like the light task; for unconsciously, perhaps, you are never weary of admiring the delicate tracery of the wrought silver, or the graceful shape and coloring of the porcelain. Then the drawing-room is to be reviewed, to see that no dust remains upon the carpet, where fruit and flowers lie crushed and tangled in wild, though graceful confusion, in colors that vie with nature's own bright tints. There are orders to be given concerning the new chintz curtains of your own room, the prettiest pattern imported this year; all your lady friends are asking that satisfactory and complimentary question, "Where did you find it?"

Now for shopping. A new wall paper for the dining-room is to be selected, and you pass a pleasant half hour in admiring the endless variety and grace which the new patterns display. An oil-cloth for the hall—here, too, variety and beauty; and then, as you are passing the upholsterer's, you cannot resist indulging yourself with another longing glance at the lace curtains you wish, but know you ought not to afford just now. "There is no harm in looking at them!" you say at least, and perhaps there is not, for the exquisite wreaths of embroidery are so beautiful in themselves. Even had you resolved to purchase, you could scarcely decide between so many attractions.

But you have only time for Levy's, and here you sit comfortably at the counter, and turn over chintzes, ginghams, mousselines, ribbons, lawns, and laces. It is not the difference in quality so much as the pattern, that keeps you hesitating so long between spots and bouquets, or perhaps the delicate shades of color are to be graduated to suit another part of your costume. But every tint, and every form is before you; there can be no complaint of a lack in variety.

On your way home, you think of the new book you have promised the children; and, as you rest from the heat and fatigue of your walk, you hear them exclaiming over the pictures, just as you did at their age, save that picture-books then bore little comparison to the beautifully illustrated volumes enjoyed by the juveniles of the present day. Yet, in all these purchases, it has not crossed your mind to wonder how the designs of the silver, the china, the carpets, curtains, oil-cloths, paper-hangings, lawns, chintzes, laces, and wood-cuts are produced; or, if the vague thought flitted past, you knew nothing at all of the matter.

We are very apt to judge of others by ourselves—it is an all-the-world custom—and such at least was our ignorance, or thoughtlessness, until we chanced to be turning over the pattern-books of a celebrated importing house, the spring patterns alone heaping a long counter, in neatly-arranged volumes that would have made any patchwork-lover wild with delight.

"These are French lawns," said our gentlemanly informant. "These are English, but stolen from French designs; you can see that by the grace of the pattern. The French people have an unapproachable genius for these things; besides, their facilities for study are greater, and they are better encouraged to produce and invent. Their Schools of Design have made a great difference of late in our patterns. English manufacturers do not hesitate to appropriate them, however."

We had heard of "Schools of Design," it is true; but, up till that time, had never connected the name with any definite understanding of their use and intent.

"There are none in this country," we were told, in answer to our inquiries. "Those established in France and England are under government patronage. So few delicate or tasteful fabrics are manufactured in this country, that patterns here are often supplied by men who have happened to fall upon that method of earning a livelihood, without previous instruction or study, and perhaps with very little, if any, artistic knowledge."

"But is it a regular business, then?"

"Yes, and a very profitable one abroad. You would scarcely believe the prices French manufacturers are ready to pay for a single successful design. It is a little fortune sometimes; and thus, you see, they can afford to make beautiful patterns in France."

We did not think to inquire if females were engaged in this graceful and essentially feminine employment, so suited to their taste, strength, and delicate skill, and the subject passed from our thoughts at the time. It was subsequently recalled by a portfolio of drawings shown us accidentally at the house of the British Consul. They were the work of a class of young girls taught at the expense of the lady of the house, whose energetic benevolence is well known in our city. It was something of an experiment. Mrs. Peter had selected her class from young girls of limited education and ordinary capabilities, such as usually have no resource but the needle. They commenced, with no knowledge of the art, at the simplest principles of drawing, and yet, interested in the novel pursuit, many of them had already made great progress, evincing even decided taste and spirit in their sketches. At first, Mrs. Peter gave up a room in her own house; but, the class increasing, a neighboring apartment was taken, where it could still be under her immediate supervision. At this time, one or two of the pupils had commenced wood engraving, a business entirely monopolized by men in this city, and, we believe, through the country, although, since it demands little physical strength, but the most delicate manipulation, it would seem better fitted for our own sex.

Such was the unostentatious commencement of the "Philadelphia School of Design for Women," an institution that is now attracting much public attention, and has been followed by the establishment of one in Boston, while in New York large subscriptions are already made for a similar purpose. Satisfied with the success of her experiment, having demonstrated that her sex had taste and industry sufficient to surmount the mechanical difficulties presenting themselves, Mrs. Peter relinquished the superintendence of her class to the Board of the Franklin Institute, some two years ago, under whose patronage it has since been conducted. Unfortunately, however, this arrangement did not include pecuniary assistance, and for this it has been dependent upon donations and annual subscriptions—at best a precarious trust; but, as the real importance of the school becomes known, a more permanent basis of endowment is hoped for by all connected with its management.

An hour's visit to the rooms which it now occupies will awaken more interest than the most eloquent appeal in its behalf, and therefore we shall be most happy to introduce you to the novel scene.

We are ushered into a small, but comfortably furnished apartment, the manager's room, where visitors are received, the business of the school transacted, and which is occupied principally by Mrs. Hill, the principal drawing teacher, and the efficient directress of the whole establishment. It is she who decides on the reception of a pupil, makes contracts for work, enforces discipline, guiding her pupils, however, by love rather than law, and is in all things devoted to the prosperity and advancement of her charge. With so much devolving upon her, she has nevertheless a kindly welcome for all interested visitors, and takes the time to explain anything that may be asked. The room is decorated with a few casts from celebrated statuary, which serve also as models. An Apollo, a Clyte, and Canova's Graces are among them; while on the walls we have framed drawings, in water colors, of the celebrated Royal Lily, the Victoria Regia, exhibited by Mr. Cope the past year, in various stages of its development. From the next room comes the low hum of the drawing class, the first department of the School of Design, and here we see the animated face of the lady we are in quest of, bending over a drawing whose towers have a Pisalike inclination, for it is the first attempt of the young girl to whom it belongs. The room is large and cool; and, through a half-open door, we have a glimpse of the dressing-closet, where the bonnets and shawls ranged in order show that a large class is in attendance. The seventy pupils, which the school now numbers, are divided into classes that have alternate days, so that all may be under the immediate supervision of the teachers. The drawing-desks are full of industrious and attentive students, though there is a playful war among a group of the younger pupils, mere school girls, in the furthest window, and one or two are leaning by the mantle, or examining a model, as they wait the instructions of their teacher. Good prints are suspended on the wall, which some are patiently copying; before others are placed models in plaster, which they study. Now a bright young face looks up with a smile from a flower-piece, her first attempt perhaps at water colors; and on the desk stands a single rosebud in a wineglass, which her neighbor is transferring to the paper before her. Here a landscape in pencil, there a single figure, or beyond, placed by the window, so that it may catch the sunshine and the sweet morning air, the golden blossoms of a healthy plant are nodding, conscious, it would almost seem, of the attempt to imitate its beauty. It is a new seedling, and the drawing will be engraved for the next number of a horticultural magazine. How lifelike the shape and colors seem! The most graceful position of stem and blossoms has been seized, and transferred with a boldness, yet a correctness that would do credit to a more accomplished artist. The scarlet bells of a fuchsia are drooping near it, also a "living model" for the pencil, and others have arranged cut blossoms into groups, placed in simple vases before them.

It is here that the mechanical skill and correctness are acquired, which must, of course, form the basis of all design.

Many of the pupils in this department are, therefore, young girls, with bright, animated faces, and an exuberance of spirits that needs the watchful eye and gentle firmness of their instructress to control. Some of them are a study in themselves, as they bend over their pleasant tasks, or lean, in thoughtful mood, upon their hands, surveying critically what they have already accomplished; the graceful turn of the head, with a wealth of curls, or smoothly banded hair, or a coil of heavy braids suiting a profile as classic as the model before them.

Others have more thoughtful faces; life's struggle, perhaps with care and want, from which this will win a release, has already commenced. Study is with them an earnest purpose, and every moment golden; for others will be dependent upon the labors of their hands. And here, sadder still, the bowed figure, and the gentle smile of pain and patience, mark a sufferer, it may be, for life, to whom this knowledge will be not only an occupation, but one full of the holiest ministry, by bringing constant and unwearied interest, and pleasant thoughts to beguile the monotonous round of the invalid's lonely hours.

The pattern-room has a more novel aspect, though there are not so many at the desks, and there is a more methodical and business-like air about those who occupy them. The walls are filled with strips of paper hangings, or gay flowers, on dark backgrounds, less pleasing in their first aspect than the engravings and prints of the outer room; but here we have also the application of those studies. It does not seem particularly interesting, at first, to watch the flowers, leaves, and tendrils which the young lady we approach is sketching roughly in charcoal upon a white ground. She does not know that we are observing her, and goes on, apparently without an object, until her paper is filled with these fragmentary studies. But here is a leaf that she seems to like; it is transferred to a more open space, a spray from another corner is added, rubbed out, drawn again, but with a different inclination. Now an open blossom, apparently a rude imitation of a rose, then a spray of bells, with the stem entwining the heavier stalk of the rose, the blossom of a sweet pea, with its curling tendrils; and the half-satisfied artist holds up the rough sketch to catch the effect, for the first time noticing that she is observed. But it does not confuse her, visitors are often admitted, and she goes on with a quiet and ladylike self-possession. She is designing a mousseline-de-laine pattern, that you may possibly chance to wear this winter, or at least see at your dressmaker's, the property of some lady who has a fancy for those bright styles that would not suit your figure or complexion.

Now she has an idea of what she intends the figure shall be. A smaller square of paper is produced, and she proceeds to cover it with a dark chocolate ground, in tempera, or water colors, thickened with a size or glue, which gives something the effect of those on wall-paper. On this the tiny bouquet she has designed is placed, every touch being in full relief; now a stem, now a petal is added, until the whole shall receive her own approbation or that of her teacher, who is busy, with a large drawing-board before him, in a distant part of the room. The combination and execution are not so speedily finished as described; but this is the process, the result of previous study, both in taste and skill.

There is a pile of finished patterns submitted to our inspection; those which even your inexperienced eye selects as superior to the rest are already ordered for a manufactory; the others are merely studies, or are still for sale. You can see also the great improvement effected in this year's patterns over the last, both in grace and ease of design, and smoothness of execution. Here are some intended for lawns or fine chintzes, in contrast to the warm coloring of the mousselines, a white or pale tinted ground, with a delicate spot, star, leaf, or lozenge, in some contrasting tint. What infinite variety and cheerful fancy! And this is a business increasing yearly in importance; for the present season, the richest Organdies have been produced by the French manufacturers, so beautiful in design that they have taken the place of silk fabrics in demi-toilets. They are printed à disposition, as it is called, as brocades are now woven; that is, one pattern for the skirt, another corresponding, but still different, for the waist and sleeves, and a running border for the five flounces which fashion at present dictates. Exquisite cashmeres and tissues are also printed in this style, plain colors being voted out of date, so richly ornamented are the designs and colors in use. This branch of the school will therefore be one of the most lucrative connected with it, as well as one of the lightest and most truly feminine employments that can be chosen.

But here we have scrolls and arabesques on a larger scale, and recognize something very like a fine wall-paper, in the corner, already finished. This also is an order; and those three patterns near you have been printed from the designs of the same young lady, one of the original pupils, who displays unusual promise in her profession. The richest of these is more commonly called "gilt paper," being in white, two shades of stone color and gold. It was printed at the large manufactory of Howell & Brothers, in this city, where it is already a favorite pattern. In these there is also great variety, both in design and coloring; they compare with the chintzes in popularity, and the price they will readily command from the manufacturers. The rich bordering gives more scope for tasteful fancy, as you will see by the specimens exhibited.

A third is occupied with the neutral tints in squares and diamonds, which mark the present favorite styles of oil-cloths for entrance halls, and near her, in more glowing colors and larger proportions, an order for a carpet manufactory is being executed. In all of these, nearly the same method is pursued as that at first described, the pattern, of course, being correspondingly proportioned.

Now we find something quite as novel to unpractised eyes. This window is occupied by a small table, where one of the pupils is busily employed in drawing; but neither on Bristol board nor drawing-paper of any description. A heavy block of smooth gray stone, smoother than the paper itself, receives the fine touches of her crayon. She is lithographing; and these prints lying beside her are proof impressions of a drawing just completed, spirited, clear, far better than many lithographs exhibited for sale in the windows of the print-seller, or bound up in the cheap literature of the day; yet, until very lately, no woman has ever thought of attempting it.

But this reminds us of a not less important, or, in the end, less profitable employment—the wood-cutting department. It is a smaller room, and under the charge of a distinct teacher. But perhaps you, ladies, know as little as we ourselves did a few years since, of this process. A hard block of pear-tree wood is carefully prepared, almost as smooth as the stone, on which a drawing is made. The lights of the picture are then carefully cut out, leaving raised lines or ridges in the wood, which correspond to the raised letter on a common type, from which it is printed. Turn to any wood-cut in the magazine, and you will see what care and delicacy this requires; or hold—some of the very prints they are now cutting will be found in our fashion department the present number, the caps, which will challenge comparison with any others in the “Book,” the work of far more practised hands. In no department of the school has more rapid advancement been made; and, as the present demand for illustrated books, magazines, and newspapers is still increasing, its value and importance become obvious.

Still another department claims our notice, if you have patience or time remaining, the last now in operation. Did it occur to you to wonder how the design for the wall-paper was to be transferred to the endless strips displayed in the warehouse of the manufacturer? These, too, are printed from wooden blocks, on which the pattern has to be first traced in pencil, and then cut like a coarse wood engraving. They are perhaps half a yard square, and the wood is to be cut away much more from the design; consequently, larger tools and more manual labor are needed. The operator stands at her work with chisel and mallet, patiently and carefully bringing out the complicated design. It seems the hardest work of any, yet those who have chosen it prefer it to any other department in the school. There must be a separate block for every color introduced, so here also is an ample field of employment.

“Is it not hard work?” we say to a young girl almost too busy to notice our approach.

“Not very, except all work is hard, you know,” she answers, shaking back the long curls that have fallen over her shoulder.

No doubt she finds all work hard, for she is very young, not more than fifteen; but how much better this than the close workshop, or the constrained position of the needlewoman! Here also we find a competent teacher, interested in the success of his pupils.

And now we return to the board-room, to discuss the management of the school, full of wonder at its rapid advance and active results.

We find the terms of instruction merely nominal, when we consider the great expense by which such an institution is conducted. Four dollars a quarter for the drawing-class, or, if circumstances seem to require it, only an entrance fee of half that sum, is required. No pupil can pass from this to the industrial department without a careful examination of progress, and even then is required to spend a part of every day in drawing. The principal has knowledge of the character and pursuits of every pupil, and thus there is a great moral influence excited, as well as in the study itself; for, “by infusing a love of the beautiful, the fine arts have a tendency to disgust the mind with the deformity of vice, and, though not always leading to the practice of virtue, they at least tend to the admiration of it.”

Yet, strange as it may seem, both at home and abroad, there has been, and still continues to be, opposition to the employment of women in a business evidently so well suited to them, on the plea that it is going out of their sphere, and taking work from those to whom it rightfully belongs.

The importance of Schools of Design to manufacturers no one now attempts to dispute. In looking over the official reports made to the Board of Trade of the English Government Schools, we everywhere find this acknowledged. Speaking of the branch school, Coventry, they say, “Previously to the establishment of the school the manufacturers were dependent upon French designs, which are, indeed, still forced upon them by the influence of fashion; their present obligations, and their hopes of the future, are effectually acknowledged by their support of it.”

And at Nottingham, so celebrated for its lace manufactories, the hope is expressed that, in their lace curtains, they “shall soon be able to compete with France and Belgium in what has hitherto been the stronghold of the foreign market—beauty of design.”

At Stoke and Hanly, where the great porcelain manufactories are situated, the official report speaks more plainly of the discouragement attending the female schools:—

“There is the usual difficulty to be reported in the maintenance of the female classes. Whatever reason may be put forward for their failure, the real and efficient cause is the envy and jealousy of the male artisans, and the offensive regulations with regard to the employment of women in manufactories. In offering prizes for competition, the manufacturers hope to see this done away with, and to extend so congenial an employment as executing designs for porcelain to women, for which the school must qualify them rapidly."

But we have a still more unprejudiced testimony to adduce, which we noted some two years since, in an able article upon the rise and fortunes of the Peel family, in the "Manchester (England) Examiner and Times." In speaking of the chints manufactories of Peel and Yates, the writer pauses to say, "It has often been a matter of surprise to me that women are never educated as pattern designers. Surely, in the present very great dearth of profitable female employment, some good father or brother might have thought of this; for it seems one especially suited to a woman's nature, and its object is the garments she herself exclusively wears. Perhaps man will some time resign to the more graceful and gentle sex an occupation so delicate and fanciful, and one every way befitting them as an employment; for, by a quick and vivid fancy, joined to a delicate and sensitive touch, woman appears formed, with proper education, to excel in this art. And I believe, generally speaking, with the same instruction, a young woman, from her greater quickness of perception and innate love and aspirations for the beautiful, will in five years arrive at a higher degree of excellence than a youth in the same time."

An unbiassed opinion, so gracefully expressed, must "carry weight;" and we have introduced it as summing up the principal reasons in support of our proposition, that all branches of design are essentially suited to the feminine employments. With every necessary natural and artistic qualification, the graceful pursuit can be conducted in the quiet of home, with surroundings that must of themselves bring pure and beautiful thoughts. When novelty and jealousy shall have ceased to excite envy and suspicion among those who would keep our sex from honest independence, a wide sphere of employment will be opened by this and similar institutions to educated, intelligent women; for surely, if English manufacturers are not content to be under the control of foreign influence, our own countrymen can never be.

THE SWEETEST SLEEP; OR, THE POET'S FIRST INSPIRATION.

A SKETCH FROM LIFE.

BY F. A. GAGE.

POETS are inspired. The world says so; and the world is a gray-headed teacher, whose words may not lightly be doubted. But the world simply asserts a general fact; so we, without irreverence, may qualify, describe, and illustrate it.

A great inspiration makes a great poet; a commonized one a common kind of a poet; and a small one a proportionately small poet. But when inspiration is resolved into its true limits, it appears like all things else in nature to be made. The mind of the poet is cut off from its accustomed channels for a season of its own accord, and all its powers are concentrated in a single shoot, which stretches upward with prodigious speed, and spreads out its broad and tender leaves in the genial light. And, like its counterpart in nature, it is forced beyond its allotted bounds by the impulse, and is often cut down unfinished by the frosts of autumn. Whether it be rough and strong like the oak, dark and towering like the pine, smooth and delicate like the maple, or meek and lowly like the weeping willow, depends upon the natural qualities of the source from which it springs; for the offspring reflects the image of the fount: a gloomy mind produces gloomy thoughts, and a merry mind inspires mirth.

And, now that we have qualified and described, let us illustrate.

In a little New England country village, known far and near by the appropriate title of Tattleville, lived a youth of quiet, but humorous turn of mind, who amused himself during his leisure moments writing prose for "the papers." Thus far, he had not dared to "try his hand" at poetry; but one day, as he was repeating to himself,

*'Tis sweet to sleep where wild-flowers bloom
Around the pilgrim's forest tomb—*

a rhyme he had made without meaning to—an uncommonly ludicrous idea disturbed the even tenor of his thoughts. 'Twas the birth of inspiration. Immediately all the powers of his mind gathered around it; and, after two days' growth, it developed into the following elevated poem:—

*'Tis sweet to sleep where wild flowers bloom
Around the pilgrim's forest tomb,
Where naught but wild-bird's carol gay
Is heard from dawn till dusk of day!*

*'Tis sweet to sleep where mermaids dwell,
Far down within some rocky dell,
Where playful sea-fish find a home,
And earth's wild sorrows never come.*

*'Tis sweet to sleep where wild winds rave
Above the sailor's island grave;
'Tis sweet, when life's rough voyage is o'er,
To sleep where billows roll no more.*

'Tis sweet to sleep at glory's call,
'Tis sweet upon her field to fall;
But sweeter far his sleep shall be
Who falls defending Liberty!

This brought him to the point where he wished to introduce his ludicrous idea, and render the change from the sublime sudden and irresistible. But, like the natural life to which we have compared it, his inspiration had spent its force, and no exertion of his could bring it back to finish its work. The result was inevitable. There was a great falling off of the green leaves of skill, leaving the knotty and uneven stalk without an ornament. The first two lines were obscure, the third contained three feet of anapest instead of the four feet of trochee that preceded and followed it, while the fourth was decidedly plain. But go it must, and go it did; for, though the mirthful inspiration of our poet had passed away, the root remained.

In the next week's edition of the "Tattleville Gazette," the editor inserted, "If the author of 'Tis Sweet to Sleep' will call at this office, we will show him something that may be for his interest to see."

In due time, the young sprig of a rhymer paid his respects to that, to him, important personage, who immediately produced his communication, and inquired the meaning of the concluding verse.

"I meant to raise a laugh," he replied, "by the oddity of the idea, and the sudden change from the sublime to the ridiculous."

"I suppose it is original?" observed the editor, inquiringly, coming at once, and not very guardedly, to the point.

"Certainly, sir, certainly," replied the other, with a confiding frankness that put his well-founded suspicions to flight.

"I thought I had read a poem very much like it, somewhere," continued the editor, evasively, evidently wishing to turn the subject as quickly and as lightly as possible, now that he saw his error. "I will send it to you, if I can find it."

"I shall be happy to see it," returned the bard; "for, if there is a similarity, it must be accidental." And, after agreeing to a compromise, which was nothing less than the decapitation of the child of his brains, he received the assurance that its remains should be attended to, and took his leave. "Bold tactics for me," he exclaimed, as he merrily plodded homeward. "Had I not faced the enemy, he would have taken me for a cowardly thief." Then he repeated the suspicious verse—

"For sleeps like these we'll shed no tear;
Far sweetest is the drunkard's bier,
When he tumbles, because of his glasses,
Into a hoghead of molasses!"

The intended ideas of which, had not his inspiration failed him, he would have conveyed by rhym-

ing that he would not weep if he could not enjoy such sweet slumbers, and then he would have assigned the reason by thus delicately hinting his preference—

Far sweetest is the drunkard's sleep,
When he falls into a hoghead deep!

The moral of our story, O ye unripened twigs of inspiration! is—whittle your arrow down to a point, that it may not rebound and pierce the heart of him who gives it flight.

RECEIPT FOR A FASHIONABLE NOVEL.

TAKE your hero and heroine and put them on to simmer, taking care they do not boil over during the first Volume.

Be sure to throw in a sufficient quantity of Dukes and Duchesses, and season plentifully with Al-macks, the Opera, and Devonshire House. Some literary celebrities might be added, but they must not be too pungent.

Put to these a pound and a half of love, an ounce of jealousy, and three or four drops of morality, just to give it a consistence; but be careful not to put too much of the latter, or it might turn out heavy. To prevent this, sprinkle it over with plenty of small talk, (if you can procure any wit, so much the better,) and lard it well with quotations, French phrases and incidents, which need have nothing to do with the main story. You may flavor with a little sentiment, but take care it is not too romantic, or poetical, or the whole might ferment. A spice of impropriety, and a crime or two, if well glazed over, would be an improvement as a sauce piquant.

After having well stirred and strained them, you may pour all the personages into a country seat, or park, and leave the ingredients to work together during the second volume. Be sure you drop in a country ball, an election, private theatricals, and moonlight walks in plenty. You should then begin to consider how you mean it to turn out, and let the plot thicken. If it be to end well, and all to be cleared up like a calves-foot jelly, the most approved method is for the hero and heroine to meet in the first volume, quarrel in the second, and marry in the third. But if the other plan, more like an Italian cream, be adopted, your heroine should marry towards the end of the first volume, fall in love in the second, and elope in the third. You may either kill her or not, as it suits you.

Having determined this point, spin your novel out, and strain it to the utmost, then butter the dish well with flattery of popular authors, garnish the heads of the chapters with German and Italian mottoes, and it will be sure to turn out to your wishes.

POETRY.

THE ENGLISH LARK.

BY ANNE MARIA W. WARD.

THE morning sun is shining bright on merry England's hills,
And fragrance from the dewy flowers the air with sweetness fills;

A thousand beauties greet the eye, and melodies the ear—
Nature puts on her loveliest face, and all her charms appear.

The feathered warblers have begun their matin carols now,
And songs of praise ascend to God from many a waving bough;

But sweetest of the tuneful notes in that wild concert given,
Is heard the music of the Lark as she ascends to heaven.

Uprising from her lowly nest, she spreads the downy wing,
And, mounting upward toward the skies, her sweetest song doth sing:

Still onward in the blue expanse and upward is her flight,
Till in ethereal realms above she soars beyond our sight.

But still her cheerful song is heard in softer, sweeter notes,
As, by celestial breezes borne, upon the air it floats:

What is it, heavenward-soaring bird, attracts thy upward flight?

What glories does thine eye behold in yonder realms of light?

So doth the Christian love at morn a cheerful song to raise;
He loves to lift his heart in prayer, and raise his voice in praise:

The quiet hours of opening day are to devotion given—
He with the lark doth soar aloft, and converse hold with Heaven.

Why should the golden morning hours, the best of all the day,
Upon a soft and downy couch be idly thrown away?

No! rather, with the early lark, our souls shall heavenward rise—

And we'll bring back again to earth the spirit of the skies.

The bird descends on graceful wing, she takes her homeward flight,

Returning to her lowly nest from that celestial height!
And so the Christian, who enjoys communion with his God,
Seeks not a lofty sphere on earth, where mortals may applaud,

But from the loftiest height of bliss to which his soul may soar,

Returns to humble duties, far more humble than before.

Sweet bird! still warble forth thy song while thou art on the wing;*

The Christian, too, and he alone, when leaving earth can sing;

While heaven is bursting on his view, and rapture fills his soul,

He sings the song of victory, for he has reached the goal.

* The lark is the only bird that sings when flying.

SONG.

BY WILLIAM E. GILMORE.

THE hearth was piled with glowing coals,
Diffusing warmth and ruddy light;
Alone, with ANNIE in my arms,
Oh, I was happy yester-night;

Her beating heart, I felt its throb
When'er I strained her to my breast,
And in its raptured trembling, read
The love I wooed her for, confessed.

Her tearful eyes, so bright and blue,
Turned not their melting rays on me;
Upon the shadowy cell she gazed,
Like one who dreams in ecstasy.

And not with words we plighted faith,
Words would the blissful spell have broken;
Yet firmer, truer vows than ours,
Oh, never yet hath lover spoken.

All fears, all sorrows I forgot—
My soul was ravished with delight;
Alone, with ANNIE in my arms,
Oh, I was happy yester-night.

EGERIA.—A PORTRAIT.

BY J. W. BRYCE.

Oh, she was beautiful! The Poet's dream
Embodied ne'er a form more heavenly fair:
All elements of loveliness did seem
With tribute offerings to gather there,
And blend to render one beyond compare!
Each charming grace so modestly she wore,
And yet she moved with so divine an air,
That, while enough of earth to love, no more
Was hers, there was enough of Heaven to adore!

Her eyes, so sweet, serene, and softly blue,
Were filled with bright intelligence the while—
To purest thought and gentlest feeling true;
Artless their every glance, and free from guile—
And that resistless witchery, to wile
The heart away, to her was freely given.

You should have felt the influence of her smile:
The quickening ray Prometheus stole from Heaven
To animate his dust, had not more magic even.

Her form was cast in nature's perfect mould—
More fair than e'er in Grace or Nymph shone forth;
And fancy still is tame, and words are cold
To paint its matchless beauties, as her worth:
For ne'er before to one of mortal birth
Did all creation's harmonies impart
Such gentle type of loveliness and truth—
Peerless in nature, and transcending art:
Such was the sweet Egeria of my youthful heart.

TWILIGHT DREAMS.

BY MARIE ROSEAU.

In the stillness and the twilight of this dimly-lighted room,
Where the glow from burning embers but half dissipates
the gloom,

While without is dreary darkness, and upon the window-pane,

Like gems of ocean, glitter the crystal drops of rain,
I may sit, in pensive musing, with my eyes upon the fire,
To watch the vivid blazes as they spread and then expire,
And recall the olden memories in dim array that pass,
As a host of phantom pictures in a syren's magic glass;
Or dream the untold future, and a fairy structure raise,
Perchance in air to vanish as the bright, uncertain blaze.

The past its spell is throwing upon my dreamy brain,
And I see, as in a vision, the pleasant room again,
Where a household band we gathered around the glowing hearth,

To listen to some tale of old, or sing in gleeful mirth;
Where I, a little, careless child, have sat upon the floor,
And, gazing on the embers, sought the mystery to explore
Of strange, fantastic figures appearing 'mid them then,
In varied form, and shaping of birds, and beasts, and men;
Or have turned, in wild excitement, as upon my eye would fall

The gaunt and spectral shadows that were moving on the wall—

Have gazed until my brain has reeled in tumult of surprise,
At the vague, uncouth proportions that danced before my eyes.

I scarcely see a shadow now, but comes that transport wild,
That strange, delirious feeling that thrilled me when a child.

Another picture glideth before the magic glass,
In panoramic order, as one by one they pass.
It is a pensive vision, and sombre to behold;
No tints of purple decking, no brilliant hues of gold.
The household now are gathered; but one is missing there—
The father—he who sat within that vacant fireside chair.
The room is hushed and quiet, there sounds no voices now,
But silence reigns, and sorrow resteth sadly on each brow.
The shadows seem to deepen and lengthen on the wall,
Until they bear the semblance of sable plumes and pall.
Yet sounds a voice from Heaven within that twilight room—
The youngest lists unheeding those fearful shades of gloom—
And hopeful thoughts are wakened within each mourning breast,
As come the words of comfort: "The dead in Christ are blest."

Again the pageant moveth; another scene is here,
And gay and mirthful parties of youthful forms appear;
And music sweetly soundeth, in measures quick and free,
From chorals of art's invention and childhood's laugh of glee.

Tumultuous is the transport that fills the happy throng:—
The fire gleams bright, and quickly the shadows move along.

I fain would stop this picture; but it is passing now—
Another view appeareth, and 'neath its spell I bow.

Again a sombre shadow across the scene is thrown,
Again deep silence resteth within that room alone.
I cannot tell the conflict which moves that household train,
The deep, unspoken sorrow, the bitter grief and pain

Another form has vanished, there's another vacant chair,
Another bond is shattered, and mute the soul's despair.
No human music lingers, no earthly sound is heard;
But soon within that silent room again the air is stirred.
Again that word of comfort, and low the mourners bow,
A still small voice from Heaven is sweetly speaking now.
The fearful storm is over, the whirlwind and the strife.
And with a calm attention they hear the words of life:
"Why do ye mourn in sorrow a weary one at rest?
Why weep in bitter sadness a careworn spirit blest!"

This scene is now departing; the present comes in sight,
Its trials and its blessings, its shadows and its light.
The quiet, homely comforts which now I highly prize,
Were once esteemed as meaner things—worth nothing in my eyes.

Here I must pause; old memories, the past, its joys and woes,
Have gone, and present scenes have brought the pageant to its close.

I may not dream the future when reality is here,
Its sober prose forbiddeth all visions to appear

LINES.

BY M—.

We thank thee, O our Father! for the memories of the past;
Thanks for that life so good and true, and loving to the last:
Thanks for those hallowed words of faith from our beloved given,
Ere Thou, in "loving kindness," called her spirit home to Heaven.

Dear mother! from thy spirit may an influence sweet descend,
To hover round our pathway, and its blessed presence lend;
To strengthen and turn heavenward the yearnings of the soul,
That, like an ever-gushing rill, through its deep fountains roll.

To comfort and support us, 'midst the anguish and the tears
That have been ours—that may be ours, through long and weary years;

To guide and bear us safely through the conflict and the strife,
Until at length the goal is reached—our battle fought with life.

And when our time of passing through Death's shadowy vale comes on,
Our hearts will falter not, or fear—thou hast the journey won!

And oh! all trustingly we hope, after a "little while,"
To meet, where partings never come, thy beaming, welcome smile!

MOONLIGHT.

BY M. H. FORTUNE.

'Tis a moonlit hour where the ivy hangs
From a mouldering castle wall,
And many a wild flower peeps from out
The nooks of that ancient hall;
And the soft light shines through the casement wide,
And silvers the broken floor,
Where light feet oft through the dance have moved,
In the golden days of yore.

Oh, that holy light! It has travelled far,
It has pierced through the dungeon's gloom;
It has carved a ray from its pure, bright source
To lay on the silent tomb:
It has bathed in glory the poor man's hearth,
It has rested in regal halls,
And 'tis sleeping now, in a soul-felt calm,
On those old deserted walls.

It is streaming bright through the aspen leaves,
So still in the breathless hour,
Like arrows swift from the queen of night,
That come in a silver shower,
To lay in streaks on the polished floor,
Or fall through the portal gray,
As gleams of mem'ry come once more
From the hours long passed away.

Oh, many a troubled, earth-worn heart
Has bent to that tender power,
To the breathing influence, calm and wild,
That mantles a moonlit hour!
And many a heart looks back to find
Its happiest hours in one,
Near a kindly heart, 'mid some peaceful scene,
Where the light of the fair moon shone!

A LEGEND OF THE "FORGET-ME-NOT."

BY MRS. A. A. BARNES.

BESIDE a lonely streamlet's margin,
'Mid the deluge's wreck profound,
A fallen angel, lone, despairing,
Bowed himself upon the ground.

For weary months, with plumes all drooping,
Hovered he the dark floods o'er;
No living thing moved on the waters,
Save those the ark in silence bore.

Now were his winglets' downy whiteness
Dabbled by the dark soil o'er,
His heart immortal wellnigh bursting,
On that once familiar shore.

That love-lit bower, alas! no vestige
Met the starlight of his eyes,
Where he had lost, for love of woman,
His seat in yon celestial skies.

"Loveliest flower among the blossoms,
By the deluge swept away!"
Thus groaned he in the dust, not daring
To raise his eyes to heaven's pure day.

"How oft thy form and voice through ether,
Which I ne'er shall trace again,
Came floating 'mid the white-winged cherubs,
And the holy anthem's strain!

"Oh, never, in the golden sunset,
Shall I list thy accents more!
Far sweeter than the music floating
O'er the envied heavenly shore.

"Lovelier than the perfumed blossoms,
In immortal gardens there,
Were thy pure brow's snowy whiteness,
And the sunshine of thy hair.

"Ah! with the valley's dark clouds blended,
Now thy golden ringlets lie!
While all dark, and dimmed, and rayless
Is the radiance of thine eye!"

He rose, now mute and sad, despairing,
His bowed face shaded by his hand,
His ringlets o'er his shoulders waving,
Once by heavenly breezes fanned.

And tears, the first from eyes immortal,
Fell in showers upon the ground;
The sweet "forget-me-not," upspringing,
Covered far the waste around.

Her voice, whose love had cost him Heaven,
Now rose softly on the air;
With outstretched arms and breath suspended,
Knelt he 'mid the blue flowers there.

The legend saith, where wave the blossoms,
Boon of that lost angel's tears,
In sorrow hath his spirit wandered
Through lapse of many thousand years.

THE WIFE.

"Faithful unto death."

FORSAKE thee? Never! Though the mark
Of Cain were stamped upon thy brow,
Though thy whole soul with guilt were dark,
Fear not that I will leave thee now.

No; underneath the listening stars
I bound my life, my all to thee;
Not crime and sin can break the bars—
'Tis death alone can set me free.

Thine, thine, "for better or for worse,"
Through joy and sorrow, bliss and pain;
Thy crimes I hate, which bring a curse,
But love and cleave to thee the same.

And who is left thee now but me?
The world look on in pride and scorn.
Oh, dark, indeed, thy way would be,
With little hope of brightening morn,

Alone to tread the downward road,
Without one pitying hand to save!
No, dearest, I will share the load,
Our parting spot shall be the grave.

And when remorse is on thy breast,
And dark thy brow with inward pain,
Oh, be it mine to tell of rest,
And lead thee to the path again!

To smooth the narrow way to peace,
To cheer thy hopes, to soothe thy fears,
Bid thy remorseful anguish cease,
And wipe away thy bitter tears;

Or, if my pleading love is vain,
And deeper, blacker crimes ascend,
My breaking heart shall tell no tale,
But steadfast follow to the end.

When shadowy death shall break the chain
That bound us in a life-long spell,
The grave alone disputes thy reign,
Then only will I say—Farewell.

M. W.

SONNET.—EARLY AUTUMN.

BY M. B. W. HOUGH.

SHE stands, a gentle maiden, by me now,
 With robe of beaming gold, and on her brow
 A garland of the bright, yet faded leaves,
 Which from the spoil of summer's wealth she weaves.
 Her smile is bland; her breath is on my cheek
 Inspiring, grateful; but her murmurs speak
 Of long hours wasted in my summer past,
 And of my autumn, that approaches fast.
 She cheers me then, with words of peace and hope;
 Through spirit-darkness bids me onwards grope;
 With truth's opposers fires my soul to cope.
 Oft 'mid her tresses gleams the frozen dew,
 Yet will I love her life's long journey through,
 So mild and gentle, yet so sternly true.

THREE SONGS FOR THREE BELLES.

BY MRS. P. P. LOMPATRAE.

TO MISS C. S.

LOVE not too well, O maiden fair—
 For those who love must weep;
 And pity 'tis that tears should dim
 Thy bright eyes' lucid deep:
 Love not too well, love not too well—
 For those who love must weep.

The dew which sparkles on the rose,
 Exhaled, ascends on high,
 To fall, perchance, e'er day be done,
 In anger from the sky:
 Love not too well, O gentle one—
 For those who love must weep.

And clouds which in the sunlight glow
 With purple and with gold,
 Within their azure depths full oft
 The lightning dire enfold:
 Thou of the gentle voice and soft,
 'Tis they who love must weep.

No flower which opens to the day
 But has its hour to fade,
 And 'tis the fair sun's brightest ray
 Which makes the deepest shade:
 Love not too well, O maiden gay—
 For those who love must weep.

Just like that rosy cloud is love,
 Or like the sparkling dew,
 It lures us on with withering mien,
 But hides its danger too:
 The memory, e'en, of joy is pain,
 And those who love must weep.

TO MISS A. L.

LOVELY lady, gentle lady,
 Lady with the eyes of jet,
